Lachesis (pron. Lak'esis). One of the three Fates; the one that spins the thread of life, which Atropos cuts off, while Clotho holds the distaff.

Lacon'ic. Very concise and pithy. A Spartan was called a Lacon from Laco'nia, the land in which he dwelt. The Spartans were noted for their brusque and sententious speech. When Philip of Macedon wrote to the Spartan magistrates, "If I enter Laco'nia I will level Lacedæmon to the ground," the ephors wrote word back the single word, "If." The Greek ι, being the smallest of the alphabet, is called the Lacedæmonian letter.

Lacus'trine Deposits. Deposits formed at the bottom of fresh-water pools and lakes. (Latin, lacus, a lake.)

Lacus'trine Habitations. The remains of human dwellings of great antiquity, constructed on certain lakes in Ireland, Switzerland, &c. They seem to have been villages built on piles in the middle of a lake.

Lad and Lass. A lad is one led or in "leading strings" under a pedagogue (ped-agogue, boy-leader). Lass is "lad-ess" contracted first into "la'ess," and then into "lass." (See Miss.)

Lad o' Wax. A little boy, a doll of a man. In "Romeo and Juliet," the Nurse calls Paris "a man of wax," meaning a very "proper man." Horace speaks of the "waxen arms of Tel'ephus," meaning well modelled.

La'das. Alexander's messenger, noted for his swiftness of foot.

La'don. One of the dogs of Actæon. La'on. The dragon which guarded the apples of the Hesperid's.

Lady. A woman of wealth, station, or rank. Verstegan says, "It was anciently written Hleaf'dian or Leaf'dian, contracted first into lafly, and then into Lady. La'f or lla'f (loaf) means food in general or bread in particular, and dian means 'to serve,' whence Leaf'dian means 'bread-server.' The lord sup- plied the food, and the lady saw that it was properly served, for ladies used to carve and distribute the food to the guests."

Ladies retire to the drawing-room after dinner, and leave the gentlemen behind. This custom was brought in by the Norsemen. The Vikings always dismissed all women from their drinking parties.—S. Bunbury.

Lady-bird. The bishop Barnaby, called in German, Unsers herrn huhn (our Lady-fowl), Marien-huhn (Mary-fowl), and Marien Käfer (Mary's beetle). "Cushcow Lady," as it is called in Yorkshire, is also the German Marien-kalbchen (Lady-cow). Probably our bird in this instance is a corruption of bug. Thus the cockchafer is called the May bug, where the German käfer is rendered bug; and several of the scarabæi are called bugs, as the rose-bug. (See BISHOP.)

Lady Bountiful. The benevolent lady of a village. The character of Lady Bountiful is from the "Beaux' Strata-gem," by Farquhar.

Lady Chapel. The small chapel behind the screen of the high altar; so called because usually dedicated to the Virgin Mary.

Lady-day. The 25th of March, to commemorate the Annunciation of Our Lady, the Virgin Mary.

Lady Isabella, the beloved daughter of a noble lord, accompanied her father and mother on a chase one day, when her step-mother requested her to return and tell the master-cook to prepare "the milk-white doe for dinner." Lady Isabella did as she was told, and the master-cook replied, "Thou art the doe that I must dress." The scullion-boy exclaimed, "O save the lady's life, and make thy pies of me;" but the master-cook heeded him not. When the lord returned he called for his daughter, the fair Isabelle, and the scullion-boy said, "If now you will your daughter see, my lord, cut up that pie." When the fond father comprehended the awful tragedy, he adjudged the cruel step-dame to be burnt alive, and the master-cook "in boiling lead to stand;" but the scullion-boy he made his heir. — Percy, "Reliques," &c., series iii., bk. 2.

Lady Majestrate. Queen Mary made lady Berkley a justice of the peace for Gloucestershire, and appointed her to the quorum of Suffolk. Lady Berkley sat on the bench at assizes and sessions, girt with a sword. Tony Lumpkin says of Mr. Harcastle—

He'll persuade you, that his mother was an alderman and his aunt a justice of the peace.—Goldsmith, "She Stoops to Conquer."

Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, founded in 1502 by the mother of Henry VII. The year following, she founded a preachership, both in the University of Cambridge.

Lady of England. Matilda, daughter of Henry I. The title of "Domina Anglorum" was conferred upon her by the council of Winchester, held April 7th, 1141.

Lady of Mercy (Our). An order of knighthood in Spain, instituted in 1218 by James I. of Aragon, for the deliverance of Christian captives amongst the Moors. Within the first six years as many as 400 captives were rescued by these knights.

Lady of Shalott. A maiden who fell in love with Sir Lancelot of the Lake, and died because her love was not returned. Tennyson has a poem on the subject, and the story of Elaine, "the lily maid of Astolat," in the "Idylls of the King," is substantially the same. (See ELAINE.)

Lady of the Bleeding Heart. A Douglas; so called from the cognisance of the family. In the "Lady of the Lake," ii. 10, Ellen Douglas is so called.

Lady of the Haystack—made her appearance in 1776 at Bourton, near Bristol. She was young and beautiful, graceful, and evidently accustomed to good society. She lived for four years in a haystack; but was ultimately kept by Mrs. Hannah More in an asylum, and died suddenly in December, 1801. Mrs. More called her Louisa; but she was probably a Mademoiselle La Frülen, natural daughter of Francis Joseph I., emperor of Austria. (See "World of Wonders," p. 134.)

Lady of the Lake. Vivian, mistress of Merlin, the enchanter, who lived in the midst of an imaginary lake, surrounded by knights and damsels. Tennyson, in the "Idylls of the King," tells the story of Vivian and Merlin. (See LAKE, and LANCELOT.)

Lady of the Lake. Ellen Douglas, once a favourite of king James; but when her father fell into disgrace, she retired with him to the vicinity of Loch Katrine.—Sir Walter Scott, "Lady of the Lake."

But for the difference marriage makes
"I wixt wives and ladies of the lakes,"
S. Butler, "Hudibras," iii. 1.

Lady of the Rock (Our). A miraculous image of the Virgin found by the wayside between Salamanca and Ciudad Rodrigo in 1409.

Lady in the Sacque. The apparition of this hag forms the story of the "Tapestried Chamber," by Sir Walter Scott.

An old woman, whose dress was an old-fashioned gown, which had its call a sacque; that is, a sort of robe completely loose in the body, but gathered into broad plaits upon the neck and shoulders.

Laelaps (Storm). One of the dogs of Actæon.

Lalaps. A very powerful dog given by Diana to Procris; Procris gave it to Ceph'alos. While pursuing a wild boar it was metamorphosed into a stone.

Laer'tes (3 syl.). Son of Polo'nus and brother of Ophelia. He kills Hamlet with a poisoned rapier, and dies himself from a wound by the same foil.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Læta'rë Sunday. The fourth Sunday of Lent is so called, from the first word of the Introit, which is from Isa. lxvi. 10: "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her." It is on this day that the pope blesses the Golden Rose.

Lag'ado. Capital of Balmarbi, celebrated for its grand academy of projectors, where the scholars spend their time in such useful projects as making pincushions from softened rocks, extracting sun-beams from cucumbers, and converting ice into gunpowder.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Laputa).

Laïs. A courtesan or Greek Hetaira. There were two of the name; the elder was the most beautiful woman of Corinth, and lived at the time of the Peloponnesian war. The beauty of the latter excited the jealousy of the Thessalonian women, who stoned her to death. She was contemporary with Phryne, her rival, and sat to Apelles as a model.

Laissez Faire, Laissez Passer. Lord John Russell said—"Colbert, with the intention of fostering the manufactures of France, established regulations which limited the webs woven in looms to a particular size. He also prohibited the introduction of foreign manufactures. The French vine-growers, finding they could no longer get rid of their wine, began to grumble. Then Colbert asked a merchant what relief he could give, and received for answer 'Laissez faire, laissez passer'—Don't interfere with our mode of manufactures and don't stop the introduction of foreign imports."

The laissez-faire system. The let-alone system.

Lake-school (The). The school of poetry introduced by the Lake Poets, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, who resided in the Lake district of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and sought inspiration in the simplicity of nature. The term was first used in the Edinburgh Review.

N.B. Charles Lamb, Lloyd, and Professor Wilson (Christopher North) are sometimes placed in the list of "Lakers."

Laked'ion or LAQUEDEM (Isaac). The name given in France, in the fourteenth century, to the Wandering Jew.

La'kin. By'r Lakin. An oath, meaning "By our Lady-kin," or Little Lady, where little does not refer to size, but is equivalent to dear.

By'r Lakin, a parlous (perilous) feat.—Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," iii. 1.

Laks'mi or Lakshmi. One of the consorts of Vishnu, goddess of beauty, wealth and pleasure.—Hindu mythology.

Lalla Rookh (Tulip Cheek) is the supposed daughter of Au-rung-ze'-be, emperor of Delhi, betrothed to Al'iris, sultan of Lesser Buchar'ia; on her journey from Delhi to the valley of Cashmere, she is entertained by a young Persian poet named Fer'amorz, who is supposed to relate the four poetical tales of the romance, and with whom she falls in love. Her delight is unbounded when she discovers that the poet and the sultan are one and the same person.—Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh."

La'ma, among the Mongols, means the priestly order. Hence the religion of the Mongols and Calmucs is termed

Lamaism. The Grand Lamas wear yellow caps, the subordinate Lamas red caps. (See GRAND LAMA.)

La'ma'ism (Tibetan, Blama, spiritual teacher). The religion of Tibet and Mongolia, which is Buddhism corrupted by Sivaism and spirit-worship.

Lamb. In Christian art, an emblem of the Redeemer, called "the Lamb of God." It is also the attribute of St. Agnes, St. Geneviève, St. Catherine, and St. Regina. St. John neither carries a lamb, or is accompanied by the paschal lamb. It is also introduced symbolically to represent any of the "types" of Christ, as Abraham, Moses, and so on.

Lamb-pie. A flogging. Lamb is a pun on the Latin verb lumbo (to lick), and the word "lick" has been perverted to mean flog (see LICK); or it may be the old Norse lum (the hand), meaning hand or slap pie. (See LAMMING.)

Lamb's Conduit Street (London). Stow says, "One William Lamb, citizen and clothworker, born at Sutton Valence, Kent, did found near unto Oldbourne a faire conduit and standard; from this conduit, water clear as crystal was conveyed in pipes to a conduit on Snow hill." (26th March, 1577.)

Lambs' Wool. A beverage consisting of the juice of apples roasted over spiced ale. A great day for this drink was the feast of apple-gathering, called la mœs Abhal, pronounced "lammas ool," and corrupted into "lambs' wool."

Lambeth means the small port. (Saxon, lamb, small; hgyth, port.)

Lame (The). Charles II. of Naples, le Boiteux. (1243-1309.)

Lame King. A Grecian oracle had told Sparta to "Beware of a lame king." Agesilaos was lame, and during his reign Sparta lost her supremacy, and Thebes became the head of Greece.

Lame Vicegerent (in "Hudibras"). Richard Cromwell.

Lamereck (Sir), of Wales. A knight of the Round Table, son of Sir Pellinore, and brother of Sir Percival. He had an amour with his own aunt, the wife of king Lote. Strange that of all the famous knights of the Round Table, Sir Caradoc was the only one who was continent.

Lam'ia. A female phantom, whose name was used by the Greeks and Romans as a bugbear to children. She was a Lib'yan queen beloved by Jupiter, but robbed of her offspring by the jealous Juno; in consequence of which she vowed vengeance against all children, whom she delighted to entice and murder. She had the power of taking out her eyes at pleasure. (See LILITH.)

Lam'ies (3 syl.). Spectres of Africa, with the head of a woman and tail of a serpent. They attracted strangers by a sort of hissing sound, and then devoured them. In the story of "Machatës and Philemon," a young man is represented as marrying one of these empusa, who sucks his blood at night. Göethe borrowed his ballad of the "Bride of Corinth" from this tale. (Greek, laimos, the throat, voracity.)

Lammas. At latter Lammas—i.e., never. (See GREEK CALEND.)

Lammas-day, 1st August, means the loaf-mass day. The day of first-fruit offerings, when a loaf was given to the priests in lieu of the first-fruits. (Saxon, hlam-mæsse, for hlaf-mæsse daeg.)

Lammer Beads. Amber beads, once used as charms. (French, l'ambre; Teutonic, lamertyn-steen.)

Lammikin, Lankin, Linkin, or Bold Rankin. A Scottish ogre, represented in the ballad as a bloodthirsty mason, the terror of the Scotch nursery.

Lamming (A). A beating. (See LAMB PIE.)

Lam'ourette's Kiss. On July 7th, 1792, the abbé Lamourette induced the different factions of the Legislative Assembly of France to lay aside their differences; so the deputies of the Royalists, Constitutionlists, Girondists, Jacobins, and Orleanists rushed into each other's arms, and the king was sent for to see "how these Christians loved one another;" but the reconciliation was hollow and unsound. The term is now used for a reconciliation of policy without abatement of rancour.

Lamp. To smell of the lamp. To bear the marks of great study, but not enough laboured to conceal the marks of labour. The phrase was first applied to the orations of Demosthenes, written by lamp-light with enormous care.

The Lamp of the Law. Irnerius the German was so called, who first lectured on the Pandects of Justinian, after their discovery at Amalphi in 1137.

Lamps. The seven lamps of sleep. In the mansion of the Knight of the Black Castle were seven lamps, which could be quenched only with water from an enchanted fountain. So long as these lamps kept burning, every one within the room fell into a deep sleep, from which nothing could rouse them till the lamps were extinguished. (See ROSANA.)—"The Seven Champions," &c., ii. 8.

Sepulchral Lamps. The Romans are said to have preserved lamps in some of their sepulchres for centuries. In the papacy of Paul III. one of these lamps was found in the tomb of Tullia (Cicero's daughter), which had been shut up for 1,550 years. At the dissolution of the monasteries a lamp was found which is said to have been burning 1,200 years. Two have been preserved in the Leyden museum.

Lampad'ion. The received name of a lively, petulant courtesan, in the later Greek comedy.

Lampoon. Sir Walter Scott says, "These personal and scandalous libels, carried to excess in the reign of Charles II., acquired the name of lampoons from the burden sung to them: 'Lampone, lampone, camerada lampone'—Guzzler, guzzler, my fellow guzzler." (French, lamper, to guzzle.) Sir Walter obtained his information from Trevoux.

Lamos and Pha'eton. The two steeds of Auro'ra. One of Actæon's dogs was called Lamos.

Lancashire Lads or "The Lancashire." The 47th Foot.

Lancaster. The camp-town on the river Lune.

Lancaster Gun. A species of rifled cannon with elliptical bore; so called from Mr. Lancaster, its inventor.

Lance (1 syl.), in Christian art, is an attribute of St. Matthew and St. Thomas, the evangelists; also of St. Longinus, St. George, St. Adalbert, St. Oswin, St. Barbara, St. Michael, St. Demetrius, and several others.

Astolpho had a lance of gold that with enchanted force dismounted every one it touched.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. ix.

Lance of the Ladies. At the termination of every joust, a course was run "pour les dames," and called the "Lance of the Ladies."

Lance-Corporal. The lowest of the non-commissioned officers. He wears one chevron or slash on his sleeve. In the middle ages a lance meant a soldier.

Lance-knight. A foot-soldier; a corruption of lansquenet or lancequenet, a German foot-soldier.

Lan'celot (Sir). "The chief of knights" and "darling of the court." Elaine, the lily of Astolat, fell in love with him, but he returned not her love, and she died. (See ELAINE.)—Tennyson, "Idylls of the King" (Elaine).

Lan'celot du Lac. One of the earliest romances of the "Round Table" (1494). Sir Lancelot was the son of king Ban of Brittany, but was stolen in infancy by Vivienne, called "La Dame du Lac," who dwelt "en la marche de la petite Bretagne;" she plunged with the babe into the lake, and when her protégé was grown to man's estate, presented him to king Arthur. The lake referred to was a sort of enchanted delusion to conceal her demesnes. Hence the cognomen of du Lac given to the knight. Sir Lancelot goes in search of the St. Greal or holy cup brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathea. (See GRAAL.) Though always represented in the Arthurian romances as the model of chivalry, Sir Lancelot was the adulterous lover of Guinevere, wife of king Arthur, his friend. At the close of his life the adulterous knight became a hermit.

Sir Lancelot du Lac and Tarquin. Sir Lancelot, seeking some adventure, met a lady who requested him to deliver certain knights of the Round Table from the power of Tarquin. Coming to a river, he saw a copper basin suspended to a tree, and struck at it so hard that the basin broke. This brought out Tarquin, when a furious encounter took place, in which Tarquin was slain, and Sir Lancelot liberated from durance "threescore knights and four, all of the Table Round."—Percy, "Reliques," &c., bk. 2, series i.

Lancelot of the Laik. A Scottish metrical romance, taken from the French roman called "Lancelot du Lac." Galiot, a neighbouring king, invades Arthur's territory, and captures the castle of lady Melyhalt among others. Sir Lancelot goes to chastise Galiot, sees queen Guinevere and falls in love with her. Sir Gawayne is wounded in the war, and Sir Lancelot taken prisoner. In the French romance, Sir Lancelot makes Galiot submit to Arthur, but the Scotch romance terminates with the capture of the knight.

Lancelot or Launcelot Gobbo. Shylock's servant, famous for his soliloquy whether or not he should run away from his master.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice."

Land of Beulah, "where the sun shineth night and day" (Isa. lxii. 4). In "Pilgrim's Progress" it is that land of heavenly joy where pilgrims tarry till they are summoned to enter the Celestial City; the Paradise before the resurrection.

Land of Bondage. Egypt was so called by the Jews, who were bondsmen there to the Pharaohs "who knew not Joseph."

Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

Land of Myrrh. Azab or Saba.

Land of Promise. Canaan, the land which God promised to give to Abraham for his obedience.

Land of Stars and Stripes. The United States of America. The reference is to their national flag.

Land o' the Leal. The Scotch Dixey Land (q.v.). An hypothetical land of happiness, loyalty, and virtue. Carolina Oliphant, baroness Nairn, meant heaven in her exquisite song so called, and this is now its accepted meaning.

Land-damn. A corruption of landan (to rate or reprove severely). According to dean Milles the word is still used in Gloucestershire.

You are abused....would I knew the villain, I would land-damn him.—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," ii. i.

Land-loupers. Persons who fly the country for crime or debt. Louper, loper, loafer, and luffer are varieties of the German laufer, a vagrant, a runner.

Land-lubber. Lubber is a lazy or fat person (Danish).

Landau. A four-wheeled carriage, the top of which may be thrown back; invented at Landau, in Germany.

Landey'da. (See RAVEN.)

Landière (French, 3 syl.). A booth in a fair; so called from Le Landit, a famous fair at one time held at St. Denis. Landit means a small present such as one receives from a fair.

Il gambi doit, il faisoit le badin ;
Ouc'ou ne vit ung plus parait landin.
Bourdigné, "Légende," c. iii.

Mercuré avec d'avidés mains . . .
M-t impost et taxes nouvelles . . .
Sur les land s, sur les estreunes.

L. Chamhoudry, "Le Voyage de Mercuré," bk. iii., p. 51. (1653.)

Landscape is a land picture. "Scape" is from the German schaffen (to make).

Lane. No evil thing that walks by night, blue meagre hag, or stubborn un-laid ghost, no goblin, or smart fairy of the mine, has power to cross a lane; once in a lane, and the spirit of evil is in a fix. The reason is obvious: a lane is a spur from a main road, and therefore forms with it a sort of T, quite near enough to the shape of a cross to arrest such simple folk of the unseen world as care to trouble the peaceful inmates of this we live in.

Lane, of King's Bromley Manor, Staffordshire, bears in a escutcheon "The arms of England." This honour was granted to colonel John Lane, by Charles II., for conducting the king from the field of battle to his father's seat after the battle of Worcester. (See below.)

Jane Lane, daughter of Thomas and sister of Colonel John, to save king Charles II. after the battle of Worcester, rode behind him from Bentley, in Staffordshire, the ancient seat of the Lanes, to the house of her cousin, Mrs. Norton, near Bristol. For this act of loyalty, the king granted the family to have the following crest: A strawberry-roan horse saliant (couped at the flank), bridled, bitted, and garnished, supporting between its feet a royal crown proper; motto, "Garde le Roy."

Lanfu'sa's Son (in "Orlando Furioso"). (See FERRAU.)

Lang Syne (Scotch, long since). In the olden time, in days gone by. The song called "Auld Lang Syne," generally attributed to Robert Burns, was not composed by him, for he says expressly in a letter to Thomson, it is "the old song of the olden times, which has never been in print. . . . I took it down from an old man's singing." In another letter he says, "Light be the turf on the heaven-inspired poet who composed this glorious fragment." Nothing whatever is known of the author of the words, the composer is wholly unknown.

Langbourn Ward (London). So called from the long bourn or rivulet of sweet water which formerly broke out of a spring near Magpye Alley. This bourn gives its name to Sharebourne or Southbourne Lane.

Langstaff (Launcelot). The name under which "Salmagundi" was published, the real authors being Washington Irving, William Irving, and J. K. Paulding.

Language. Which is the primeval language? An Egyptian king entrusted two new-born infants to a shepherd, with strict charge that they were never to hear any one utter a word. These children were afterwards brought before the king, and uttered the word bekos (baked bread). The same experiment was tried by Frederick II. of Sweden, James IV. of Scotland, and one of the Mogul emperors of India.

The Persians say that Arabic, Persian, and Turkish are the three primitive languages. The serpent that seduced Eve spoke Arabic, the most suasive language in the world; Adam and Eve spoke Persian, the most poetic of all languages; and the angel Gabriel spoke Turkish, the most menacent of all languages.—Chardin.

"Language given to men to conceal their thoughts" is from Fontenelle, but is generally fathered on Talleyrand.

Langue d'Oc. The Provençal branch of the Gallo-Romaic idiom; so called from their oc (yes).

Langue d'Oil. Walloon or Germanised Gallo-Romaic; so called from their pronouncing our yes as oil (o-e). These Gauls lived north of the Loire; the Provençals dwelt south of that river.

Languish (Lydia). A young lady of romantic notions in "The Rivals," by Sheridan.

Lantern. In Christian art, the attribute of St. Gudule and St. Hugh.

The Feast of Lanterns. Tradition says that the daughter of a famous maudarin, walking on the edge of a lake one evening, fell in and was drowned. The father, with all his neighbours, went with lanterns to look for her, and happily she was rescued. In commemoration thereof an annual festival was held on the spot, and grew in time to the celebrated "Feast of Lanterns."—"Present State of China."

A la lanterne. Hang him with the lantern or lamp ropes. A cry and custom introduced in the French revolution.

Lanterns. Authors, literary men, and other inmates of Lantern-land (q.v.). Rabelais so calls the prelates and divines of the council of Trent, who wasted the time in great displays of learning, to very little profit; hence "lanternise" (q.v.).

Lanternise. Spending one's time in learned trifles; darkening counsel by words; mystifying the more by attempting to unravel mysteries; putting truths into a lantern through which, at best, we see but darkly. When monks bring their hoods over their faces "to meditate," they are said by the French to lanternise, because they look like the tops of lanterns; but the result of their meditations is that of a "brown study," or "fog of sleepy thought." (See above.)

Lantern-land. The land of literary charlatans, whose inhabitants are graduates in arts, doctors, professors, prelates, and so on.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," v. 33.

Lao'coön (4 syl.). A son of Priam, famous for the tragic fate of himself and two sons, who were crushed to death by serpents. The group representing these three in their death-agony, now in the Vatican, was discovered in 1506. Thomson has described the group in his "Liberty," pt. iv.

Laodami'a. The wife of Protesila'os, who was slain before Troy. She begged to be allowed to converse with her dead husband for only three hours, and her request was granted; when the respite was over, she accompanied the dead hero to the shades of death. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Laodice'an. One indifferent to religion, caring little or nothing about the matter, like the Christians of that church, mentioned in the Book of Revelation (iii. 14-18).

Lao-kium. A Chinese philosopher, who lived about B.C. 600, and after death was placed among the gods. His system was a sort of quietism.

Lap'ithæ. Descendants of Lap'ithēs, son of Apollo; noted for their defeat of the Centaurs.—Classic mythology.

Lapping Water. When Gideon's army was too numerous, the men were taken to a stream to drink, and 300 of them lapped water with their tongue; all the rest sucked it up (Judg. vii. 4-7). All carnivorous animals lap water like dogs, all herbivorous animals suck it up like horses. The presumption is that the lappers of water partook of the carnivorous character, and were more fit for military exploits.

Laprel. The rabbit in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." (French, lapin, rabbit.)

Lapsus Linguae (Latin). A slip of the tongue, a mistake in uttering a word, a word inadvertently spoken.

Lap'uta. The flying island inhabited by scientific quacks, and visited by Gulliver in his "Travels." These dreamy philosophers were so absorbed in their speculations, that they employed attendants called "flappers," to flap them on the mouth and ears with a blown bladder when their attention was to be called off from "high things" to vulgar mundane matters.—Sirijt.

Realising in a manner the dreams of Laputa, and endeavouring to extract sunbeams from cucumbers.—De Quincy.

Lar. The chief town of Laristan, in Persia, once famous for its bazaars.

Lar Familia'ris. The familiar lar was the spirit of the founder of the house, which never left it, but accompanied his descendants in all their changes. (See LARES.)

Lara. The name assumed by lord Conrad, the corsair, after the death of Medo'ra. He returned to his native land, and was one day recognised by lord Ezzelin at the table of lord Otho. Ezzelin charges him home, and a duel is arranged for the day following, but Ezzelin is never heard of more. In time Lara heads a rebellion, and is shot by lord Otho, the leader of the other party.—Byron, "Lara."

The seven infants of Lara. Gonçalo Bustos de Salas de Lara, a Castilian hero of the eleventh century, had seven sons.

His brother, Rodri'go Velasquez, married a Moorish lady, and these seven nephews were invited to the feast. A fray took place in which one of the seven slew a Moor, and the bride demanded vengeance. Rodri'go, to please his bride, waylaid his brother Gonçalo, and kept him in durance in a dungeon of Cor'dova, and the seven boys were betrayed into a ravine where they were cruelly murdered. While in the dungeon, the daughter of the Moorish king fell in love with Gonçalo, and became the mother of Mudarra, who avenged the death of Lara's seven sons by slaying Rodri'go.

Larboard, now called port (q.v.). Larboard and Starboard are the two Italian phrases quello bordo (that side), and questo bordo (this side—i.e., the right side), contracted into 'lo-bord' and 'sto-bord'.

Larder. A place for keeping lard or bacon. This shows that swine were the chief animals salted and preserved in olden times.

The Douglas Larder. The destruction of the English garrison and all its provisions in Douglas castle, by Good lord James Douglas, in 1307.

He caused all the barrels containing flour, meal, wheat, and malt to be knocked in pieces, and their contents mixed on the floor; then he slaved the great hogsheads of wine and ale, and mixed the liquor with the stores; and last of all, he killed the prisoners, and flung the dead bodies among the disgusting heap which his men called in derision of the English, "The Douglas Larder."—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," ix.

Larēs. The Etruscan lar (lord or hero). Among the Romans larēs were either domestic or public. Domestic larēs were the souls of virtuous ancestors exalted to the rank of protectors. Public larēs were the protectors of roads and streets. Domestic larēs were images, like dogs, set behind the "hall" door or in the lara'rum or shrine. Wicked souls became lem'urēs or ghosts that made night hideous. Pena'tēs were the natural powers personified, and their office was to bring wealth and plenty, rather than to protect and avert danger.

Large. Set at large—i.e., at liberty. It is a French phrase; prendre le large is to stand out at sea, or occupy the main ocean, so as to be free to move. Similarly, to be set at large is to be placed free in the wide world.

To sail large is to sail on a large wind

—i.e., with the wind not straight astern, but what sailors call "abaft the beam."

Larigot. Boire à tire larigot. To tope, to bouse. Larigot is a corruption of "L'arigot" (a limb), and boire à tire l'arigot means simply "to drink with all your might," as jouer de l'arigot means "to play your best"—i.e., "with all your power." It is absurd to derive the word larigot from "la Rigaud," according to Noël Taillepied, who says ("Rouen," xlv.): "Au xiii. siècle, l'archevêque Eudes Rigaud fit présent à la ville de Rouen d'une cloche à laquelle resta son nom. Cette cloche était d'une grandeur et d'une grosseur telles, que ceux qui la mettaient en mouvement ne manquaient pas de boire abondamment pour reprendre des forces. De là l'habitude de comparer ceux qui buvaient beaucoup aux seneurs chargés de tirer la Rigaud" —i.e., the bell so called.

Lark. A spree; a corruption of the Anglo-Saxon luak or lac (play, fun).

Larry Dugan's Eyewater.—Blackening; so called from Larry Dugan, a noted shoe-black of Dublin, whose face was always smudged with his blackening.

Larvæ. Mischievous spectres. The larva or ghost of Caligula was often seen (according to Suetonius) in his palace.

Lascar. A native East Indian sailor in the British service. The natives of the East Indies call camp-followers lascars.

Last. The cobbler should stick to his last ("Ne sutor ultra crepidam"). Apelles having executed a famous painting, exposed it to public view, when a cobbler found fault because the painter had made too few latches to the goshes. Apelles amended the fault, and set out his picture again. Next day the cobbler complained of the legs, when Apelles retorted, "Keep to the shop, friend, but do not attempt to criticise what you do not understand." (See WIGS.)

Last Man (The). Charles I. was so called by the Parliamentarians, meaning that he would be the last man to sit on the throne of Great Britain as king. His son, Charles II., was called The Son of the Last Man.

Last of the Fathers. St. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux. (1091-1153.)

Last of the Goths. Roderick, who reigned in Spain from 414 to 711. Southey has an historic tale in verse on this subject.

Last of the Greeks. Philopœmen of Arcadia. (B.C. 253-183.)

Last of the Knights. (See KNIGHTS.)

Last of the Mohicans. The Indian chief, Uncas, is so called by Cooper in his novel of that title.

Last of the Romans.

Caius Cassius Longinus, so called by Brutus. (B.C. -42.)

Aëtius, a general who defended the Gauls against the Franks and other barbarians, and defeated Attila in the Champs Catalauniques, near Châlon, in 451. So called by Procopius.

François Joseph Terasse Desbillons, so called from the elegance and purity of his Latin. (1751-1789.)

Pope calls Congreve Ultimus Romanorum. (1670-1729.)

Last of the Troubadours. Jacques Jasmin, of Gascony. (1798-1864.)

Lât (El). A female idol made of stone and said to be inspired with life; the chief object of adoration by the Arabs before their conversion.

Lât, at Somanat in India, was a single stone fifty fathoms high, placed in the midst of a temple supported by fifty-six pillars of massive gold. This idol was broken in pieces by Mahmood Ibn-Sabuktigen, who conquered that part of India.

Lateran. The ancient palace of the Laterani, given by the emperor Constantine to the popes, and now applied to the several buildings erected on the same site, the chief of which is the church of St. John of Lateran.

The Councils of the Lateran are the eleven councils held in the basilica of the Lateran. The most celebrated was that held under pope Innocent III.

Lath or Lathe. A division of a county. Sometimes it was an intermediate division between a hundred and a shire, as the lathes of Kent and rapes of Sussex, each of which contained three or four hundreds a-piece. In Ireland the arrangement was different. The officer over a lath was called a lathreeve. (Saxon lad, Norwegian lad, articulation.)

If all that tything failed, then all that lath was charged for that tything; and if the lath failed, then all that hundred was demanded for them [i.e., turbulent fellows]; and if the hundred, then the shire. — Spencer, "Ireland."

Latin. The language spoken by the people of La'tium, in Italy. The Latins are called aboriginēs of Italy. Alba Longa was head of the Latin league, and, as Rome was a colony of Alba Longa, it is plain to see how the Roman tongue was Latin.

The Latin Church. The Western Church, in contradistinction to the Greek or Eastern Church.

The Latin Cross. Formed thus: †

Latin Learning, properly so called, terminated with Boethius, but continued to be used in literary compositions and in the services of the church.

Latīnus. King of the Laurentians, a people of Latium. According to Virgil, Latinus opposed Æneas on his first landing, but subsequently formed an alliance with him, and gave him Lavinia in marriage. Turnus, king of the Rutuli, declared that Lavinia had been betrothed to him, and prepared to support his claim by arms. It was agreed to decide the rival claims by single combat, and Æneas, being victor, had Lavinia to wife.

Latīnus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), an Italian, went with his five sons to the Holy War. His eldest son was slain by Solyman; Aramantēs, going to his brother's aid, was also slain; then Sabīnus; and lastly, Picus and Laurentūs, twins. The father now rushed on the soldan, and was slain also. In one hour, the father and his five sons were all slain.

Latitudina'rians. A sect of divines in the time of Charles II., opposed both to the High Church party and to the Puritans. The term is now applied to those who hold very loose views of Divine inspiration, and what are called orthodox doctrines.

Lato'na. Mother of Apollo and Diana. When she knelt by a fountain in Delos, infants in arms, to quench her thirst at a small lake, some Lycian clewms insulted her, and were turned into frogs.

As when those hinds that were transformed to frogs
Hailed at Latona's twin-born progeny,
Which after held the sun and moon in fœd.
— Milton, "Sonnets."

Latri'a and Duli'a. Greek words adopted by the Roman Catholics: the former to express that supreme reverence and adoration which is offered to God alone; and the latter, that secondary reverence and adoration which is offered to saints. (Latria is the reverence of a latrix or hired servant, who receives wages; dulia is the reverence of a doulos or slave.)

Lattice or Chequers A public-house sign, the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henries, was invested with the power of licensing the establishments of vintners and publicans. Houses licensed notified the same by displaying the Fitzwarren arms. — The Times, April 29, 1869.

The Fitzwarren arms were chequy or and gules, hence public-houses and their signs are frequently called the "Red Lattice."

He called me even now, my lord, through a red lattice. — Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.", ii. 2.

Laudicœni. Roman claqueurs, who attended to applaud speeches, plays, &c. (See CLAUQUE.)

Laughing Philosopher. Democritus of Ab'dera, who viewed with supreme contempt the feeble powers of man. (B.C. 460-357.) (See WEeping PHILOSOPHER.)

Launce. The clownish serving-man of Proteus, one of the two Gentlemen of Verona. Speed is the serving-man of Valentine, the other gentleman. Launce is famous for his soliloquies to his dog Crab. "the sourest-natured dog that lives." Lord Dundreary is Launce polished into a gentleman. — Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Launcelot. (See LANCELOT.)

Launfal (Sir). Steward of king Arthur. He so greatly disliked queen Gwennere, daughter of Ryon, king of Ireland, that he feigned illness and retired to Carlyoun, where he lived in great poverty. Having obtained the loan of a horse, he rode into a forest, and while he rested himself on the grass two damsels came to him, who invited him to rest in their lady's bower hard by. Sir Launfal accepted the invitation, and fell in love with the lady, whose name was Tryamour. Tryamour gave the knight an unfailing purse, and when he left told him if he ever wished to see her all he had to do was to retire into a private room, and she would instantly be with him. Sir Launfal now returned to court, and excited much attention by his great wealth, but having told Gwennere, who solicited his love, that she was not worthy to kiss the feet of his lady-love, the queen accused him to Arthur of insulting her person. Thereupon Arthur told him, unless he made good his word by producing this paragon of women he should be burned alive. On the day appointed, Tryamour arrived; Launfal was set at liberty, and accompanied his mistress to the isle of Ole'ron, and no man ever saw him more. — Thomas Chestre, "Sir Launfal" (a metrical romance of Henry VI.'s time).

Laura—the name immortalised by Petrarch—was either the wife of Hugues de Sade, of Avignon, or a fictitious name used by him on which to hang incidents of his life and love. If the former, her maiden name was Laura de Novès.

Laura, Beppo's wife. (See BEPPO.)

Laureate. Poets so called from an ancient custom in our universities of presenting a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and poetry. Young aspirants were wreathed with laurels in berry (orné de baies de laurier), whence our term "Bachelor" of Arts. The poets laureate of the last two centuries have been—

John Dryden, 1670.
Thomas Shadwell, 1688.
Nahum Tate, 1692.
Nicholas Rowe, 1715.
Laurence Eusden, 1718.
Colley Cibber, 1730.
William Whitehead, 1757.

Thomas Warton, 1783.
Henry James Pye, 1790.
Robert Southey, 1813.
William Wordsworth, 1844.
Alfred Tennyson, 1850.

Laurel. The Greeks gave a wreath of laurels to the victor in the Pythian games, but the victor in the Olympic games had a wreath of wild olives, the victor in the Nem'ean games a wreath of green parsley, and the victor in the Isthmian games a wreath of dry parsley or green pine-leaves. (See CROWN.)

Laurel. The ancients believed that laurel communicated the spirit of prophecy and poetry. Hence the custom of crowning the pythoness and poets, and of putting laurel leaves under one's pillow to acquire inspiration.

Laurel, in modern times, is a symbol of victory and peace. St. Gudule, in Christian art, carries a laurel crown.

Laurence (Friar). The Franciscan friar who undertakes to marry Romeo and Juliet. To save Juliet from a second marriage he gives her a sleeping draught, and she is carried to the family vault as dead. Romeo finds her there, and believing her sleep to be the sleep of death, kills himself. On waking, Juliet discovers Romeo dead at her side, and kills herself also. (See LAWRENCE.)—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."

Lavaine', Sir (2 syl.). Brother of Elaine', and son of the lord of As'tolat. He accompanied Sir Lancelot when he went incog. to tilt for the ninth diamond. He is described as young, brave, and a true knight.—Tennyson, "Idylls of the King" (Elaine).

Lav'ender. Laid up in lavender, i.e., taken great care of, laid away, as women put things away in lavender to keep off moths. Things in pawn, or persons in hiding, are said to be in lavender.

Lavin'ia. Daughter of Lat'inus, betrothed to Turnus, king of the Ru'tuli. When Æneas landed in Italy, Latinus made an alliance with the Trojan hero, and promised to give him Lavin'ia to wife. This brought on a war between Turnus and Æneas, which was decided by single combat, in which Æneas was victor.—Virgil, "Æneid."

Lavinia. The daughter of Titus Andronicus, bride of Bassia'nus, brother of the emperor of Rome. Being grossly abused by Chiron and Demetrius, sons of Tam'ora, queen of the Goths, the savage wantons cut off her hands and pluck out her tongue, that she may not reveal their names. Lavinia, guiding a stick with her stumps, makes her tale known to her father and brothers; whereupon Titus murders the two Moorish princes and serves their heads in a pasty to their mother, whom he afterwards slays, together with the emperor Saturni'nus her husband.—"Titus Andronicus" (a play published with those of Shakespeare).

Lavinia. Italy; so called from Lavinia, daughter of Lat'inus and wife of Æneas. Æneas built a town which he called Lavin'ium, capital of La'tium.

Lavin'ia and Palemon. A free poetical version of Ruth and Boaz, by Thomson in his "Autumn."

Lavolt or LAVOLTA (French, la volte). A lively dance, in which was a good deal of jumping or capering, whence its name. Troilus says, "I cannot sing, nor heel the high lavolt" (iv. 4). It is thus described:

A lofty jumping or a leaping round,
Where arm in arm two dancers are entwined,
And whirl themselves with strict embracements bound,
And still their feet an anapest do sound
Sir John Davies.

Law. To give one law. A sporting term, meaning the chance of saving oneself. Thus a hare or a stag is allowed "law"—i.e., a certain start before any hound is permitted to attack it; and a tradesman allowed law is one to whom time is given to "find his legs."

Quips of law, called "devices of Cépola," from Bartholomew Cépola, whose law-quirks teaching how to elude the most express law, and to perpetuate law-suits ad infinitum, have been frequently reprinted—once in octavo, in black letter, by John Petit, in 1508.

The Man of Lawes Tale, by Chaucer. This story is found in Gower, who probably took it from the French chronicle of Nicholas Trivet. A similar story forms the plot of En'arê, a romance printed in Ritson's collection. The treason of the knight who murders Hermengilde resembles an incident in the French "Roman de la Violette," the English metrical romance of "Le bone Florence of Rome" (in Ritson), and a tale in the "Gesta Romanorum," c. 69 (Madden's edition). (See CONSTANCE.)

The Laws of Howell Dha, who reigned in South Wales in the tenth century, printed with a Latin translation by Wotton, in his "Leges Wallicæ" (1841).

Law's Bubble. The famous Mississippi scheme, devised by John Law, for paying off the national debt of France (1716-1720). By this "French South-Sea Bubble" the nation was almost ruined. It was called Mississippi because the company was granted the "exclusive trade of Louisiana on the banks of the Mississippi."

Lawn is fine cloth bleached on a lawn, instead of the ordinary bleaching grounds.

Lawrence (St.). Patron saint of curriers, because his skin was boiled on a gridiron. In the pontificate of Sextus I. he was charged with the care of the poor, the orphans, and the widows. In the persecution of Vale'rian, being summoned to deliver up the treasures of the church, he produced the poor, &c., under his charge, and said to the prætor, "These are the church's treasures." In Christian art he is generally represented as holding a gridiron in his hand. He is the subject of one of the principal hymns of Prudentius. (See LAURENCE.)

St. Lawrence's tears or The fiery tears of St. Lawrence. Meteoric or shooting stars, which generally make a great display on this anniversary (August 10th). The great periods of this phenomenon are between the 9th and 14th of August, from the 12th to the 14th of November, and from the 6th to the 12th of December.

Tom Lawrence, alias "Tyburn Tom" or "Tuck." A highwayman.—Sir Walter Scott, "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Lawsuits. Miles d'Illicis, bishop of Chartres (1459-1493) was so litigious, that when Louis XI. gave him a pension to clear off old scores, and told him in future to live in peace and good-will with his neighbours, the bishop earnestly entreated the king to leave him some three or four to keep his mind in good exercise. Similarly Panurge entreated Pantagruel not to pay off all his debts, but to leave some centimes at least, that he might not feel altogether a stranger to his own self.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 5. (See LIL-BURNE.)

Lay-brothers. Persons not in holy orders received into convents under the three vows. They belong to the laity. (Greek, laïos, people.)

Lay Figures. Wooden figures with free joints, used by artists chiefly for the study of drapery. This is a metaphorical use of lay. As divines divide the world into two parties, the ecclesiastics and the laity, so artists divide their models into two classes, the living and the lay.

Lay of the Last Minstrel. (For plot see MARGARET.)

Lay'amon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of the "Brut" of Wace, in the twelfth century, is called The English Ennius. (See ENNIUS.)

Lazar-house or Lazaretto. A house for poor persons affected with contagious diseases. So called from the beggar Lazarus (q. v.).

Laz'arists. A body of missionaries founded by St. Vincent de Paul in 1632, and so termed from the priory of St. Lazarus, at Paris, which was their headquarters.

Lazarillo de Tormés (1553). A comic romance, something in the "Gil Blas" style, the object being to satirise all classes of society. Lazarillo, a light, jovial, audacious man-servant, sees his masters in their undress, and exposes their foibles. This work was written by Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, general and statesman of Spain, author of "War against the Moors," the best historical production in Spain.

Lazaro'nē, plur. Lazaroni (Italian). The mob. Originally all those people of Naples who lived in the streets without any habitation of their own; so called from the hospital of St. Lazarus, which served as a refuge for the destitute of that city. Every year they elected a chief, called the Capo Lazzaro. Masaniello, in 1647, with these vagabonds accomplished the revolution of Naples. In 1798 Michele Sforza, at the head of the Lazaroni, successfully resisted Etienne Championnet, the French general.

Lazarus. Any poor beggar; so called from the Lazarus of the parable, who was laid daily at the rich man's gate (St. Luke xvi.).

La'zy means serfs.

Dividebantur anti'qui Saxo'nēs (ut testa'tur Nithardus) in tres ordines, EDILLINGOS, TRILINGOS et LAZZOS (hoc est nobiles ingen'uos, et servilēs) quos et nos distinctio'uem diu retinui'mus. Sed ita cuncto autem secundo pars servorum max'ima se in libertatem evadenda vit; sic ut hodie apud Anglos ratiō inveniat'ur servus, qui mancip'ium dicitur. Restat nihilomin' in a'li'is quæ appellatio'nis commemoratio. Ignos'vos enim hodie lazze dicimus.—Spelman.

Lazy as David Lawrence's dog, that leaned his head against a wall to bark. In Yorkshire they say "Lazy as Ludlam's dog," which is sanctioned by Ray in his proverbs. (See LAZY LAWRENCE.)

Lazy as Ludlam's dog, which leaned his head against the wall to bark. This Ludlam was the famous sorceress of Surrey, who lived in a cave near Farnham, called "Ludlam's Cave." She kept a dog, noted for its laziness, so that when the rustics came to consult the witch, it would hardly condescend to give notice of their approach, even with the ghost of a bark.

Lazy Lawrence of Lubberland. The hero of a popular tale. He served the schoolmaster, the squire's cook, the farmer, and his own wife, which was accounted high treason in Lubberland.

Lazy-man's Load. One too heavy to be carried; so called because lazy people, to save themselves the trouble of coming a second time, are apt to overload themselves.

Lazzaro'ni. (See LAZARONI.)

L'État e'est Moi (I am the State). The saying and belief of Louis XIV. On this principle he acted with tolerable consistency.

Le Roi le Veut (French, The king wills it). The form of royal assent made by the clerk of parliament to bills submitted to the crown. The dissent is expressed by Le roi s'avisera (The king will give it his consideration).

Le'a. One of the "daughters of men" beloved by one of the "sons of God." The angel who loved her ranked with the least of the spirits of light, whose post around the throne was in the uttermost circle. Sent to earth on a message, he saw Lea bathing, and fell in love with her; but Lea was so heavenly-minded that her only wish was to "dwell in purity, and serve God in singleness of heart." Her angel lover, in the madness of his passion, told Lea the spell-word that gave him admittance into heaven. The moment Lea uttered that word her body became spiritual, rose through the air, and vanished from his sight. On the other hand, the angel lost his ethereal nature, and became altogether earthy, like a child of clay.—Moore, "Loves of the Angels," story i.

Lea'ba na Feine (Beds of the Feinē). The name of several large piles of stones in Ireland. The ancient Irish warriors were called Fe'i-ne, which some mistake for Phœni (Carthaginians), but which means hunters; thus Nimrod was called "a mighty hunter" (warrior or Fenian).

Leading Note in music. The sharp seventh of the diatonic scale, which leads to the octave, only half a tone higher.

Leading Question. A question so worded as to suggest an answer. "Was he dressed in a black coat?" leads to the answer "Yes." In cross-examining a witness, leading questions are permitted, because the chief object of a cross-examination is to obtain contradictions.

Leading-strings. To be in leading-strings, is to be under the control of another. Leading-strings are those strings used for holding-up infants just learning to walk.

Leaf. Before the invention of paper, one of the substances employed for writing was the leaves of certain plants. In the British Museum are some writings on leaves from the Malabar coast, and several copies of the Bible written on palm-leaves. The reverse and obverse pages of a book are still called leaves; and the double page of a ledger is termed a "folio," from folium (a leaf).

League. The Holy League was founded at Péronne in 1576, for the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion in its predominancy, and the exclusion of Protestant princes from the throne. This league was mainly due to the Guises.

Lean'der (3 syl.). A young man of Abydos who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love, Hero, a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in his attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont also. This story is told in one of the poems of Musæus, entitled "Hero and Leander."

Leandro the Fair. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance called "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Pedro de Lujan.

Leaning Tower. The one at Pisa, in Italy, leans a little more than six feet in eighty; but at Caerphilly, in Glamorganshire, there is a tower which leans eleven feet in eighty.

Leap-year. Every year divisible by four. Such years occur every fourth year. In ordinary years the day of the month which falls on Monday this year, will fall on Tuesday next year, and Wednesday the year after; but the fourth year will leap over Thursday to Friday. This is because a day is added to February, which of course affects every subsequent day. (See BISSEXTILE.)

The ladies propose, and if not accepted, claim a silk gown. St. Patrick, having "driven the frogs out of the bogs," was walking along the shores of Lough Neagh, when he was accosted by St. Bridget in tears, and was told that a mutiny had broken out in the nunnery over which she presided, the ladies claiming the right of "popping the question."

St. Patrick said he would concede them the right every seventh year, when St. Bridget threw her arms round his neck, and exclaimed, "Arrah, Pathrick, jewel, I daurn't go back to the girls wid such a proposal. Make it one year in four." St. Patrick replied, "Bridget, acushla, squeeze me that way agin, an' I'll give ye leap-year, the longest of the lot." St. Bridget, upon this, popped the question to St. Patrick himself, who of course could not marry; so he patched up the difficulty as best he could with a kiss and a silk gown.

Lear (King). A legendary king of Britain, who in his old age divided his kingdom between Goneril and Regan, two of his daughters, who professed great love for him. These two daughters drove the old man mad by their unnatural conduct.—Shakespeare, "King Lear."

Percy, in his "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," has a ballad about "King Leir and his Three Daughters" (series i., bk. 2).

Camden tells a similar story of Ina, king of the West Saxons (see "Remains," p. 306, edition 1674). The story of king Lear is given by Geoffrey of Monmouth in his "Chronicles," whence Holinshed transcribed it. Spenser has introduced the same story into his "Faëry Queen," bk. ii., canto 10.

Learn (1 syl.). Live and learn.

Cato, the censor, was an old man when he taught himself Greek.

Michael Angelo, at seventy years of age, said, "I am still learning."

John Kemble wrote out Hamlet thirty times, and said, on quitting the stage, "I am now beginning to understand my art."

Mrs. Siddons, after she left the stage, was found studying Lady Macbeth, and said, "I am amazed to discover some new points in the character which I never found out while acting it."

Milton, in his blindness, when past fifty, sat down to complete his "Paradise Lost."

Scott, at fifty-five, took up his pen to redeem an enormous liability.

Richardson was above fifty when he published his first novel ("Pam'ela").

Benjamin West was sixty-four when he commenced his series of paintings, one of which is "Christ Healing the Sick."

Learn by heart. The heart is the seat of understanding; thus the Scripture speaks of men "wise in heart;" and "slow of heart" means dull of understanding. To learn by heart, is to learn and understand; to learn by rote, is to learn so as to be able to repeat; to learn by memory, is to commit to memory without reference to understanding what is so learnt.

Learned. Celeman, king of Hungary, was called The Learned. (1095-1114.) (See BEAUCLERC.)

The Learned Blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, the linguist, who was at one time a blacksmith.

The Learned Painter. Charles Lebrun; so called from the great accuracy of his costumes. (1619-1690.)

The Learned Tailor. Henry Wild, of Norwich, who mastered, while he worked at his trade, the Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Persian, and Arabic languages. (1684-1734.)

Leather or Prunello. It is all leather or prunello. Nothing of any moment, all rubbish. Prunello, or prunella, is a woollen stuff, used for the uppers of ladies' boots and shoes.

Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow;
The rest is all but leather or prunello.

Pope, "Essay on Man," iv.

Leathering. To give one a leathering is to beat him with a leather belt, such as policemen wear, and boys used to wear; or, more probably, it is a corruption of lathering (Welsh, llath, a rod).

Leatherstocking (Natty). The nickname of Natty Bumppo (q.v.), in Cooper's novel, called "The Pioneers." A half savage and half Christian chevalier of American wild life.

Led Captain (A). An obsequious person, who dances attendance on the master and mistress of a house, for which service he has a knife and fork at the dinner-table. He is led like a dog, and always graced with the title of captain. If led is short for ledly, the phrase would be analogous to our "lady's man."

Leda. The mother of Castor and Pollux; their father being Jupiter in the shape of a swan.

Lee is the Saxon hleō (a shelter.).

Under the lee of the land. Under the shelter of the cliffs which break the force of the winds.

Under the lee of a ship. On the side opposite to the wind, so that the ship shelters or wards it off.

To lay a ship by the lee, is to bring her so that all her sails may be flat against the masts and shrouds, and that the wind may come right on her broadside, so that she will make little or no way.

Lee Hatch. Take care of the lee hatch. Take care, helmsman, that the ship goes not to the leeward of her course—i.e., the part towards which the wind blows.

Lee Shore, is the shore under the lee of a ship, or that towards which the wind blows. (See LEE.)

Lee-side and Weather-side. The lee-side of a ship is that farthest from the point whence the wind blows; the weather-side is the opposite part, viz., that upon which the wind blows, or in other words, the part to windward.

Lee Tide or Leeward Tide, is a tide running in the same direction as the wind blows. A tide in the opposite direction is called a tide under the lee.

Leeward and Windward. Leeward is toward the lee, or that part towards which the wind blows; windward is in the opposite direction, viz., in the teeth of the wind.

Leek. Wearing the leek on St. David's day. Mr. Brady says St. David caused the Britons under king Cadwallader to distinguish themselves by a leek in their caps. They conquered the Saxons, and recall their victory by adopting the leek on every anniversary (March 1st).—"Clavis Calendaria."

Shakespeare makes the wearing of the leek to originate at the battle of Poitiers, for Fluellen says:

If your majesty is remembered of it, the Welshmen did good service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing leeks in their Monmouth caps, which your majesty knows to this hour is an honourable badge of the service; and I do believe your majesty takes no scorn to wear leek upon St. Tavy's day.—"Henry V.," iv 7.

To eat the leek. To be compelled to eat your own words, or retract what you have said. Fluellen (in Shakespeare's "Henry V.") is taunted by Pistol for wearing a leek in his hat. "Hence," says Pistol, "I am qualmish at the smell of leek." Fluellen replies, "I peseech you . . . at my desire . . . to eat this leek." The ancient answers, "Not for Cadwallader and all his goats." Then the peppery Welshman beats him, nor desists till Pistol has swallowed the entire abhorrence.

Lees. There are lees to every wine. The best things have some defect. A French proverb.

Lefevre. The poor lieutenant whose story is so touchingly told in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy."

Left, unlucky; Right, lucky. The augur among the Romans having taken his stand on the Capitoline hill, and marked out with his wand the space in the heavens to be the field of observation, divided the space into two from top to bottom. If the birds appeared on the left side of the division the augury was unlucky, if on the right side the augury was pronounced to be favourable.

"Hail, gentle bird, turn thy wings and fly on my right hand!" but the bird flew on the left side. Then the cat grew very heavy, for he knew the omen to be unlucky.—"Reynard the Fox," iii.

Over the left. A way of expressing disbelief, incredulity, or a negative. The allusion is tomorganatic marriages (q.v.). When a woman so married claimed to be a wedded wife, she was told that such was the case "over the left." (See below.)

Left-handed Marriage. A morganatic marriage (q.v.). In these marriages the husband gives his left hand to the bride instead of the right, when he says "I take thee for my wedded wife." George William, duke of Zell, married Eleanor d'Esmiers in this way, and the lady took the name and title of Lady of Harburg; her daughter was Sophia Dorothea, the wife of George I.

Leg (A), that is, a blackleg (q.v.).
To make a leg, is to make a bow.

The pursuivant smiled at their simplicity,
And making many legs, took their reward.
"The King and Miller of Mansfield."

Leg-bail—i.e., to cut and run.

Legend means simply "something to be read" as part of the divine service. The narratives of the lives of saints and martyrs were so termed from their being read, especially at matins, and after dinner in the refectories. Exaggeration and a love for the wonderful so predominated in these readings, that the word came to signify the untrue, or rather, an event based on tradition.

Legend of Pierce Gareston. A poem of 702 lines, by Michael Drayton.

Legend of Rollo, Duke of Normandy. A poem of about 940 lines, by Michael Drayton.

Legen'da Au'rea, by Jacob de Voragine. A collection of monkish legends in Latin.

Leger. St. Leger Stakes (Doncaster); so called from colonel Anthony St. Leger, who founded them in 1776. The colonel was governor of St. Lucia, and cousin of the Hon. Elizabeth St. Leger (the lady Freemason).

Legion. My name is Legion, for we are many (St. Mark v. 9). A proverbial expression somewhat similar to hydra-headed. Thus, speaking of the houseless poor we should say, "Their name is Legion;" so also we should say of the diseases arising from want of cleanliness, the evils of ignorance, and so on.

Legion of Honour. An order of merit instituted by the First Consul in 1802, for either military or civil merit. In 1843 there were 49,417 members, but in 1851 one new member was elected for every two extinct ones, so that the honour is no longer a mere farce.

The Thundering Legion. The Roman legion that discomfited the Marcomanni in 179 is so called, because (as the legend informs us) a thunder-storm was sent in answer to the prayers of certain Christians. This storm relieved the thirst of the legion like that which was sent to the aid of Joshua after he commanded the sun to stay its course, and assisted them to their victory.—Dion. Cassius, lxxi. 8.

Legislator or Solon of Parnassus. Boileau was so called by Voltaire, because of his "Art of Poetry," a production unequalled in the whole range of didactic poetry. (1636-1711.)

Leglin-girth. To cast a leglin-girth. To have "a screw loose;" to have made a faux pas; to have one's reputation blown upon. A leglin-girth is the lowest hoop of a leglin or milk-pail. (See Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel," ch. xxii.)

Legree. A slave-dealer in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," by Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

Leicester is the camp-town on the river Leire, now called the Soar.

Leicester Square (London). So called from a family mansion of the Sydneys, earls of Leicester, which stood on the north-east side.

The earl of Leicester, father of Algernon Sidney the patriot... built for himself a stately house at the north-east corner of a square plot of "Lammas Land," belonging to the parish of St. Martin's, which plot henceforth became known to Londoners as Leicester fields. A square gradually grew up on the spot, and was completed in 1671.—Cassell's Magazine, "London Legends," xi.

Leigh (Aurora). The heroine of Mrs. Browning's poem so called, designed to show the noble aim of true art.

Leilah (Li-lah). A beautiful young slave, the concubine of Hassan, caliph of the Ottoman empire. She falls in love with the Giaour, flees from the seraglio, is overtaken by an emir, put to death, and cast into the sea.—Byron, "The Giaour."

Lely (Sir Peter), the painter, was the son of Vander Vans or Faes, of Westphalia, whose house had a lily for its sign. Both father and son went by the nickname of Le-lys (the Lily), a sobriquet which Peter adopted as his cognomen.

Le'man (Lake). Geneva; called in Latin Lemmannus.

Lake Lemman wooes me with its crystal face.
Lord Byron, "Childe Harold," iii. 68.

Lem'nian. A Lemnian act. One of unusual barbarity and cruelty. The phrase arose from two horrible massacres perpetrated by the Lemnians: The first was the murder of all the men and male children on the island by the women; and the other was the murder by the men of all the children in the island born of Athenian parents.

Lem'nian Earth. A species of earth of a yellowish-grey colour, found in the island of Lemnos, said to cure the bites of serpents and other wounds. It was called terra sigillata, because it was sealed by the priest before being vended. Philoctetes was left at Lemnos when wounded in the foot by Heracles.

Lem'urës. The spirits of the dead. Good lem'urës were called Larës, but bad ones Larvæ, spectres who wandered about at night-time to terrify the living. Milton makes Larës one syllable, and Lemures two syllables.—Ovid, "Fasti," v.

The lars and lemures moan with midnight pain.
Milton, "Ode on the Nativity."

Length (l). Forty-two lines. This is a theatrical term; an actor says he has one, two, or more lengths in his part; and if written out for him, the scribe is paid by the length.

Length-month. (See LENT.)

Lens (Latin, a lentil or bean). Glasses used in mathematical instruments are so called because the double convex one, which may be termed the perfect lens, is of a bean shape.

Lenson. As much akin, as Lenson hill to Pilsen pin—i.e., not at all. Lenson and Pilsen are two high hills in Dorsetshire, called by sailors the Cow and Calf. Out at sea they look like one elevation, though in reality several hills separate them.

Lent is from Lenet. Lenet-monat (length-month) was the Saxon name for March, because in this month there is a manifest lengthening of the days. As the chief part of the great fast falls in March, this period of fast received the name of the Lenet-fast or Lent.

Lenten. Frugal, stinted, as food in Lent. Shakespeare has "lenten entertainment" ("Hamlet," ii. 2); "a lenten answer" ("Twelfth Night," i. 5); "a lenten pye" ("Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4).

Le'on (in "Orlando Furioso"), son of Constantine, the Greek emperor, is promised Bradamant in marriage by her parents, Amon and Beatrice; but Bradamant loves Rogero. By-and-by a friendship springs up between Leon and Rogero, and when the prince learns that Bradamant and Rogero are betrothed to each other, he nobly withdraws his suit, and Rogero is married to the lady of his affection.

Leonard. A real scholar, forced for daily bread to keep a common school.—Crabbe, "Bozough," letter xxiv.

St. Leonard is usually represented in a deacon's dress, and holding chains or broken fetters in his hand, in allusion to his untiring zeal in releasing prisoners. Contemporary with Clovis.

Leonidas of Modern Greece. Marcos Bozzaris, who with 1,200 men put to rout 4,000 Turco-Albanians, at Kerpensisi, but was killed in the attack (1823). He was buried at Mesolonghi.

Le'online Contract. A one-sided agreement, so called in allusion to the Fable of "The Lion and his Fellow-Hunters." (See GLAUCUS.)

Le'online Verses. Verses in which the middle word rhymes with the end one; so called from the inventor Leoni'nus, a canon of the church of St. Victor, in Paris, in the twelfth century.

*Ni fallat fotum, Scoti, quocunque locatum
Invenit lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem;
Gloria fictorum conceditur humorum.*

If true the fate thy bards relate,
Where hides this stane, Scotch kings shall reign;
Whose deeds of glory shall live in story.

One of the most noted specimens of Leonine verse celebrates the tale of a Jew, who fell into a pit on Saturday and refused to be helped out because it was his Sabbath. His comrade, being a Christian, refused to aid him the day following, because it was Sunday:—

*Tende manus, Salomon, ego te de stercore collam.
Sabbata nostra colo, de stercore nolo.
Sabbata nostra quidem Salomon celebrabis ibidem.*

"Your hand," cried John Bull, "and I'll give you a pull."

"Tis our Sabbath, dear John, when no work must be done."

"As mine is on Sunday, you must stay there till Monday."

Leonnoys, Leonnesse, or Lyonnesse. A mythical country, contiguous to Cornwall.

Leono'ra, wife of Fernando Florestan, a state prisoner in Seville, in order to aid his release, assumed the attire of a man and the name of Fide'lio. She enters the service of Rocco the jailor, and Marcellina the jailor's daughter falls in love with her. Pizarro, governor of the prison, being resolved to murder Fernando, sends Rocco and Fidelio to dig his grave in his cell. Pizarro descends to accomplish his nefarious purpose, when Leonora draws a pistol and intercepts him. At this moment the minister of state arrives, and orders the prisoner to be released. Leonora is allowed to unlock the chains of her husband, and the revenge of Pizarro is foiled.—Beethoven, "Fidelio" (an opera).

Leonora. A princess who falls in love with Manri'co, the supposed son of Azucen'a the gipsy. The conte di Luna is in love with her, and happening to get Manri'co and his reputed mother into his power, condemns them to death. Leonora intercedes for Manrico, and promises the count if he will spare his life to "give herself to him." The count consents, and goes to the prison to fulfil his promise. when Leonora falls dead from the effect of poison which she has sucked from a ring. Manrico, perceiving this, dies also.—Verdi, "Il Trovatore" (an opera).

Leono'ra de Guzman. The mistress or "favourite" of Alfonso XI. of Castile. Ferdinando, not knowing who she was, fell in love with her; and Alfonso, to save himself from excommunication and reward Ferdinando for services, gave them in marriage to each other. No sooner was this done than the bridegroom, hearing who his bride was, indignantly rejected her and became a monk. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, made herself known to Ferdinando, obtained his forgiveness, and died.—Donizetti, "La Favorita" (an opera).

Leon'tes (3 syl.), king of Sicilia, invited his friend Polix'enès, king of Bohemia, to pay him a visit, and being seized with jealousy, ordered Camillo to poison him. Camillo told Polixenes of the king's jealousy, and fled with him to Bohemia. The flight of Polixenes increased the anger of Leontes against Hermi'onè, his virtuous queen, whom he sent to prison, where she was confined of a daughter (Per'dita), and it was reported that she had died in giving birth to the child. Per'dita, by order of the jealous king, was put away that she might be no more heard of as his; but being abandoned in Bohemia, she was discovered by a shepherd, who brought her up as his own child. In time, Florizel, the son and heir of Polixenes, under the assumed name of Doriclès, fell in love with Perdita; but Polixenes, hearing of this attachment, sternly forbade the match. The two lovers, under the charge of Camillo, fled to Sicily, where the mystery was cleared up, and all "went merry as a marriage bell."—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale."

Leopard, in Christian art, is employed to represent that beast spoken of in the Apocalypse with seven heads and ten horns; six of the horns are nimbed, but the seventh being "wounded to death" has lost its power, and consequently has no nimbus.

Leopard, in heraldry, represents those brave and generous warriors who have performed some bold enterprise with force, courage, promptitude, and activity.

Leopards. So the French designate the English, because their heralds describe our device as a lion leopardé. Bertrand du Guesclin, the famous Breton, declared that men "devoient bien honorer la noble Fleur-de-lis, plus qu'ils ne faisaient le félon Liépard."

Lepol'emo. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part to the Spanish romance called "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Pedro de Lujan.

Leporello. The valet of Don Giovanni, in Mozart's opera of "Don Giovanni."

Lerna. A Lerna of ills (mal'orum Lerna). A very great evil. Lake Lerna is where Hercules destroyed the hydra which did incalculable evil to Argos.

Spain was a Lerna of ills to all Europe, while it aspired to universal monarchy.—P. Motteux, Preface to "Rabelais."

Les Anguilles de Melun. Crying out before you are hurt. When the Mystery of St. Bartholomew was performed at Melun, one Languille took the character of the saint, but when the executioner came to "flay him alive," got nervous and began to shriek in earnest. The audience were in hysterics at the fun, and shouted out, "Languille crie avant qu'on l'écorche," and "Les anguilles de Melun" passed into a French proverb.

Les'bian Poets (The). Terpan'der, Alcæ'us, Ari'on, and the poetess Sappho, all of Lesbos.

Les'sian Diet. Great abstinence; so aspired from Lessius, a physician who prescribed very stringent rules for diet.

Let us Eat and Drink, for to-morrow we shall Die (Isa. xxii. 13). The Egyptians in their banquets exhibited a skeleton to the guests, to remind them of the brevity of human life, saying as they did so, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

Le'the (2 syl.), in Greek mythology, is one of the rivers of Hadēs, which the souls of all the dead are obliged to taste, that they may forget everything said and done in the earth on which they lived.

Letters. Their proportionate use is as follows:—

Letters. Philo affirms that letters were invented by Abraham.

Many attribute the invention to Bada-manth, the Assyrian.

Blair says they were invented by Memnon, the Egyptian, B.C. 1822.

The same authority says that Menēs invented hieroglyphics, and wrote in them a history of Egypt, B.C. 2122.

Josephus asserts that he had seen inscriptions by Seth, son of Adam.

Lucan says—

Phœni'cēs primi, famæ si creditur, ausi
Mansu'ram ru'dibus vocem signatæ figu'ris,
"Pharsalia," iii. 220.

Sir Richard Phillips says—"Thoth, the Egyptian who invented current writing, lived between B.C. 2806 and 3000."

Many maintain that Jehovah taught men written characters when he inscribed on stone the ten commandments. Of course all these assertions have a similar value to mythology and fable.

Father of Letters (Père des Lettres). François I. of France. (1494-1547.)

Lorenzo de' Medici, the Magnificent. (1448-1492.)

Letters Patent. So denominated because they are written upon open sheets of parchment, with the seal of the sovereign or party by whom they were issued pendent at the bottom. Close letters are folded up and sealed on the outside. —Sir Thomas Duffus Hardy.

Letter of Credit. A letter written by a merchant or banker to another, requesting him to credit the bearer with certain sums of money. Circular notes are letters of credit carried by gentlemen when they travel.

Letter of Marque. A commission authorising a privateer to make reprisals on a hostile nation till satisfaction for injury has been duly made. Called marque because the persons to whom they are given may sell or bring to market all the spoil they take, and keep the proceeds for their own use.

Lettre de Cachet (French). An arbitrary warrant of imprisonment; a letter folded and sealed with the king's cachet or little seal. These were secret instructions to the person addressed to proceed against some one named in the letter. The lieutenant-general of police kept an unlimited number of these instruments, and any one, for a consideration, could obtain one, either to conceal a criminal, or to incarcerate some one obnoxious. This power was abolished in the Revolution.

Lettre de Jérusalem. A letter written to extort money. (See Vidocq, "Les Voleurs," i. 240-253.)

Leuca'dia or Leucas. The promontory from which desponding lovers threw themselves into the sea. Sappho threw herself from this rock into the sea, when she found her love for Phaon was in vain.

Thence injured lovers, leaping from above,
Their flames extinguish, and forget to love.
Pope, "Sappho to Phaon."

Leucippus (Greek, Leukippos). Founder of the Atomistic school of Greek philosophy (about B.C. 428).

Leucoth'ea (White Goddess). So Ino was called after she became a sea-nymph. Her son Palaemon, called by the Romans Portunus, was the protecting genius of harbours.

Levant. He has levan'ted—i.e., made off, decamped. A levan'ter is one who makes a bet, and runs away without paying his bet if he loses. (Saxon, lafan, to leave.)

Lev'ant and Couchant. Applied to cattle which have strayed into another's field, and have been there long enough to lie down and sleep.

Levéé. Levéé en masse (French). A patriotic rising of a whole nation to defend their country from invasion.

The Queen's Levée. It was customary for the queens of France to receive at the hour of their levée—i.e., while making their toilet—the visits of certain noblemen. This custom was afterwards demanded as a right by the court physicians, messengers from the king, the queen's secretary, and some few other gentlemen, so that ten or more persons were often in the dressing-room while the queen was making her toilet and sipping her coffee. The word is now used to express that concourse of gentlemen who wait on the Queen on mornings appointed. No ladies except those attached to the court are present on these occasions.

Lev'ellers. Radicals in the time of Charles I. and the Commonwealth, who wanted all men to be placed on a level with respect to their eligibility to office. Ireton was a leveller. (See LILBURNE.)

Levelling-up. Raising the lower to the higher level. The expression was first employed by lord Mayo when opposing Mr. Gladstone's proposition to abolish the Church Establishment of Ireland. Lord Mayo meant by it that the tory government wished to endow the Roman Catholics and Dissenters as the Church of England was endowed, and not to disendow the Church of England, and lower it to the condition of other religious communities in Ireland. (1863.)

Lev'eret. The duke d'Epemon always swooned at the sight of a leveret, though he was not affected if he saw a hare. (See FOX.)

Levi'athan. The crocodile, or some extinct sea-monster, described in the Book of Job (chap. xli.). It sometimes in Scripture designates Pharaoh, king of Egypt, as in Psa. lxxiv. 14; Isa. xxvii. 1; and Ezek. xxix. 3, &c., where the word is translated "dragon."

The Leviathan of literature. Dr. Johnson. (1709-1784.)

Levit'ical. Belonging to the Levites or priestly tribe of Levi; pertaining to the Jewish priesthood, as the Levitical law, Levitical rites.

Lewd (Saxon, leod) simply means the laity. This word carries with it a comment on the old ecclesiastical notion of the virtue of celibacy. The clergy were bound to celibacy, not so the laity, hence the clergy were the "chaste men," and the laity the "lewd or wanton ones."

Lewis (Monk). (See MONK.)

Lewis Baboon. Louis XIV. of France is so called in Arbuthnot's "History of John Bull."

Lex non scripta. The common law as distinguished from the statute or written law. Common law does not derive its force from being recorded, and though its several provisions have been compiled and printed, the compilations are not statutes, but simply remembrancers.

Lex Talio'nis (Latin). Tit for tat; the law of retaliation.

Leyden Jar or Phial. A glass vessel partly coated, inside and out, with lead-foil, and used in electrical experiments to receive accumulated electricity; invented by Vanleigh, of Leyden, in the Netherlands.

Liak'ura (3 syl.). Parnassus.

But where is he that hath beheld
The peak of Liakura unveiled.
Byron, "The Giaour,"

Liar (The). Al Aswad, who set himself up as a prophet against Mahomet, and for four months met with great success. He was called the Weather-cock because he changed his creed so often, the Impostor, and the Liar.

Moseïlma, another contemporary, who affirmed that the "belly is the seat of the soul." He wrote to Mahomet, and began his letter: "From Moseïlma prophet of Allah, to Mahomet prophet of Allah," and received for answer a letter beginning thus: "From Mahomet the prophet of God, to Moseïlma the Liar."

Prince of Liars. Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, a Portuguese traveller, whose narrative partakes so much of the Münchhausen character, that Cervantes dubbed him "the Prince of Liars." He is alluded to in the "Tatler" as a man "of infinite adventure and unbounded imagination."

Li'bel means a little book (Latin, libellus). A lampoon, a satire, or any defamatory writing. Originally it meant a plaintiff's statement of his case; but as these statements "defame" the defendant, the word lapsed to its present usage.

Li'ber Albus (Latin, the White Book). An ancient book containing the laws and customs of the city of London. Printed under the direction of the Master of the Rolls.

Li'ber Niger or The Black Book of the Exchequer, compiled by Gervase of Tilbury.

Lib'erals. A political term first employed when lord Byron and his friends set on foot the periodical called "The Liberal," to represent their views in politics, religion, and literature.

Liberal Arts. Book-learning (Latin, liber); viz., Grammar, Rhetoric, Philosophy, Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, and Music.

Lingua, Tropus, Ratio, Numerus, Tonus, Angulus, Astra.

Lib'erator (The). The Peruvians so call Simon Bolivar, who established the independence of Peru. (1785-1831.)

Lib'ertines. A sect of heretics in Holland, led by Quinton a factor, and Copin. They maintained that nothing is sinful but to those who think it sinful, and that perfect innocence is to live without doubt.

Liberty means "balance of power." (Latin, libra, a balance.)

Cap of liberty. The goddess of liberty, in the Aventine Mount, was represented as holding in her hand a cap, the symbol of freedom. In France, the Jacobins wore a red cap; in England, a blue cap with a white border is the symbol of liberty, and Britannia is sometimes represented as holding such a cap on the point of her spear. (See CAP.)

Libissa. Queen of the fairies.

Li'bra (the balance). One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (September 23rd to October 23rd), when day and night being weighed would be found equal.

Li'brary. One of the most approved materials for writing on, before the invention of paper, was the thin rind between the solid wood and the outside bark of certain trees. This substance is in Latin called liber, which came in time to signify also a "book." Hence our library, the place for books; librarian, the keeper of books; and the French livre, a book.

A living or walking library. Longinus, the philosopher and rhetorician, was so called. (213-273.)

Public libraries.

¶ Ancient. That of Alexandria, founded by the Ptolemies, and destroyed by the Arabs A.D. 641.

The first public library of Rome was founded by As'inus Polio; the second, called the Palatine, by Augustus.

The royal library of the Fatimites of Egypt contained 100,000 manuscripts, splendidly bound.—Gibbon.

The library of the Omniadēs of Spain contained 600,000 volumes, 44 of which were catalogues.—Gibbon.

There were seventy public libraries in the kingdom of Andalu'sia.—Gibbon.

When the monastery of Croydon was burnt, in 1091, its library consisted of 900 volumes, 300 of which were very large.—Ingulphus.

¶ Modern. The British Museum contains 89,000 manuscripts, and about 900,000 volumes (some 40,000 additions are made annually).

The Impériale, France, about 600,000 books, 500,000 pamphlets, and 85,000 manuscripts.

The Munich, about 500,000 books and 10,000 manuscripts.

The Vienna, about 400,000 books and 20,000 manuscripts.

The Vatican, about 150,000 books and 40,000 manuscripts.

The Imperial, of Russia, about 600,000 books and 21,000 manuscripts.

The Copenhagen, about 450,000 books and 15,000 manuscripts.

Lib'ya. Africa, or all the interior of Africa.

Licen'tiate (4 syl.). One who has a licence to practise some art or faculty, as a licentiate of medicine.

Lich. A dead body. (Saxon, lic; German, leiche.)

Lich-field, in Staffordshire. The field of the dead—i.e., of the martyred Christians.

Lich-fowls. Birds that feed on carrion, as night-ravens, screech-owls, &c.

Lich-gate. The shed or covered place at the entrance of church-yards, intended to afford shelter to the coffin and mourners, while they wait for the clergyman to conduct the cortège into the church.

Lich-owl. The owl superstitiously supposed to foretell death.

Lich-wake or Lyke-wake. The funeral feast or the waking of a corpse—i.e., watching it all night.

Lich-way. The path by which a funeral is conveyed to church, which not unfrequently deviates from the ordinary road. It was long supposed that wherever a dead body passed became a public thoroughfare.

Lichten. Belonging to the lich-ground or cemetery. In Chichester, just outside the city walls on the east are what the common people call the lightnen or liten schools, a corruption of lichten schools, so termed because they stand on a part of the ancient Saxon lich-acre. The spelling usually adopted for these schools is "litten."

Lick. I licked him. I flogged or beat him. (Welsh, llag, a slap.) Generally derived from lictors, the Roman officers who inflicted punishment on underservers, but the resemblance of the words is accidental.

To lick into shape. According to tradition the cubs of bears are cast shapeless, and remain so till the dam has licked them into proper form.

So watchful Bruin forms, with plastic care,
Each growing lump, and brings it to a bear.
"Dunciad," bk. i. 191.

Lictors. Binders (Latin, ligo, to bind or tie). These Roman officers were so called because they bound the hands and feet of criminals before they executed the award of the law upon them.—Aulus Gellius.

Lid. Greek, kleid (to shut down); Latin, claud; and clud; Saxon, hlid; Dutch and Danish, lid; our lid and close.

Lidskial'fa (the terror of nations). The throne of Alfader, whence he can view the whole universe.—Scandinavian mythology.

Lie. (Saxon, lig, a falsehood.)

A lie hath no feet, because it cannot stand alone. In fact a lie wants twenty others to support it, and even then is in constant danger of tripping.

You lie for the whetstone. This refers to an ancient custom mentioned by Lup-ton in his "Too Good to be True" (1580): He who told the greatest lie gained a silver whetstone.

Father of Lies. Satan (St. John viii. 44).

Lie. (Saxon, ligan, to 'bide or rest.)

Lie heavy on him, earth, for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

This is part of Dr. Evans's epitaph on Sir John Vanbrugh, the comic poet, herald, and architect. The "heavy loads" referred to were Blenheim, Greenwich Hospital (which he finished), Castle Howard in Yorkshire, and other massive buildings. (1666-1726.)

Lie at the catch. Thus Talkative says to Faithful, "You lie at the catch, I perceive." To which Faithful replies, "No, not I; I am only for setting things right." "To lie at the catch," or lie on the catch, is to lie in wait to catch one up—to lay a trap to catch one.

Liebenstein and Sternfels. Two ruined castles of the Rhine. According to tradition, Leoline, the orphan, was the sole surviving child of the lord of Liebenstein; and two brothers, named Warbeck and Otho, were the surviving children of the lord of Sternfels. Both the brothers fell in love with Leoline; but, as Leoline gave the preference to Otho, Warbeck joined the Crusades. A templar in time persuaded Otho to do the same; but the war being over, Otho stayed at Constantinople, where he fell in love with a Greek, whom he brought home for his bride. Leoline retired to the adjacent convent of Bornhofen. Warbeck defied his brother to single combat for this insult to his betrothed; but Leoline with the nuns interposed to prevent the fight. The Greek wife, in time, eloped with one of the inmates of Sternfels, and Otho died childless. A band of robbers broke into the convent; but Warbeck armed in its defence. He repelled the robbers, but received his death-wound, and died in the lap of Leoline, and thus passed away the last lord of Liebenstein.—Traditions of the Rhine.

Liege, applied to a king, is a lucus a non lucendo. The word means one bound, a bondsman (Latin, ligo, to bind); hence, vassals were called liege-men—i.e., men bound to serve their lord. The lord was called the liege-lord, meaning not the bond-lord, but the liege-man's lord, or the lieging-lord.

Li'en. A bond (Latin, ligu'men). Legally, a bond on goods for a debt; a right to retain goods in a creditor's hands till he has satisfied a legal claim for debt.

Liesse (2 syl.). Abbé de Liesse or Abbas Letitia. The French term for the "Boy Bishop," or "Abbot of Unreason." (See ABBOT.)

Lieutenant is the Latin locum-tenens, through the French.

Life-Guards. Two senior regiments of the mounted body-guard, comprising 878 men, all six feet high; hence a fine, tall, manly fellow is called "a regular Life-guards' man."

Li-Flambe. The banner of Clovis, miraculously displayed to him in the skies. (See TOADS.)

Lift. To have one at a lift is to have one in your power. When a wrestler has his antagonist in his hands and lifts him from the ground, he has him "at a lift," or in his power.

"Sirra," says he, "I have you at a lift. Now you are come unto your latest shift," Percy, "Reliques" (Guy and Amarant).

Lifter. A thief. We still call one who plunders shops "a shop-lifter." (Gothic, hliftus, a thief.)

Is he so young a man, and so old a lifter?
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," i. 2.

Lige'a. A sea-nymph and syren (Greek, ligus, sweet or shrill voiced).

Light of the Age. Maimon'idès or Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, of Cor'dova. (1135-1204.)

Light of the Haram. The sultana Nourmahal, afterwards called Nourjehan (Light of the World). She was the bride of Selim.—Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh."

Light gains make a heavy purse. Small profits and a quick return, is the best way of gaining wealth; French, Le petit gain remplit la bourse; Italian, I guadagni mediocri empiono la borsa.

Light-foot. One of Fortunio's servants. He could run ten times faster than a deer.—"Grimm's Goblins" (Fortunio).

Lighthouse. The most celebrated of antiquity was the one erected by Ptolemy Soter in the island of Pharos, opposite Alexandria. Josephus says it could be seen at the distance of 42 miles.

Of modern lighthouses the most famous are the Eddystone, opposite Plymouth Sound; the Tour de Corduan, at the entrance of the Gironde, in France; and the Bell Rock, opposite the Frith of Tay.

Lightning (Borca). Hamilcar of Carthage was so called for the rapidity of his march and severity of his attacks. (B.C. 247-228.)

Lightning. The most approved classical preservatives against lightning were the eagle, the sea-calf, and the laurel. Jupiter chose the first, Augustus Cæsar the second, and Tiberius the third.—Collumella, x.; Sueton. in Vit. Aug., xc.; ditto in Vit. Tib., lxi.

Bodies scathed and persons struck dead by lightning were said to be incorruptible; and any one so distinguished was held by the ancients in great honour.—J. C. Bullenger, "De Terræ Motu," &c., v. 11.

Liguo'rians. A congregation of missionary priests called also Redemptionists, founded in 1732, by Liguori. Their object is the religious instruction of the people, and the reform of public morality.

Ligurian Arts. Deception, trickery.

The Ligurian Republic. Venetia, Genoa, and a part of Sardinia, tied up in one bundle by Napoleon I. in 1797, and bound with a constitution similar to that of the French "Directory;" so called from Ligu'ria, pretty well commensurate with these districts.

The Ligurian Sage. Aulus Persius Flaccus, born at Volaterræ, in Etruria, according to ancient authors; and at Lunæ Portus, in Liguria, according to some modern authorities. (See "Satire," vi. 6.)

Lilburne. If no one else were alive John would quarrel with Lilburne. John Lilburne was a contentious leveller in the Commonwealth, so rancorous against rank that he could never satisfy himself that any two persons were exactly on the same level. (See LAWSUITS.)

Lil'inau was wooed by a phantom that lived in her father's pines. At nightfall the phantom whispered love, and won the fair Lilinau, who followed his green waving plume through the forest, and was never seen again.—American-Indian tradition.

Lil'is or LIL'ITH (Rabbinical mythology). The Talmudists say that Adam had a wife before Eve, whose name was Lilis. Refusing to submit to Adam, she left Paradise for a region of the air. She still haunts the night as a spectre, and is especially hostile to new-born infants. Some superstitious Jews still put in the chamber occupied by their wife four coins, with labels on which the names of Adam and Eve are inscribed, with the words "Avant thee, Lilith!" According to the "Cyclopædia Metropolitana," our word lullaby is a corruption of "Lilla, abi" (Lilith, avant). Goethe has introduced her in his "Faust." (See LAMIA.)

Lilli-Burlero and BULLEN-A-LAH. Said to have been the words of distinction used by the Irish Papists in their massacres of the Protestants in 1641. A song with the refrain of "Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!" was written by lord Wharton, which had a more powerful effect than the philippics of either Demosthenes or Cicero, and contributed not a little to the great revolution of 1688. Burnet says, "It made an impression on the [king's] army that cannot be imagined. . . . The whole army, and at last the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually . . . never had so slight a thing so great an effect." The song is in Percy's "Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," series ii., bk. 3.

Lilliput. The country of pigmies called "Lilliputians," to whom Gulliver was a huge Colossus.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels."

Lily. Emblem of France. Tasso, in his "Jerusalem Delivered," terms the French Gigli d'oro (golden lilies). It is said the people were commonly called Liliarts, and the kingdom Lilium in the time of Philippe le Bel, Charles VIII., and Louis XII. They were so called from the fleur de lys, the emblem of France.

I saw my country's lily torn.
Bloomfield (A Frenchman is speaking.)

The burghers of Ghent were bound by solemn oath not to make war upon the lilies.—Mullington, "Heraldry," l.

Lily of France. The device of Clovis was three black toads, but an aged hermit of Joye-en-valle saw a miraculous light stream one night into his cell, and an angel appeared to him holding a shield of wonderful beauty: its colour was azure, and on it were emblazoned three gold lilies that shone like stars, which the hermit was commanded to give to queen Clotilde. Scarcely had the angel vanished when Clotilde entered, and receiving the celestial shield, gave it to her royal husband, whose arms were everywhere victorious.

Un hermite apporta à la ditte royne un drap d'azur à Trois Fleurs de Lis d'or, que l'ange luy auoit donnee et le deliura la ditte royne à son mary le roy Clovis pour le porter comme ses armes en lieu quil les portoit d'or à trois crapavz de sable. —Chiffre.

Lily in Christian art is an emblem of chastity, innocence, and purity. In pictures of the Annunciation, Gabriel is sometimes represented as carrying a lily-branch, while a vase containing a lily stands before the Virgin, who is kneeling in prayer. St. Joseph also holds a lily-branch in his hand, to show that his wife Mary was always the virgin.

Lily Maid of Astolat. (See ELAINE.)

Lim Hay. Lick it up like Lim hay. Lim, on the Mersey, is famous for its excellent hay.

Limbo. To tear limb from Warburton. Lymm cum Warburton form one rectory in Cheshire. The play is on limb and Lymm.

Limberham. A tame, foolish keeper. The character is in Dryden's comedy of "Limberham or the Kind Keeper," and is supposed to satirise the duke of Lauderdale.

Limbo. A waste-basket; a place where things are stowed, too good to destroy, but not good enough to use. In School Theology, unbaptised infants and good heathens go to Limbo. (Latin, limbus, the edge). They cannot go to heaven, because they are not baptised, and they cannot go to the place of torment, because they have not committed sin at all, or because their good preponderates. (See Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. iii.) In slang phraseology, In Limbo means in prison. (See ARAF.)

Limbus Fatuorum. The Limbus of Fools, or Fool's Paradise. As fools are not responsible for their works, they are not punished in purgatory, but cannot be received into heaven; so they go to a place called the Paradise of Fools.

Limbus Patrum. The half-way house between earth and heaven, where the patriarchs and prophets, after death, await the coming of Messiah. According to the Roman Catholic notion, this is the "hell" or hadēs into which Jesus Christ descended after he gave up the ghost on the cross. Limbo, and sometimes Limbo patrum, is used for "quod," jail, confinement.

I have some of them in limbo patrum, and there they are like to dance these three days.—Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," v. 3.

Limbus Puerorum. The Child's Paradise, for children who die before they are responsible for their actions.

Lime Street (London). The place where in former times lime was sold in public market. It gives its name to one of the wards of London.

Limisso. A city of Cyprus, called Caria by Ptolemy.—"Orlando Furioso."

Limited Liability. The liability of a shareholder in a company only for a fixed amount, generally the amount of the shares he has subscribed for.

Limner. A drawer, a painter, an artist. A contraction of illuminator, or rather lumineur (one who illuminates manuscripts.)

Limp. Formed of the initial letters of Louis, James, Mary, Prince. A Jacobite toast in the time of William III. (See NOTARICA.)

Lina. The goddess flax.

Inventress of the woof, fair Lina flings
The flying shuttle rough the dancing strings.
Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," c. ii.

Lincoln. A contraction of Lindum-colonia. Lindum was an old British town, called Llyn-dune (the fen-town). If we had not known the Latin name, we should have given the etymology Llyn-collyne (the fen-hill), as the old city was on a hill.

Lincoln College (Oxford). Founded by Richard Fleming in 1427, and completed by Rotherham, bishop of Lincoln, 1479.

Lincoln's Inn. One of the fashionable theatres in the reign of Charles II.

Lincoln's Inn Fields (London). Henry Lacy, earl of Lincoln, built an inn (mansion) here in the 14th century. The ground belonged to the Black Friars, but was granted by Edward I. to that earl. Subsequently one of the bishops of Chichester, in the reign of Henry VII., granted leases here to certain students of law.

Lindabrides. A heroine in "The Mirror of Knighthood," whose name at one time was a synonym for a kept mistress, in which sense it is used by Sir Walter Scott.

Lindor. A poetic swain of the Cor'ydon type, a lover en bergère.

Do not, for heaven's sake, bring down Corydon and Lindor upon us.—Sir Walter Scott.

Line. A line a day (Nulla dies sine lineâ). Apelles the artist said he never passed a day without doing at least one line, and to this steady industry he owed his great success.

The line. All numbered cavalry and infantry regiments, except the life-guards, foot-guards, and dragoon-guards, belong to the line. A "line of battle" is when the army is so drawn up that the front extends as far as the ground will allow, to prevent its being flanked. There are three lines, the van, the main body, and the rear. A fleet drawn up in line of battle is so arranged that the ships are ahead and astern of each other at equal distances.

To break the enemy's line is to destroy their order of battle, and so put them to confusion.

The deep-sea line. A long line marked at every five fathoms, for sounding the depth of the sea.

What line are you in? What trade or profession are you of? "In the book line"—i.e., the book trade. This is a Scripture phrase. "The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage." The allusion is to drawing a line to mark out the lot of each tribe, hence line became the synonym of lot, and lot means position or destiny, and hence calling, trade, or profession.

Line of Beauty, according to Hogarth, is a curve thus  Mengs was of the same opinion, but thought it should be more serpentine. Of course, these fancies are not tenable, for the line which may be beautiful for one object would be hideous in another. What would Hogarth have said to a nose or mouth which followed his line of beauty?

Line of Communication, or rather Lines of Communication, are trenches made to continue and preserve a safe correspondence between two forts, or two approaches to a besieged city, or between two parts of the same army, that they may co-operate with each other.

Line of Demarcation. The line which divides the territories of different proprietors. The space between two opposite doctrines, opinions, rules of conduct, &c.

Line of Direction. The line in which a body moves, a force acts, or motion is communicated. In order that a body may stand without falling, a line let down from the centre of gravity must fall within the base on which the object stands. Thus the leaning tower of Pisa does not fall, because this rule is preserved.

Line of March. The ground over which the line of battle moves.

Line of Operations is that line which corresponds with the line of communication, proceeding from the place whence the army draws its supplies to the spot occupied by the army.

Linen Goods. In 1721, a statute was passed imposing a penalty of £5 upon the weaver, and £20 upon the seller of a piece of calico. Fifteen years later this statute was so far modified that calicoes manufactured in Great Britain were allowed, "provided the warp thereof was entirely of linen yarn." In 1774, a statute was passed allowing printed cotton goods to be used on the payment of threepence a yard duty; in 1806, the duty was raised to threepence-halfpenny. This was done to prevent the use of calicoes from interfering with the demand for linen and woollen stuffs. The law for burying in woollen was of a similar character. The following extracts from a London news-letter, dated August 2nd, 1768, are curious. [Note—chintz is simply printed calico.]

Yesterday 3 tradesmen's wives of this city were convicted before the Rt. Hon. the Ld. Mayor for wearing chintz gowns on Sunday last, and each of them was fined £5. These make 80 who have been convicted of the above offence within 12 months past. . . . There were several ladies in St. J. mes's Pk. on the same day with chintz gowns on, but the persons who gave informâs of the above 3 were not able to discover their names or places of abode. . . . Yesterday a wagon loaded with £2,000 worth of chintz was seized at Dart ord in Kent by some custom-house officers. Two post chaises loaded with the same commodity got off with their goods by swiftness of driving.

Lingua Franca. A species of corrupt Italian spoken on the coasts of the Mediterranean. The Franks' language mixed with the Italian.

Linnæan System. A system devised by Linnæus of Sweden, who arranged his three kingdoms of animals, vegetables, and minerals into classes, orders, genera, species, and varieties, according to certain specific characters.

Linne (The Heir of). The lord of Linne was a great spendthrift, "who wasted his substance in riotous living." Having spent all, he sold his estates to John o' the Scales, his steward, reserving to himself only a "poor and lonesome lodge in a lonely glen." When he had squandered away the money received for his estates, and found that no one would lend or give him more, he retired to the lodge in the glen, where he found a rope with a running noose dangling over his head. He put the rope round his neck and sprang aloft, when lo! the ceiling burst in twain, and he fell to the ground. When he came to himself he espied two chests of beaten gold, and a third full of white money, and over them was written, "Once more, my son, I set thee clear; amend thy life, or a rope at last must end it." The heir of Linne now returned to his old hall, where he asked his quondam steward for the loan of forty pence; this was denied him. One of the guests proffered the loan, and told John o' the Scales he ought to have lent it, as he had bought the estate cheap enough. "Cheap call you it?" exclaimed John; "why, be shall have it back for 100 marks less." "Done," said the heir of Lynne, and counted out the money. He thus recovered his estates, and made the kind guest his forester.—Percy, "Reliques," series ii., bk. 2.

Linsprê (French, 2 syl.) means a prince in slang or familiar usage. It comes from the inspector or monitor of the cathedral choir called the Spê or the Inspê (inspector), because he had to superintend the rest of the boys.

Lion. A marble lion was set up in honour of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylæ.

¶ The Lion.

ALEP ARSLAN (the Valiant Lion), son of Togrul Beg, the Perso-Turkish monarch. (1063-1072.)

ALI was called The Lion of God for his religious zeal and great courage. His mother called him at birth Al Haïdara (the Rugged Lion). (A.D. 597-660.)

ALI PASHA, called The Lion of Janina, overthrown in 1822 by Ibrahim Pasha. (1741-1822.)

ARIOCH (fifth of the dynasty of Ninu, the Assyrian), called Arioch Ellasar—i.e., Arioch Melech al Asser, The Lion King of Assyria. (B.C. 1927-1897.)

DAMELOWIEZ, prince of Haliez, who founded Lemberg (the Lion City) in 1259.

GUSTA'VUS ADOLPHUS, called The Lion of the North. (1594, 1611-1632.)

HAMZA, called The Lion of God and of his Prophet. So Gabriel told Mahomet his uncle was enregistered in heaven.

HENRY, duke of Bavaria and Saxony, was called The Lion for his daring courage. (1129-1195.)

LOUIS VIII. of France was called The Lion because he was born under the sign Leo. (1187, 1223-1226.)

RICHARD I. Cœur de Lion (Lion's heart), so called for his bravery. (1157, 1189-1199.)

WILLIAM of Scotland, so called because he chose a red lion rampant for his cognizance. (1165-1214.)

¶ The Lion Killer. Jules Gerard. (1817-1864.)

The Lion of the tribe of Judah. The Messiah. (Rev. v. 5.)

The Lion of the Reformation. Spenser says that while Una was seeking St. George, she sat to rest herself, when a lion rushed suddenly out of a thicket, with gaping mouth and lashing tail; but as he drew near he was awe-struck, and laying aside his fury, kissed her feet and licked her hands; for, as the poet adds, "beauty can master strength, and truth subdue vengeance." [The lion is the emblem of England, which waits upon Truth. When true Faith was deserted by all the world, England the lion came to its rescue.] The lion now follows Una as a dog, but when Una meets Hypocrisy, Sansloy comes upon them and kills the lion. That is: During the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., England the lion followed the footsteps of Truth; but in the reign of Mary Hypocrisy came, and False-faith killed the lion—i.e., separated England from Truth by fire and sword.

The lion an emblem of the resurrection. According to tradition, the lion's whelp is born dead, and remains so for three days, when the father breathes on it and it receives life. Hence is it assigned by artists to St. Mark, the historian of the resurrection. (See EVANGELIST.)

A lion emblematic of St. Jerome. Typifying his substitute. Jesus Christ, the "Lion of the tribe of Judah," is sometimes symbolised under the form of a lion.

¶ The lion in heraldry, as a symbol of sovereignty and power, has always been selected as the support of royal thrones. In coat armour the attribute particularised depends on the attitude given; thus—

Couchant represents sovereignty, in which attitude also it is employed as the support of lecterns and candlesticks.

Gardant represents prudence.

Passant—resolution.

Rampant—magnanimity.

Regardant—circumspection.

Saliant—valour.

Sciant—counsel.

Strictly speaking, there is a difference between a lion-leopard and a leoparded lion. The former is passant and in profile, the latter passant gardant. The latter has always a mane, the former none.

The lions in the arms of England. They are three lions passant gardant—i.e., walking and showing the full face. The first lion was that of Rollo, duke of Normandy, and the second represented the country of Maine, which was added to Normandy. These were the two lions borne by William the Conqueror and his descendants. Henry II. added a third lion to represent the duchy of Aquitaine, which came to him through his wife Eleanor. The French heralds call the lion passant a leopard; accordingly Napoleon said to his soldiers, "Let us drive these leopards (the English) into the sea!"

The lion in the arms of Scotland is derived from the arms of the ancient earls of Northumberland and Huntingdon, from whom some of the Scotch monarchs were descended. The treasure is referred to the reign of king Achaicus, who made a league with Charlemagne, "who did augment his arms with a double trace formed with Floure-de-lyces, signifying thereby that the lion henceforth should be defended by the ayde of the Frencemen."—Holinshed, "Chronicles."

Sir Walter Scott says the lion rampant in the arms of Scotland was first assumed by William of Scotland, and has been continued ever since.

William, king of Scotland, having chosen for his armorial bearing a Red Lion rampant, acquired the name of William the Lion; and this rampant lion still constitutes the arms of Scotland; and the president of the heraldic court ... is called Lord Lion King-at-Arms.—"Tales of a Grandfather," iv.

(1) A man who is a notoriety, and is made much of by the public, is called a lion.

(2) To lionise a person is either to show him the lions or chief objects of attraction, or to make a lion of him, by fétting him and making a fuss about him. To be lionised is to be so treated.

¶ Lion, a public-house sign.

Black lion comes from the Flemmings.

Au noir lyon la fleur-de-lis

Prist la terre de ça le l'ys.

Godefroy de Paris.

Blue, the badge of the earl of Mortimer, also of Denmark.

Crowned, the badge of Henry VIII.

Golden, the badge of Henry I., and also of Percy, duke of Northumberland.

Passant gardant (walking and showing a full face), the device of England.

Red, of Scotland; also the badge of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, who assumed this badge as a token of his claim to the throne of Castile.

Rampant, the device of Scotland.

Rampant, with the tail between its legs and turned over its back, the badge of Edward IV. as earl of March.

Sleeping, the device of Richard I.

Statant gardant (i.e., standing and showing a full face), the device of the duke of Norfolk.

White, the device of the dukes of Norfolk; also of the earl of Surrey, earl of Mortimer, and the Fitz-Hammonds.

For who, in field or foray slack,

Saw the blanch lion e'er full back? (duke of Norfolk.)

Sir Walter Scott, "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

Blue seems frequently to represent silver; thus we have the Blue Bear of Richard III., the Blue Lion of the earl of Mortimer, the Blue Swan of Henry IV., the Blue Dragon, &c.

The winged lion. The republic of Venice. Its heraldic device.

¶ Lion. One of the signs of the zodiac. (See LEO.)

¶ Lions in classic mythology. CYBELE is represented as riding in a chariot drawn by two tame lions.

PRACRITI, the goddess of nature among the Hindus, is represented in a similar manner.

HIPPOMENES and ATALANTA (fond lovers) were metamorphosed into lions by Cybèle.

HERCULES is said to have worn over his shoulders the hide of the Nemean lion, which he slew with his club. TERROUR is also represented as arrayed in a lion's hide.

The Nem'ean lion, slain by Hercules. The first of his twelve labours.

¶ The lion attached to man.

ANDROC'LUS, a Roman slave, was condemned to encounter a lion; but when the lion was let loose he couched at the feet of Androcl'us, and began licking them. The reason was this: Androcl'us one day had taken a thorn out of the lion's foot, and the beast recognised its benefactor.

SIR IWAIN DE GALLES was attended by a lion, which, in gratitude to the knight, who had delivered it from a serpent with which it had been engaged in deadly combat, ever after became his faithful servant, approaching the knight with tears, and rising on his hind-feet like a dog.

SIR GEOFFREY DE LATOUR was aided by a lion against the Saracens; but the faithful brute was drowned in attempting to follow the vessel in which the knight had embarked on his departure from the Holy Land.

ST. JEROME is represented as attended by a lion.

The lion will not touch the true prince ('1 Henry IV.," ii. 4). This is a religious superstition; the "true prince," strictly speaking, being the Messiah, who is called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah." Loosely it is applied to any prince of blood royal, supposed at one time "to be hedged around with a sort of divinity."

Fetch the Numidian lion I brought over;
If she be sprung from royal blood, the lion
Will do her reverence, else he'll tear her.
Beaumont and Fletcher, "The Mad Lover."

Lion of God. (See above, The Lion.)

Lion and Unicorn. The animosity which existed between these beasts, referred to by Spenser in his "Faëry Queen," is allegorical of the animosity which once existed between England and Scotland.

Like sea a lion, whose imperial powre
A proud rebellious unicorn defies.—(ii. 5.)

Lion and Unicorn. Ever since 1603 the royal arms have been supported as now by the English lion and Scottish unicorn; but prior to the accession of James I., the sinister supporter was a family badge. Edward III., with whom supporters began, had a lion and eagle; Henry IV., an antelope and swan; Henry

V., a lion and antelope; Edward IV., a lion and bull; Richard III., a lion and boar; Henry VII., a lion and dragon; Elizabeth, Mary, and Henry VIII., a lion and greyhound. The lion is dexter—i.e., to the right hand of the wearer or person behind the shield.

Lion's Head. In fountains the water generally is made to issue from the mouth of a lion. This is a very ancient custom. The Egyptians thus symbolised the inundation of the Nile, which happens when the sun is in Leo. The Greeks and Romans adopted the same device for their fountains.

Lion's Provider. A jackal; a foil to another man's wit; a humble friend who plays into your hand to show you to best advantage. The jackal feeds on the lion's leavings, and is supposed to serve the lion in much the same way as a dog serves a sportsman. The dog lifts up its foot to indicate that game is at hand, and the jackal yells to advertise the lion that prey is close by. (See JACKAL.)

Lion's Share. The larger part; all or nearly all. In "Æsop's Fables," several beasts joined the lion in a hunt, but when the spoil was divided, the lion claimed one quarter in right of his prerogative, one for his superior courage, one for his dam and cubs, "and as for the fourth, let who will dispute it with me." Awed by his frown, the other beasts silently withdrew. (See MONTGOMERY.)

Lion-sick. Sick of love, like the lion in the fable. (See "Troilus and Cressida," ii. 3.)

Liosal'far. The light Alfs who dwell in the city Alfheim. They are whiter than the sun. (See DÜCK-ALFAR.)—Scandinavian mythology.

Lip. To hang the lip. To drop the underlip in sullenness or contempt. Thus Helen explains why her brother Troilus is not abroad by saying, "He hangs the lip at something." (Act iii. 1.)

A foolish hanging of thy nether lip.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," Act ii. 4.

Liris. A proud but lovely daughter of the race of man, beloved by Rubi, first of the angel host. Her passion was the love of knowledge, and she was captivated by all her lover told her of heaven and the works of God. At last she requested Rubi to appear before her in all his glory, and as she fell into his embrace was burnt to ashes by the rays which issued from him.—Moore, "Loves of the Angels," story ii.

Lis. Fleur de lis. The tradition is that lis is a corruption of Clovis, which of course is the same as 'lovis or louis. The chroniclers say that Clovis, after the battle of Tolbiac, on his way to Rheims, where he was going to be baptised, received a lily from heaven. It was Louis le Jeune who adopted the "celestial flower" in the national standard. At first the flag was thickly sown with lilies (1180), but later in the same reign the number was reduced to three, in honour of the Holy Trinity.

Lisbo'a or LIS'BOA. Lisbon (q.v.).

What beauties doth Lisbo'a first unfold.

Byron, "Childe Harold," i. 16.

And thou, famed Lis bo'a, whose embattled wall knew by the hand that wrought proud Ilion's fall.
Mickle, "Lusid."

Lisbon. A corruption of 'Ulyssippo (Ulysses' polis or city). Said by some to have been founded by Lusus, who visited Portugal with Ulysses, whence "Lusitania" (q.v.); and by others to have been founded by Ulysses himself. This is Camoens' version. (See above.)

Lismaha'go (Captain), in Smollett's "Humphry Clinker." Very conceited, fond of disputation, jealous of honour, and brim-full of national pride. This poor but proud Scotch officer is the suitor of Miss Tabitha Bramble. The romance of Captain Lismaha'go among the Indians is worthy of Cervantes.

Lisuar'te of Greece. One of the knights whose adventures and exploits are recounted in the latter part of the Spanish version of "Amadis of Gaul." This part was added by Juan Diaz.

Lit de Justice. Properly the seat occupied by the French king when he attended the deliberations of his parlement. The session itself. Any arbitrary edict. As the members of parlement derived their power from the king, when the king himself was present their power returned to the fountain-head, and the king was arbitrary. What he then proposed could not be controverted, and of course had the force of law. The last lit de justice was held by Louis XVI. in 1787.

Little. Thomas Moore published a volume of amatory poems in 1808, under the name of Thomas Little.

Little Britain or Brittany. Same as Armorica.

Little Corporal (The). General Bonaparte. So called after the battle of Lodi, in 1796, from his low stature, youthful age, and amazing courage.

Little Dauphin (The). The eldest son of the Great Dauphin—i.e., the duc de Bourgoyne, son of Louis, and grandson of Louis XIV.

Little-endians. The two great empires of Lilliput and Blefuscu waged a destructive war against each other, exhausted their treasures, and decimated their subjects on their different views of interpreting this vital direction contained in the 54th chapter of the Blun'decral (Koran): "All true believers break their eggs at the convenient end." The godfather of Calin Deffar Plune, the reigning emperor of Lilliput, happened to cut his finger while breaking his egg at the big end, and very royally published a decree commanding all his liege and faithful subjects, on pains and penalties of great severity, to break their eggs in future at the small end. The orthodox Blefuscu'dians deemed it their duty to resent this innovation, and declared war of extermination against the heretical Lilliputians. Many hundreds of large treatises were published on both sides, but those of a contrary opinion were put in the Index expurgatorius of the opposite empire.—"Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Lilliput, iv.).

The quarrel between the Little-endians and the Big-endians broke out on Thursday, like the after-fire of a more serious conflagration.—The Times.

Little-go. The examination held in the Cambridge University in the second year of residence. Called also the "previous examination," because it precedes by a year the examination for a degree. In Oxford the corresponding examination is called The Smalls.

Little Jack Horner. (See JACK.)

Little John. A big stalwart fellow, named John Little (or John Nailor), who encountered Robin Hood, and gave him a sound thrashing, after which he was re-christened, and Robin stood godfather. Little John is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "The Talisman."

"This infant was called John Little," quoth he;
 "Which name shall be changed anon.
 The words we'll transpose, so wherever he goes,
 His name shall be called Little John."
Ritson, "Robin Hood," xxi.

Little John was executed on Arbor Hill, Dublin.

It will be remembered that Maria in "Twelfth Night," represented by Shakespeare as a little woman, is by a similar pleasantry called by Viola, "Olivia's giant;" and Sir Toby says to her, "Good night, Penthesilea!"—i.e., Amazon.

Little Masters. A name applied to certain designers, who worked for engravers, &c., in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Called little because their designs were on a small scale, fit for copper or wood. The most famous are Jost Amman, for the minuteness of his work; Hans Burgmair, who made drawings in wood illustrative of the triumph of the emperor Maximilian; Hans Sebald Beham; Albert Altdorfer, and Henrich Aldegraver. Albert Durer and Lucas van Leyden made the art renowned and popular.

Little Nell. A child of beautiful purity of character, living in the midst of selfishness, worldliness, and crime.—Dickens, "Old Curiosity Shop."

Little Paris. Brussels, the capital of Belgium, and Milan in Italy are so called, from their gaiety and resemblance in miniature to the French capital.

Little Peddlington. The village of quackery and cant, humbug and egotism, wherever that locality is. A satire by John Poole.

Little Red-Ridinghood. This nursery tale is, with slight variations, common to Sweden, Germany, and France. It comes to us from the French, called "Le Petit Chaperon Rouge," in Charles Perrault's "Contes des Temps."

Liturgy means public work, such as arranging the dancing and singing parties on public festivals, the torch-races, the equipping and manning of ships, &c. In the church it means the public ministry of its ceremonies and service. (Greek, leitōs-ergon.)

Liver. White-livered, lily-livered. Cowardly. In the auspices taken by the Greeks and Romans before battle, if the liver of the animals sacrificed was healthy and blood-red, the omen was favourable; but if pale, it augured defeat. The colour of the lips shows the colour of the liver, and fear makes the lips turn pale; hence Cassius says, "His coward lips did from their colours fly."—"Julius Cæsar," i. 2.

Liverpool. A corruption of Lhavan-pwll. Lavan or laver (liver-wort) is a sort of sea-weed that was much esteemed by the ancient Britons, and once an article of commerce. It was used for edible conserves. "Laver-bread" was made of it. Pwll is the Welsh for an "offing" or "port."

Livery. What is delivered. The clothes of a man-servant delivered to him by his master. The stables to which your horse is delivered for keep. During the Merovingian and Carolingian dynasties, splendid dresses were given to all the members of the royal household; barons and knights gave uniforms to their retainers, and even a duke's son, serving as a page, was clothed in the livery of the prince he served. (French, livrer.)

What livery is we know well enough; it is the allowance of horse-meat to keepe horses at livery: the which word, I guess, is derived of delivering forth their nightly food.—Spenser on Ireland.

Livery. The colours of a livery should be those of the field and principal charge of the armorial shield; hence the queen's livery is gules (scarlet) or scarlet trimmed with gold. The Irish regiments preserve the charge of their own nation, either by blue uniform or blue facings, scarlet being the reverse. Thus the Royal Irish Dragoon Guards have scarlet uniform with blue facings, and the Royal Irish Lancers have blue uniform with scarlet facings.

Livery-men. The freemen of the ninety-one guilds of London are so called, because they are entitled to wear the livery of their respective companies.

Livy. The Livy of Portugal. João de Barros, the best of the Portuguese historians. (1496-1570.)

Liza. An innkeeper's daughter in love with Elvino, a rich farmer; but Elvi'no loves Ami'na. Suspicious circumstances make the farmer renounce the hand of Amina and promise marriage to her rival; but Liza is shown to be the paramour of another, and Amina, being proved innocent, is married to the man who loves her.—Bellini, "La Sonnambula" (his best opera).

Lizard Islands. Fabulous islands where damsels, outcast from the rest of the world, are received.—Torquemada, "Garden of Flowers."

Lloyd's. So called because the headquarters of the under-writers was originally Lloyd's Coffee House (since 1716). Lloyd's Rooms now form a part of the Royal Exchange, and are under the management of a committee.

Lloyd's List. A London periodical, in which the shipping news received at Lloyd's Rooms is regularly published.

Loaf. Never turn a loaf in the presence of a Menteith. Sir John Menteith was the person who betrayed Sir William Wallace to king Edward. His signal was, when he turned a loaf set on the table, the English were to rush upon the patriot and secure him.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," vii.

A loaf held in the hand is the attribute of St. Philip the apostle, St. Osyth, St. Joanna, Nicholas, St. Godfrey, and of many other saints noted for their charity to the poor.

Loafer. An idle man who gets his living by expedients, a chevalier d'industrie. (German, laufer, a runner.)

Loathly Lady. A lady so hideous that no one would marry her, except Sir Gawain; and immediately after the marriage, her ugliness—the effect of enchantment—disappeared, and she became a model of beauty.

Lob's Pound. A prison, the stocks, or any other place of confinement. (Welsh, llob, a dolb.) The Irish call it Pook's or Pouk's pondfold, and Puck is called by Shakespeare "the lob of spirits," and by Milton "the lubber fiend." Our word lobby is where people are confined till admission is granted them into the audience chamber; it is also applied to that enclosed space near farm-yards where cattle are confined.

Lob's pound. Dr. Grey says: "Dr. Lob was a dissenting preacher who used to hold forth when conventicles were prohibited, but made himself a way of escape through the floor of the pulpit. One day, being pressed by the officers, the doctor was followed; but the officers lost their way, and were obliged to cry for help. This maze was ever after termed "Lob's pound."

Lobby. The bill will cross the lobbies. Be sent from the House of Commons to the House of Lords.

Loblolly, among seamen, is spoon-victuals or pap for lobs or dolts. (See LOLLYPOPS.)

Lochi'el (3 syl.) of Thomas Campbell is Sir Evan Cameron, lord of Lochiel, surnamed The Black, and The Ulysses of the Highlands. His grandson Donald was called The Gentle Lochiel. Sir Evan died in 1719, Donald in 1743.

Lochinvar', being in love with a lady at Netherby Hall, persuaded her to dance one last dance. She was condemned to marry a "laggard in love and a dastard in war," but her young chevalier swung her into his saddle and made off with her, before the "bridegroom" and his servants could recover from their astonishment.—Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion."

Lockhart. When the good lord James, on his way to the Holy Land with the heart of king Robert Bruce, was slain in Spain fighting against the Moors, Sir Simon Locard, of Lee, was commissioned to carry back to Scotland the heart, which was interred in St. Bride's Church. In consequence thereof he changed his name to Lock-heart, and adopted the device of a heart within a fetterlock, with this motto—"Corda serrata pando" (Locked hearts I open). Of course this is romance; Lockhart is Teutonic, "Strong beguiler."

For this reason men changed Sir Simon's name from Lockhard to Lockheart, and all who are descended from Sir Simon are called Lockhart to this day.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," xi.

Lockit. The jailor in Gay's "Beggar's Opera."

Lockitt's. A fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

Lockman. An executioner; so called because one of his dues was a lock (or ladleful) of meal from every casualty exposed for sale in the market. In the Isle of Man the under-sheriff is so called.

Locksley. So Robin Hood is sometimes called, from the village in which he was born. (See "Ivanhoe," ch. xiii.)

Locksmith's Daughter. A key.

Loco Parentis (Latin). One acting in the place of a parent, as a guardian or schoolmaster.

Locofo'cos. Lucifer matches; so called in America. (Latin, loco-foci, in lieu of fire.)

Locofo'cos. Ultra-radicals, so called in America, because at a grand meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, in 1834, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were suddenly extinguished with the hope of breaking up the turbulent assembly; but those who were in favour of extreme measures instantly drew from their pockets their loco-focos, and re-lighted the gas. The meeting was continued, and the Radicals had it their own way. (See above.)

Locomotive, or Locomotive Engine. A steam-engine employed to move carriages from place to place. (Latin, locus moveo, to move place.)

Locomotive Power. Power applied to the transport of goods, in contradistinction to stationary power.

Loeri'ne (2 syl.). Father of Sabri'na, and eldest son of the mythical Brutus, king of ancient Britain. On the death of his father he became king of Loegria (q. v.).

Locum Te'nens (Latin, one holding the place of another). A substitute, a deputy, one acting temporarily for another, a lieutenant.

Locus in quo (Latin). The place in question, the spot mentioned.

Locus Pœnitentiæ (Latin, place for repentance); that is, the licence of drawing back from a bargain, which can be done before any act has been committed to confirm it. In the interview between Esau and his father Isaac, St. Paul says that the former "found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. xii. 17)—i. e., no means whereby Isaac could break his bargain with Jacob.

Locus Pœnitentiæ. Time to withdraw from a bargain (in Scotch law).

Locus Sigilli or L.S. (Latin). The place where the seal is to be put.

Locus Standi (Latin). Recognised position, acknowledged right or claim. We say such-and-such a one has no locus standi in society.

Locust Bird. A native of Khorasan (Persia), so fond of the water of the Bird Fountain, between Shiraz and Ispahan, that it will follow wherever it is carried.

Locus'ta. This woman has become a byword for one who murders those she professes to nurse, or those whom it is her duty to take care of. She lived in the early part of the Roman empire, poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and attempted to destroy Nero; but being found out, she was put to death.

Lode. The vein that leads or guides to ore.

Lode. A ditch that guides or leads water into a river or sewer.

Lodestar. The leading-star by which mariners are led or guided.

Your eyes are lodestars, and your tongue sweet air. Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," i. 1.

Load-stone or Lode-stone. The magnet or stone that guides.

Lodo'na. An affluent of the Thames in Windsor Forest. Pope, in "Windsor Forest," says it was a nymph, fond of the chase like Diana. It chanced one day that Pan saw her, and tried to catch her; but Lodona fled, and implored Cynthia to save her from her persecutor. No sooner had she spoken than she became "a silver stream which ever keeps its virgin coolness."

Loegria or Lo'gres. England is so called by Geoffrey of Monmouth, from Logris, eldest son of the mythical king Brute.

Lofna. The goddess whose office it is to reconcile lovers after a quarrel.—Scandinavian mythology.

Log. An instrument for measuring the velocity of a ship. It is a flat piece of wood, some six inches in radius, and in the shape of a quadrant. A piece of lead is nailed to the rim to make the log float perpendicularly. To this log a line is fastened, called the log-line (q. v.).

Log-board. A couple of boards shutting like a book, in which the "logs" are entered. It may be termed the waste-book, and the log-book the journal.

Log-book. The journal in which the "logs" are entered by the chief mate. Besides the logs, this book contains all general transactions pertaining to the ship and its crew, such as the strength and course of the winds, the conduct and misconduct of the men, and, in short, everything worthy of note.

Log-line. The line fastened to the log (q.v.), and wound round a reel in the ship's gallery. The whole line (except some five fathoms next the log, called stray line) is divided into equal lengths called knots, each of which is marked with a piece of coloured tape or bunting. Suppose the captain wishes to know the rate of his ship: one of the sailors throws the log into the sea, and the reel begins to unwind. The length of line run off in half a minute shows the rate of the ship's motion per hour.

Logan or Rocking Stones, for which Cornwall is famous.

Pliny tells us of a rock near Harpasa which might be moved with a finger.

Ptolemy says the Gygonian rock might be stirred with a stalk of asphodel.

Half a mile from St. David's is a Logan stone, mounted on divers other stones, which may be shaken with one finger.

At Golcar Hill (Yorkshire) is a rocking stone, which has lost its power from being hacked by workmen who wanted to find out the secret of its rocking mystery.

In Pembrokeshire is a rocking stone, rendered immovable by the soldiers of Cromwell, who held it to be an encouragement to superstition.

The stone called Menamber in Sithney (Cornwall) was also rendered immovable by the same soldiers, under the same notion.

There are very many others.

Loggerheads. Full to loggerheads; to squabbling and handy-cuffs, after the fashion of blockheads.

Logistilla (in "Orlando Furioso"). The good fairy, and sister of Alcina the sorceress. She teaches Ruggiero to manage the hippogriff, and gives Astolpho a magic book and horn. The impersonation of reason.

Logres. (See LOEGRIA.)

Lo'gria. England, so called by the old romancers and fabulous historians.

Logris, Locris. Same as Locrine (q.v.).

Loki. The god of strife and spirit of evil. He artfully contrived the death of Balder, when Odin had forbidden everything that springs "from fire, air, earth, and water" to injure him. The mistletoe not being included, was made into an arrow, given to the blind Höder, and shot at random; but it struck the beautiful Balder and killed him. This evil being was subsequently chained with ten chains, and will so continue till the twilight of the gods appears, when he will break his bonds; then will the heavens disappear, the earth be swallowed up by the sea, fire shall consume the elements, and even Odin, with all his kindred deities, shall perish.

Lokmân. A fabulous personage, the supposed author of a collection of Arabic fables. Like Æsop he is said to have been a slave, noted for his ugliness.

Lollards. So called from their practice of singing dirges at funerals. (Low-German, lollen, to sing slowly.) The early German reformers and the followers of Wickliffe were so called. An ingenious derivation is given by Bailey, who suggests the Latin word lolium (darnel), because these reformers were deemed "tares in God's wheat-field."

Lollypops. Sweets made of treacle, butter, and flour; any sweets which are sucked. They are the lollie's puppets. A loll is a pet or spoilt child, from loll, to fondle, and lollie is its diminutive. Puppet means a doll or plaything.

Lombard (A). A banker or money-lender; so called because the first bankers were from Lombardy, and set up in Lombard Street (London) in the middle ages. The business of lending money on pawns was carried on in England by Italian merchants or bankers as early at least as the reign of Richard I. By the 12 Edward I. a message was confirmed to these traders where Lombard Street now stands; but the trade was first recognised in law by James I. The name Lombard (according to Stowe) is a contraction of Longobards. Among the richest of these Longobard merchants was the celebrated Medici family, from whose armorial bearings the insignia of three golden balls has been derived. The Lombard bankers exercised a monopoly in pawn-broking till the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Lombard Fever. Laziness. Pawn-brokers are called Lombard brokers, because they retain the three golden balls of the Lombard money-changers; and lazy folk will pawn anything rather than settle down to steady work.

Lombardic. The debased Roman style of architecture adopted in Lombardy after the fall of Rome.

London, says Francis Crossley, is Luan-dun (Celtic), City of the Moon, and tradition says there was once a temple of Diana (the Moon) where St. Paul's now stands. Greenwich he derives from Grian-wich (City of the Sun), also Celtic. It would fill a page to give a list of guesses made at the derivation of the word London. The one given above is about the best for fable and mythology. (See AUGUSTA, BABYLON, and LUD'S TOWN.)

London-stone. The central miliarium (mile-stone) of Roman London, similar to that in the Forum of Rome. The British high-roads radiated from this stone, and it was from this point they were measured. Near London-stone lived Fitz Alwyne, first mayor of London.

Long-boat. Formerly the largest boat belonging to a ship, built full, flat, and high, so as to carry a great weight.

Long-bow. To draw the long-bow. To exaggerate. The force of an arrow in the long-bow depends on the strength of the arm that draws it, so the force of a statement depends on the force of the speaker's imagination. The long-bow was the favourite weapon of the English from the reign of Edward II. till it was superseded by fire-arms.

Longchamps. On Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Passion Week, the Parisians go in procession to Longchamps, near the Bois de Boulogne. This procession is made by private carriages and hired cabs, and is formed by all the smartly-dressed men and women who wish to display the spring fashions. The origin of the custom is this: There was once a famous nunnery at Long-champs, noted for its singing. In Passion Week all who could went to hear these religious women sing the Ténèbres; the custom grew into a fashion, and though the house no longer exists, the procession continues, and is as fashionable as ever.

Long-crown. A deep fellow; long-headed.

That caps Long-crown, and he capped the Devil. That is a greater falsehood than even "the father of lies" would tell.

Long Meg of Westminster. A noted virago of the reign of Henry VIII. Her name has been given to several articles of unusual size. Thus, the large blue-black marble in the south cloister of Westminster Abbey, over the grave of Cervasius de Blois, is called "Long Meg of Westminster." Fuller says the term is applied to things "of hop-pole height, wanting breadth proportionable thereunto," and refers to a great gun in the Tower so called, taken to Westminster in troublous times.

The large gun in Edinburgh Castle is called Long Meg, and the bomb forged for the siege of Oudenarde, in 1832, now in the city of Ghent, is called Mad Meg.

In the "Edinburgh Antiquarian Magazine," September, 1769, we read of "Peter Brauan, aged 104, who was six feet six inches high, and was commonly called Long Meg of Westminster. (See MEG.)

Long Meg and her Daughters. At Little Salkeld (Cornwall) is a circle of seventy-seven stones, each ten feet high; before these, at the entrance, is a single stone, fifteen feet high. The tall stone is called Long Meg, and the seventy-seven shorter ones her daughters.

There is a similar family of stones, called by the same name, near Penrith, in Cumberland. (Greek, meg-as, great.)

Long Parliament. The parliament which assembled November 3rd, 1640, and was dissolved by Cromwell, April 20th, 1653.

Long Peter. Peter Aartsen, the Flemish painter; so called on account of his extraordinary height. (1507-1573.)

Long-sword (Longue-épée). William II. duke of Normandy. (Died 943.)

Long Tail. Cut and long tail. One and another, all of every description. The phrase had its origin in the practice of cutting the tails of certain dogs and horses, and leaving others in their natural state, so that cut and long tail horses or dogs included all the species. Master Slender says he will maintain Anne Page like a gentlewoman. "Ah!" says he—

That I will, come cut and long tail under the degree of a squire (i.e., as well as any man can who is not a squire).—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iii. 4.

Long-tailed. How about the long-tailed beggar? A reproof given to one who is drawing the long-bow too freely. The tale is that a boy who had been a short voyage pretended on his return to have forgotten everything belonging to his native home, and asked his mother what she called that "long-tailed beggar," meaning the cat.

Long Tom Coffin. A sailor of noble daring, in "The Pilot," by Cooper.

Long Words.

Alcomiroziropoulopilousitounitapignac The giantess.—"Croquemitaine," iii. 2. Amoronthologosporus. (See HAIR—The Three Hairs.)

Anautachaturdasivratkatha. (Sanskrit work. See Trübner's "Literary Record.")

Antipericatametananparbeugedamphicributions Teordicantium. One of the books in the library of St. Victor.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," ii. 7.

Batrachomyomachia (battle of the frogs and mice). A Greek mock heroic.

Cluninstaridysarchides.—Plautus.

Don Juan Nepomuceno de Burionaginatotorecageazcoeha. An employé in the finance department of Madrid. (1867.)

Drimtaidhvrickhillichattan, in the Isle of Mull, Argyleshire.

Honorificabilitudinitatibus, called the longest word in the (?) English language. It frequently occurs in old plays. (See "Bailey's Dictionary.")

Thou art not so long by the head as honorificabilitudinitatibus.—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 1.

Jungefrauenzimmerdurchschwindsuchttoedtuungs-gegenverein (German).—See "Notes and Queries," vol. v., p. 124 (First Series).

Kagwadawwacomögishcarg. An Indian chief, who died in Wisconsin in 1866.

Kleinkinderbewharanstalten (German).

Lepidotemachoselachogaleokraniroleiphanodrimupotrimmatokiehlepikossuphophattopristeralektruonoptegkephalok-igklopleiolagoosiraiobaphetraganopterugon. The longest word extant (169 Greek letters and 77 syl.).—Aristophanes, "Ekklesiazousai," v. 1169.

Llanvairpwllgwngyll, in the diocese of Bangor.

Nitrophenylenediamine. A dye of an intense red colour.

Dinitroaniline, chloroxynaphthalic acid, which may be used for colouring wool in intense red; and nitrophenylenediamine of chromatic brilliancy.—William Crookes, "The Times," October 8th, 1868.

Polyprasticontinomimegalondulation.

Why not wind up the famous ministerial declaration with "Konx Om Pax," or the mystic "Om," or that difficult expression "Polyprasticontinomimegalondulation?"—The Star.

M. N. Rostocostojambedanese, author of "After Beef Mustard."—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," ii. 7.

Saukashtachaturhivratodyapana. (Sanskrit work. See Trübner's "Literary Record.")

Swapanchaksharimahamantrastotra.—(Sanskrit work. See Trübner's "Literary Record.")

Trigunatmikakalikastotra. (Sanskrit work. See Trübner's "Literary Record.")

Upangalalitavratodyapana. (Sanskrit work. See Trübner's "Literary Record.")

Longius. The Roman soldier who smote our Lord with his spear. In the romance of king Arthur, this spear was brought by Joseph of Arimathea to Lisenise, when he visited king Pellam, "who was nigh of Joseph's kin." The bed and spear were thus endowed with miraculous powers. Sir Balin the Savage being in want of a weapon, seized this spear, with which he wounded king Pellam, and "three whole countries were destroyed" by that one stroke, and Sir Balin saw "the people thereof lying dead on all sides."—"History of Prince Arthur," vol. i., chaps. 40, 41.

Lookers-on. The man on the dyke always hurls well. The man standing on the mound, and looking at those who are playing at the game of hurling, can see the faults and criticise them.

To look as big as bull beef. To look stout and hearty, as if fed on bull beef. Bull beef was formerly recommended for making men strong and muscular.

Looking back (unlucky). This arose from Lot's wife, who looked back towards Sodom and was turned to a pillar of salt (Gen. xix. 26).

Looking-glass. It is unlucky to break a looking-glass. The nature of the ill-luck varies; thus, if a maiden, she will never marry; if a married woman, it betokens a death; &c. This superstition arose from the use made of mirrors in former times by magicians. If in their operations the mirror used was broken, the magician was obliged to give over his operation, and the unlucky inquirer could receive no answer.

Looking-glass of Lao reflected the mind as well as the outward form.—“Citizen of the World,” xlv.

Loom; so called from Sir Thomas Loom, who erected the first machine for weaving raw silk at Derby in 1725. The invention came from Flanders.

Loophole. A way of escape, an evasion; a corruption of “louvre holes.” (See LOUVRE.)

Lorbrul’grud. The capital of Brobdingnag. The word is humourously said to mean “Pride of the Universe.”—Swift, “Gulliver’s Travels.”

Lord. A nobleman.

Verstegan says—“Our ancestors used for lord the name of laford, which they wrote hlaford. Afterwards it grew to be written loved, abridged into lord.” He adds—“They called bread hlaf (a loaf), and the wealthy were called hlaford, or bread-givers, because they used to feed many at their board.” The word lord, therefore, means feeders of many.

Lord Burleigh. As significant as the shake of Lord Burleigh’s head. In “The Critic,” by Sheridan, is introduced a tragedy called the “Spanish Armada.” Lord Burleigh is introduced, but is too full of state affairs to utter a word; he shakes his head, and Puff explains what the shake means.

Lord Fanny. A nickname given to Lord Hervey for his effeminate and foppish manners. He painted his face, and was as pretty in his ways as a boarding-school miss. (In the reign of George II.)

Lord Foppington. A coxcomb who considers dress and fashion the end and aim of nobility.—Vanbrugh, “The Relapse.”

Lord Lovel. The bridegroom who lost his bride on the wedding-day. She was playing at hide-and-seek, and selected an old oak chest for her hiding-place. The chest closed with a spring lock, and many years after her skeleton told the sad story of “The Mistletoe Bough.” Samuel Rogers introduces this story in his “Italy” (part i. 18). He says the bride was Ginevra, only child of Orsini, “an indulgent father.” The bridegroom was Francesco Doria, “her playmate from her birth, and her first love.” The chest in which she was buried alive in her bridal dress was an heirloom, “richly carved by Antony of Trent, with Scripture stories from the life of Christ.” It came from Venice, and had “held the ducal robes of some old ancestor.” Francesco, weary of his life, flew to Venice and “flung his life away in battle with the Turk.” Orsini went deranged, and spent the live-long day “wandering as in quest of something, something he could not find.” Fifty years after the chest was removed by strangers and the skeleton discovered.

Lord Peter. The pope is so called in “The History of John Bull,” by Arbuthnot.

Lord Strutt. Charles II. is so called in “The History of John Bull,” by Arbuthnot.

Lord Thomas and the Fair Annet or Elinor, had a lovers’ quarrel, when lord Thomas resolved to forsake Annet for a nut-brown maid who had houses and lands. On the wedding-day Annet, in bridal bravery, went to the church, when lord Thomas repented of his folly, and gave Annet a rose. Whereupon the nut-brown maid killed her with a “long bodkin from out her gay head-gear.” Lord Thomas, seeing Annet fall dead, plunged his dagger into the heart of the murderess, and then stabbed himself. Over the graves of lord Thomas and fair Annet grew a “bonny briar, and by this ye may ken right well that they were lovers dear.” In some ballads the fair Annet is called the fair Elinor.—Percy, “Reliques,” &c., series iii., bk. 3.

Lord of Misrule, called in Scotland Abbot of Unreason, prohibited in 1555. Stowe says—“At the feast of Christmas, in the king’s court, there was always appointed, on All-Hallow’s eve, a master of mirth and fun,” who remained in office till the feast of Purification. A similar “lord” was appointed by the lord mayor of London, the sheriffs, and the chief nobility. Stubbs tells us that these mock dignitaries had from twenty to sixty officers under them, and were furnished with hobby-horses, dragons, and musicians. They first went to church with such a confused noise that no one could hear his own voice.

Lord of the Isles. Donald of Islay, who in 1346 reduced the Hebrides under his sway. The title had been borne by others for centuries before, and was also borne by his successors. One of Sir Walter Scott's metrical romances is so called.

Loreda'no (James). A Venetian patrician, and one of the "Council of Ten." He was the personal enemy of the Fos'cari.—Byron, "The Two Fos'cari."

Lorenzo (in Young's "Night Thoughts"). An atheist, whose remorse ends in despair.

Lorenzo. 'The suitor of the fair Jessica, daughter of Shylock the Jew.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice."

Lorrequer (Harry). The hero of a novel so called, by Charles Lever.

Lose. 'Tis not I who lose the Athenians, but the Athenians who lose me, said Anaxag'oras, when he was driven out of Athens.

Lost Island. Cephalo'nia, so called because it was only by chance that even those who had visited it could find it again. It is sometimes called "The Hidden Island."

Lotha'rio. A gay Lothario. A gay libertine, a seducer of female modesty, a debauchee. The character is from "The Fair Penitent," by Rowe.

Lotus. The Egyptians pictured God sitting on a lote-tree, above the watery mud. Jamblichus says, the leaves and fruit of the lote-tree being round, represent "the motion of intellect;" its towering up through mud symbolises the eminency of divine intellect over matter; and the deity sitting on the lote tree implies his intellectual sovereignty.—"Myster. Egypt.," sec. 7, cap. ii., p. 151.

Lotus. Mahomet says that a lote-tree stands in the seventh heaven, on the right hand of the throne of God.

Dry'opë of Echa'lia was one day carrying her infant son, when she plucked a lotus-flower for his amusement, and was instantaneously transformed into a lotus.

Lotis, daughter of Neptune, fleeing from Priap'us, was metamorphosed into a lotus.

Lotus-eaters or Lotoph'agi, in Homeric legend, are a people who ate of the lotus-tree, the effect of which was to make them forget their friends and homes, and to lose all desire of returning to their native land, their only wish being to live in idleness in Lotus-land.—"Odyssey," xi.

A lotus-eater. One living in ease and luxury.

Loud Patterns. Flashy, showy ones. The analogy between sound and colour is very striking.

Loud as Tom of Lincoln. The great church-bell.

Louis (St.) is usually represented as holding the Saviour's crown of thorns and the cross; sometimes, however, he is represented with a pilgrim's staff, and sometimes with the standard of the cross, the allusion in all cases being to his crusades.

Louse-wort (Pedicularis palustris). A corruption of Loose-wort; so called because the seeds are very loosely held in a spacious inflated capsule, and may when dry be shaken like a rattle.

Louvre (Paris); so called from the Saxon louvre, a château or mansion. The common tradition is that it is so called from loup, a wolf, because the site was the resort of wolves, and hence in old title-deeds it is called Lupaca.

He'll make your Paris Louvre shake for it.
Shakespeare, "Henry V.," act ii. 4.

Louvre. The tower or turret of a building like a belfry, originally designed for a sort of chimney to let out the smoke. (French, l'ouvert, the opening.)

Louvre Boards in churches. Before chimneys were used, holes were left in the roof, called loovers or leu-r holes. From the French l'ouvert (the open boards).

Love (god of).

Cam'deo, in Hindu mythology.

Camade'ra, in Persian mythology.

Cupid, in Roman mythology.

Eros, in Greek mythology.

Freyja, in Celtic mythology.

Kama or Cama, in Indian mythology.

(See BOWYER, &c. &c.)

The family of love. A sect of fanatics in the sixteenth century, holding tenets not unlike those of the Anabaptists.

Love and lordship never like fellowship. French, Amour et seigneurie ne veulent point de compagne; German, Lieb und herschaft leiden keinẽ geselschaft; Italian, Amor e signoria non vogliono compagna (Neither lovers nor princes can brook a rival).

Love me, love my dog. St. Bernard quotes this proverb in Latin, Qui me amat, amat et canem meum; French, Qui aime Bertrand, aime son chien; Spanish, Quien bien quiers a beliram, bien quierẽ a su can (If you love any one you will like all that belongs to him).

Love's Girdle. (See CESTUS.)

Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare). Ferdinand, king of Navarre, with the three lords, Biron, Longaville, and Dumain, make a vow to spend three years in study, during which time they bind themselves to look upon no woman. Scarce is the vow made when the princess of France, with Rosaline, Maria, and Catherine are announced, bringing a petition from the king of France. The four gentlemen fall in love with the four ladies, and send them verses; they also visit them masked as Muscovites. The ladies treat the whole matter as a jest, and when the gentlemen declare their intentions to be honourable, impose upon them a delay of twelve months, to be spent in works of charity. If at the expiration of that time they still wish to marry, the ladies promise to lend a favourable ear to their respective suits.

Love-lock. A small curl gummed to the temples, sometimes called a beau or bow catcher. When men indulge in a curl in front of their ears, the love-lock is called a bell-rope—i.e., a rope to pull the belles after them. At the latter end of the sixteenth century, the love-lock was decorated with bows and ribbons.

Love Powders or Potions were drugs to excite lust. Once these love-charms were generally believed in; thus Brabantio accuses Othello of having bewitched Desdemona with "drugs to waken motion;" and lady Grey was accused of having bewitched Edward IV. "by strange potions and amorous charms."—"Fabian," p. 495.

Lovelace. The hero of Richardson's novel called "Clarissa Harlowe." He is a selfish voluptuary, a man of fashion whose sole ambition is to ensnare female modesty and virtue. Crabbe calls him "Rich, proud, and crafty; handsome, brave, and gay."

Lover's Leap. The promontory from which Sappho threw herself into the sea; now called Santa Maura. (See LEUCADIA.)

Loving or Grace Cup. A large cup passed round from guest to guest at state banquets and city feasts. Miss Strickland says that Margaret Atheling, wife of Malcolm Kenmore, in order to induce the Scotch to remain for grace, devised the grace cup, which was filled with the choicest wine, and of which each guest was allowed to drink ad libitum after grace had been said.—"Historic Sketches."

Loving Cup. On the introduction of Christianity, the custom of wassailing was not abolished, but it assumed a religious aspect. The monks called the wassail bowl the potulum charitatis (loving cup), a term still retained in the London companies, but in the universities the term Grace Cup is more general. In drinking the loving cup, two adjacent persons always stand up together, one to drink and the other to pledge his safety while so occupied.

Low-bell. Night-fowling, in which birds are first roused from their slumber by the tinkling of a bell, and then dazed by a light so as to be easily caught. (Saxon, læg; Scotch, lowe; German, loke, a light, and bell.)

The sound of the low-bell makes the birds lie close, so that they dare not stir whilst you are pit-hing the net, for the sound thereof is dreadful to them; but the sight of the fire, much more terrible, make them fly up, so that they become instantly entangled in the net.—"Gent. Recreation."

Low Church. Those who hold the church as a church, and all the ministers and ordinances thereof, in low estimation. They do not believe in baptismal regeneration, apostolic succession, and so on. The Times wittily defines a low-churchman as one "who loves a Jew and hates the Pope."

Low Sunday. The Sunday next after Easter, so called because it is at the bottom of the Easter which it closes.

Lower Empire. The Roman Western, from the removal of the seat empire to Constantinople to the extinction of that empire by the Turks in 1453.

Lowlanders of Attica were the gentry, so called because they lived on the plains. (Pedieis or wealthy Eupatrids.)

Lownde'an Professor (Cambridge University). A professor of astronomy (and geometry); so called from Thomas Lowndes, Esq., who founded the professorship in 1749.

Lreux. King Arthur's seneschal. A braggart and a coward.

Luath (2 syl.). Cuchullin's dog in Ossian's "Fingal;" also the name of the poor man's dog representing the peasantry in "The Twa Dogs," by Robert Burns. The gentleman's dog is called Caesar.

Lubber's Hole. A lazy cowardly way of doing what is appointed, or of evading duty. A seaman's expression. Sailors call the vacant space between the head of a lower-mast and the edge of the top, the lubber's hole, because timid boys get through this space to the top, to avoid the danger and difficulties of the "futtock shrouds."

Lubberkin or Lu'brican (Irish, Lobaircin or Lep'rechaun). A fairy resembling an old man, by profession a maker of brogues, who resorts to out-of-the-way places, where he is discovered by the noise of his hammer. He is rich, and while any one keeps his eye fixed upon him cannot escape, but the moment the eye is withdrawn he vanishes. (Latin, lu'bricus, slippery.)

Lubins. A species of gobelins in Normandy that take the form of wolves, and frequent churchyards. They are very timorous, and take flight at the slightest noise.

Il a peur de Lubins (Timid as a Lubin). Said of a chicken-hearted person.

Lucasian Professor. A professor of mathematics in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1663 by Henry Lucas, Esq., M.P. for the University.

Lucasta, to whom Richard Lovelace sang, was Lucy Sacheverel, called by him lux casta.

Lu e. Flower de Luce. A corruption of fleur de lis (q.v.), more anciently written "flore delices." The French Messenger says to the regent Bedford—

Cropped are the flower de lues in your arms;
Of England's coat one half is cut away—
(Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI." i. 1)

referring of course to the loss of France. The luce or lacy is a full-grown pike or jack. Thus Justice Shallow says—"The luce is the fresh fish, the salt fish is an old coat"—i.e., its fellow is an old device in coat armour.—"Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 1. (See FLEURS-DE-LYS.)

Luce, the full-grown pike, is the Latin luci-us, from the Greek lukos (a wolf), meaning the wolf of fishes.

Lucia di Lammermoor, called Lucy Ashton by Sir Walter Scott, was the sister of lord Henry Ashton of Lammermoor, who, to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the family, arranges a marriage between his sister and lord Arthur Bucklaw (or Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw). Unknown to Henry Ashton, Edgardo (or Edgar), master of Ravenswood, whose family has long been in a state of hostility with the Lammermoors, is in love with Lucy, and his attachment is reciprocated. While Edgar is absent in France on an embassy, Lucy is made to believe, by feigned letters, that Edgar is unfaithful to her, and in her frenzy of indignation consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw; but on the wedding-night she stabs her husband, goes mad, and dies.—Donizetti, opera of "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Sir Walter Scott, "Bride of Lammermoor."

Lu'cian. The impersonation of the follies and vices of the age, metamorphosed into an ass. The chief character in the "Golden Ass" of Appule'ius.

Lucifer. The morning star. Venus is both an evening and a morning star: when she follows the sun and is an evening star, she is called Hesperus; when she precedes the sun, and appears before sunrise, she is called Lucifer (the light-bringer).

Proud as Lucifer. Very haughty and overbearing. Lucifer is the name given by Isaiah to Nebuchadnezzar, the proud but ruined king of Babylon: "Take up this proverb against the king of Babylon, and say. . . How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" (Isa. xiv. 4, 12). The poets feign that Satan, before he was driven out of heaven for his pride, was called Lucifer. Milton, in his "Paradise Lost," gives this name to the demon of "Sinful Pride."

Luci'fera (Pride) lived in a splendid palace, only its foundation was of sand. The door stood always open, and the queen gave welcome to every comer. Her six privy ministers are Idleness, Gluttony, Lechery, Avarice, Envy, and Revenge. These six, with Pride herself, are the seven mortal sins. Her carriage was drawn by six different animals, viz., an ass, swine, goat, camel, wolf, and lion, on each of which rode one of her privy councillors, Satan himself being coachman. While here the Red-Cross Knight was attacked by Sansjoy, who would have been slain if Duessa had not rescued him.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Luciferians. A sect of the fourth century, who refused to hold any communion with the Arians, who had renounced their "errors" and been readmitted into the church. So called from Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, their leader.

Lucin'ien. The young prince, son of Dolopatos the Sicilian monarch, entrusted to the charge of Virgil the philosopher. (See SEVEN WISE MASTERS, and DOLOPATOS.)

Lucius. (See PUDENS.)

Luck. Give a man luck and throw him into the sea. Meaning that his luck will save him even in the greatest extremity. Referring to Jonah and Ari'on, who were cast into the sea, but carried safely to land—the one by a whale and the other by a dolphin.

The Luck of Eden Hall. A drinking-horn, on which the luck of the family is supposed to depend. (See EDEN HALL.)

Luck in Odd Numbers. (See ODD.)

Luckshmi or Luximee. Wife of Vishnoo, and goddess of wealth and prosperity.—Hindu mythology.

Lucre'zia Bor'gia, daughter of pope Alexander VI., was thrice married, her last husband being Alfonso, duke of Ferra'ra. Before her marriage with the duke she had a natural son named Genna'ro, who was sent to be brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. When arrived at man's estate he received a letter informing him that he was nobly born, and offering him a commission in the army. In the battle of Rim'ini, he saved the life of Orsi'ni, and they became sworn friends. In Venice he is introduced to the young nobles, who tell him of the ill deeds of Lucrezia Borgia. Each of them has had some relative put to death by her agency. Genna'ro in his indignation mutilates the duke's escutcheon with his dagger, knocking off the "B" of his name, and changing Borgia into Orgia (orgies). Lucrezia, not knowing who has offered the insult, requests the duke that the perpetrator may be put to death, but when she discovers it to be her own son, gives him an antidote to neutralise the poison he has drunk, and releases him from his confinement. Scarcely is he liberated when he and his companions are invited by the princess Neg'roni to a banquet, where they are all poisoned. Lucrezia tells Gennaro he is her son, and dies herself as soon as her son expires.—Donizetti's opera.

Lucullus sups with Lucullus. Said of a glutton who gormandises alone. Lucullus was a rich Roman soldier, noted for his magnificence and self-indulgence. Sometimes above £1,700 was expended on a single meal, and Horace tells us he had 5,000 rich purple robes in his house. On one occasion a very superb supper was prepared, and when asked who were to be his guests the "rich fool" replied, "Lucullus will sup to-night with Lucullus." (B.C. 110-57.)

Lucus a non Lucendo.

Bellum (war) quia min'imè bellum.—Priscian.

Black from the Saxon blacian, blacan, "to turn white," as bleach and blanch.

Calid (hot) radically the same as the Saxon cald, German kalt (cold).

Cleave, to part, also signifies to stick together. (Saxon, clifun, to adhere.)

Curta'na (the instrument that shortens by cutting off the head; French court, Italian corto) is the blunt sword, emblematical of mercy, borne before our sovereigns at their coronation.

Devoted (attached to) is the Latin devotus (cursel).

Lambs are ruffians employed at elections to use "physical force" to deter electors from voting for the opposition.

Lily-white is a cant term for a chimney-sweep.

Liege (a king) is no liege or bondman, but the lord of his liege subjects.

Religion, bond-service (re liquo), is the service of which Christ has made us free.

Slave (a degraded servant) is the word slavi (noblemen, illustrious).

Salt is not a salt at all, but is wholly excluded by chemists from the category.

In their marriage service, the Jews break a wine-glass; the symbol being "as this glass is shattered to pieces and can never be rejoined, so may we be united and our bond never broken." (See MISNOMER.)

Lucy (St.). Patron saint to aid those who suffer from ophthalmia or other disorders of the eyes. It is said that a nobleman wanted to marry her for the beauty of her eyes. St. Lucy tore out her eyes and gave them to her admirer, saying, "Take them, and now let me live to God." The story says that Heaven approved the act, and restored her eyesight; but the rejected lover accused her of "faith in Christ," and she was martyred by a sword being thrust into her neck.

St. Lucy in Christian art is represented as carrying a palm-branch, and bearing a platter with two eyes in it. (See above.)

Lucy and Colin. A ballad by Thomas Tickel, translated into Latin by Vincent Bourne. Colin forsook Lucy of Leinster for a bride "thrice as rich." Lucy felt that she was dying, and made request that she might be taken to the church at the time of Colin's wedding. Her request was granted, and when Colin saw Lucy's corpse, "the damps of death bedewed his brow, and he died." Both were buried in one tomb, and to their grave many a constant hind and plighted maid resort to "deck it with garlands and true-love knots."

Lud. A mythical king of Britain.

General Lud. The name assumed by the ringleader of certain rioters, who in 1811 endeavoured to prevent the introduction of power-looms. The faction revived in 1816, but was soon put down. Miss Harriet Martineau says the name was taken from an imbecile called Ned Lud of Leicester. (See LUDDITES.)

Lud's Bulwark. Ludgate prison. (See above.)

Lud's Town. London; so called from Lud, a mythical king of Britain.

Ludgate is by a similar tradition said to be the gate where Lud was buried. (See LONDON.)

And on the gates of Lud's Town set your heads.
Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," iv. 2.

Luddites (2 syl.). Riotous workmen who went about the manufacturing districts breaking machines, under the notion that machinery threw men out of employ. Miss Martineau says that the term arose from Ned Lud, of Leicestershire, an imbecile who was much hounded by boys. One day he chased a set of tormentors into a house, and broke two stocking-frames, whence the leader of these rioters was called General Lud, his chief abettors Lud's wives, and his followers Luddites. (1811-1816.)

Ludgate. Stow says, "King Lud, repairing the city, called it after his name Lud's town; the strong gate which he built in the west part, he likewise named Lud-gate. In the year 1260, the gate was beautiful with images of Lud and other kings. Those images, in the reign of Edward VI., had their heads smitten off. . . . Queen Mary did set new heads upon their old bodies again. The twenty-eighth of Queen Elizabeth the gate was newly and beautifully built, with images of Lud and others, as before." ("Survey of London") The more probable etymon is the Saxon leod (people), similar to the "Porto del popoli" of Rome.

[Lud] Built that gate of which his name is hight,
By which he lies entombed solemnly.
Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. x. 46.

Ludlam. (See LAZY.)

Luez. (See LUZ.)

Luff. The part towards the wind. The tuff of a vessel is the roundest part of her bow.

To luff is to turn the head of a ship towards the wind.

Luff l—i.e., put the tiller on the lee-side. This is done to make the ship sail nearer the wind.

Luff round!—Throw the ship's head round to the wind.

Luff a-lee l—same as Luff round.

A ship is said to Spring her luff when she yields to the helm by sailing nearer the wind.

Keep the luff l—the wind side.

Lufra. Douglas's dog, "the fleetest hound in all the North."—Sir Walter Scott, "Lady of the Lake," v. 25.

Luggie. The warlock who, when storms prevented him from going to sea, used to sit on "Luggie's Knoll" and fish up dressed food.

Luggnagg. An island mentioned in "Gulliver's Travels," where people live for ever. Swift shows the evil of such a destiny, unless accompanied with eternal youth and freshness.

Luke (St.). Patron saint of painters and physicians. Tradition says he painted a portrait of the Virgin Mary. From Col. iv. 14 he is supposed to have been a physician.

St. Luke, in Christian art, is usually represented with an ox lying near him, and generally with painting materials. Sometimes he seems engaged painting a picture of the Virgin and infant Saviour, his description of the early life of the Saviour being more minute than that of the other evangelists. Metaphrastus mentions the skill of St. Luke in painting; John of Damascus speaks of his portrait of the Virgin (p. 631. Paris, 1712). Many pictures still extant are ascribed to St. Luke; but the artist was probably St. Luke the Greek hermit; certainly these meagre Byzantine productions were not the works of the evangelist. (See Lanzi, "Storia Pittorica dell' Italia," ii. 10.)

St. Luke's Club or The Virtuosi's. An artists' club, established in England by Sir Antonio Vandyke, and held at the Rose Tavern, Fleet Street. There was an academy of St. Luke founded by the Paris artists in 1391; one at Rome, founded in 1593, but based on the "Compagnia di San Luca" of Florence, founded in 1345; a similar one was established at Sienna in 1355.

St. Luke's Summer, called by the French l'été de S. Martin; hence the phrase "L'été de la S. Denis à la S. Martin," from October 9th to November 11th, meaning generally the latter end of autumn.

As light as St. Luke's bird (i.e., an ox). Not light at all, but quite the contrary. St. Luke is generally represented writing, while behind him is an ox, symbolical of sacrifice. The whole tableau means that Luke pre-eminently wrote about the sacrifice of Jesus Christ.

Luke's Iron Crown. George and Luke Dosa headed an unsuccessful revolt against the Hungarian nobles in the early part of the sixteenth century. Luke (according to Goldsmith) underwent the torture of the red-hot iron crown, as a punishment for allowing himself to be proclaimed king. Most writers say it was George, not Luke.

Lullaby has been derived from Lilla, abi (Lilith, avaunt!). (See LILIS.)

There was a fairy called Elahy Ga'hon, invoked by nurses to watch over sleeping babes, that they might not be changed by the eyes, and some think that lullaby is a corruption of L'Elahy.

Lullian Method. A mechanical aid to the memory, by means of systematic arrangements of ideas and subjects, devised by Raymond Lully, in the thirteenth century.

Lumber (from Lombard). A pawnbroker's shop. Thus lady Murray writes: "They put all the little plate they had in the lumber, which is pawning it, till the ships came home." The first pawnbrokers were called Lombards, and the places where pawns were kept were called "lumber-rooms."

Lump. If you don't like it you may lump it. If you do not choose to take what is offered, you may sit in the sulks. In Devonshire the sulks are called the lumps, and our lumpish means heavy, awkward, and ungainly.

Lumpkin (Tony), in "She Stoops to Conquer," by Goldsmith. A sheepish, mischievous, idle, cunning lout, "with the vices of a man and the follies of a boy;" fond of low company, but giving himself the airs of the young squire.

Luna. An ancient seaport of Gen'oa, whence the marble quarried in the neighbourhood is called "marmo lunensè."—"Orlando Furioso."

Contè di Luna. Garzia, brother of count Luna, had two sons. One day a gipsy was found in their chamber, and being seized, was condemned to be burnt alive. The daughter of the gipsy, out of revenge, vowed vengeance, and stole Manrico, the infant son of Garzia. It so fell out that the count and Manrico both fell in love with the princess Leonora, who loved Manrico only. Luna and Manrico both fall into the hands of the count, and are condemned to death, when Leonora promises to "give herself" to Luna, provided he liberates Manrico. The count accepts the terms, and goes to the prison to fulfil his promise, when Leonora dies from poison which she has sucked from a ring. Soon as Manrico sees that Leonora is dead, he also dies. — Verdi, "Il Trovatore" (an opera).

Lu'nar Month. About four weeks. The time which a moon takes to complete one revolution round the earth—i.e., from full to full moon, new to new moon, &c.

Lu'nar Year. Twelve lunar months—i.e., six months of twenty-nine days each, and six months of thirty days each. Total, 354 days.

Lunatics. Moon-struck persons. The Romans believed that the mind was affected by the moon, and that "lunatics" were more and more frenzied as the moon increased to its full. (See AVERTIN.)

Luncheon. So called from the Spanish meal at eleven o'clock, called l'oncè (lunchy). Similarly, nuncheon is the noon-song repast, called in Yorkshire nooning's caup. The noon-song was at three in the afternoon, and was over at about four, when refreshment was taken.

Lungaggi'ni. Dull, tedious twaddlers; prosy talkers. Lungagnola is prosy twaddle (Italian).

Lungs of London. The parks. In a debate, 30th of June, 1808, respecting encroachments upon Hyde Park, Mr. Windham said it was the "lungs of London."

Lunsfort. A name used in terrorem over children. He was Sir Thomas Lunsfort, governor of the Tower; a man of most vindictive temper, and the dread of every one.

Lu'percal. A festival held by the Romans on the 15th February, in honour of Lu'percus, the god of fertility.

Lupus et Agnus. A mere pretence to found a quarrel on. The words are the Latin of the well-known fable of "The Wolf and the Lamb."

Lush. Beer and other intoxicating drinks; so called from Lushington the brewer.

Lu'siad. The adventures of the Lusians or Portuguese under Vasquez de Gama in their "discovery of India." The fleet first sailed to Mozambique, in Africa, but Bacchus (the guardian power of the Mahometans) raised a commotion against the Lusians, and a battle ensued in which the Lusians were victorious. The fleet was next conducted by treachery to Quil'oa, a harbour on the east coast of the same continent; but Venus or Divine love, to save her favourites from danger, drove them away by a tempest, and Hermès bade Gama steer for Melinda, in Africa. At Melinda the Lusians were hospitably received, and the king of the country not only vowed eternal friendship, but also provided a pilot to conduct the fleet to India. In the Indian Ocean Bacchus tried to destroy the fleet, but "the silver star of Divine love" calmed the sea, and Gama arrived at India in safety. Having accomplished his object, Gama returned to Lisbon.

N.B.—Gama sailed three times to India:—(1) with four vessels, in 1497, returning to Lisbon in two years and two months; he was appointed admiral of the Eastern seas. (2) In 1502, with twenty ships, when he was attacked by the Zamorin or king of Calicut, whom he defeated, and returned to Lisbon the year following; and (3) when John III. appointed him viceroy of India. He established his government at Cochin, where he died in 1525. It is the first of these voyages which is the subject of the Lusiad.

Lusita'nia. Ancient name for Portugal, said to be so called from Lusus. (See LUSUS.)

Lusita'nian Prince. Don Henry, third son of Joam I., king of Portugal—

Who heaven-inspired,
To love of useful glory roused mankind,
And in unbounded commerce mixed the world.
Thomson, "Summer."

Lustrum. A space of five years. The word means a purification. These public expiations were made by the censors every fifth year, at the conclusion of the census. (Latin, lu'ere, to purify.)

Lus'us. The sons or race of Lusus. Pliny (iii. 1.) tells us that Lusus was the companion of Bacchus in his travels, and settled a colony in Portugal; whence the country was termed Lusita'nia, and the inhabitants Lusians.

Lusus Natu'ræ (Latin). A freak of nature; as a man with six toes, a sheep with two heads, a stone shaped like a well-known object, &c.

Lutestring. A glossy silk; a corruption of lustring, from the French lustre.

To speak in lutestring. Flash, highly-polished oratory. The expression was first used in "Junius." Shakespeare has "Taffeta phrases and silken terms precise." We call inflated speech "fustian" (q.v.) or "bombast" (q.v.); say a man talks stuff; term a book or speech made up of other men's brains, shoddy (q.v.); sailors call telling a story "spinning a yarn," &c. &c.

Lutetia. Mud-hovels; the ancient name of Paris. The Romans called it Lutetia Parisiorum, the mud-town of the Parisii. The former word being dropped, has left the present name Paris. (Celtic, louiou-hesi, mud-dwellings.)

Luther, called Martin Eleutherius by Wolsey and others.

Lu'therans. Dr. Eck was the first to call the followers of Martin Luther by this name. It was used by way of contempt.

Lu'tin. A sort of gobelin in the mythology of Normandy, very similar to the house-spirits of Germany and Scandinavia. Sometimes it assumes the form of a horse ready equipped, and in this shape is called Le Cheval Bayard.

To Lutin is to twist hair into elf-locks. Sometimes these mischievous urchins so tangle the mane of a horse or head of a child that the hair must be cut off.

Le Prince Lutin, by the countess D'Aulnoy.

Luxemburgers. The people of Luxemburg. Similarly we have Augsburgers, Carlsburgers, Edinburgers, Friburgers, Hamburgers, and many more.

Luz or Luez. The indestructible bone; the nucleus of the resurrection body.

"How doth a man revive again in the world to come?" asked Hadrian; and Joshua Ben Hanani'ab made answer, "From luz in the backbone." He then went on to demonstrate this to him: He took the bone luz, and put it into water, but the water had no action on it; he put it in the fire, but the fire consumed it not; he placed it in a mill, but could not grind it; and laid it on an anvil, but the hammer crushed it not.—Lightfoot.

Lybius (Sir). A very young knight who undertook to rescue the lady of Sinadone; after overcoming various knights, giants, and euchanters, he entered the palace of the lady. Presently the whole edifice fell to pieces about his ears, and a horrible serpent coiled round his neck and kissed him. The spell being broken, the serpent turned into the lady of Sinadone, who married the knight that so gallantly rescued her.—"Libeaux" (a romance).

Lycaon'ian Tables (Lycaonia mensæ). Execrable food. Lyca'on, desirous of testing the divine knowledge of Jove, who had honoured him with a visit, served up human flesh on his table; for which the god changed him into a wolf.

Ly'cidas. The name under which Milton celebrates the untimely death of Edward King, Fellow of Christ College, Cambridge, who was drowned in his passage from Chester to Ireland, August 10th, 1637. He was the son of Sir John King, secretary for Ireland.

Ly'cis'ca (half wolf, half dog). One of the dogs of Actæon. In Latin it is a common term for a shepherd's dog, and is so used by Virgil (Eclogue iii. 18).

Lycome'dës. King of Scyros, at whose court Achilles concealed himself.

Lycopo'dium. (See MISNOMER.)

Lydford Law is, punish first and try afterwards. Lydford, in the county of Devon, was a fortified town, in which was an ancient castle, where were held the courts of the duchy of Cornwall. Offenders against the stannary laws were confined before trial in a dungeon so loathsome and dreary, that it gave rise to the proverb referred to. The castle was destroyed by the Danes. (See COWPER'S LAW.)

Lydia, daughter of the king of Lydia, was sought in marriage by Alcestes, a Thracian knight; his suit was refused, and he repaired to the king of Armenia, who gave him an army with which he laid siege to Lydia. He was persuaded by Lydia to raise the siege. The king of Armenia would not give up the project, and Alcestes slew him. Lydia now set him all sorts of dangerous tasks to "prove the ardour of his love," all of which he surmounted. Lastly, she induced him to put to death all his allies, and when she had cut off the claws of the love-sick lion, she mocked him. Alcestes pined and died, and Lydia was doomed to endless torment in hell, where Astolpho saw her, to whom she told her story.—“Orlando Furioso,” bk. xvii.

Lydia Languish, in “The Rivals,” by Sheridan.

Lydian Poet (The). Aleman of Lydia. (Fl. B.C. 670.)

Lying. Lying for the whetstone. Said of a person who is grossly exaggerating or falsifying a statement. One of the Whitsun amusements of our forefathers was the lie-wage or lie-match; he who could tell the greatest lie carried off a whetstone as his reward. The nature of these contests may be illustrated by the following well-known extravaganzas: one of the combatants declared he could see a fly on the top of a church-steeple; the other replied, “Oh yes, I saw him wink his eye.”

Lying Traveller (The). So Sir John Mandeville has been unjustly called. (1300-1372.)

Lying by the Wall. Dead but not buried. Saxon, wæl (death). He is lying with the dead.

Lyn. Cease. (Anglo-Saxon, linnan, to cease.)

Lynch-law. Mob-law, law administered by private persons. Lynch is Saxon for a club; whence the nearly obsolete verb linch, to beat or chastise, and the compound linch-pin, which is the pin of the “lynis” or axle. According to Webster, the word lynch refers to James Lynch, a farmer, of Piedmont in Virginia. The tale is that, as Piedmont, on the frontier, was seven miles from any law-court, the neighbours, in 1636, selected James Lynch, a man of good judgment and great impartiality, to pass sentence on offenders on the nonce. His judgments were so judicious that he acquired the name of Judge Lynch, and this sort of law went by the name of Lynch-law. In confirmation of this story, we are told there was a James Lynch Fitz-Stephen, who was warden of Galway in 1526; and in the capacity of warden he passed sentence of death on his own son for murder. (See BURLAW.)

Lynchno'bians. Booksellers and publishers. Rabelais says they inhabit a little hamlet near Lantern-land, and live by lanterns.—“Pantagruel,” v. 33.

Lynx-eyed. Having as keen a sight as a lynx.

Lyon King-of-Arms. Chief heraldic officer for Scotland; so called from the lion rampant in the Scottish regal escutcheon.

Lyonnesse (3 syl.). “That sweet land of Lyonesse”—a tract between the Land's End and the Scilly Isles, now submerged full “forty fathoms under water.” Arthur came from this mythical country.

Lyre.

Amphion built Thebes with the music of his lyre, for the very stones moved of their own accord into walls and houses.

Arion charmed the dolphins by the music of his lyre, and when the bard was thrown overboard one of them carried him safely to Tænarus.

Hercules was taught music by Linus. One day, being reproved, the strong man broke the head of his master with his own lyre.

Orpheus charmed savage beasts, and even the infernal gods, with the music of his lyre.

Lyttelton, invoked by Thomson in his “Spring,” was George, lord Lyttelton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, who procured from the prince of Wales a pension of £100 a year for the poet. Lucinda was Lucy Fortescue, daughter of Hugh Fortescue, of Devonshire.

M

M. This letter represents the wavy appearance of water, and is called in Hebrew mem (water).

M (initial of manslaughter). The brand of a person convicted of that offence, and admitted to the benefit of clergy. It was burnt on the brawn of the left thumb.

M in numerals is the initial of mille, a thousand.

Whoever prayeth for the soul of John Gower he shall, so oft as he so doth, have a M. and a D. days of pardon.—Gower's Tablet.

M. The five Ms: Mansa, Matsya, Madya, Maithuna, and Mudra (flesh, fish, wine, women, and gesticulation). The five forms of Hindu asceticism.

M⁶—i.e., Mac. A Gaelic prefix meaning son. (Gothic, magus, a son; Sanskrit, mah, to grow; Welsh, magu, to breed.) The Welsh ap is mac changed to map, and contracted into 'ap or 'p, as Apadam ('Ap Adam), Prichard ('P Richard).

M or N in the Catechism. M is a contraction of NN (names); N is for name. The respondent is required to give his names if he has more than one, or his name if only one.

In the marriage service, M stands for mas (the man) or maritus (the bridegroom), and N for nupta (the bride).

There are some who think M stands for Mary, the patron saint of girls, and N for Nicholas, the patron saint of boys.

M.D. The first woman that obtained this degree was Elizabeth Blackwell, of the United States (1849).

M.P. Member of Parliament, but in slang language Member of the Police.

MS., manuscript; MSS., manuscripts; generally applied to literary works in penmanship. (Latin, manuscriptum, what is written by the hand.)

Ma. The goddess of truth and justice.—Egyptian mythology.

Ma. The fox is so called by the Japanese because of its ravages. It is the name of a malignant spirit.

Ma. Rhea, so called by the Lydians; also the nurse of Bacchus.

Mab. The "fairies' midwife," whose office is to deliver the brain of dreams, or in plain English, to send dreams. Thus when Romeo says, "I dreamed a dream to-night," Mercutio replies, "O then, I see queen Mab hath been with you." Sir Walter Scott follows in the same track: "I have a friend who is peculiarly favoured with the visits of queen Mab," meaning with dreams ("The Antiquary"). When Mab is called "queen" it does not mean sovereign, for Titania was O'beron's wife, but simply female; both midwives and monthly nurses were anciently called queens or queans, which in Anglo-Saxon means neither more nor less than woman; so "elf-queen" and the Danish "ellequinde" mean female elf, and not "queen of the elves." Excellent descriptions of "Mistress Mab" are given by Shakespeare ("Romeo and Juliet," i. 4), by Ben Jonson, by Herrick, and by Drayton in his "Nimphidea." (Mab, Welsh, a baby.)

Mac'aber. The Dance Macaber. The Dance of Death (q.v.).

Macad'amise (4 syl.). Using broken stones for road metal, and making the road convex instead of concave; a method introduced by Sir John L. Macadam. (1756-1836.)

Macaire (2 syl.). A favourite name in French plays, inasmuch that Robert Macaire is sometimes used generically for a Frenchman. It is said that Aubry de Montdidier was murdered in the forest of Bondy in 1371. His dog conceived such a hatred against Richard Macaire, that suspicion was aroused, and it was resolved to pit the man and dog together. The result was fatal to the man, who died confessing his guilt.

Mac'amut. Sultan of Cambaya, who lived upon poison, with which he was so saturated that his breath or touch carried instant death.—Purchas.

Macare (French). The impersonation of good-temper, in Voltaire's allegory of "Theleme and Macare."

Macarius (St.). An Egyptian anchorite, noted for giving his name to the Mac'aber Dance, or Dance of Death. Three noblemen hawking arrived at his cell, and the anchorite pointed out to them three coffins—one containing a skeleton, and the other two dead bodies.

Macaro'ni. A dandy. The word is derived from the Macaroni club, instituted by a set of flashy men who had travelled in Italy, and introduced Italian macaroni at Almack's subscription table. The Macaronies were the most exquisite fops that ever disgraced the name of man; vicious, insolent, fond of gambling, drinking, and duelling, they were (about 1773) the curse of Vauxhall Gardens.

We are indebted to the Macaronies for only two things: the one is the introduction of that excellent dish, macaroni, and the other is the invention of that useful slang word "bore" [boar], which originally meant any opponent of dandisism.—Cassell's Magazine, "London Leg. nls," iii.

Macaronic Latin. Dog Latin. From macaro'ne, a medley, a merry Andrew; hence, macaronic, foolish, strangely mixed and jumbled together. The cake called in Italian macaroni is a mixture of coarse meal, eggs, and cheese.—Thomassin, "Eleg.," p. 72.

Macaronic Verse. Verses in which foreign words are ludicrously distorted and jumbled together, as in Porson's lines on the threatened invasion of England by Napoleon. So called by Teofilo Folengo, a Mantuan monk of noble family, who published a book entitled "Liber Macaronico-rum," a poetical rhapsody made up of words of different languages, and treating of "pleasant matters" in a comical style (1520). Folengo is generally called Merlinus Coccaius, or Merlino Coccajo. (See preceding.)

Macbeth (Shakespeare). The story is taken from Holinshed, who copied it from the "History of Scotland," by Hector Boece or Boyce, in seventeen volumes (1527). This history written in Latin was translated by John Bellenden (1531-1535).

*. History states that Macbeth slew Duncan at Bothgowan, near Elgin, in 1059, and not as Shakespeare says, at his castle of Inverness; the attack was made because Duncan had usurped the throne to which Macbeth had the better claim. As a king, Macbeth proved a very just and equitable prince, but the partisans of Malcolm got head, and succeeded in deposing Macbeth, who was slain in 1056 at Lumphavan. He was thane of Cromarty [Glamis], and afterwards of Moray [Cawdor].—Lardner, "Cabinet Cyclopædia."

Lady Macbeth. The wife of Macbeth. Ambition is her sin, and to gain the object of her ambition she hesitates at nothing. Her masterful mind sways the weaker Macbeth to "the mood of what she liked or loathed." She is a Medea, or Catharine de' Medici, or Cæsar Borgia in female form.—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."

*. The real name of lady Macbeth was Graoch, and instead of being urged to the murder of Duncan through ambition, she was goaded by deadly injuries. She was, in fact, the grand daughter of Kenneth IV., killed in 1005, fighting against Malcolm II.—Lardner, "Cabinet Cyclopædia," vol. i. 17, &c.

Macbriar (Ephraim). An enthusiastic preacher in Sir Walter Scott's "Old Mortality."

Maccabæus. The Hammerer. A surname given to Judas Asmonæus; similar to "Martel," the name given to Charles, son of Pepin the Short, who beat down the Saracens as with a sledge-hammer. Some think the name is a notarica or acrostic: Mi Camaka Baelin Jehovah (Who is like to thee among the gods, O Lord?).—Exodus xv. 11. (See NOTARICA.)

Macduff. The thane of Fife. A Scotch nobleman whose castle of Kenno-way was surprised by Macbeth, and his wife and babes "savagely slaughtered." Macduff vowed vengeance, and joined the army of Siward, to dethrone the tyrant. On reaching the royal castle of Dunsinane, they fought, and Macbeth was slain.—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."

*. History states that Macbeth was defeated at Dunsinane, but escaped from the battle, and was slain at Lumphavan in 1056.—Lardner, "Cabinet Cyclopædia," i. p. 17, &c.

MacFarlane's Geese. The proverb is that "MacFarlane's geese like their play better than their meat." The wild geese of Inch-Tavoe (Loch-Lomon) used to be called MacFarlane's geese because the MacFarlanes had a house and garden on the island. It is said that these geese never returned after the extinction of that house. One day James VI. visited the chieftain, and was highly amused by the gambols of the geese, but the one served at table was so tough that the king exclaimed, "MacFarlane's geese like their play better than their meat."

MacFleck'noe, in Dryden's famous satire, is Thomas Shadwell, poet laureate, whose immortality rests on the not very complimentary line of "Shadwell never deviates into sense." (1640-1692.)

N.B.—Flecknoe was an Irish Roman Catholic priest, doggerel sonneteer, and playwright. Shadwell, according to Dryden, was his double.

MacGregor. The motto of the MacGregors is, "Een do and spair nocht," said to have been given them in the twelfth century by the king of Scotland. While the king was hunting he was attacked by a wild boar, when Sir Malcolm requested permission to encounter the creature. "Een do," said the king, "and spair nocht." Whereupon the strong baronet tore up an oak sapling and dispatched the enraged animal. For this defence the king gave Sir Malcolm permission to use the said motto, and, in place of a Scotch fir, to adopt for crest an oak-tree eradicate, proper.

Rob Roy MacGregor or Robert Campbell, the outlaw. A Highland freebooter, the hero of Sir Walter Scott's "Rob Roy." His wife's name is Helen, and their eldest son, Hamish. In the "Two Drivers," MacGregor or MacCombich (Robins Oig) is a Highland drover.

MacHeath (Captain). A highwayman, hero of "The Beggar's Opera," by Gay. A fine, gay, bold-faced ruffian, game to the very last.

Mac'hiavel. The imperial Machiavel. Tiberius the Roman emperor. (B.C. 42 to A.D. 37.)

Machiavellism. Political cunning and overreaching by diplomacy, according to the pernicious political principles of Niccolo del Machiavelli, of Florence, set forth in his work called "The Prince." The general scope of this book is to show that rulers may resort to any treachery and artifice to uphold their arbitrary power, and whatever dishonourable acts princes may indulge in are fully set off by the insubordination of their subjects. (1469-1527.)

Mac Intyre (Captain Hector). Brother of Maria Mac Intyre, the antiquary's niece, in Sir Walter Scott's "Antiquary."

Mac Ivor (Fergus). Chief of Glennaquich, and brother of Flora Mac Ivor, the heroine of "Waverley," by Sir Walter Scott.

Mackintosh or Macintosh. Cloth waterproofed with caoutchouc, patented by Mr. Macintosh.

Macklin. The real name of this great actor was Charles M'Laughlin, but he changed it on coming to England. (1690-1797.)

Macmill'anites (4 syl.). A religious sect of Scotland, who succeeded the Covenanters; so named from John Macmillan, their leader. They called themselves the "Reformed Presbytery."

Mac Pherson. During the reign of David I. of Scotland, a younger brother of the chief of the powerful clan Chattan espoused the clerical life, and in due time became abbot of Kingussie. His elder brother died childless, and the chieftainship devolved on the abbot. He procured the needful dispensation from the pope, married the daughter of the thane of Calder, and a swarm of little "Kingussies" was the result. The good people of Inverness-shire called them the Mac-phersons—i.e., the sons of the parson.

Macsyc'ophant (Sir Pertinax). In "The Man of the World," by Charles Macklin, Sir Pertinax "bowed, and bowed, and bowed," and cringed, and fawned, to obtain the object of his ambition.

Mac Tab. The Honourable Miss Lucretia Mac Tab. A poor Scotch relative of Emily Worthington "on her deceased mother's side, and of the noble blood of the Mac Tabs." She lived on the Worthingtons, always snubbing them for not appreciating the honour of such a noble hanger-on, and always committing the most ludicrous mistakes from her extravagant vanity and family pride.—George Colman, "The Poor Gentleman."

Mac Turk (Captain Mungo or Hector). "The man of peace" at the Spa Hotel, and one of the Managing Committee.—Sir Walter Scott, "St. Ronan's Well."

Mace. Originally a club armed with iron, and used in war. Both sword and mace are ensigns of dignity, suited to the times when men went about in armour, and sovereigns needed champions to vindicate their rights.

Macedon. Macedon is not worthy of thee, is what Philip said to his son Alexander, after his achievement with the horse Buceph'alos, which he subdued to his will, though only eighteen years of age.

Edward III., after the battle of Crecy, in which the Black Prince behaved very valiantly, exclaimed, "My brave boy, go on as you have begun, and you will be worthy of England's crown."

Macedo'nian (The). Julius Polyænus, author of "Stratage'mata," in the second century.

Macedo'nians. A religious sect, so named from Macedo'nus, patriarch of Constantinople, in the fourth century. They denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost, and that the essence of the Son is the same in kind with that of the Father.

Macedon'icus. Paulus Æmil'ius, conqueror of Perseus. (230-160 B.C.)

Macon. Mahomet or Maheun.

Macon. A poetical and romance name of Mecca, the birthplace of Mahomet.

Mac'reons. The Island of the Mac'reons. Great Britain. The word is Greek, and means long-lived. Rabelais describes the persecutions of the reformers as a terrible storm at sea, in which Pantag'ruel and his fleet were tempest tossed, but contrived to enter one of the harbours of Great Britain, an island called "Long-life," because no one was put to death there for his religious opinions. This island was full of antique ruins, relics of decayed popery and ancient superstitions.

Macrocosm (Greek, the great world), in opposition to microcosm (the little world). The ancients looked upon the universe as a living creature, and the followers of Paracelsus considered man a miniature representation of the universe. The one was termed the Macrocosm, and the other the Microcosm (q.v.).

Mad as a Hatter. A corruption of Mad as an atter (adder). The word adder is atter in Saxon, natter in German.

Mad Cavalier. Prince Rupert, noted for his rash courage and impatience of control. (1619-1682.)

Mad Parliament. The parliament which assembled at Oxford in 1258, and broke out into open rebellion against Henry III. The king was declared deposed, and the government was vested in the hands of twenty-four councillors, with Simon de Montfort at their head.

Mad Poet. Nathaniel Lee, who was confined for four years in Bedlam. (1657-1690.)

Madame. So the wife of Philippe duc d'Orléans was styled in the reign of Louis XIV.; other ladies were only Madame This or That.

Madame la Duchesse. Wife of Henri-Jules de Bourbon, eldest son of prince de Condé.

Madame la Princesse. Wife of the prince de Condé, and natural daughter of Louis XIV. (See MONSIEUR.)

Mademoiselle (4 syl.). The daughter of Philippe duc de Chartres, grandson of Philippe duc d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIV.

La Grande Mademoiselle. The duchesse de Montpensier, cousin to Louis XIV., and daughter of Gaston duc d'Orléans.

Madge. An owl. Probably from its sapient look it is called a magistrate, contracted into Madge; or magus, Persian magusch, a philosopher and priest.

Madge Wildfire. The nickname of Margaret Murdockson, a beautiful but giddy girl, whose brain was crazed by seduction and the murder of her infant.—Sir Walter Scott. "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Mâdhava. A name of the Hindu god Vishnu.

Madman. Macedonia's Madman. Alexander the Great. (B.C. 356-323.)

The Brilliant Madman or Madman of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden. (1682, 1697-1718.)

MADNESS. In Perthshire there are several wells and springs dedicated to St. Filian, which are still places of pilgrimage. These wells are held to be efficacious in cases of madness. Even recently lunatics have been bound to the holy stone at night, under the expectation that St. Filian would release them before dawn, and send them home in their right minds.

Ma'doc. The youngest son of Owen Gwyneth, king of North Wales, who died in 1169. According to tradition he sailed away to America, and established a colony on the southern branches of the Missouri. About the same time the Aztecs forsook Aztlan, under the guidance of Yuhid'thilton, and founded the empire called Mexico, in honour of Mexitli, their tutelary god. Southey has a poem in two parts called "Ma'doc," in which these two events are made to harmonise with each other.

Madonna. (Italian, my lady). Specially applied to representations of the Virgin Mary.

Ma'dor (Sir). The Scotch knight slain in single combat by Sir Launcelot of the Lake, who volunteered to defend the innocence of queen Guinever.

Madras System of Education. A system of mutual instruction, introduced by Dr. Andrew Bell into the institution at Madras for the education of the orphan children of the European military. Bell lived 1753-1832.

Mæander. To wind like the river Mæander, in Phrygia. The "Greek pattern" of embroidery is so called.

Mæcenas. A patron of letters; so called from C. Cilnius Mæcenas, a Roman statesman in the reign of Augustus, who kept open house for all men of letters, and was the special friend and patron of Horace and Virgil. Nicholas Rowe so called the earl of Halifax on his installation to the order of the Garter (1714).

The last English Mæcenas. Samuel Rogers, poet and banker. (1763-1855.)

Maelström (Norwegian, whirling stream). There are above fifty maelströms off the coast of Norway, but the one Englishmen delight to tremble at is at the foot of the Lofoten Islands, between the islands of Moskenes and Mosken, where the water is pushed and jostled a good deal, and when the wind and tide are contrary it is not safe for small boats to venture near.

It was anciently thought that the Maelström was a subterranean abyss, penetrating the globe, and communicating with the Gulf of Bothnia.

Mæonides (4 syl.) or Mæonian Poet. Homer, either because he was the son of Mæon, or because he was born in Mæonia (Asia Minor).

Mæviad. A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Cruscan school of poetry. Published 1796. The word is from Virgil's Eclogue. (See BAVIAD.)

Mag. What a mag you are; jabbberer, hence to chatter like a magpie. Mag is a contraction of magpie. The French have a famous word, caquet-bon-bec. We call a prating woman "a mag." (See MAGPIE.)

Not a mag to bless myself with—not a halfpenny. Guineas used to be called mags or mags, from the Greek megas ("large" money).

Mag'a. "Blackwood's Magazine." A mere contraction of the word magazine.

Magalo'na. (See MAGUELONE.)

Magazine (3 syl.). A place for stores. (Arabic, makhzan, gazana, a place where articles are preserved.)

Magdalen Smith. Gaspar Smitz, the Dutch portrait painter. (Died 1689.)

Magdalene (3 syl.). An asylum for the reclaiming of prostitutes; so called from Mary Magdalene or Mary of Magdala, "out of whom Jesus cast seven devils," a great prodigal till she met with the Lord and Saviour.

Mag'deburg Centuries. The first great work of Protestant divines on the history of the Christian church. It was begun at Magdeburg by Matthias Flacius, in 1552; and, as each century occupies a volume, the thirteen volumes complete the history to 1300.

Magellan. Straits of Magellan. So called after Magellan or Magalhães, the Portuguese navigator, who discovered them in 1520.

Magen'ta. A brilliant blue-red colour derived from coal-tar, named in commemoration of the battle of Magenta in 1859.

Maggot, Maggoty. Whimsical, full of whims and fancies. Fancy tunes used to be called maggots, hence we have "Barker's maggots," "Cary's maggots," "Draper's maggots," &c.—"Dancing Master" (1721).

When the maggot bites. When the fancy takes us. Swift tells us that it was the opinion of certain virtuosi that the brain is filled with little worms or maggots, and that thought is produced by these worms biting the nerves. "If the bite is hexagonal it produces poetry; if circular, eloquence; if conical, politics; &c.—"The Mechanical Operation of the Spirit."

Instead of maggots the Scotch say, "His head is full of bees;" the French, "Il a des rats dans la tête;" and in Holland, "He has a mouse's nest in his head." (See BEE.)

Ma'gi (The), according to one tradition, were Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar, three kings of the East. The first offered gold, the emblem of royalty, to the infant Jesus; the second, frankincense, in token of divinity; and the third, myrrh, in prophetic allusion to the persecution unto death which awaited the "Man of Sorrows."

Magi, in Camoens' "Lusiad," means the Indian "brahmins." Ananiaus Marcellinus says that the Persian magi derived their knowledge from the brahmins of India (i. 23); and Arianus expressly calls the brahmins "magi" (i. 7).

Magic Rings, like that of Gyges, king of Lydia, &c., arose from the belief that magicians had the power of imprisoning demons in rings. This power was supposed to prevail in Asia, and subsequently in Salamanca, Toledo, and Italy. N.B. Magic circles, like "magic squares," are mathematical puzzles.

Magic Wand.

In "Jerusalem Delivered," the Hermit gives Charles the Dane and Ubaldo a wand, which being shaken, infused terror into all who saw it.

In the "Faery Queen," the palmer who accompanies Sir Guyon has a staff of like virtue, made of the same wood as Mercury's caduceus.

Magician. The Great Magician or Wizard of the North. Professor Wilson calls Sir Walter Scott the Great Magician, from the wonderful fascination of his writings.

Magician of the North. The title assumed by Johann Georg Hamann, of Prussia. (1730-1788.)

Magna Charta. The Great Charter of English liberty extorted by the barons from king John, 1215; called by Spelman—

Angustis'simum Anglica'rum liberta tum diplo'ma et sacra an'chora.

Magnanimous (The).

Alfonso V. of Aragon. (1385, 1416-1458.)

Chosroes or Khosru, twenty-first of the Sassanidēs, surnamed Noushir'wan (the Magnanimous). (531-579.)

Magna'no. One of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The character is a satire on Simon Wait, a tinker and Independent preacher.—“Hudibras,” pt. i. 2.

Magnet. The loadstone; so called from Magne'sia, in Lydia, where the ore was said to abound. The Greeks called it magnes. Milton uses the adjective for the substantive in the line “As the magnetic hardest iron draws.”

Magnetic Mountain. A mountain which drew out all the nails of any ship that approached within its magnetic influence. The ship in which prince Agib sailed fell to pieces when wind-driven towards it.—“Arabian Nights” (The Third Calendar).

Magneuse (French). An anomya or “fille de joie,” so called from the nunnery founded at Rheims in 1654, by Jeanne Canart, daughter of Nicolas Colbert, seigneur de Magneux. The word is sometimes jocosely perverted into Magni-magno.

Magnificat. To sing the Magnificat at matins. To do things at the wrong time, or out of place. The Magnificat does not belong to the morning service, but to vespers (French). The Magnificat is Luke i. 46-55 in Latin.

Magnificent (The).

Khosru or Chosroes I. of Persia. (531-579.) The golden period of Persian history was 550-628.

Lorenzo de Medici. (1448-1492.)

Robert duc de Normandie, also called Le Diable. (1026-1035.)

Soliman I., greatest of the Turkish sultans. (1493, 1520-1566.)

Magno'lia. So called from Pièrè Magnol, professor of medicine at Montpellier. (1638-1715.)

Ma'go the Carthaginian, says Aristotle, crossed the Great Desert twice without having a drop of anything to drink.

Magopho'nia. A festival observed by the Persians to commemorate the massacre of the Magi. Smerdis usurped the throne on the death of Camby'sēs; but seven Persians, conspiring together, slew Smerdis and his brother; whereupon the people put all the Magi to the sword, and elected Darius, son of Hystaspes, to the throne. (Greek, magos-phono's, the magi-slaughter.)

Magot (French). Money, or rather a mass of secreted money; a corruption of imago, the “image and superscription” of coined money.

Là il vola de même, revint à Paris avec un bon magot.—La Gazette Noire, 1784, p. 270.

Magpie. A contraction of magot-pie or mag'ata-pie. “Mag” is generally thought to be a contraction of Margaret; thus we have Robin red-breast, Tom-tit, Philip—i.e., a sparrow, &c.; but probably it is a corruption of major pica, the ordinary pie, as distinguished from the pica minor, which is not larger than a sparrow; thus pievert is a corruption of pio vert—i.e., pica viridis (the green pie).

Augurs and understood relations have (By magot pies, and enoughts, and rooks) brought forth

The secret'st man of blood.

Shakespeare, “Macbeth,” iii. 4.

Magpie. The following is an old Scotch rhyme:—

One's sorrow, two's mirth,
Three's a wedding, four's a birth,
Five's a christening, six a death,
Seven's heaven, eight is hell,
And nine's the devil his ane sel'.

Magricio. The champion of Isabella of Portugal, who refused to do homage to France. The brave champion vanquished the French chevalier, and thus vindicated the liberty of his country.

Mag'uelo'ne or MAG'ALO'NA (the fair). Heroine of the romance called "The History of the Fair Magalona, Daughter of the King of Naples," &c. Originally written in French. Cervantès alludes to it in "Don Quixote." (See PETER OF PROVENÇE.)

Mah-abade'an Dynasty. The first dynasty of Persian mythological history. Mah Abad (the great Abad) and his wife were the only persons left on the earth after the great cycle, and from them the world was peopled. Azer Abad, the fourteenth and last of this dynasty, left the earth because "all flesh had corrupted itself," and a period of anarchy ensued.

Mahabharata. One of the two great epic poems of ancient India. Its story is the contests between the descendants of Kuru and Pandu. (See KURU.)

Mahâdeva (great god). One of the names of the Hindu god Siva. Mahâ-devî (great goddess) is his consort Durgâ.

Ma'hadi or Hakem. The Kalif who reigned about 400 years after Mahomet. In one pilgrimage to Mecca he expended six million gold dinars.

Mahmoud of Ghizai, the conqueror of India in the eleventh century, kept 400 greyhounds and bloodhounds, each of which wore a jewelled collar taken from the neck of some captive sultana.

Mahng (North-American Indian). The loon, a sort of sea-gull.

Mahomet or Mohammed, according to Deutsch, means the predicted Messiah. (Hag. ii. 7.) It is the titular name taken by Halabi, the founder of Islam. (570-632.)

His grandsire was Abd-el-Motaleb; his father, Abdallah; his father-in-law, Abu Bekr; his cousin and warmest disciple was Ali; his adopted heir, Said; his favourite wife, Ayesha; his daughter, Fatima; his son, Ibrahim. His nickname in youth was El Amin (the safe-man).

Mahomet loved Mary, a Coptic girl, and in justification of his amour added a new chapter to the Koran, which may be found in Gagnier's "Notes upon Abulfeda," p. 151.

Mahomet's Banner. Sanjak-sherif, kept in the Eyab mosque, at Constantinople.

Mahomet's Bow. (See CATUM.)

Mahomet's Camels. (See ADHA.)

Mahomet's Coffin. It is said that Mahomet's coffin, in the Had'gira of Medi'na, is suspended in mid-air without any support. Many explanations have been given of this phenomenon, the one most generally received being that the coffin is of iron, placed midway between two magnets. Burekhardt visited the sacred enclosure, and found the ingenuity of science useless in this case, as the coffin is not suspended at all.

Mahomet's Cuirass. (See FADHA.)

Mahomet's Dove. Mahomet had a dove which he used to feed with wheat out of his ear. When the dove was hungry it used to light on the prophet's shoulder, and thrust its bill into his ear to find its meal. Mahomet thus induced the Arabs to believe that he was inspired by the Holy Ghost, in the semblance of a dove.—Sir Walter Raleigh, "History of the World," bk. 1, pt. i, ch. 6. (See also Pridauntz, "Life of Mahomet.")

Mahomet's Horse. Al Borak (the lightning). It conveyed the prophet to the seventh heaven. (See BORAK.)

Borak was a fine-limbed high-standing horse, strong in frame, and with a coat as glossy as marble. His colour was saffron, with one hair of gold for every three of tawny; his ears were restless and pointed like a reed; his eyes large and full of fire; his nostrils wide and steaming; he had a white star on his forehead, a neck gracefully arched, a mane soft and silky, and a thick tail that swept the ground.—"Croquemitaine," ii. 9.

Mahomet's Mule. (See FADDA.)

Mahomet's Standard. Baj'ura.

Mahomet's Stepping-stone. The stone upon which the prophet placed his foot when he mounted the beast Al Borak, on his ascent to heaven. It rose as the best rose, but Mahomet, putting his hand upon it, forbade it to follow him, whereupon it remained suspended in mid-air, where the true believer, if he has faith enough, may still behold it.

Mahomet's Swords. Dhu'l Fakâr (the trenchant); Al Battar (the beater); Medham (the keen); and Hatêf (the deadly).

Mahomet's Wives. Ten in number, viz., (1) Cadijeh, a rich widow of the tribe of Koreish, who had been twice married already, and was forty years of age. For twenty-five years she was his only wife, but at her death he married nine others all of whom survived him.

The nine wives. (1) Ayesha, daughter of Abu Bekr, only nine years old on her wedding-day. This was his youngest and favourite wife.

(2) Sawda, widow of Sokran, and nurse to his daughter Fatima.

(3) Hend, a widow, twenty-eight years old, who also had a son. She was daughter of Omeyya.

(4) Zeinab, wife of Zeid, but divorced in order that the prophet might take her to wife.

(5) Barra, wife of a young Arab and daughter of Al Hareth, chief of an Arab tribe. Both father and husband were slain in a battle with Mahomet. She was a captive.

(6) Rehana', daughter of Simeon, and a Jewish captive.

(7) Safi'ya, the espoused wife of Kena'na. Kena'na was put to death. This wife outlived the prophet for forty years.

(8) Omm Habiba—i.e., mother of Habiba; the widow of Abu Sofian.

(9) Maimuna, fifty-one years old, and a widow, who survived all his other wives.

Also ten or fifteen concubines, chief of whom was Mari'yeh, mother of Ibrahim, the prophet's son, who died when fifteen months old.

Mahometan Gruel. A cant term for coffee, the common beverage of the Turks.

Maho'un (3 syl.). Name of contempt for Mahomet, a Moslem a Moor. In Scotland it used to mean devil.

There's the son of the renegade—spawn of Mahoun
(son of the Moorish prince—"Vengeance of Mudarra.")

Mahu. Fiend-prince that urges to theft.

Five fiends have been in poor Tom at once: of just, as Obadiah: Ho bid dance, prince of dumbness; Ma u of steal; Mudo, of murder; and Finbert, libbet, of moppog and mowing—Shakespeare, "King Lear," iv. 1.

Maid Marian. A morris dance, or the boy in the morris dance, called mad Morion, from the "morion" which he wore on his head (See MORRIS DANCE). Maid Marian is a corruption first of the word, and then of the sex. Having got the words Maid Marian, etymologists have puzzled out a suitable character in Matilda, the daughter of Fitz-Walter, baron of Bayard and Dunmow, who eloped with Robert Fitz-Ooth, the outlaw, and lived with him in Sherwood Forest. Some refine upon this tale, and affirm that Matilda was married to the outlaw (commonly called Robin Hood) by friar Tuck.

A set of morrice dancers danced a maidmarian with a tabor and pipe.—Temple.

Maid of Norway. Margaret, daughter of Eric and Margaret of Norway. On the death of Alexander III. she was acknowledged queen of Scotland, and was betrothed to Edward, son of Edward I. of England, but she died on her passage to England.

Maid of Orleans. Jeanne d'Arc. (1412-1431.)

Maid of Perth (Fair). Catherine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, the old glover of Perth. She kisses Smith while asleep on St. Valentine's morning, and ultimately marries him. (See SMITH.)—Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth."

Maid of Saragossa. Augustina Zaragoza, distinguished for her heroism when Saragossa was besieged in 1808-9. Byron mentions her in his "Child Harold."

Maiden. A machine resembling the guillotine for beheading criminals in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; brought to Scotland by the regent Morton from Halifax, in Yorkshire, for the purpose of beheading the laird of Penny-cuik. It was also called "The Widow."

The Maiden. Malcolm IV. of Scotland. (1141, 1153-1165.)

Malcolm... son of the brave and generous prince Henry... was so kind and gentle in his disposition, that he was usually called Malcolm the Maiden.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," iv.

He who invented the Maiden first hanged it. Referring to regent Morton, who introduced this sort of guillotine into Scotland; erroneously said to have been the first to suffer by it. Thomas Scott, one of the murderers of Riccio, was beheaded by it in 1566, fifteen years before Morton's execution.

Maiden Assize. One in which there is no person to be brought to trial. We have also the expressions Maiden-tree, one never lopped; Maiden-fortress, one never taken; Maiden Speech; &c. In a Maiden assize, the sheriff of the county presents the judge with a pair of white gloves. White gloves symbolise innocence. Maiden also means unspotted, unpolluted, innocent; thus Shakespeare makes Hubert say to the King—

This hand of mine
Is yet a maiden and an innocent hand,
Not painted with the crimson spots of blood.
"King John," iv. 2.

Maiden Lane (London). So called from an image of the Maiden or Virgin Mary, which stood there before the Reformation.

Maiden or Virgin Queen. Elizabeth, queen of England. (1533, 1558-1603.)

Maiden Town. Edinburgh. The tradition is that the maiden daughters of a Pictish king were sent there for protection during a time of intestine war.

Maiden of the Mist. Anne of Geierstein, in Sir Walter Scott's novel called "Anne of Geierstein."

Mainote (2 syl.). Pirates that infest the coast of Attica.

... Like boat
Of island-pirate or Mainote.
Byron, "The Giaour."

Maintain is to hold in the hand; hence to keep, and hence to clothe and feed. (French, main tenir; Latin, manus teneo.)

Maize (1 syl.). According to American superstition, if a damsel finds a blood-red ear of maize, she will have a suitor before the year is over.

Even the blood-red ear to Evangeline brought not her lover.
Longfellow.

Majesty. Henry VIII. was the first English sovereign who was styled "His Majesty." Henry IV. was "His Grace;" Henry VI., "His Excellent Grace;" Edward IV., "His High and Might, Prince;" Henry VII., "His Grace," and "His Highness;" Henry VIII., in the earlier part of his reign, was styled "His Highness." "His Sacred Majesty" was a title assumed by subsequent sovereigns, but was afterwards changed to "Most Excellent Majesty."

Majolica Ware. A pottery originally made in the island of Majorca or Majolica, and lately revived by Mr. Minton.

Makambi. A male idol of the Orongou in Africa. His wife Abiala usurped all power.

Malagigi (in "Orlando Furioso"). Son of Buovo, and brother of Al'diger and Vivian, of Clarmont's race; a wizard knight, and cousin of Rinaldo. (See MAUGIS.)

Mal'agrow'ther (Sir Mungo). An old courtier soured by misfortune, who tries to make every one as discontented as himself.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Mal'akoff (in the Crim'ea). In 1831 a sailor and ropemaker, named Alexander Ivanovitch Malakoff, celebrated for his wit and conviviality, lived at Sebastopol. He had many friends and admirers, but being engaged in a riot, was dismissed the dockyards in which he had been employed. He now opened a liquor shop on the hill outside the town. His old friends gathered round him, and his shop was called the Malakoff. In time other houses were built around, and the Malakoff became a town, which ultimately was fortified; and this was the origin of the famed Malakoff Tower, which caused so much trouble to the allied army in the Crimean War.—Gazette de France.

Malambu'no. The giant, first cousin of queen Magun'cia, of Canday'a, who enchanted Antonomas'ia and her husband and shut them up in the tomb of the deceased queen. The infanta he transformed into a monkey of brass, and the knight into a crocodile. Don Quixote achieved their disenchantment by mounting the wooden horse called Clavile'no.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. iii., c. 45.

Malaprop (Mrs.) in "The Rivals," by Sheridan. (French, mal à propos.) Noted for her blunders in the use of words. "As headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile," is one of her famous similes. (See PARTINGTON.)

Malbec'co. A "cankered, crabbed carl," very wealthy, but miserly and mean. He seems to be the impersonation of self-inflicted torments. He married a young wife named Helenore, who set fire to his house, and eloped with Sir Paridel. Malbecca cast himself over a high rock, and all his flesh vanished into thin air, leaving behind nothing but his ghost, which was metamorphosed into Jealousy.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iii.

Malbrook or MARLBROUGH (Marlbro'), does not date from the battle of Malplaquet (1709), but from the time of the Crusades, 600 years before. According to a tradition discovered by M. de Chateaubriand, the air came from the Arabs, and the tale is a legend of Mambroun, a crusader. It was brought into fashion during the Revolution by Mme. Poitrine, who used to sing it to her royal foster-child, the son of Louis XVI. M. Arago tells us that when M. Monge, at Cairo, sang this air to an Egyptian audience, they all knew it, and joined in it. Certainly the song has nothing to do with the duke of Marlborough, as it is all about feudal castles and Eastern wars. We are told also that the band of Captain Cook, in 1770, was playing the air one day on the east coast of Australia, when the natives evidently recognised it, and seemed enchanted.—Moniteur de l'Armée.

Marlbrouch s'en va-t-en guerre,
Miron-ton, miron-ton, miron-taine;
Marlbrouch s'en va-t-en guerre,
Ne sait quand reviendra,
Il reviendra z'a paques—
Miron-ton, miron-ton, miron-taine ...
Ou à la Trinité.

Malcolm. Eldest son of Duncan, king of Scotland. He was called Can-More (Great-head), and succeeded Macbeth (1056).—Shakespeare, "Macbeth."

Maldine (French). School; so called because at school "on dine assez mal."

Malebolge (4 syl.). The eighth circle of Dante's "Inferno," which contained in all ten bolgi or pits.

Malëcast. The impersonation of lust.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iii.

Maleger (wretchedly thin). Captain of the rabble rout which attack the castle of Temperance. He was "thin as a rake," and cold as a serpent. Prince Arthur attacks him and flings him to the ground, but Maleger springs up with renewed vigour. Arthur now stabs him through and through, but it is like stabbing a shadow; he then takes him in his arms and squeezes him as in a vice, but it is like squeezing a piece of sponge; he then remembers that every time the earl touches the earth his strength is renewed, so he squeezes all his breath out, flings the body over his shoulder, and tosses it into a lake. (See ANTÆOS.)—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Malengin (guile). On his back he carried a net "to catch fools." Being attacked by Sir Artegaal and his iron man, he turned himself first into a fox, then to a bush, then to a bird, then to a hedgehog, then to a snake; but Talus was a match for all his deceits, and killed him.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v. 9.

Malepardus. The castle of Master Reynard the Fox, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Malherbe's Canons of French poetry:

(1) Poetry is to contain only such words as are in common use by well-educated Parisians.

(2) A word ending with a vowel must in no case be followed by a word beginning with a vowel.

(3) One line in no wise is to run into another.

(4) The cæsura must always be most strictly observed.

(5) Every alternate rhyme must be feminine.

Maliom. Mahomet is so called in some of the old romances.

Send five, send six against me. By Maliom I swear, I'll take them all.—"Fierabras."

Malkin. The nickname of Mary, now called Molly. Hence the Maid Marian is so termed.

Malkin. A kitchen wench, now called a Molly, is by Shakespeare termed "the Kitchen Malkin."—"Coriolanus," ii. 1.

Malkin. A scare-crow or figure dressed like a scullion; hence, anything made of rags, as a mop.

Malkin. A Moll or female cat, the male being a "Tom." When the cat mews, the Witch in "Macbeth" calls out "I come, Gray-malkin" (i. i).

Mall or Pall Mall (London). From the Latin pellërë mall'eo (to strike with a mallet or bat). So called because it was where the ancient game of pell-mall used to be played. Cotgrave says: "Palo maille is a game wherein a round box-ball is struck with a mallet through a high arch of iron. He that can do this most frequently wins." It was a fashionable game in the reign of Charles II., and the walk called the Mall was appropriated to it for the king and his court.

Malmesbury Monastery. Founded by Maildulf, Meildulf, or Meldun, an Irishman.

Malmsey Wine is the wine of Malvasia, in Candia.

Thane spyces unsparyly thay spendyde thereafter, Malvesje and muskadelle, thase mervelous dyynkes. "Morte d'Arthur."

Malt, Sermon on, was by John Dod, the thealogist, so called from his famous exposition of the Ten Commandments. He was born at Sheeklach in Cheshire, in 1555, and died in 1615.

Maltese Cross, made thus:

Malthu'sian. A disciple of Malthus, whose political doctrines are laid down in his "Essay on the Principles of Population."

Malthu'sian Doctrine. That population increases more than the means of increasing subsistence does, so that in time, if no check is put upon the increase of population, many must starve or all be ill-fed. Applied to individual nations, like Britain, it intimated that something must be done to check the increase of population, as all the land would not suffice to feed its inhabitants.

Malum, in Latin, means an apple; and "malus, mala, malum," means evil. Southey, in his "Commonplace Book," quotes a witty etymon given by Nicolson and Burn, making the noun derived from the adjective, in allusion, I suppose, to the (?) apple eaten by Eve.

Malum in Se (Latin). What is of itself wrong, and would be so even if no law existed against its commission, as lying, murder, theft.

Malum Prohibitum (Latin). What is wrong merely because it is forbidden, as eating a particular fruit was wrong in Adam and Eve, because they were commanded not to do so.

Malvolio. Steward to Olivia, in Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night."

Mamamouchi. A mock honour. "Better be a country gentleman in England than a foreign Mamamouchi." The honour is conferred on M. Jourdain.—Molière, "Bourgeois Gentilhomme."

Mambri'no's Helmet was of pure gold, and rendered the wearer invulnerable. It was taken possession of by Rinaldo ("Orlando Furioso"). Cervantes tells us of a barber who was caught in a shower, and to protect his hat clapped his brazen basin on his head. Don Quixote insisted that this shaving basin was the enchanted helmet of the Moorish king.

Mam'elon (2 syl., French). A mound in the shape of a woman's breast. These artificial mounds were common in the siege of Sebastopol. (Latin, mamma, a breast.)

Mamelukes (2 syl.) or Mamalukes (Arabic, mamluk, a slave). A name given in Egypt to the slaves of the beys brought from the Caucasus, and formed into a standing army. In 1254, these military "slaves" raised one of their body to the supreme power; and Nouredin Ali, the founder of the Baharites, gave twenty-three sultans; in 1832 the dynasty of the Borjites, also mamluks, succeeded, and was followed by twenty-one successors. Selim I., sultan of Turkey, overthrew the mamluk kingdom in 1517, but allowed the twenty-four beys to be elected from their body. In 1811, Mohammed Ali by a wholesale massacre annihilated the Mamelukes, and became viceroy of Egypt.

Mamma, Mother. The former is Norman-French, and the latter Saxon. (See PAPA.)

Mammet. A puppet, a favourite, an idol. A corruption of Mahomet. Mahometanism being the most prominent form of false religion with which Christendom was acquainted before the Reformation, it became a generic word to designate any false faith, even idolatry, called mammetry.

Mammon. The god of this world. The word in Syriac means riches. (See Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.)

Mammon. In Spenser's "Faëry Queen," Mammon says if Sir Guyon will serve him he shall be the richest man in the world; but the knight says money has no charm for him. Mammon then takes him to his smithy, and tells him he may make what orders he likes, but Guyon declines to make any. The god then offers to give him Philotino to wife, but Guyon will not accept the honour. Lastly he takes him to Proserpine's bower, and tells him to pluck the golden fruit, and rest on the silver stool; Sir Guyon again refuses, and after three days' sojourn in the infernal regions is led back to earth, where he swoons.—ii. 7.

Mammon's Cave. The abode of the Money-god. Sir Guyon visited this cave, and Spenser gives a very full description of it in the "Faery Queen," bk. ii., c. 7.

Sir Epicure Mammon. A worldly sensualist.—Ben Jonson, "The Alchymist."

The Mammon of Unrighteousness. Money. A Scripture phrase (Luke xvi. 9). Mammon was the Syrian god who presided over wealth, similar to Plutus of Greek and Roman mythology.

Mammoth Cave. In Edmonson county, Kentucky—the largest in the world.

Mamour (Ab). The House of Adoration, in the seventh heaven.

Man. Emblematic of St. Matthew, one of the four Evangelists, in allusion to the man which was one of the four elements of Ezekiel's cherub (i. 10).

Man. Average weight, 150 lbs.; height, 69 inches; strength, 420 lbs.

Man Threefold. According to Diogenes Laertius, the body was composed of (1) a mortal part; (2) a divine and ethereal part, called the phrēn; (3) an aerial and vaporous part, called the thumos.

According to the Romans man has a three-fold soul, which at the dissolution of the body resolves itself into (1) the Manēs; (2) the Anima or Spirit; (3) the Umbra. The Manēs went either to Elysium or Tartarus; the Anima returned to the gods; but the Umbra hovered about the body as unwilling to quit it.

According to the Jews, man consists of body, soul, and spirit.

Isle of Man, called by the ancient Britons main-au (little island), Latinised into Manavia. Caesar calls it Mona (i.e., Mon-ah), the Scotch pronunciation of Manau. Mona and Pliny's Monabia are varieties of "Manavia."

Man in Black. Supposed to be Goldsmith's father.—Citizen of the World.

Man in the Iron Mask. (See IRON MASK.)

Man in the Moon. Some say it is a man leaning on a fork, on which he is carrying a bundle of sticks picked up on a Sunday. The origin of this fable is from Num. xv., 32-36. Some add a dog also, thus the Prologue in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" says, "This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorns, presenteth moonshine;" Chaucer says "he stole the bush" (Test. of Cresseide). Another tradition says that the man is Cain, with his dog and thorn-bush; the thorn-bush being emblematic of the thorns and briars of the fall, and the dog being the "foul fiend." Some poets make out the "man" to be the youth Endymion, taken thither by Diana.

Man in the Moon. The nameless person employed in elections to negotiate bribes. Thus the rumour is set flying among the electors that "The Man in the Moon has arrived."

Man of Belial. Any wicked man. Shimei so called David (2 Sam. xvi. 7). The ungodly are called "Children of Belial," or "Sons of Belial." The word Belial means worthlessness.

Man of Blood. David is so called (2 Sam. xvi. 7).

The Puritans applied the term to Charles I., because he made war against his Parliament. Any man of violence.

Man of Feeling. The title of a novel by Henry Mackenzie. His "man of feeling" is named Harley—a sensitive, bashful, kind-hearted, sentimental hero.

Man of Ross. John Kyrle, of Ross, in Herefordshire, immortalised by Pope in his Epistle "On the Use of Riches."

Man of Salt. A man like Aeneas, always "melting into salt tears," called "drops of salt."

This would make a man, a man of salt
To use his eyes for garden waterpots.
Shakespeare, "King Lear," iv. 6.

Man of Sin (2 Thess. ii. 3). The Roman Catholics say the Man of Sin is Antichrist. The Puritans applied the term to the pope of Rome; the Fifth-Monarchy men, to Cromwell; many modern theologians apply it to that "wicked one" (identical with the "last horn" of Dan. vii.) who is to appear immediately before the second advent of Christ, and whom he will destroy with the "breath of his mouth," and the "brightness of his appearing."

Man of Straw. A person without capital. It used to be customary for a number of worthless fellows to loiter about our law-courts, to become false-witness or surety for any one who would buy their services; their badge was a straw in their shoes. Being utterly penniless and without principle, a man of straw became proverbial.

Man of Wax. A model man: like one fashioned in wax. Horace speaks of the "waxen arms of Telephus," meaning model arms, or of perfect shape and colour; and the Nurse says of Romeo, "Why, he's a man of wax" (i. 3), which she explains by saying, "Nay, he's a flower, i' faith, a very flower."

Man of the Hill. A tedious "hermit of the vale," which incumbers the main story of "Tom Jones," by Fielding.

Man of the Sea. (See OLD, &c.)

Man's. A fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

The Count of Mans. Roland, the nephew of Charlemagne; also called Knight of Blaives.

Mana of St. Nicolas of Bari. So Toffania called her poisonous liquid, best known as the Acqua Tofu'na or Acqua di Perugia. (See TOFFANIA.)

Manche (French). Aimer mieux la manche que le bras. Manche is a slang word equivalent to the Indian "buckshish" (q.v.), a gratuity given to a cicerone, cabman, or porter. It is the Italian buona mancia.

Manchester. The first syllable is the Friesic man (a common); and the word means the Roman encampment on the common.

Manchester Poet. Charles Swain. (1803-.)

Manda'mus (Latin). A writ of King's Bench, commanding the person named to do what the writ directs. The first word is "Mandamus" (We command . . .).

Manda'na. A stock name in heroic romance, which generally represents the fate of the world turning on the caprice of some beautiful Mandana or Statira.

Mandarin' is not a Chinese word, but one given by the Portuguese colonists at Macao to the officials called by the natives Khiouping (3 syl.). It is from the verb mandar (to command).

The nine Mandarins are distinguished by the button in their cap:—1, ruby; 2, coral; 3, sapphire; 4, an opaque blue stone; 5, crystal; 6, an opaque white shell; 7, wrought gold; 8, plain gold; and 9, silver.

Mandeville (Bernard). A licentious deistical writer, author of "The Virgin Unmasked," and "Free Thoughts on Religion," in the reign of George II.

Mandiecar'do. A knight whose adventures are recorded by Barahona (c. i. 70-1).

Mandou'sians. Very short swords. So called from a certain Spanish nobleman of the house of Mendo'sa, who brought them into use.

Man'drabul. From gold to nothing, like Man'drabul's offering. Mandrabul having found a gold mine in Samos, offered to Juno a golden ram for the discovery; next year he gave a silver one, then a brazen one, and in the fourth year nothing. The proverb "to bring a noble to nimpence, and nimpence to nothing," carries the same meaning.

Mandrake (Greck, hurtful to cattle.) The root of the mandragora often divides itself in two, and presents a rude appearance of a man. In ancient times human figures were often cut out of the root, and wonderful virtues ascribed to them. It was used to produce fecundity in women (Gen. xxx. 14-16). Some mandrakes cannot be pulled from the earth without producing fatal effects, so a cord used to be fixed to the root, and round a dog's neck, and the dog being chased drew out the mandrake, and died. Another superstition is that when the mandrake is uprooted it utters a scream, in explanation of which Thomas Newton, in his "Herball to the Bible," says, "It is supposed to be a creature having life, engendered under the earth of the seed of some dead person put to death for murder."

Shrieks like mandrakes torn out of the earth.
Shakespeare. "Romeo and Juliet," iv. 3.

Mandrakes called love-apples. From the old notion that they excited amorous inclinations; hence Venus is called Mandragoritis, and the emperor Julian, in his epistles, tells Calixenus that he drank its juice nightly as a love-potion.

He has eaten mandrake. Said of a very indolent and sleepy man, from the narcotic and stupefying properties of the plant, well-known to the ancients.

Give me to drink mandragora . . .
That I might sleep out this great gap of time
My Antony is away.
Shakespeare, "Antony and Cleopatra," i. 5.

Mandrake. Another superstition connected with this plant is that a small dose makes a person vain of his beauty, and conceited; but that a large dose makes him an idiot.

Mandricar'do. King of Tartary, or Seythia, son of Ag'rican. He wore Hector's cuirass, married Dor'alis, and was slain in single combat by Roge'ro.—"Orlando Innamorato," and "Orlando l'arioso."

Manduce (2 syl.). The idol Gluttony, venerated by the Gastrol'aters, people whose god was their belly.

It is a monstrous . . . figure, fit to frighten little children; its eyes are bigger than its belly, and its head larger than all the rest of its body . . . having a goodly pair of wide jaws, lined with two rows of teeth which, by the magic of a small twine . . . are made to clash, chatter, and rattle one against the other, as the jaws of St. Clement's dragon (cal ed. graulin) on St. Mark's procession at Metz.—Kabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 50.

Man'ës. To appease his man'ës. To do when a person is dead what would have pleased him or was due to him when alive. The spirit or ghost of the dead was by the Romans called his man'ës, which never slept quietly in the grave so long as survivors left its wishes unfulfilled. The 19th February was the day when all the living sacrificed to the shades of their dead relations and friends.

Manfred. Count Manfred, son of count Sig'ismund, sold himself to the prince of darkness, and had seven spirits bound to do his bidding, viz., the spirits of "earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds," and the star of his own destiny. He was wholly without human sympathies, and lived in splendid solitude among the Alpine mountains. He once loved the lady As'tarte (2 syl.) who died, but Manfred went to the hall of Arim'anës to see and speak to her phantom, and was told that he would die the following day. The next day the Spirit of his Destiny came to summon him; the proud count scornfully dismissed it, and died.—Byron, "Manfred."

Manger or Manger le morceau. To betray, to impeach, to turn king's evidence. The allusion is to the words of Jesus to the beloved disciple—He will be the traitor "to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it," &c. (John xiii. 26).

Ma'ni. The son of Mundilfori; taken to heaven by the gods to drive the moon-car. He is followed by a wolf, which, when time shall be no more, will devour both Mani and his sister Sol.

Mani, Man'ës, or Manichæus. The greatest Persian painter, who lived in the reign of Shah-pour (Sapor I.). It is said his productions rivalled nature. (226-274.)

Manichæ'ans or Manichees. A religious sect founded by Mani or Manichæus, the Persian painter. It was an amalgamation of the Magian and Christian religions, interlarded with a little Buddhism. In order to enforce his religious system, Mani declared himself to be the Paraclete or Comforter promised by Jesus Christ.

Man'itou. The American-Indian fetish.

Man'lian Orders. Overstrained severity. Manlius Torqua'tus, the Roman consul, gave orders in the Latin war that no Roman, on pain of death, should engage in single combat; but one of the Latins provoked young Manlius by repeated insults, and Manlius slew him. When the young man took the spoils to his father, Torqua'tus ordered him to be put to death for violating the commands of his superior officer.

Manly in the "Plain Dealer," by Wycherly. He is violent and uncouth, but presents an excellent contrast to the hypocritical Olivia (q.v.).

Mr. Manly in "The Provoked Husband," by Vanbrugh and Cibber.

Man-Mountain or Quinbus Fles-trin. So Gulliver was called by the Lilliputians.

Manna. Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari. The name given to a colourless and tasteless poison, sold in phials by a woman of Italy named Tofani, who confessed to having poisoned 600 persons by this liquid.

Man'nering. Colonel or Guy Mannering; Mrs. Mannering, née Sophia Wellwood, his wife; Julia Mannering, their daughter, who married Captain Bertram; Sir Paul Mannering, the colonel's uncle. In Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Guy Mannering."

Manningtree (Essex). Noted for its Whitsun fair, where an ox was roasted whole. Shakespeare makes prince Henry call Falstaff "a roasted Manningtree ox, with the pudding in his belly."—"Henry IV." ii. 4.

You shall have a slave eat more at a meale than ten of the guard; and drink more in two days than all Manningtree does at a Witsun-ale.

Mano'a. The fabulous capital of El Dora'do, the houses of which city were said to be roofed with gold.

Manon Lescaut. A novel by the abbé Prevot. It is the history of a young man possessed of many brilliant and some estimable qualities, but being intoxicated by a fatal attachment he is hurried into the violation of every rule of conduct, and finally prefers the life of a wretched wanderer, with the worthless object of his affection, to all the advantages presented by nature and fortune.

Mansard Roof, also called the curb roof. A roof in which the rafters instead of forming a Λ are broken on each side into an elbow. It was devised by Mansard, the French architect, to give height to attics. (1598-1666.)

Mansfield. The Miller of Mansfield. Henry II. was one day hunting, and lost his way. He met a miller who took him home to his cottage, and gave him a bed with his son Richard. Next morning the courtiers tracked the king to the cottage, and the miller discovered the rank of his guest. The king, in merry mood, knighted his host, who thus became Sir John Cockle. On St. George's day Henry II. invited the three to a royal banquet, and after being amused with their rustic ways, made Sir John "Overseer of Sherwood Forest, with a salary of £300 a year."—Percy, "Reliques."

Mansion. This word has considerably changed its original meaning, which was simply a tent pitched for soldiers on their march, and hence a "day's journey" (Pliny, xii. 14). Subsequently the word was applied to a roadside house for the accommodation of strangers (Suet. Tit. 10).

Mantacci'ni. A charlatan who professed to restore the dead to life.

Mantali'ni (Madame). A fashionable milliner near Cavendish square. Her husband, noted for his white teeth, minced oaths, and gorgeous morning gown, is an exquisite man-milliner, who lives on his wife's earnings.—Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Mantible (Bridge of) consisted of thirty arches of black marble, and was guarded by "a fearful huge giant," slain by Sir Fierabras.

Man'tiger. An heraldic monster, having a tiger's body, and the head of an old man with long spiral horns.

Mantle. The mantle of fidelity. A little boy one day presented himself before king Arthur, and showed him a curious mantle, "which would become no wife that was not leal." Queen Guinever tried it, but it changed from green to red, and red to black, and seemed rent into shreds. Sir Kay's lady tried it, but fared no better; others followed, but only Sir Cradock's wife could wear it.—Percy, "Reliques."

Mantra or Mintra (Persian mythology). A spell, a talisman, by which a person holds sway over the elements and spirits of all denominations.—Wilford.

Man'tuan Swain, swan, or bard. Virgil, a native of Mantua, in Italy. Besides his great Latin epic, he wrote on pastoral and rural subjects.

Man'umit. To set free; properly "to send from one's hand" (e manu mittere). One of the Roman ways of freeing a slave was to take him before the chief magistrate and say, "I wish this man to be free." The licitor or master then turned the slave round in a circle, struck him with a rod across the cheek, and let him go.

Manure (2 syl.) means hand-work (French, man-œuvre), tillage by manual labour. It now means the dressing applied to lands. Milton uses it in its original sense in "Paradise Lost," iv.—

Yon flowery arbour . . . with branches overgrown
That mock our scant manuring.

Ma'ra, in old Runie, a goblin that seized upon men asleep in their beds, and took from them all speech and motion.

Mar'abou Feathers. Feathers of the bird so called, used by ladies for head-gear. There are two species of Marabou stork, which have white feathers beneath their wings and tail especially prized.

Mar'about. A sort of plume worn by ladies; so called from the Marabou stork, whose tail furnishes them. The Marabout hat is a hat adorned with the Marabout feather.

Marabuts (Arabic, frontier inhabitants). An Arab tribe which in 1075 founded a dynasty, put an end to by the Almohads. They form a priestly order greatly venerated by the common people. The Great Marabut ranks next to the king.

Marana'tha (Syriac, the Lord will come—i.e., to execute judgment). A form of anathematising among the Jews. The Romans called a curse or imprecation a devotion—i.e., given up to some one of the gods.

Marbles. The Arundelian Marbles. Some thirty-seven statues and 123 busts with inscriptions, collected by W. Petty, in the reign of James I., in the island of Paros, and purchased of him by lord Arundel, who gave them to the University of Oxford in 1627.

The Elgin Marbles. Fragments of the Parthenon of Athens, built by Phidias, collected by Thomas lord Elgin during his mission to the Ottoman Porte in 1802, and purchased of him by the British Museum, in 1816, for £35,000.

Money and Marbles. Cash and furniture. Marbles is a corruption of the French meubles (furniture).

Marcassin (the prince). From the Italian fairy-tales by Straparola, called "Nights," translated into French in 1535.

Marcella. A fair shepherdess whose story forms an episode in "Don Quixote," by Cervantes.

Marcellina. The daughter of Rocco, jailor of the state prison of Seville. She falls in love with Fidelio, her father's servant, who turns out to be Leonora, the wife of the state prisoner Fernando Florestan. — Beethoven, "Fidelio" (an opera).

March. He may be a rogue, but he's no fool on the march. On the march is the French phrase sur la marche (likewise).

March borrows three days from April.

The first it shall be wind and wet;
The next it shall be snow and sleet;
The third it shall be sleet and freeze;
Shall gar the birds sick to the trees.
The Complaint of Scotland.

March Dust. A bushel of March dust is worth a king's ransom. According to the Anglo Saxon laws, the fine of murder was a sliding scale proportioned to the rank of the person killed. The lowest was £10 and the highest £60; two former was the ransom of a churl, and the latter of a king.

March Hare. Mad as a March hare. Hares in March are very wild.

Marches, boundaries, is the Saxon meare; but marsh, a meadow, is the Saxon mersc, anciently written marash, the French marais, and our morass. The other march is the origin of our marquis, the lord of the march. The boundaries between England and Wales, and between England and Scotland, were called "marches;" the territory between the Ebro and the Pyrenees was called by Charlemagne "the Spanish march," &c.

Riding the Marches—i.e., beating the bounds of the parish (Scotch).

March-pane. A confection of pistachio-nuts, almonds, and sugar; a corruption of the French masse-pain (bread-lumps).

Marchaundes Tale, in Chaucer, is substantially the same as the first Latin metrical tale of Adolus, and is not unlike a Latin prose tale given in the appendix of T. Wright's edition of Æsop's Fables. (See JANUARY and MAY.)

Marchington (Staffordshire) famous for a crumbling short cake. Hence the saying that a man or woman of crusty temper is "as short as Marchington wake-cake."

Marchioness (The). The half-starved girl-of-all-work in "The Old Curiosity Shop," by Charles Dickens.

Mar'cionites (3 syl.). An ascetic Gnostic sect, founded by Marcion in the second century.

Marck (William de la), or "The Wild Boar of Ardennes." A French nobleman, called in French history Sanglier des Ardennes, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in "Quentin Durward." (1445-1485.)

Marcley Hill, Herefordshire, on February 7th, 1571, at six o'clock in the evening, "roused itself with a roar, and by seven next morning had moved forty paces. It kept on the move for three days, carrying with it sheep in their cotes, hedge-rows, and trees; overthrew Kinnaston chapel, and diverted two high roads at least 200 yards from their former route. The entire mass thus moved consisted of twenty-six acres of land, and the entire distance moved was 400 yards."—Speed, "Herefordshire."

Marcos de Obregon. The model of Gil Blas, in the Spanish romance entitled "Relaciones de la Vida del Escudero Marcos de Obregon."

Marcosians. A branch of the Gnostics, so called from the Egyptian Marcus. They are noted for their apocryphal books and religious fables.

Mardle. To waste time in gossip. (Anglo-Saxon, mathelian, to talk; methel, a discourse.)

Mardonius (Captain), in "A King or No King," by Beaumont and Fletcher.

Mare. The Cromlech at Gorwell, Dorsetshire, is called the White Mare; the barrows near Hambleton, the Grey Mare.

Away the mare—i.e., Off with the blue devils, good-bye to care. This mare is the incubus called the night-mare.

To cry the mare (Herefordshire and Shropshire). In harvesting, when the in-gathering is complete, a few blades of corn left for the purpose have their tops tied together. The reapers then place themselves at a certain distance, and fling their sickles at the "mare." He who succeeds in cutting the knot cries out "I have her!" "What have you?" "A mare." "Whose is she?" The name of some farmer whose field has been reaped is here mentioned. "Where will you send her?" The name of some farmer whose corn is not yet harvested is here given, and then all the reapers give a final shout.

To win the mare or lose the halter—i.e., to play double or quits.

The grey mare is the better horse. (See GREY MARE.)

The two-legged mare. The gallows.

Money will make the mare to go.

"Will you lend me your mare to go a mile?"

"No, she is lame leaping over a stile."

"But if you will her to me spare,

You shall have money for your mare."

"Oh, ho! say you so?"

Money will make the mare to go."

Old Glee and Catches.

Whose mare's dead? What's the matter? Thus in "2 Henry IV." when Sir John Falstaff sees Mistress Quickly with the sheriff's officers, evidently in a state of great discomposure, he cries out—

How now? Whose mare's dead? What's the matter? (ii. 1.)

Mare's Nest. To find a mare's nest is to make what you suppose to be a great discovery, but which turns out to be all moonshine. What we call a nightmare was by our forefathers supposed to be the Saxon demon Mara or Marè, a kind of vampire, sitting on the sleeper's chest. These vampires were said to be the guardians of hid treasures, over which they brooded as hens over their eggs, and the place where they sat was termed their nidus or nest. When any one supposes he has made a great discovery, we ask if he has discovered a mare's nest, or the place where the vampire keeps guard over hypothetical treasures.

Why dost thou laugh?

What mare's nest hast thou found?

Beaumont and Fletcher, "Bonduca," v. 2.

Are we to believe that the governor, executive council, the officers, and merchants have been finding mare's nests only?—The Times.

N.B.—In some parts of Scotland they use instead a Skate's Nest. In Gloucestershire a long-winded tale is called a Horse-nest. In Cornwall they say You have found a wee's nest, and are laughing over the eggs. In Devon, nonsense is called a blind mare's nest. Holinshed calls a gallows a foul's nest (iii). In French the corresponding phrase is, Nid de lapin; Nid d'une souris dans l'oreille d'un chat. (See CHAT.)

Marfi'sa. An Indian queen in Bojardo's "Orlando Innamorato," and in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso."

Marfo'rio. A pasquinade (q.v.).

Margan Monastery (Register q.), from 1066 to 1232, published in Gale, 1687.

Margaret, queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, called the "Northern Semiramis." (1353, 1387-1412.)

Margaret. A simple, uncultured girl of wonderful witchery, seduced by Faust. She killed the infant of her shame, was sent to prison where she lost her reason, and was ultimately condemned to death.—Goethe, "Faust."

Ladye Margaret. "The Flower of Teviot," daughter of the duchess Margaret and lord Walter Scott, of Branksome Hall. She was beloved by baron Henry of Cranstown, whose family had a deadly feud with that of Scott. One day the elfin page of lord Cranstown enquired the heir of Branksome Hall, then a lad, into the woods, where he fell into the hands of the Southerners; whereupon 3000 of the English marched against the castle of the widowed duchess; but being told by a spy that Douglas with 10,000 men were coming to the rescue, they agreed to decide by single combat whether the boy was to become king Edward's page, or be delivered up to his mother. The champions to decide this question were to be Sir Richard Musgrave on the side of the English, and Sir William Deloraine on the side of the Scotch. In the combat the English champion was slain, and the boy was delivered to the widow; but it then appeared that the antagonist was not William of Deloraine, but lord Cranstown, who claimed and received the hand of fair Margaret as his reward.—Sir Walter Scott, "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

Lady Margaret's Preacher. A preacher who has to preach a Concio ad clerum before the University, on the day preceding Easter Term. This preachership was founded in 1503 by lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII.

Lady Margaret Professor. A professor of divinity in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1502 by lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII. These lectures are given for the "Voluntary Theological Examination," and treat upon the Fathers, the Liturgy, and the priestly duties. (See NORRISIAN.)

ST. MARGARET. The chosen type of female innocence and meekness.

In Christian art she is represented as a young woman of great beauty, bearing the martyr's palm and crown, or with the dragon as an attribute. Sometimes she is delineated as coming from the dragon's mouth, for the legend says that the monster swallowed her, but on making the sign of the cross he suffered her to quit his maw.

St. Margaret and the dragon. Olybius, governor of Antioch, captivated by the beauty of St. Margaret, wanted to marry her, and as she rejected him with scorn threw her into a dungeon, where the devil came to her in the form of a dragon. Margaret held up the cross, and the dragon fled. Some say it burst asunder.

St. Pela'gia, St. Mari'na, and St. Geruma, are the same person as St. Margaret.

St. Margaret is the patron saint of the ancient borough of Lynn Regis, and on the corporation seal she is represented as standing on a dragon and wounding it with the cross. The inscription of the seal is SVB. MARGARETA. TERITUR. DRACO. STAT. CRUCE. LETA.

Margaret or Marguarite. The daisy; so called from its pearly whiteness, marguarite being the French for a pearl.

The daise, a flour white and redde.
In French called "la belle Margarete."

Margarit'a di Valois married Henri the Bearnais, afterwards Henri IV. of France. During the wedding solemnities, Catherine de Medicis devised the massacre of the French Protestants, and Margarita was at a ball during the dreadful enactment of this device.—Meyerbeer, "Gli Ugonotti" (an opera).

Margate (Kent), is the sea-gate or opening. (Latin, mare; Saxon, mere, &c.)

Margin. In all our ancient English books, the commentary is printed in the margin. Hence Shakespeare—

Her face's own margin did quote such amazes.
"Love's Labour's Lost," ii. 1.

I knew you must be edified by the margin.
"Hamlet," v. 2.

She could pick no meaning... writ in the g'assy margin of such looks.
"Rape of Lucrece."

Margutt ". A low-minded vulgar giant, ten feet high, with enormous appetite and the grossest passions. One day he saw an ape pulling on his boots, and burst with laughter.—"Morganti Maggiorè," by Pulci.

Mari'a. Heroine of Donizetti's opera "La Figlia del Reggimento." She first appears as a vivandière or French suttler-girl, for Sulpizio, the sergeant of the 11th regiment of Napoleon's Grand Army, had found her after a battle, and the regiment adopted her as their daughter. Tonio, a Tyrolean, saved her life, and fell in love with her, and the regiment agreed to his marriage provided he joined the regiment. Just at this juncture the marchioness of Berkenfield claims Maria as her daughter; the claim is allowed, and the vivandière is obliged to leave the regiment for the castle of the marchioness. After a time, the French regiment takes possession of Berkenfield Castle, and Tonio has risen to the rank of a field officer. He claims Maria as his bride, but is told that her mother has promised her hand to the son of a duchess. Maria promises to obey her mother, the marchioness relents, and Tonio becomes the accepted suitor.

Maria. A fair, quick-witted, amiable maiden, whose banns were forbidden by the curate who published them, in consequence of which she lost her reason, and used to sit on the roadside near Moulines, playing vesper hymns to the Virgin all day long. She led by a ribbon a little dog named Silvio, of which she was very jealous, for she had first made a goat her favourite, but the goat had forsaken her. — Sterne, “Sentimental Journey.”

Maria There'sa. Wife of Sancho Panza. She is sometimes called Ma'ria, and sometimes Teresa Panza. — “Don Quixote.”

Mariamites (4 syl.). Worshippers of Mary, the mother of Jesus. They said the Trinity consisted of God the Father, God the Son, and Mary the mother of God.

Marian'a. One of the most lovable of Shakespeare's characters. Her pleading for Angelo is unrivalled. — “Measure for Measure.”

Tennyson has two Marianas among his poems.

Mariana. Daughter of the king of Sicily, beloved by Sir Alexander, one of the three sons of St. George, the patron saint of England. Sir Alexander married her, and was crowned king of Thessaly. — “The Seven Champions of Christendom,” iii. 3.

Ma'rid. An evil jinnee of the most powerful class. — Arabian mythology.

Marigold. So called in honour of the Virgin Mary, and hence the introduction of marigold windows in lady chapels. (See MARYGOLD.)

This riddle, Cuddy, if thou canst, explain
“What flower is that which bears the Virgin's name,
The richest metal added to the same?”
Gay, “Pastoral.”

Mari'na. Wife of Jacopo Fos'cari, son of the doge. — Byron, “The Two Fos'cari.”

Marinda or Maridah. The fair mistress of Haroun-al-Raschid.

Mariner's Compass. The fleur de lis which ornaments the northern radius of the mariner's compass was adopted out of compliment to Charles d'Anjou, whose device it was. He was the reigning king of Sicily when Flavio Gioja the Neapolitan made his improvements in this instrument.

Marines (2 syl.). Empty bottles. The marines are looked down upon by the regular seamen, who consider them useless, like empty bottles. A marine officer was once dining at a mess-table, when the duke of York said to the man in waiting, “Here, take away these marines.” The officer demanded an explanation, when the colonel replied, “They have done their duty well, and are prepared to do it again.”

Marino Faliëro. The forty-ninth doge or chief magistrate of the republic of Venice, elected 1354. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the women assembled at the great civic banquet given by the doge, was kicked off the solajo by order of the duke. In revenge he wrote upon the duke's chair a scurrilous libel against the dogaressa. The insult was referred to the Forty, and the council condemned the young patrician to a month's imprisonment. The doge, furious at this inadequate punishment, joined a conspiracy to overthrow the republic, under the hope and promise of being made a king. He was betrayed by Bertram, one of the conspirators, and was beheaded on the “Giant's Staircase,” the place where the doges were wont to take the oath of fidelity to the republic. — Byron, “Marino Faliëro.”

Mariotte's Law. At a given temperature, the volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure. So called from Ed. Mariotte, a Frenchman, who died 1684.

Maritor'nës (Spanish, bad woman). A vulgar, ugly, stunted servant-wench, whom Don Quixote mistakes for a lord's daughter, and her “hair, rough as a horse's tail,” his diseased imagination fancies to be “silken threads of finest gold.” — “Don Quixote.”

Mark (King). A mythical king of Cornwall; Sir Tristram's uncle. He married Isolde the Fair, but Isolde became passionately enamoured of her nephew, Sir Tristram. The illicit loves of Isolde and Sir Tristram were proverbial in the middle ages.

St. Mark in Christian art is represented as being in the prime of life; sometimes habited as a bishop, and as the historian of the resurrection, accompanied by a winged lion (q.v.). He holds in his right hand a pen, and in his left the Gospel.

The duty-mark on gold or silver articles is some letter of the Alphabet indicating the year when the article was made. Thus in the Goldsmith's Company of London:—From 1716 to 1755 it was Roman capitals, beginning from A and following in succession year after year; from 1756 to 1775 it was Roman small letters, A to U; from 1776 to 1796, Old English letters, A to U; from 1796 to 1815, Roman capitals, A to U; from 1816 to 1835, Roman small letters; from 1836 to 1855, Old English capitals; from 1856 to 1875, small black letters.

The duty-mark on gold and silver articles is the head of the reigning sovereign, and shows that the duty has been paid. This mark is not now placed on watch-cases, &c.

The Hall-mark, stamped upon gold and silver articles, is a leopard's head crowned for London; three lions and a cross for York; a castle with two wings for Exeter; three wheat-sheaves or a dagger for Chester; three castles for Newcastle; an anchor for Birmingham; a crown for Sheffield; a castle and lion for Edinburgh; a tree, salmon, and ring for Glasgow; the fig of Hibernia for Dublin. (See SILVER.)

The Standard-mark of gold or silver is a lion passant for England; a thistle for Edinburgh; a lion rampant for Glasgow; and a harp crowned for Ireland.

Mark Tapley, ever-jolly, who recognises nothing creditable unless it is overclouded by difficulties.—Charles Dickens, "Martin Chuzzlewit."

Markham (Mrs.). A nom de plume of Elizabeth Cartwright, afterwards Mrs. Penrose.

Marl. Latin, argill; German, mär-gel; Spanish and Italian, maria; Armenian, mar; Irish, marla; Welsh, marl.

Marlborough Dog. (See BLenheim DOG.)

Statutes of Marlborough. Certain laws passed in the reign of Henry III., by a parliament held in Marlborough castle.

Marlow. Both Sir Charles Marlow and his son Young Marlow are characters in "She Stoops to Conquer," by Goldsmith. Young Marlow is bashful before ladies, but easy enough before women of low degree.

Mar'mion. Ralph de Wilton being charged with treason, claimed to prove his innocence by the ordeal of battle, and being overthrown by lord Marmion was supposed to be dead, but was picked up by a headsman who nursed him carefully; and being restored to health, he went on a pilgrimage to foreign lands. Now, lord Marmion was betrothed to Constance de Beverley; and De Wilton to lady Clare, daughter of the earl of Gloucester. When De Wilton was supposed to be dead lord Marmion proved faithless to Constance, and proposed to Clare—having an eye especially to her rich inheritance. Clare rejected his suit, and took refuge in the convent of St. Hilda, in Whitby; Constance, on the other hand, took the veil in the convent of St. Cuthbert, in Holy Isle. In time Constance eloped from the convent, but being overtaken was buried alive in the walls of a deep cell. In the meantime lord Marmion was sent by Henry VIII. with a message to James IV. of Scotland, and stopped at the hall of Hugh de Heron for a night. Sir Hugh, at his request, appointed him a guide to conduct him to the king, and the guide wore the dress of a palmer. On his return, lord Marmion hears that lady Clare is in Holy Isle, and commands the abbess of Hilda to release her, that she may be placed under the charge of her kinsman, Fitz Clare, of Tantallon Hall. Here she meets De Wilton, the palmer-guide of lord Marmion. Lord Marmion being killed at the battle of Flodden Field, De Wilton married lady Clare.—Sir Walter Scott.

Lord Marmion. The hero of Scott's poem so called is a purely fictitious character. There was, however, an historic family so called, descendants of Robert de Marmion, a follower of the Conqueror, who obtained the grant of Tamworth, and the manor of Scirelby, in Lincolnshire. He was the first royal champion, and his male issue ceased with Philip Marmion, in the reign of Edward I. Sir John Dymoke, who married Margery, daughter of Joan, the only surviving child of Philip, claimed the office and manor in the reign of Richard II., and they have remained in his male line ever since.

Marmo Lunensë. (See LUNA.)

Ma'ro. Virgil, whose name was Publius Virgilius Maro, was born on the banks of the river Mincio, at the village of Andes, near Mantua.

Sweet Maro's muse, sunk in inclorious rest,
Had silent slept amid the Mincian reeds.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," ii.

Maron or Marron (French). A cat's-paw (q.v.). "Se servir de la patte du chat pour tirer les marrons du feu;" in Italian, "Cavare i marroni dal fuoco colla zampa del gatto."

C'est ne se point commettre à faire de l'éclat
Et tirer les marrons de la patte du chat.
"L'Étourdi," iii. 7.

Mar'onites (3 syl.). A Christian tribe of Syria in the eighth century; so called from the monastery of Maron, on the slopes of Lebanon, their chief seat; so called from John Maron, patriarch of Antioch, in the sixth century.

Maroon. A runaway slave sent to the Calabouço, or place where such slaves were punished, as the Maroons of Brazil. Those of Jamaica are the offspring of runaways from the old Jamaica plantations or from Cuba, to whom, in 1738, the British Government granted a tract of land, on which they built two towns. The word is from the verb "maroon," to set a person on an inhospitable shore and leave him there (a practice common with pirates and buccaneers). The word is a corruption of Cimarron, a word applied by Spaniards to anything unruly, whether man or beast. (See Scott, "Pirate," ch. xxii.)

Maro'zia, daughter of Theodora. The infamous offspring of an infamous mother of the ninth century. Her intrigues have rendered her name proverbial. By one she became the mother of Pope John XI. (See MESSALINA.)

Marp'hisa (in "Orlando Furioso"). Sister of Roge'ro, and a female knight of amazing prowess. She was brought up by a magician, but being stolen at the age of seven, was sold to the king of Persia. The king assailed her virtue when she was eighteen, but she slew him, and seized the crown. She came to Gaul to join the army of Agramant, but hearing that Agramant's father had murdered her mother Galacella, she entered the camp of Charlemagne, and was baptised.

Marplot. A silly, cowardly, inquisitive Paul Pry, in "The Busybody," by Mrs. Centlivre.

Marriages. Carrier's Republican Marriages. A device of wholesale slaughter, adopted by Carrier, pro-consul of Nantes, in the first French Revolution. It consisted in tying men and women together by their hands and feet, and casting them into the Loire. (1794.)

Married Women take their husband's surname. This was a Roman custom. Thus Julia, Octavia, &c., married to Pompey, Cicero, &c., would be called Julia of Pompey, Octavia of Cicero. Our married women sign their names in the same manner, but omit the "of."

Marrow Controversy. A memorable struggle in Scotland between Puritanism and Presbyterianism; so called from a book entitled "The Marrow of Modern Divinity," condemned by the General Assembly in 1720. After several months of bitter controversy the matter fell through, but the controversy was the root of the Secession.

Marrow-bones. Down on your marrow-bones—your knees. That marrow in this phrase is not a corruption of "Mary," meaning the Virgin, is palpable from the analogous phrase, the marrow-bone stage—walking. The leg-bone is the marrow-bone of beef and mutton, and the play is on Marylebone (London).

Marrow-men. The twelve ministers who signed the remonstrance to the General Assembly for condemning the evangelical doctrines of the "Marrow." (See above.) Marry! An oath, meaning By Mary, the Virgin.

Mars. Under this planet "is borne thieves and robbers . . . nyght walkers and quarell pykers, bosters, mockers, and skoffers: and these men of Mars causeth warre, and murder, and batayle. They wyll be gladly smythes or workers of yron . . . lyers, pret swerers . . . He is red and angry . . . a great walker, and a maker of swordes and knyves, and a shedder of mannes blode . . . and good to be a barbour and a blode letter, and to drawe tethe.—"Compost of Ptholomeus."

Mars in Camoëns' "Lusiad" is "divine fortitude" personified. As Bacchus, the evil demon, is the guardian power of Mahometanism, so Mars or divine fortitude is the guardian power of Christianity.

The Mars of Portugal. Alfonso de Albuquerque, viceroy of India. (1452-1515.)

Marseilles' Good Bishop. In 1720 and 1722, the plague made dreadful havoc at Marseilles. The bishop was indefatigable in the pastoral office, and spent his whole time in visiting, relieving, and attending the sick. During the plague of London, Sir John Lawrence, the then lord mayor, was no less conspicuous in his benevolence. He supported 40,000 dismissed servants so long as his fortune lasted, and when he had spent his own money, collected and distributed the alms of the nation. Darwin refers to these philanthropists in his "Loves of the Plants," ii. 433.

Marseillaise (3 syl.). The grand song of the French Revolution. Both words and music were composed by Rouget de Lisle an artillery officer in garrison at Strasbourg, for Dietrich mayor of the town. On July 30th, 1792, the Marseillaise volunteers, invited by Barbaroux at the instance of Madame Roland, marched to Paris singing the favourite song; and the Parisians, enchanted with it, called it the "Hymne des Marseillaise." (Rouget born 1760, died 1836.)

Marsh (Le Marais). The pit of the National Convention, between Mountain benches on one side, and those occupied by the ministerial party and the opposition on the other. These middle men or "flats" were "swamped," or enforcés dans un marais by those of more decided politics. (See PLAIN.)

Marshal means an ostler or groom, a servant to look after one's horse. The original duty of a marshal was to feed, groom, shoe, and physic his master's horse. (Teutonic, marah, a horse, scalc, servant; British, mare, a mare, scal, a boy.)

Marshal of the Army of God, and of Holy Church. The baron Robert Fitzwalter, appointed by his brother barons to command their forces in 1215 to obtain from king John redress of grievances. Magna Charta was the result.

Marsiglio or Marsilius. A Saracen king who plotted the attack upon Roland, under "the tree on which Judas hanged himself." With a force of 600,000 men, divided into three armies, he attacked the paladin and overthrew him, but was in turn overthrown by Charlemagne, and hanged on the very tree beneath which he had arranged the attack.—Turpin, "Chronicles."

Mar'syas. The Phrygian flute-player who challenged Apollo to a contest of skill, and being beaten by the god was flayed alive for his presumption. From his blood arose the river so called. The flute on which Mar'syas played was one Athēna had thrown away, and being filled with the breath of the goddess, discoursed most excellent music. The interpretation of this fable is as follows: A contest long existed between the lutists and the flautists as to the superiority of their respective instruments. The Dorian mode, employed in the worship of Apollo, was performed on lutes; and the Phrygian mode, employed in the rites of Cybēlē, was executed by flutes, the reeds of which grew on the banks of the river Mar'syas. As the Dorian mode was preferred by the Greeks, they said that Apollo beat the flute-player.

Marta'no (in "Orlando Furioso") who decoyed Origilla from Gryphon. He was a great coward, and fled from the tournament amidst the jeers of the spectators. While Gryphon was asleep he stole his armour, went to king Norandi'no to receive the honours due to Gryphon, and then quitted Damascus with Origilla. A'quilant encountered them, and brought them back to Damascus, when Marta'no was committed to the hangman's mercies (books viii., ix.).

Marteau des Hérétiques. Pierre d'Ailly, also called l'Aigle de la France. (1350-1420.)

Martel. The surname given to Charles, natural son of Pépin d'Héristal, for his victory over the Saracens, who had invaded France under Abd-el-Rahman in 732. It is said that Charles "knocked down the foe, and crushed them beneath his axe, as a martel or hammer crushes what it strikes."

Judas Asmonæus for a similar reason was called Maccabæus (the Hammerer).

M. Collin de Plancy says that Charles, the palace mayor, was not called Martel because he martelé (hammered) the Saracens, but because his patron saint was Martellus (or Martin).—Bibliothèque des Légendes.

Avoir martel en tête. To have a bee in one's bonnet, to be crotchety. Martel is a corruption of Martin, an ass, a hobby-horse. M. Hilaire le Gai says, but gives no authority, "Cette expression nous vient des Italiens, car en Italien martello signifie proprement "jalousie."

Ils portent des martels, des capriches.—Brantôme, Des Dames Gallantes.
Telles filles...pourroient bien donner de bons martels à leurs pauvres marys.—Brantôme, Des Dames Gallantes.

Martello Towers. Round towers about forty feet in height, of great strength, and situated on a beach or river; so called from the Italian towers built as a protection against pirates. As the warning was given by striking a bell with a martello or hammer, the towers were called Torri da Martello.

Some say that these towers were so called from a tower at the entrance of St. Fiorenzo, in Corsica. Similar towers were common all along the Mediterranean coast as a defence against pirates. They were erected in the low parts of Sussex and Kent in consequence of the powerful defence made (February 8th, 1794) by Le Tellier at the tower of Mortella, with only thirty-eight men, against a simultaneous sea and land attack—the former led by lord Hood, and the latter by major-general Dundas.

Martha (St.), patron saint of good housewives, is represented in Christian art as clad in homely costume, bearing at her girdle a bunch of keys, and holding a ladle or pot of water in her hand. Like St. Margaret she is accompanied with a dragon bound, but has not the palm and crown of martyrdom. The dragon is given to St. Martha from her having destroyed one that ravaged the neighbourhood of Marseilles.

Martial. Pertaining to Mars, the Roman god of war.

Martin. One of the swallow tribe. Dies derives the word from St. Martin, but St. Martin's bird is the raven. It is most likely murus-teneo, mur'-ten, corrupted into martin. Hence in German it is mauer-schwalbē (the wall swallow).

Martin. The ape, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Martin, in Dryden's allegory of the "Hind and Panther," means the Lutheran party; so called by a pun on the name of Martin Luther.

Chanter or parler d'autre martin. To be obstinate or self-opiniated. Martin means a jack-ass. The more modern expression Avoir martel en tête, to have the obstinacy of a donkey, is a corruption of martin. Another word for a jack-ass is Bernart, and hence the synonymous expressions, Chanter de Bernart, and Parler d'autre Bernart.

Or vos metron el col la hart
Puis parleron d'autre Bernart.

"Le Roman du Renart," ii., p. 75.

Vous parlerés d'autre Martin.

"Le Roman du Renart," iii., p. 53.

For a hair Martin lost his ass. The French say that Martin made a bet that his ass was black; the bet was lost because a white hair was found in its coat.

Girt like Martin of Cambray—in a very ridiculous manner. Martin and Martine are the two figures that strike with their marteaux the hours on the clock of Cambray. Martin is represented as a peasant in a blouse girt very tight about the waist.

St. Martin. Patron of drunkards, to save them from falling into danger. This is a mere accident arising thus: The 11th November (St. Martin's day) is the Vina'lia or feast of Bacchus. When Bacchus was merged by Christians into St. Martin, St. Martin had to bear the ill-repute of his predecessor.

St. Martin's bird. A cock, whose blood is shed "sacrificially" on the 11th of November, in honour of that saint.

St. Martin's cloak. Martin was a military tribune before conversion, and, while stationed at Amiens in midwinter, divided his military cloak with a naked beggar, who craved alms of him before the city gate of Amiens. At night, the story says, Christ himself appeared to the soldier, arrayed in this very garment.

St. Martin's goose. The 11th of November, St. Martin's day, was at one time the great goose-feast of France. The legend is that St. Martin was annoyed by a goose, which he ordered to be killed and served up for dinner. As he died from the repast, the goose has been ever since "sacrificed" to him on the anniversary. The goose is sometimes called by the French "St. Martin's Bird."

St. Martin's jewellery. Counterfeit gems. Upon the site of the old collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand, which was demolished upon the dissolution of the monasteries, a number of persons established themselves and carried on a considerable trade in artificial stones, beads, and jewellery. These Brumma-gem ornaments were called St. Martin's beads, St. Martin's gems, or St. Martin's jewellery, as the case might be.

St. Martin's rings. Imitation gold ones, so called because they were sold chiefly by persons within the collegiate church of St. Martin's-le-Grand.

St. Martin's tree. St. Martin planted a pilgrim's staff somewhere near Utopia; the staff grew into a large tree, which Gargantua pulled up to serve for a mace or club, with which he dislodged king Picrocholle from Clermont Rock.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Faire la St. Martin or Martinier. To feast; because the people used to begin St. Martin's day with feasting and drinking.

Martin Chuzzlewit. Hero of a novel so called, by Charles Dickens.

Martin Drunk. Very intoxicated indeed; a drunken man "sobered" by drinking more. The feast of St. Martin (November 11) used to be held as a day of great debauch. Hence Baxter uses the word Martin as the synonyme of a drunkard:—"The language of Martin is there (in heaven) a stranger."—"Saint's Rest."

Martine (Spanish), Martina (Italian), a sword, and martino, a poignard; a corruption of marteau, a poignard (Italian).

Quiconque aura affaire à moy, il faut qu'il ait affaire à Martine qui me voylà au costé (appellant son espée "Martine") — Br n'ô ne, "Rodomonades Espagnoles," vol. ii., p. 16, col. 2

Martinet. A strict disciplinarian; so called from M. de Martinet, a young colonel in the reign of Louis XIV., who re-modelled the infantry, and was slain at the siege of Doesbourg in 1672 (Voltaire, "Louis XIV.," c. 10). The French still call a cat-o'-nine-tails a "martinet."

Martinmas. His Martinmas will come as it does to every hog—i.e., all must die.

November or Martinmas was the great slaughter-time of the Anglo-Saxons, when bees, sheep, and hogs, whose store of food was exhausted, were killed and salted. Martinmas, therefore, was the slaying time, and the proverb intimates that our slaying-time or day of death will come as surely as that of a hog at St. Martin's-tide. The feast of St. Martin is November 11th.

Martyr (Greek) simply means a witness, but is applied to one who witnesses a good confession with his blood.

The martyr king. Charles I. of England, beheaded January 30th, 1649. He was buried at Windsor, and was called "The White King."

Martyr to Science. Claude Louis, count Berthollet, who determined to test on his own person the effects of carbonic acid on the human frame, and died under the experiment. (1748-1822.)

Marut. God of the wind and tempest.—Hindu mythology.

Marvellous. The marvellous boy. Thomas Chatterton, the poet, author of a volume of poetry entitled "Rowley's Poems," professedly written by Rowley, a monk. (1752-1770.)

Mary.

As the Virgin, she is represented in Christian art with flowing hair, emblematical of her virginity.

As Mater Dolorosa, or Our Lady of Pity, she is represented as somewhat elderly, clad in mourning, head draped, and weeping over the dead body of Christ.

As Our Lady of Dolours, she is represented as seated, her breast being pierced with seven swords, emblematic of her seven sorrows.

As Our Lady of Mercy, she is represented with arms extended, spreading out her mantle, and gathering sinners beneath it.

As The glorified Madonna, she is represented as bearing a crown and sceptre, or a ball and cross, in rich robes and surrounded by angels.

Her seven joys. The Annunciation, Visitation, Nativity, Adoration of the Magi, Presentation in the Temple, Finding Christ amongst the Doctors, and the Assumption.

Her seven sorrows. Simeon's Prophecy, the Flight into Egypt, Christ Missed, the Betrayal, the Crucifixion, the Taking Down from the Cross, and the Ascension when she was left alone.

Mary of lord Byron's poetry is Miss Chaworth, who was older than his lordship. Both Miss Chaworth and lord Byron were under the guardianship of Mr. White. Miss Chaworth married John Musters, generally called Jack Musters; but the marriage was not a happy one, and the parties soon separated. The "Dream" of lord Byron refers to this love affair of his youth.

Mary Blane. A nigger melody introduced by the Ethiopian Serenaders at St. James's Theatre.

Mary Magdalene (St.). Patron saint of penitents, being herself the model penitent of Gospel history.

In Christian art she is represented (1) as a patron saint, young and beautiful, with a profusion of hair, and holding a box of ointment; (2) as a penitent, in a sequestered place, reading before a cross or skull.

Mary-le-bone (London) is not a corruption of Marie la bonne, but "Mary on the bourne" or river, as Holborn is "Old Bourne."

Marygold or Marigold. A million sterling. A plum is £100,000. (See MARIGOLD.)

Mas; plural, Masse. "Mr.," "Messrs.;" as, Mas John King, Masse Fleming and Stebbing. (Master.)

Masaniello. A corruption of Tom MASO ANIELLO, a Neapolitan fisherman who led the revolt of July, 1647. The great grievance was a new tax upon fruit, and the immediate cause of Masaniello's interference was the seizure of his wife (or deaf and dumb sister) for having in her possession some contraband flour. Having surrounded himself with some 150 000 men, women, and boys, he was elected chief of Naples, and for nine days ruled with absolute control. The Spanish viceroy flattered him, and this so turned his head that he acted like a maniac. The people betrayed him, he was shot, and his body flung into a ditch, but next day it was interred with a pomp and ceremony never equalled in Naples (1647).

Auber has an opera on this subject called "La Muette de Portici." (1828.)

Masche-croute (gnaw-crust). A hideous wooden statue carried about Lyons during Carnival. The nurses of Lyons frighten children by threatening to throw them to Masche-croute.

Masdeu (Catalan for God's field). The vineyard not far from Perpignan was anciently so called.

Masetto. A rustic engaged to Zerlina; but Don Giovanni intercepts them in their wedding festivities, and induces the foolish damsel to believe he meant to make her his wife.—Mozart, "Don Giovanni" (an opera).

Mason and Dixon's Line. The southern boundary line which separated the free states of Pennsylvania from what were at one time the slave states of Maryland and Virginia. It lies 39° 43' 26" north latitude, and was run by Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, two English mathematicians and surveyors (between November 15th, 1763, and December 26th, 1767).

Mass. There seems to be no sufficient reason for supposing, with Dr. Hook, "that the word first imported the dismissal of the church assembly, then the assembling of it, then the service, and at last the communion." Such a climax would be very unnatural. Neither can the word be derived from the custom of dismissing the catechumens before the communion service began, for the words "Ite, missa est" (Go, mass is about to begin) quite refute the notion. Ite is the dismissal word, not missa. Without doubt the true etymon is the Saxon mæsse; French, German, and Danish, messe; Low Latin, missa; meaning a "holiday" or "feast," as in Christ-mas, Martin-mas, Candle-mas, Michael-mas. Mass is the feast of the church, when Christians "feed on the body of Christ, their Saviour."

High Mass or "Grand Mass" is sung by choristers, and celebrated with the assistance of a deacon and sub-deacon.

Low Mass is simply read without singing; there is one between these two called the "chanted mass," in which the service is chanted by the priest.

Besides these there are a number of special masses, as the mass of the Bente, mass of the Holy Ghost, mass of the dead, mass of a saint, mass of scarcity, dry mass, votive mass, holiday mass, Ambrosian mass, Gallic mass, mass of the pre-sanctified for Good Friday, missa Mosarabum, &c. &c.

Massacre of the Innocents. Devoting to destruction the "innocent" or useful bills at the end of the sessions, merely for lack of time to pass them. The expression was first used by The Times in 1859. (See BARTHOLOMEW.)

Mass'amore (3 syl.) or Massy More. The principal dungeon of a feudal castle. A Moorish word.

Proximus est carcer subterraneus, sine ut Mauri appellat "Mazmorra."—Old Latin Itinerary.

Master Humphrey. A miserable old gambler, in "The Old Curiosity Shop," by Charles Dickens.

Master Leonard. Grand-master of the nocturnal orgies of the demons. He is represented as a three-horned goat, with black human face. He marked his novitiates with one of his horns.—Middle-age demonology.

Master of Sentences. Pierre Lombard, author of a work called "Sentences," a compilation from the fathers of the leading arguments pro and con, bearing on the hair-splitting theological questions of the middle ages. (1100-1164.)

Master of the Mint. A punning term for a gardener.

Master of the Rolls. A punning term for a baker.

Mastic. A tonic, which promotes appetite, and therefore only increases the misery of a hungry man.

Like the starved wretch that hungry mastic chews,
But cheats himself and fosters his disease.
West, "Triumphs of the Gout" (Lucian).

Mas'todon (Greek, nipple-toothed). An extinct animal of the elephant tribe; so called because the heads of its teeth are pointed like little nipples.

Mat'adore (3 syl., Spanish, a slayer). A name given to a man who is pitted against a bull in the Spanish bull-fights.

Mat'amore (3 syl.). A poltroon, a swaggerer, a major Bobadil (q.v.). A French term composed of two Spanish words, matur-Moros (a slayer of Moors).

Matchlock. The lock of an old-fashioned gun; so called because it was fired with a lighted match.

Maté. Paraguay tea is so called from maté, the vessel in which the herb is in Paraguay infused. These vessels are generally gourds hollowed out, and the herb is called Yerba de maté.

Materialism. The doctrines of a Materialist, who maintains that the soul and spirit are effects of matter. The orthodox doctrine is that the soul is distinct from the body, and is a portion of the Divine essence breathed into the body. A materialist, of course, does not believe in a "spiritual deity" distinct from matter. Tertullian contended that the Bible proves the soul to be "material," and he charges the "spiritual" view to the heretical doctrines of the Platonic school.

Math'isen. One of the three anabaptists who induce John of Leyden to join their rebellion. No sooner is John declared "the prophet-king" than the three faithless rebels betray him to the emperor; but when they enter the banquet-hall to arrest him, they all perish in the burning palace.—Meyerbeer, "Le Prophète" (an opera).

Math'urin (St.). Patron saint of idiots and fools. A pun on his name. (See below).

The madlady of St. Mathurin. Folly, stupidity. A French expression.

"Maturins" in French argot means dice, and "Maturin Plat," a domino.

Ces deux objets doivent leur nom à leur ressemblance avec le costume des Trinitaires (vulgairement appelés Maturins), qui, chez nous, portaient une soutane de serge blanche sur laquelle, quand ils sor aient, ils jetaient un manteau noir.—Francisque Michel.

Matilda. Daughter of lord Robert Fitzwalter. Michael Drayton has a poem of some 670 lines so called.

Matilda. Daughter of Rokeby, and niece of Mortham. She was beloved by Wilfrid, son of Oswald, but loved Redmond, her father's page, who turns out to be Mortham's son.—Scott, "Rokeby".

Matilda. Sister of Gessler; in love with Arnold, a Swiss, who had saved her life when threatened by the fall of an avalanche. After the death of Gessler, who was shot by William Tell, the marriage of these lovers is consummated.—Rossini, "Guglielmo Tell" (an opera).

Rosa Matilda. (See Gifford's "Baviad and Mæviad.")

Matric'ulate means to enrol oneself under a mother. The University is called our alma mater (propitious mother). The students are her alumni (foster-children), and become so by being enrolled in a register after certain forms and examinations. (Latin, matricula, a roll.)

Matthew (St.) in Christian art is represented (1) as an evangelist—an old man with long beard; an angel generally stands near him dictating his gospel. (2) As an apostle, in which capacity he bears a purse in reference to his calling as a publican; sometimes he carries a spear, sometimes a carpenter's rule or square.

In the last of Matthew. At the last gasp, on one's last legs. This is a German expression, and arose thus: A Catholic priest said in his sermon that Protestantism was in the last of Matthew, and being asked what he meant replied, "The last five words of the Gospel of St. Matthew are these: 'the end of this dispensation.'" Of course he quoted the Latin version; ours is less correctly translated "the end of the world."

Matthew Bramble, in Smollett's "Humphry Clinker," is Roderick Random grown old, somewhat cynical by experience of the world, but vastly improved in taste. Chambers says, "Smollett took some of the incidents of the family tour from 'Anstey's New Bath Guide.'"—English Literature, vol. ii.

Matthias (St.) in Christian art is known by the axe or halbert in his right hand—the symbol of his martyrdom. Sometimes he is bearing a stone, in allusion to the tradition of his having been stoned before he was beheaded.

Maudlin. Stupidly sentimental. Maudlin drunk is the drunkenness which is sentimental and inclined to tears. Maudlin slip-slop is sentimental chit-chat. The word is derived from Mary Magdalen, who is drawn by ancient painters with a lackadaisical face, and eyes swollen with weeping.

Maugis. The Nestor of French romance, like Hildebrand in German legend. He was one of Charlemagne's paladins, a magician and champion.

Maugis d'Aygremon. Son of duke Bevis of Aygremon, stolen in infancy by a female slave. As she rested under a white-thorn, a lion and a leopard devoured her, and then killed each other in disputing for the infant. The baho cried lustily, and Oriande la fée, who lived at Roseleur, hearing it, went to the white-thorn and exclaimed, "By the powers above this child is mal gis (badly lapped);" and ever after he was called mau-gis. Oriande took charge of him, and was assisted by her brother Baudris, who taught him magic and necromancy. When grown a man, Maugis achieved the adventure of gaining the enchanted horse Bayard, which understood like a human being all that was said, and took from Anthenor, the Saracen, the sword Flamberge or Floberge. Subsequently he gave both the horse and sword to his cousin Renaud. In the Italian romances, Maugis is called "Malagi'gi" (q.v.); Renaud is called "Renalde" (q.v.); Bevis is called "Buo'vo;" the horse is called "Bayardo;" and the sword, "Fusberta."—Romance of "Maugis d'Aygremon et de Vivian son frère."

Maugrab'in (Hegraddin). Brother of Zuzet Maugrabiu the Bohemian. He appears disguised as Rouge Sanglier, and pretends to be herald from Liège.—Sir Walter Scott, "Quentin Durward."

Mau'gys. A giant who keeps a bridge leading to a castle by a river-side, in which a beautiful lady is besieged. Sir Lybius, one of Arthur's knights, does battle with the giant; the contest lasts a whole summer's day, but terminates with the death of the giant and liberation of the lady.—"Libeaux" (a romance).

Maul. To beat roughly, to batter. The maul was a bludgeon with a leaden head, carried by ancient soldiery. It is generally called a "mall."

Maul. A giant who used to spoil young pilgrims with sophistry. He attacked Mr. Great-heart with a club, and the combat between them lasted for the space of an hour. At length Mr. Great-heart pierced the giant under the fifth rib, and then cut off his head.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Maunciplës Tale. A mediæval version of Ovid's tale about Coro'nis (Met. ii. 543, &c.). Phœbus had a crow which he taught to speak; it was downy white, and as big as a swan. He had also a wife whom he dearly loved, but she was faithless to him. One day when Phœbus came home, his bird 'gan sing "Cuckoo! cuckoo! cuckoo!" Phœbus asked what he meant, and the crow told him of his wife's infidelity. Phœbus was very angry, and seizing his bow shot his wife through the heart; but no sooner did she fall than he repented of his rashness and cursed the bird. "Never more shalt thou speak," said he ; "henceforth thy offspring shall be black." Moral—"Lordlings, by this ensample, take heed what you say ; be no tale-bearer, but—

Wher-so thou comest amongst high or low,
Keep wel thy tonge, and think upon the crow.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales."

Maundrel. A foolish, vapouring gossip. The Scotch say, "Haud your tongue, maundrel." As a verb it means to babble, to prate. In some parts of Scotland the talk of persons in delirium, in sleep, and in intoxication is called maundrel. The term is from Sir John Mandeville, the traveller, who published an account of his travels, full of idle gossip and most improbable events.

Maundy Thursday. The day before Good Friday is so called from the Latin dies mandati (the day of Christ's great mandate). After he had washed his disciples' feet, he said, "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another" (St. John xiii. 34).

Spelman derives it from maund (a basket), because on the day before the great fast all religious houses and good Catholics brought out their broken food in maunds to distribute to the poor. This custom in many places gave birth to a fair, as the Tombland fair of Norwich, held on the plain before the Cathedral close. To maund, accordingly, is a common slang term in present use, meaning to beg. Of course maund (a basket) is derived from "mandatum," being employed to hold the "mandate bread."

Mauri-gasima. An island near Formosa, said to have been sunk in the sea in consequence of the great crimes of its inhabitants.—Kempfer.

Maurita'nia. Morocco and Algiers, the land of the ancient Mauri or Moors.

Mausole'um. One of the seven "wonders of the world ;" so called from Mausolus, king of Caria, to whom Artemis'ia (his wife) erected at Halicarnassos a splendid sepulchral monument B.C. 353. Parts of this sepulchre are now in the British Museum.

The chief mausoleums besides the one referred to above are : the mausoleum of Augustus ; that of Hadrian, now called the castle of St. Angelo at Rome ; that erected in France by Catharine de Medicis to Henry II. ; that of St. Peter the Martyr in the church of St. Eustatius, by G. Balduccio in the fourteenth century ; and that erected to the memory of Louis XVI.

Mauthe Dog. A "spectre hound" that for many years haunted the ancient castle of Peel-town, in the Isle of Man. This black spaniel used to enter the guard-room as soon as candles were lighted, and leave it at day-break. While this spectre-dog was present the soldiers forebore all oaths and profane talk. One day a drunken trooper entered the guard-house alone out of bravado, but lost his speech and died in three days. Sir Walter Scott refers to it in his "Lay of the Last Minstrel," vi.

Mauvaise Honte (French, bad or silly shame). Bashfulness, sheepishness.

Mauvais Ton (French, bad manners). Ill-breeding, vulgar ways.

Mawther. (See MORTHER.)

Maw-worm. A hypocrite ; so called from the character of Maw-worm in "The Hypocrite," by Isaac Bickerstaff.

Max. A huntsman, and the best marksman in Germany. He was betrothed to Agatha, who was to be his bride if he obtained the prize in the annual trial-shot. Having been unsuccessful in his practice for several days, Caspar induced him to go to the wolf's glen at midnight, and obtain seven charmed balls from Sa'miel the Black Huntsman. On the day of contest, the prince bade him shoot at a dove. Max aimed at the bird, but killed Caspar, who was concealed in a tree. The prince abolished in consequence the annual fête of the trial-shot.—Weber, "Der Freischütz" (an opera).

Max'imum and Min'imum. 'The greatest and least amount ; as, the maximum profits or exports, and the minimum profits or exports ; the maximum and minimum price of corn during the year. The terms are also employed in mathematics.

Max'imus or Max'ime (2 syl.). Officer of the prefect Alma'chius, and his cornicular. Being ordered to put Valirian and Tiburc'us to death because they would not worship the image of Jupiter, he took pity on his victims and led them to his own house, where Cecilia was instrumental in his conversion; whereupon he and "all his" house were at once baptised. When Valirian and Tibur'cē were put to death, Maximus declared that he saw angels come and carry them to heaven, whereupon Alma'chius caused him to be beaten with whips of lead "til he his lif gan lete."—Chaucer, "Secounde Nonnes Tale."

May. A lovely girl who married January, an old Lombard baron, sixty years of age. She had a liaison with a young squire named Damyan, and was detected by January; but she persuaded the old fool that his eyes were to blame, and that he was labouring under a great mistake, the effect of senseless jealousy. January believed her words, and "who is glad but he?" for what is better than "a fruitful wife, and a confiding spouse?"—Chaucer, "The Marchaundes Tale," line 9, 121, &c.

May is not derived from Maia, the mother of Mercury, as the word existed long before either Mercury or Maia had been introduced. It is the Latin Maius, i.e., Magius, from the root mag, same as the Sanskrit mah, to grow; and means the growing or shooting month.

May unlucky for weddings. This is a Roman superstition. Ovid says, "The common people profess it is unlucky to marry in the month of May" (Fast., v. 490.). In this month were held the festivals of Bona Dea (the goddess of chastity) and the feasts of the dead.

May-day. Polydore Virgil says that the Roman youths used to go into the fields and spend the Calends of May in dancing and singing, in honour of Flora, goddess of fruits and flowers. The early English consecrated May-day to Robin Hood and the Maid Marian, because the favourite outlaw died on that day. Stowe says the villagers used to set up May-poles, and spend the day in archery, morris-dancing, and other amusements.

May-duke Cherries. Medoc, a district of France, whence the cherries first came to us.

May Meetings. A title applied to the annual gatherings, in May and June, of the religious and charitable societies, to hear the annual reports, and appeals in behalf of continued or increased support. The chief are the British Asylum for Deaf and Dumb Females, British and Foreign Bible Society, British and Foreign School, Children's Refuge, Church Home Mission, Church Missionary Society, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Clergy Orphan Society, Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, Destitute Sailors' Asylum, Field Lane Refuge, Governesses Benevolent Institution, Home and Colonial School Society, Irish Church Missionary Society, London City Mission, Mendicity Society, National Temperance League, Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, Ragged School Union, Religious Tract Society, Royal Asylum of St. Anne's, Sailors' Home, Sunday School Union, Thames Church Missionary Society, United Kingdom Band of Hope, Wesleyan Missionary Society, with many others of similar character.

May-pole. The races in the "Dun-ciad" take place "where the tall May-pole overlooked the Strand." On the spot now occupied by St. Mary-le-Strand, anciently stood a cross. In the place of this cross a May-pole was set up by John Clarges, a blacksmith, whose daughter Ann became the wife of Monk, duke of Albemarle. It was taken down in 1713, and replaced by a new one erected opposite Somerset House. This second May-pole had two gilt balls and a vane on its summit. On holidays the pole was decorated with flags and garlands. It was removed in 1718, and sent by Sir Isaac Newton to Wanstead Park, to support the largest telescope in Europe. (See UNDERSHAFT.)

Captain Baily employed four hackney coaches, with drivers in liveries, to ply at the Maypole in the Strand, fixing his own rates, about the year 1634. Baily's coaches seem to have been the first of what are now called hackney coaches.—Note 1, "The Tatler," iv., p. 415.

May-pole. The duchess of Kendal, mistress of George I.; so called because she was thin and tall as a May-pole.

Mayeux. The stock name in French plays for a man deformed, vain and licentious, brave and witty.

Maying. To go a-maying is to go a-haymaking. (Saxon, mayen, to mow-grass. Hence, math, a mowing; as after-math, the crop which comes up after the hay-harvest.) It is also used for making the May-day holiday. (See MAY-DAY.)

Mayor. The cup and sword of the lord mayor of London were given to Sir

William Walworth by Richard II. for killing Wat Tyler. In "The Nine Worthies of London" (1592) we are told that the mayor first arrested and then stabbed the rebel chief, for which deed—

A costly hat his Highness likewise gave.
That London's "maintenance" might ever be;
A sword also he did ordain to have,
That should be carried still before the mayor
Whose worth deserved succession to the chair.
R. Johnson. (1592)

Mayor of London has the title of "Lord," and is also termed "The Right Honourable." These titles were first allowed him by Edward III. in 1354.

Mayors of the Palace (Maire du Palais). Superintendents of the king's household, and stewards of the royal leudes or companies of France before the accession of the Carolingian dynasty. Being chief magistrates they were called Mora-domes (judges of murder), a word corrupted by the Romans into Major domus, and this Latin was subsequently translated into the French Maire du Palais.

Mazarinades (4 syl.). Violent publications issued against Mazarin, the French minister (1650, &c.).

Mazeppa (Jan) historically was hetman of the Cossacks. He was born of a noble Polish family in Podolia, and became a page in the court of Jan Casimir, king of Poland. While in this capacity he intrigued with Theresa, the young wife of a Podolian count, who discovered the amour, and had the young page lashed to a wild horse, and turned adrift. The horse rushed in mad fury, and dropped down dead in the Ukraine, where Mazeppa was released by a Cossack family, who nursed him carefully in their own hut. In time he became secretary to the hetman, and at the death of the prince was appointed his successor. Peter I. much admired his energy of character, and created him prince of the Ukraine, but in the wars with Sweden Mazeppa deserted to Charles XII., and fought against Russia at the battle of Pultowa. After the loss of this battle, Mazeppa fled to Valentia, and then to Bender. Some say he died a natural death, and others that he was put to death for treason by the czar. Lord Byron makes Mazeppa tell his tale to Charles after the battle of Pultowa. (1649-1749).

Mazer. A cup; so called from the British masarn (maple); like our copuncups in Cambridge, and the loving-cup of the London corporation.

"Bring hither," he said, "the mazers four My noble fathers loved of yore."
Sir Walter Scott, "Lord of the Isles."

Mazikeen or Shedem. A species of beings in Jewish mythology exactly resembling the Arabian Jinn or genii, and said to be the agents of magic and enchantment. When Adam fell, says the Talmud, he was excommunicated for 130 years, during which time he begat demons and spectres, for it is written, "Adam lived 130 years and (i.e., before he) begat children in his own image" (Gen. v. 3).—Rabbi Jeremiah ben Eliezar.

And the Mazikeen shall not come nigh thy tents.
Psalm xci. 5 (Chaldee version).

Swells out like the Mazikeen ass. The allusion is to a Jewish tradition that a servant, whose duty it was to rouse the neighbourhood to midnight prayer, found one night an ass in the street, which he mounted. As he rode along the ass grew bigger and bigger, till at last it towered as high as the tallest edifice, where it left the man, and where next morning he was found.

Mazzi'ni-ism. The political system of Giuseppe Mazzi'ni, the Daniel O'Connell of Italy, who filled almost every sovereign and government in Europe with a panic-terror. His plan was to establish secret societies all over Europe, and organise the several governments into federated republics. He was the founder of what is called "Young Italy," whose watchwords were "Liberty, Equality, and Humanity;" whose motto was "God and the People;" and whose banner was a tri-colour of white, red, and green. (Born at Genoa, 1808.)

Meals. In the fourteenth century breakfast hour was five; dinner, nine; supper, four.—Chaucer's Works.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the breakfast hour was seven; dinner, eleven; supper, six.—Wright, "Domestic Manners."

Towards the close of the sixteenth century dinner advanced to noon.

In Ireland the gentry dined at between two and three in the early part of the eighteenth century.—Swift, "Country Life."

Meal-tub Plot. A plot by Dangerfield against James, duke of York, in 1679; so called because the scheme was kept in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier. Dangerfield subsequently confessed the whole affair was a forgery, and was both whipped and condemned to stand in the pillory.

Mealy-mouthed is the Greek melimuthos (honey-speech). Dr. Johnson says when the mouths of animals are sore they are fed with meal; if this were the derivation, mealy-mouthed should mean having a sore mouth.

Mean'der (3 syl.). To wind; so called from the Meander, a winding river of Phrygia. The "Greek pattern" in embroidery is so called.

Measure for Measure (Shakespeare). The story is taken from a tale in G. Whetstone's "Heptameron," entitled "Promos and Cassandra" (1578). Promos is called by Shakespeare "lord Angelo," and Cassandra is "Isabella." Her brother, called by Shakespeare "Claudio," is named Andrugio in the story. A similar story is given in Giovanni Giraldo Cinthio's third decade of stories.

Meat, Bread. These words tell a tale; both mean food in general. The Italians and Asiatics eat little animal food, and with them the word bread stands for food; so also with the poor, whose chief diet it is; but the English consume meat very plentifully, and this word, which simply means food, almost exclusively implies animal food. In the banquet given to Joseph's brethren, the viceroy commanded the servants "to set on bread" (Gen. xliii. 31). In Ps. civ. 27 it is said of fishes, creeping things, and crocodiles that God giveth "them their meat in due season." (Greek broō, to eat; Welsh maethu, to feed.)

To carry off meat from the graves—i.e., to be poor as a church mouse. The Greeks and Romans used to make feasts at certain seasons, when the dead were supposed to return to their graves. In these feasts the fragments were left on the tombs for the use of the ghosts, and only the poorest of the poor would venture to rob these ghosts of their scraps.

Mec (French). Slang for king, governor, master; méquard, a commander; méquer, to command. All these are derived from the fourbesque word maggio, which signifies God, king, pope, doctor, seigneur, and so on, being the Latin major.

Mecca's Three Idols. Lata, Alo'za, and Menat, all of which Mahomet overthrew.

Mèche (French). Il y a mèche, the same as "Il y a moyen," so the negative Il n'y a pas mèche, there is no possibility. The "Dictionnaire du Bas-langage" says: "Dans le langage typographique, lorsque des ouvriers viennent proposer leurs services dans quelque imprimerie, ils demandent s'il y a mèche—i.e., si l'on peut les occuper. Les compositeurs demandent 's'il y a mèche pour la casse,' et les pressiers demandent 's'il y a mèche pour la presse.'" (Vol. ii., p. 122.)

Soit mis de lant ceste caverne
De nul honneur il n'y a maiche.
"Moralité de la Vindiction de Joseph."

Medam'othi (Greek, never in any place). The island at which the fleet of Pantagruel landed on the fourth day of their voyage, and where they bought many choice curiosities, such as the picture of a man's voice, echo drawn to life, Plato's ideas, the atoms of Epicuros, a sample of Philomela's needlework, and other objects of vertu which could be obtained in no other portion of the globe.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 3.

Médard (St.). Master of the Rain. St. Médard was the founder of the rose-prize of Salency in reward of merit. The legend says, he was one day passing over a large plain, when a sudden shower fell, which wetted every one to the skin except St. Médard; he remained dry as a toast, for an eagle had kindly spread his wings for an umbrella over him, and ever after he was termed Maitre de la Pluie.

S'il pleut le jour de la S. Médard (St June)
Il pleut quarante jours plus tard.

Mede'a. A sorceress, daughter of the king of Colchis. She married Jason, the leader of the Argonauts, whom she aided to obtain the golden fleece.

Medham (the kern). One of Mahomet's swords, taken from the Jews when they were exiled from Medi'na.

Mediæval or Middle Ages begin with the council of Chalcedon (451), and end with the revival of literature in the 15th century, according to the Rev. J. G. Dowling.

Me'dian Apples. Pome-citrons.

Medici'nal Days. The sixth, eighth, tenth, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, &c., of a disease; so called because, according to Hippoc'rates, no "crisis" occurs on these days, and medicine may be safely administered. (See CRISIS.)

Medici'nal Hours. Hours proper for taking medicine, viz., morning fasting, an hour before dinner, four hours after dinner, and bed-time.—Quincy.

Medicine. Father of Medicine. Aretæus of Cappado'cia, who lived at the close of the first and beginning of the second century, and Hippoc'rates of Cos (B.C. 460-357) are both so called.

Medi'na. (Economy, Latin medium, the golden mean.) Step-sister of Elissa and Perissa, but they could never agree upon any subject.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," book ii.

Medina means in Arabic "city." The city so called is "Medinat al Nabi" (city of the prophet).

Mediterranean (Key of the). The fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance.

Me'dium, in the language of spirit-rappers, &c., is some one possessed of "odily force," who puts the question of the interrogator to the "spirit" consulted.

Medo'ra. The betrothed of the Corsair. She died when Conrad the Corsair was imprisoned by the sultan Seyd (Seed).—Byron, "The Corsair."

Medo'ro (in "Orlando Furioso"). A Moorish youth of extraordinary beauty but humble race, a native of Ptolomita; a friend of Dardinello, king of Zuma'ra. After Dardinello was slain, Medo'ro and Clorinda go to bury him. Medo'ro is wounded by some unknown spear. Angelica dresses his wounds, falls in love with him, marries him, and they retire to India, where he becomes king of Cathay in right of his wife.

Medu'sa. Chief of the Gorgons. Her head was cut off by Perseus, and Minerva placed it in her ægis. Every one who looked on this head was instantly changed into stone.

Meerschäum (2 syl., German, sea-froth). This mineral, from having been found on the sea-shore in rounded white lumps, was ignorantly supposed to be sea-froth petrified; but it is a compound of silica, magnesia, lime, water, and carbonic acid. When first dug it lathers like soap, and is used as a soap by the Tartars.

Meg. Mons Meg. An old-fashioned piece of artillery in the castle of Edinburgh, made at Mons, in Flanders. It was considered a palladium by the Scotch. (See LONG MEG.)

Sent awa' our crown, and our sword, and our sceptre, and Mons Meg to be kept by the English in the Tower of London (N.B. It was restored in 1828).—Scott, "Rob Roy," c. xxvii.

A roaring Meg. Any piece of ordnance. Burton says Music is a roaring Meg against melancholy. In Ghent there is a wrought-iron gun named Mad Meg.

Meg Dods. An old landlady in Scott's novel called "St. Ronan's Well."

Meg Merrilies. A half-crazy sibyl or gipsy, in "Guy Mannering," by Sir Walter Scott.

Megalich'thys (Greek, great-fish). A fossil fish of large size, the terror of the pre-Adamite seas.

Megalo'nyx (Greek, big-claw). A fossil mammal, remains of which have been found in Virginia.

Meg'alosaur (4 syl., Greek, great lizard). A fossil land saurian of gigantic size and carnivorous habits. Its remains occur in the Oolite.

Mega'rian School. A philosophical school, founded by Euclid, a native of Meg'ara, and disciple of Socrætes.

Megathe'rium (Greek, great-beast). A gigantic extinct quadruped of the sloth kind.

Me'grims. A corruption of the Greek hemi-crania (half the skull), through the French migraine. A neuralgic affection generally confined to one brow, or to one side of the forehead; whims, fancies.

Meigle, in Strathmore. The place where Guinevere, Arthur's queen, was buried.

Meiny (2 syl.). A company of attendants. (Norman, meignal and mesnie, a household, our menial.)

With that the smiling Kriemhild forth stepped a little space,
And Brunhild and her meiny greeted with gentle grace.

Lettsom's "Nibelungen-lied," stanza 604.

Mejnôun and Leilah. A Persian love tale, the Romeo and Juliet or Pyramus and Thisbe of Eastern romance.

Mel'ancholy. Lowness of spirits, supposed at one time to arise from a redundancy of black bile. (Greek, melas cholê.)

Mel'ancholy Jacques (1 syl.). So Jean Jacques Rousseau was called for his morbid sensibilities and unhappy spirit. (1712-1777.) The expression is from Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 1.

Melan'thon is merely the Greek for Schwarzerde (black earth), the real name of this amiable reformer. (1497-1560.) Similarly Ecclampadius is the Greek version of the German name Hauschein, and Desiderius Erasmus is one Latin and one Greek rendering of the name Gheraerd Gheraerd.

Melan'tius. A brave, honest soldier, who believes every one to be true and honest till convicted of crime, and then is he a relentless punisher.—Beaumont and Fletcher, "The Maid's Tragedy."

Melchisede'cians. Certain heretics in the early Christian Church, who entertained strange notions about Melchisedec. Some thought him superior to Christ, some paid him adoration, and some believed him to be Christ himself or the Holy Ghost.

Meleager. Distinguished for throwing the javelin. He slew the Calydonian boar. It was declared by the fates that he would die as soon as a piece of wood then on the fire was burnt up; whereupon his mother snatched the log from the fire and extinguished it; but after Meleager had slain his maternal uncles, his mother threw the brand on the fire again, and Meleager died.

Mesig'enës (Greek, Melës-born). So Homer is sometimes called, because one of the traditions fixes his birthplace on the banks of the Melës, in Ionia. In a similar way we call Shakespeare the "Bard of Avon."

Mele'tians. The followers of Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt, who is said to have sacrificed to idols in order to avoid the persecutions of Diocletian. A trimmer in religion.

Melia'dus (King). Father of Tristan; he was drawn to a chase "par mal engin et negromance" of a fay who was in love with him, and from whose thralldom he was ultimately released by the power of the great enchanter Merlin.—"Tristan de Leonois," a romance. (1489.)

Melibe'us or Meliüz. A wealthy young man, married to Prudens. One day, when Melibeus "went into the fields to play," some of his enemies got into his house, beat his wife, and wounded his daughter Sophie with five mortal wounds "in her feet, in her hands, in her ears, in her nose, and in her mouth," left her for dead, and made their escape. When Melibeus returned home he resolved upon vengeance, but his wife persuaded him to forgiveness, and Melibeus taking his wife's counsel, called together his enemies, and told them he forgave them "to this effect and to this end, that God of his endleas mercy wole at the tyme of oure deyng forgive us oure giltes, that we have trespassed to him in this wreeched world."—Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales."

N.B.—This prose tale of Melibeus is a literal translation of a French story, of which there are two copies in the British Museum—MS. Reg. 19, c. vii.; and MS. Reg. 19, c. xi.

Melicer'tes (4 syl.). Son of Ino, a sea deity. Ath'amas imagined his wife to be a lioness, and her two sons to be lion's cubs. In his frenzy he slew one of the boys, and drove the other (named Melicertës) with his mother into the sea. The mother became a sea-goddess, and the boy the god of harbours.

Mel'ior. A lovely fairy, who carried off to her secret island Parthen'opex of Blois in her magic bark.—French romance called "Parthenopex de Blois." (12th century.)

Melisen'dra. Charlemagne's daughter, married to his nephew Don Gwyfe'ros. She was taken captive by the Moors, and confined seven years in a dungeon, when Gwyfe'ros rescued her.

Melis'sa (in "Orlando Furioso"). The prophetess who lived in Merlin's cave. Brad'amant gave her the enchanted ring to take to Roge'ro, so assuming the form of Atlantüs she went to Alci'na's island, and not only delivered Roge'ro, but disenchanted all the forms metamorphosed in the island. In book xix. she assumes the form of Rodomont, and persuades Agramant to break the league which was to settle the contest by single combat. A general battle ensues.

Mell Supper. Harvest supper; so called from the French mestier (to mix together), because the master and servants sat promiscuously at the harvest board.

Mellifluous Doctor. St. Bernard, whose writings were called a "river of Paradise." (1091-1153.)

Mel'on. The Mahometans say that the eating of a melon produces a thousand good works.

Être un melon. To be stupid or dull of comprehension. The melon-pumpkin or squash is soft and without heart, hence "Être un melon" is to be as soft as a squash. So also Avoir un cœur de melon or de citrouille means to have no heart at all. Tertullian says of Marcion, the heresiarch, "he has a pumpkin (pep'oem) in the place of a heart (cordis loco). It will be remembered that Thersitès, the railer, calls the Greeks "pumpkins" (peponès).

Melons (French). Children sent to school for the first time; so called because they come from a "hot-bed," and are as delicate as exotics. At St. Cyr, the new-comers are called in school-slang les melons, and the old stagers les anciens.

Melrose Abbey (Register of) from 735 to 1270, published in "Fulman," 1684.

Melusi'na. The most famous of the fées of France. Having enclosed her father in a high mountain for offending her mother, she was condemned to become every Saturday a serpent from her waist downward. When she married Raymond, count of Lusignan, she made her husband vow never to visit her on a Saturday; but the jealousy of the count being excited, he hid himself on one of the forbidden days, and saw his wife's transformation. Melusina was now obliged to quit her mortal husband, and was destined to wander about as a spectre till the day of doom. Some say the count immured her in the dungeon of his castle.

Cri de Mélusine. A sudden scream; in allusion to the scream of despair uttered by the fairy when she discovered the indiscreet visit of her beloved husband. (See above.)

Mélusines (3 syl.). Gingerbread cakes bearing the impress of a beautiful woman "bien coiffée," with a serpent's tail; made by confectioners for the May fair in the neighbourhood of Lusignan, near Poitiers. The allusion is to the transformation of the fairy Melusi'na every Saturday. (See above.)

Melyhalt (Lady). A powerful subject of king Arthur's, whose domains Galiot invaded. She chose Galiot as her lover.

Memnon. Prince of the Ethiopians, who went to the assistance of his uncle Priam, and was slain by Achilles. His mother Eos was inconsolable for his death, and wept for him every morning.

The Greeks used to call the statue of Am'enoph'is, in Thebes, the statue of Memnon. This image, when first struck by the rays of the rising sun, is said to have produced a sound like the snapping asunder of a chord. Poetically, when Eos (morning) kisses her son at daybreak, the hero acknowledges the salutation with a musical murmur. The word is the Egyptian mei-amun, beloved of Ammon.

Memnon bending o'er his broken lyre.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," i. 3.

Memnon. One of Voltaire's novels, designed to show the folly of aspiring to the height of wisdom.

Mem'orable. The Ever Memorable. John Hales, of Eton. (1584-1656.)

Mem'ory. Magliabechi, of Florence, the book-lover, was called "the universal index and living cyclopædia." (1633-1714.)

Bard of Memory. Samuel Rogers, author of "Pleasures of Memory." (1762-1855.)

Men are but Children of a Larger Growth. — Dryden, "All for Love," iv. 1.

Men in Buckram. Hypothetical men existing only in the brain of the imaginer. The allusion is to the vaunting tale of Sir John Falstaff to prince Henry.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," act ii., s. 4.

Men of Kent. (See KENT.)

Me'nah. A large stone worshipped by certain tribes of Arabia between Mecca and Medi'na. This stone, like most other Arabian idols, was demolished in the eighth year of "the flight." The "menah" is simply a rude large stone brought from Mecca, the sacred city, by certain colonists, who wished to carry with them some memento of the Holy Land.

Menal'cas. Any shepherd or rustic. The name figures in the Eclogues of Virgil and the Idyls of Theoc'ritos.

Me'nam. A river of Siam, on whose banks swarms of fire-flies are seen.

Menam'ber. A rocking-stone in the parish of Sithney (Cornwall) which a little child could move. The soldiers of Cromwell thought it fostered superstition, and rendered it immovable.

Mendo'za, the Jew. A prize-fighter who held the belt at the close of the last century, and in 1791 opened the Lyceum in the Strand to teach "the noble art of boxing."

Menela'os (4 syl.). King of Sparta. The elopement of his wife Helen with Paris brought about the Siege of Troy.

Mene'via. St. David's (Wales). A corruption of Henemenew, its old British name.

Meng-tse. The fourth of the sacred books of China; so called from its author, Latinised into Mencius. It is by far the best of all, and was written in the fourth century B.C. Confucius or Kōng-foo-tse wrote the other three: viz., Ta-heo (School of Adults), Chōng-yōng (The Golden Mean), and Lun-yu (or Book of Maxims).

Mother of Meng. A Chinese expression, meaning "an admirable teacher." Meng's father died soon after the birth of the sage, and he was brought up by his mother. (Died B.C. 317.)

Me'nie (2 syl.). A contraction of Marianne.

And maun I still on Menie doat,
And bear the scorn that's in her e'e?
Burns.

Menip'pos, the cynic, called by Lucian "the greatest snarler and snapper of all the old dogs" (cynics).

Men'nonites (3 syl.). The followers of Simons Menno, a native of Friesland, who modified the fanatical views of the Anabaptists. (1496-1561.)

Men'struum means a monthly dissolvent (Latin, mensis), from the notion of the alchemists that it acted only at the full of the moon.

All liquors are called menstruums which are used as dissolvents, or to extract the virtues of ingredients by infusion or decoction.—Quincy.

Mentor. A guide, a wise and faithful counsellor; so called from Mentor, a friend of Ulysses, whose form Minerva assumed when she accompanied Telemachos in his search for his father.—Fénelon, "Télémaque."

Me'nu. Son of Brahma, whose institutes are the great code of Indian civil and religious law.

Mephib'osheth, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Portage.

Mephistoph'elēs. A sneering, jeering, leering tempter. The character is that of a devil in Goethe's "Faust." He is next in rank to Satan.

Mephistophilis. The attendant demon in Marlowe's "Faustus."

There is an awful melancholy about Marlowe's "Mephistophilis, perhaps more expressive than the malignant mirth of that fiend in the renowned work of Goethe.—Hallam.

Mephstophilus. The familiar of Dr. Faustus. The legends of Faustus were at one time so popular that Mephstophilus was a common joocular term of address.

How now, Mephstophilus?
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 1.

Mercador Amante—the basis of our comedy called "The Curious Impertinent"—was by Gaspar de Avila, a Spaniard.

Merca'tor's Projection is Mercator's chart or map for nautical purposes. The meridian lines are at right angles to the parallels of latitude. It is so called because it was devised by Gerhard Kauffmann, whose surname Latinised is Mercator (Merchant). (1512-1594.)

Merchant of Venice (Shakespeare). The story is taken from the "Gesta Roma- no'rum." The tale of the bond is chapter xlviii., and that of the caskets is chapter xcix. Much of the other part of the story is very like a novelletti of Ser. Giovanni. (14th century.)

Mer'cia. The eighth and last kingdom of the heptarchy, between the Thames and the Humber. It was the merc or boundary of the Saxons and free Britons of Wales.

Mercu'rial. Light-hearted and gay, like those born under the planet Mercury. — Astrological notion.

Mercuriale (4 syl., French). An harangue or rebuke; so called from Mercuriale, as the first Wednesday after the great vacation of the Parliament under the old French régime used to be called. On this day the house discussed grievances, and reprimanded members for misconduct.

Mer'cury. Images of Mercury, or rather shapeless posts with a marble head of Mercury on them, used to be erected by the Greeks and Romans where two or more roads met, to point out the way. — Juvenal, viii. 53.

You cannot make a Mercury of every log (Non ex quovis ligno Mercurius fit). That is, not every mind will answer equally well to be trained into a scholar. The proper wood for a statue of Mercury was box-wood — "vel quod hominis pultorem præ se ferat, vel quod materies sit omnium maxime æterna." — Erasmus.

Mercury in astrology "signifieth subtil men, ingenious, inconstant; rymers, poets, advocates, orators, phylosophers, arithmeticians, and busie fellows."

Mercu'tio. A kind-hearted, witty nobleman, kinsman to the prince of Vero'na, in Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." Being mortally wounded by Tybalt, he was asked if he were hurt, and replied "A scratch, a scratch; marry, 'tis enough."

The Mercurio of actors. Lewis, who displayed in acting the combination of the fop and real gentleman.

Mercy. A young pilgrim who accompanied Christiana in her pilgrimage to mount Zion. When she came to the Wicket-gate she swooned from fear of being refused admittance. Mr. Brisk droposed to her, but being told that she was poor, forsook her, and she was afterwards married, in the house of Gaius, to Matthew, the eldest son of Christian and Christiana. — Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Meredith (Owen). The pseudonym of Edward Robert Bulwer Lytton, author of "Chronicles and Characters," in verse. (1834.)

Meri'no Sheep. Sheep under a meri'no or overseer of pasture lands.

Mer'ioneth (Wales) is maereonaeth (a dairy farm).

Merlan (French). A whiting, ora haidresser. Perruquiers are so called because at one time they were covered with flour like whiting prepared for the frying-pan.

M'adressant à un merlan qui filait une perruque sur un peigne de fer. — Chateaubriand, "Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe."

Merlin. Prince of Enchanters; also the name of a romance. He was the son of a damsel seduced by a fiend, but Blaise baptised the infant, and so rescued it from the power of Satan. He died spell-bound by his mistress Vivian in a hawthorn-bush. (See Spenser's "Faëry Queen," Tennyson's "Idyls of the King," and Ellis's "Specimens of Early English Metrical Romances.")

The English Merlin. Lilly, the astrologer, who published two tracts under the assumed name of "Merlinus Anglicus."

Merlo or Melo (Juan de). Born at Castile in the fifteenth century. A dispute having arisen at Esalo'na upon the question whether Hector or Achilles was the braver warrior, the marques de Ville'na called out in a voice of thunder, "Let us see if the advocates of Achilles can fight as well as prate." Presently there appeared in the midst of the assembly a gigantic fire-breathing monster, which repeated the same challenge. Every one shrank back except Juan de Melo, who drew his sword and placed himself before the king (Juan II.) to protect him, for which exploit he was appointed alcaide of Alcala la Real (Grenada). — "Chronica de Don Alvaro de Luna."

Mermaids. Sir James Emerson Tennent, speaking of the dugong, an herbivorous cetacea, says, "Its head has a rude approach to the human outline, and the mother while suckling her young holds it to her breast with one flipper, as a woman holds her infant in her arm. If disturbed she suddenly dives under water, and tosses up her fish-like tail. It is this creature which has probably given rise to the tales about mermaids."

Mermaid. Mary, queen of Scots; so called because of her beauty and intemperate love. Oberon says to Puck—

Thou remember'st
Since once I sat upon a promontory
And heard a mermaid on a dolphin's back
[She married the Dauphin of France.]
Uttering such dulcet and harmonious breath
That the rude sea grew civil at her song.
[The "rude sea" means the Scotch rebels.]
And certain stars shot madly from their spheres
To hear the sea-maid's music.

[The earl of Northumberland, the earl of Westmoreland, and the duke of Norfolk forgot their allegiance to Elizabeth out of love to Mary.]

Shakespeare, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Mermaid's Glove. The largest of British sponges, so called because its branches resemble fingers.

Mer'opë. One of the Pleiads; dimmer than the rest, because she married a mortal.

Merovingian Dynasty. The dynasty of Mer'ovius, a Latin form of Mer-wig (great warrior). Similarly Louis is Clovis, and Clovis is Clot-wig (noted warrior).

Merry (Saxon). The original meaning is not worthful, but active, brisk; hence gallant soldiers were called "merry men;" favourable weather, "merry weather;" brisk wind, "a merry gale;" London was "merry London;" England, "merry England;" Chaucer speaks of the "merry organ at the mass;" Jane Shore is called by Pennant the "merry concubine of Edward IV." (See MERRY-MEN.)

Merry Andrew. So called from Andrew Borde, physician to Henry VIII., &c. To vast learning he added great eccentricity, and in order to instruct the people used to address them at fairs and other crowded places in a very ad captandum way. Those who imitated his wit and drollery, though they possessed not his genius, were called Merry Andrews, a term now signifying a clown or buffoon. Andrew Borde Latinised his name into Andreas Perforatus. (1500-1549.) Prior has a poem on "Merry Andrew."

Merry Dancers. The northern lights, so called from their undulatory motion. The French also call them chèvres dansantes (dancing goats).

Merry Dun of Dover. A large mythical ship, which knocked down Calais steeple in passing through the Straits of Dover, and the pennant, at the same time, swept a flock of sheep off Dover cliffs into the sea. The masts were so lofty that a boy who ascended them would grow grey before he could reach deck again.—Scandinavian mythology.

Merrie England may probably mean "illustrious," from the old Teutonic mer (famous). According to R. Ferguson, the word appears in the names Marry, Merry, Merick; the French Méra, Méreau, Meray, Mériq; and numerous others.—"Teutonic Name-System," p. 368. (See above MERRY.)

Merry-men. A chief calls his followers his merry-men, either "brisk, active" (see MERRY), or "illustrious, renowned." (See above.)

Mr. Merryman, the clown or mountebank at fairs, means Mr. Funny-man, or the man whose business it is to create a laugh.

Merry Monarch. Charles II. (1630, 1660-1685.)

Merse. Berwickshire was so called because it was the mere or frontier of England and Scotland.

Mersenne (2 syl.). The English Mersenne. John Collins, mathematician and physicist, so called from Marin Mersenne, the French philosopher (1624-1683).

Merton College. Founded by Walter de Merton, bishop of Rochester, and lord high chancellor in 1264.

Merton (Tommy). One of the chief characters in the tale of "Sandford and Merton," by Thomas Day.

Meru. A fabulous mountain in the centre of the world, 80,000 leagues high, the abode of Vishnu, and a perfect paradise. It may be termed the Indian Olympus.

Merveilleuse (3 syl., French). The sword of Doolin of Mayence. It was so sharp that when placed edge downwards it would cut through a slab of wood without the use of force.

Mes'merism. So called from Friedrich Anton Mesmer, of Mersburg, in Suabia, who introduced the science into Paris in 1778. (1734-1815.)

Mesopotamia. The true "Mesopotamia" ring ("London Review")—i.e., something high-sounding and pleasing, but wholly past comprehension. The allusion is to the story of an old woman who told her pastor that she "found great support in that comfortable word Mesopotamia."

Messali'na. Wife of the emperor Claudius of Rome. Her name has become a byword for lasciviousness and incontinency. Catharine II. of Russia is called The Modern Messali'na (1729-1796). (See MAROZIA.)

Metalog'icus, by John of Salisbury, the object of which is to expose the absurdity and injurious effects of "wrangling," or dialectics and metaphysics. He says, "Prattling and quibbling the masters call disputing or wrangling, but I am no wiser for such logic."

Metamor'phic Rocks. Those rocks, including gneiss, mica-schist, clay-slate, marble, and the like, which have become more or less crystalline. They were once considered the fundamental strata of the earth's crust.

Met'aphor (Greek, a transfer). It means that the idea is to be transferred from the visible word to the thing signified. Thus, when our Lord called Herod a fox, we are to carry our thoughts from the animal (fox) to the idea which that animal suggests, viz., cunning and deceit.

Metaphys'ics (Greek, after physics). The disciples of Aristotle thought that matter or nature should be studied before mind. The Greek for matter or nature is physis, and the science of its causes and effects physics. Meta-physics is the Greek for "after-physics." Sir James Mackintosh takes a less intentional view of the case, and says the word arose from the mere accident of the compilers who sorted the treatises of Aristotle, and placed that upon mind and intelligence after that upon matter and nature. The science of metaphysics is the consideration of things in the abstract, that is, divested of their accidents, relations, and matter.

Metasta'sio. The real name of this Italian poet was Trapassi (death). He was brought up by Gravina, who Grecised the name. (1693-1782.)

Methodical. Most Methodical Doctor. John Bassol, a disciple of Duns Scotus. (*-1347.)

Meth'odists. A name originally given (1729) by a student of Christ Church to the brothers Wesley and their clique, who used to assemble on given evenings for religious conversation. As the physicians of Rome termed methodici reduced the practice of medicine to a system, so these Wesleyans made all their conduct and all their engagements square with their religious duties.

Primitive Methodists. Founded by Hugh Bourne. (1772-1852.)

Meth'uen Treaty. A commercial treaty between England and Portugal, negotiated by Paul Methuen, in 1703, whereby the Portuguese wines were received at a lower duty than those of France. This treaty was abandoned in 1836.

Meton'ic Cycle. A cycle of ninety-three years, at the end of which period the new moons fall on the same days of the year, and eclipses recur. Discovered by Meton, B.C. 432.

Metra. Qu'en dit Metra (Louis XVI.)? Metra was a noted news-vender of Paris before the Revolution—a notability with a cocked hat, who went about with his hands folded behind his back.

Metropol'itan. A prelate who has suffragan bishops subject to him. The two metropolitans of England are the two archbishops, and the two of Ireland the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin. In the Roman Catholic Church of Great Britain, the four archbishops of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam are metropolitans. The word does not mean the prelate of the metropolis in a secular sense, but the prelate of a "mother city" in an ecclesiastical sense—i.e., a city which is the mother or ruler of other cities. Thus, the bishop of London is the prelate of the metropolis, but not a metropolitan. The archbishop of Canterbury is metropolitānus et primus totius

Anglia, and the archbishop of York primus et metropolitānus Angliæ.

Mettre de la Paille dans ses Souliers or Mettre du foin dans ses bottes. To amass money, to grow rich, especially by illicit gains. The reference is to a practice in the sixteenth century followed by beggars to extort alms.

Des queuands et belistes qui, pour abuser le monde, mettoient de la paille en leurs souliers.—Supplément du Dictionnaire, ch. ix.

Me'um and Tu'um. That which belongs to me and that which is another's. Meum is Latin for "what is mine," and tuum is Latin for "what is thine." If a man is said not to know the difference between meum and tuum, it is a polite way of saying he is a thief.

"Meum est propositum in taberna mori." A famous drinking song, by Walter Mapes, who died in 1210.

Mews. Stables; but properly a place for hawks on the moults. The mulette was an edifice in a park where the officers of venery lodged, and which was fitted up with dog-kennels, stables, and hawkeries. They were called muettes from nue (the slough of anything), especially the horns shed by stags, which were collected and kept in these enclosures.—Lacombe, "Dictionnaire Portatif des Beaux Arts."

Mexitli. Tutelary god of the Aztecs, in honour of whom they named their empire Mexico.—Southey.

Mezentius. King of the Tyrrhenians, who put criminals to death by tying them face to face with dead bodies. So says Virgil, "Æneid," viii. 485.

This is like Mezentius in Virgil... such critics are like dead coals, they may blacken, but cannot burn.—Broom, Preface to "Poems."

Mezzo Reliëvo (med-zo rel-e-a'vo). Moderate relief (Italian). This is applied to figures which project more than those of Basso Reliëvo (q.v.), but less than those of Alto Reliëvo (q.v.).

Mezzo Tinto (Italian, medium tint). So engravings in imitation of Indian-ink drawings are called.

Mezzoromia. An earthly paradise somewhere in Africa, but accessible by only one narrow road. Gaudentio di Lucca discovered this secret road, and resided in this paradise for twenty-five years.—Simon Berington, "Gaudentio di Lucca."

Micawber (Mr. Wilkins). A great speechifier and letter-writer, projector of bubble schemes sure to lead to fortune, but always ending in grief. Notwithstanding his ill success he never despaired, but felt certain that something would "turn up" to make his fortune. Having tried literature and law, physic and parliamentary interest, in vain, he resolved to have a venture in "coals."—Dickens, "David Copperfield."

Micawberism. Conduct similar to that of Mr. Micawber's. (See above.)

Mi'chael. Prince of the celestial armies, commanded by God to drive the rebel angels out of heaven. Ga'briel was next to him in command. (See SEVEN SPIRITS.)

Longfellow, in his "Golden Legend," says he is the presiding spirit of the planet Mercury, and brings to man the gift of prudence.

The planet Mercury, whose place
Is nearest to the sun in space,
Is my allotted sphere;
And with celestial ardour swift
I bear upon my hand the gift
Of heavenly prudence here.

"The Miracle Play," iii.

St. Michael, in Christian art, is sometimes depicted as a beautiful young man with severe countenance, winged, and either clad in white or armour, bearing a lance and shield, with which he combats a dragon. In the final judgment he is represented with scales, in which he weighs the souls of the risen dead.

Michael Angelo. The Michael-Angelo of Battle-scenes. Michael-Angelo Cerquozzi, a native of Rome, famous for his battle-scenes and shipwrecks. (1600-1660)

Michel-Ange des Bamboches. Peter van Laar, the Dutch painter. (1613-1673.)

Michael Angelo of Music. Johann Christoph von Gluck, the German musical composer. (1714-1787.)

Michael Angelo of Sculptors. Pierre Puget, the French sculptor (1623-1694). Also Réué Michael Slodtz (1705-1764).

Michal in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for queen Catharine, wife of Charles II. As Charles II. is called David in the satire, and Michal was David's wife, the name is appropriate.

Michel or Cousin Michael. A German. Michel means a dolt; thus the French call a fool who allows himself to be taken in by thimble-rigs and card tricks mikel. In old French the word mice occurs, meaning a fool. (See MICHON.)

L'Anglais aime à être représenté comme un John Bull; pour nous, notre type est l'Allemand Michel, qui reçoit une larme par derrière et qui demande encore: "Qu'y a-t-il pour votre service?"—Dr. Weber, "De l'Allemagne," &c.

Miching Mallecho. A veiled rebuke; a bad deed probed by disguised means. To *mic*h or meech means to skulk or shrink from sight. Michers are poachers or secret pilferers. Mallecho is a Spanish word meaning an "evil-action;" as a personified name it means a malefactor.—"Hamlet," iii. 2.

Dr. Maginn says it should be munching malicho (much mischief). Spanish, mucho malhecho.

Michon, according to Cotgrave, is a "block, dunce, dolt, jobbernuol, dullard, loggerhead." Probably *mic*hon, mice, miché, and cousin Michel, are all from the Italian miccio, halt or lame. (See MIKE.)

Microcosm (Greek, little world). So man is called by Paracelsus and his followers, from the notion that he is the universe in miniature. The ancients considered the world as a living being; the sun and moon being its two eyes, the earth its body, the ether its intellect, and the sky its wings. When man was looked on as the world in miniature, it was thought that the movements of the world and of man corresponded, and if one could be ascertained, the other could be easily inferred; hence arose the system of astrology, which professed to interpret the events of a man's life by the corresponding movements, &c., of the stars. (See DIAPASON.)

Mic'romeg'as. Voltaire's imitation of "Gulliver's Travels."

Midas. Like Midas, all he touches turns to gold. Said of a person always lucky in his speculations. Midas, king of Phrygia, requested of the gods that everything he touched might be turned to gold. His request was granted, but as his food became gold the moment he touched it, he prayed the gods to take their favour back. He was now ordered to bathe in the Pactolus, and the river ever after rolled over golden sands.

Midas-eared. Without discrimination or judgment. Midas, king of Phrygia, was appointed to judge a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, and gave judgment in favour of the satyr; whereupon Apollo in contempt gave the king a pair of ass's ears. Midas hid them under his Phrygian cap, but his servant who used to cut his hair discovered them, and was so tickled at the "joke," which he durst not mention, that he dug a hole in the earth, and relieved his mind by whispering in it "Midas has ass's ears." Budæus gives a different version. He says that Midas kept spies to tell him everything that transpired throughout his kingdom, and the proverb "that kings have long arms" was changed in his case to "Midas has long ears." "Ex eo in proverbium venit, quod multos otacustas—i.e., auricularios habebat."—"De Asse." (See Pope, "Prologue to Satires.")

Midden. The kitchen midden. The dust-bin. The farmer's midden is the dunghill. The word is Scotch, and probably connected with mud; Danish, modder; Welsh, myrdaw (to wet).

Middle Ages. A term of no definite period, but varying a little with almost every nation. In France it was from Clovis to Louis XI. (481 to 1461). In England, from the Heptarchy to the accession of Henry VII. (409 to 1485). In universal history it was from the overthrow of the Roman empire to the revival of letters (the 5th to the 15th century).

Middlesex. The Middle Saxons—that is, between Essex, Sussex, and Wessex.

Midgard. The abode of the first pair, from whom sprang the human race. It was made of the eyebrows of Ymer, and was joined to Asgard by the rainbow bridge called Bifrost. — Scandinavian mythology.

Asgard is the abode of the celestials.

Utgart is the abode of the giants.

Midgard is between the two—better than Utgard, but inferior to Asgard.

Midgard Sormen (earth's monster). The great serpent that lay in the abyss at the root of the celestial ash.—Scandinavian mythology.

Mid-Lent Sunday is the fourth Sunday in Lent. It is called dominica re- fectio'nis (refection Sunday), because the first lesson is the banquet given by Joseph to his brethren, and the gospel of the day is the miraculous feeding of the five thousand. In England it used to be called Mothering Sunday, from the custom of visiting the mother or cathedral church on that day to make the Easter offering.

Midlo'thian. Sir Walter Scott's "Heart of Midlothian" is a tale of the Porteous mob, in which are introduced the interesting incidents of Effie and Jeanie Deans. Effie is seduced while in the service of Mrs. Saddletree, and is imprisoned for child-murder; but her sister Jeanie obtains her pardon through the intercession of the queen, and marries Reuben Butler.

Midrash'im (sing. Midrash). Jewish expositions of the Old Testament.

Midsummer. 'Tis Midsummer moon with you. You are mad. Thus Olivia says to Malvolio, "Why, this is very midsummer madness."—"Twelfth Night," iii. 4.

Midsummer - Night's Dream. Some of the most amusing incidents of this comedy are borrowed from the "Diana" of Montemayor, a Spanish writer of pastoral romance in the sixteenth century; and probably the "Knights Tale" in Chaucer may have furnished hints to the author.

Midsummer-Night's Dream. Egeus of Athens went to Theseus, the reigning duke, to complain that his daughter Hermia, whom he had commanded to marry Demetrius, refused to obey him, because she loved Lysander. Egeus demanded that Hermia should be put to death for this disobedience, according to the law. Hermia pleaded that Demetrius loved Helena, and that his affection was reciprocated. Theseus had no power to alter the law, and gave Hermia four days' respite to consider the matter, and if then she refused, the law was to take its course. Lysander proposed flight, to which Hermia agreed, and told Helena her intention; Helena told Demetrius, and Demetrius, of course, followed. The fugitives met in a wood, the favourite haunt of the fairies. Now Oberon and Titania had had a quarrel about a changeling boy, and Oberon, by way of punishment, dropped on Titania's eyes during sleep some love-juice, the effect of which is to make the sleeper fall in love with the first thing seen when waking. The first thing seen by Titania was Bottom the weaver, wearing an ass's head. In the meantime king Oberon dispatched Puck to pour some of the juice on the eyes of Demetrius, that he might love Helena, who Oberon thought refused to requite her love. Puck, by mistake, anointed the eyes of Lysander with the juice, and the first thing he saw on waking was not Hermia but Helena. Oberon being told that Puck had done his bidding, to make all sure dropped some of the love-juice on the eyes of Demetrius, and the first person he beheld on waking was Hermia looking for Lysander. In due time the eyes of all were disenchanting, and all went smoothly. Lysander married Hermia, Demetrius married Helena, and Titania gave the boy to her lord, king Oberon.

Midwife means simply a "hired woman." (Anglo-Saxon, med-wif, hired woman; Saxon, wif; Dutch, wyf; German, weib, woman.)

Midwife of men's thoughts. So Soc'ratēs termed himself; and as Mr. Grote observes, "No other man ever struck out of others so many sparks to set light to original thought." Out of his intellectual school sprang Plato and the Dialectic system; Euclid and the Megaric; Aristippos and the Cyrenaic; Antisthenēs and the Cynic; and his influence on the mind was never equalled by any teacher but One, of whom it was said "Never man taught as this man."

Miggs (Miss). Mrs. Varden's maid, and the impersonation of an old shrew. —Dickens, "Barnaby Rudge."

Mignon. The young Italian girl who fell in love with Wilhelm Meister's apprentice, her protector. Her love not being returned, she became insane and died. —Goethe, "Wilhelm Meister."

Mike. To loiter. A corruption of miche, to skulk; whence, micher, a thief, and mickery, theft. (Old Norse, mak, leisure; Swedish, maka; Saxon, mugan, to creep.) (See MICHON.)

Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micher? (loiterer). —Shakespeare, "Henry IV.," ii. 4.

Mil'an. Armed in Milan steel. Milan was famous in the middle ages for its armoury. —Froissart, iv., p. 597.

Mil'ane'se (3 syl.). A native of Milan—i.e., mi-lanv. (Old Italian for middle-land, meaning in the middle of the Lombardian plain.)

Milden'do. The metropolis of Lilliput, the wall of which was two feet and a-half in height, and at least eleven inches thick. The city was an exact square, and two main streets divided it into four quarters. The emperor's palace, called Belfabo'rac, was in the centre of the city. — "Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Lilliput, iv.).

Mildew has nothing to do with either mills or dew. It is the Gaelic mehl-thew (injurious or destructive blight).

Mile'sian Fables. The romances of Antonius Diogenēs, described by Photius, but no longer extant. They were greedily read by the luxurious Sybarites, and appear to have been of a very coarse amatory character. They were compiled by Aristi'dēs, and translated into Latin by Sisen'na, about the time of the civil wars of Ma'rius and Sylla.

The tales of Parthe'nus Nice'us were borrowed from them. The name is from the Milesians, a Greek colony, the first to catch from the Persians their rage for fiction.

Milesian Story or Tale. One very wanton and ludicrous. So called from the "Milesiæ Fab'ule," the immoral tendency of which was notorious. (See above.)

Mill. To fight; not from the Latin milēs, a soldier, but from the noun mill. Grinding was anciently performed by pulverising with a stone or pounding with the hand. To mill is to beat with the fist, as persons used to beat corn with a stone.

Millen'num means simply a thousand years. (Latin, millē, annus.) In Rev. xx. 2, it is said that an angel bound Satan a thousand years, and in verse 4 we are told of certain martyrs who will come to life again, and "reign with Christ a thousand years." "This," says St. John, "is the first resurrection;" and this is what is meant by the millennium.

Miller. To give one the miller is to engage a person in conversation till a sufficient number of persons have gathered together to set upon the victim with stones, dirt, garbage, and all the arms which haste supplies a mob with. (See MILL.)

More water glideth by the mill than wots the miller of ("Titus Andronicus," ii. 1). Many things are done in a house which the master and mistress never dream of.

A Joe Miller. A stale jest. John Mottley compiled a book of facetiæ in the reign of James II., which he entitled "Joe Miller's Jests," from a witty actor of farce during the time that Congreve's plays were in vogue. A stale jest is called a "Joe Miller," implying that it is stolen from Mottley's compilation. (Joe Miller, 1684-1738.)

Miller's eye. Lumps of leavened flour in bread; so called because they are little round lumps like an eye.

To put the miller's eye out. To make broth or pudding so thin that the miller's eye would be put out or puzzled to find the flour.

Miller's Thumb. A small fish, four or five inches long, so called from its resemblance to a miller's thumb, which was broad and round when it was employed to test the quality of flour. The fish is also called Bullhead, from its large head.

Milliner. A corruption of Mil'aner; so called from Mil'an, in Italy, which at one time gave the law to Europe in all matters of taste, dress, and elegance.

Millwood (Sarah). The courtesan who enticed George Barnwell to rob his master and murder his uncle. She spent all his money, then turned him out of doors and impeached him. George Barnwell laid the case at the same time before the lord mayor, and both were hanged. — George Lillo, "George Barnwell."

Milo. An athlete of Croto'na. It is said that he carried through the stadium at Olympia a heifer four years old, and ate the whole of it afterwards. When old he attempted to tear in two an oak-tree, but the parts closed upon his hands, and while held fast he was devoured by wolves.

Milton borrowed from St. Avitus his description of Paradise (book i.), of Satan (book ii.), and many other parts of "Paradise Lost." He also borrowed very largely from Du Bartas (1544-1591), who wrote an epic poem entitled "The Week of Creation," which was translated into almost every European language. (1544-1591.) St. Avitus wrote in Latin hexameters "The Creation," "The Fall," and "The Expulsion from Paradise." (400-525).

Milton. "Milton," says Dryden in the preface to his "Fables," "was the poetical son of Spenser. . . . Milton has acknowledged to me that Spenser was his original."

Milton of Germany. Friedrich G. Klopstock, author of "The Messiah." (1724-1803.) Coleridge says he is "a very German Milton indeed."

Mimir. The Scandinavian god of wisdom, and most celebrated of the giants. The Vaner, with whom he was left as a hostage, cut off his head. Odin embalmed it by his magic art, pronounced over it mystic runes, and ever after consulted it on critical occasions. —Scandinavian mythology.

Mimir's Well. A well in which all wisdom lay concealed. It was at the root of the celestial ash-tree. Mimir drank thereof from the horn Gjallar. Odin gave one of his eyes to be permitted to drink of its waters, and the draught made him the wisest of the gods. —Scandinavian mythology.

Mimo'sa. Niebuhr says the Mimosa "droops its branches whenever any one approaches it, seeming to salute those who retire under its shade."

Mince (French). A bank note. The assignats of the first republic were so called, because the paper on which they were printed was exceedingly thin. — "Dictionnaire du Bas-Langage," ii., p. 139.

Mince Pies at Christmas time are emblematical of the manger in which our Saviour was laid. The paste over the "offering" was made in form of a crutch or hay-rack. (See PLUM-PUDDING.)

Mincing Lane (London). A corruption of Mynchen Lane; so called from the tenements held there by the mynchens or nuns of St. Helen's, in Bishopsgate Street. (Mynchen, Saxon for a nun; myrchery, a nunnery.)

Min'cio or Min'tio. The birth-place of Virgil. The Clitumnus, a river of Umbria, was the residence of Propertius; the Aniois where Horace had a villa; the river Melës, in Ionia, is the supposed birthplace of Homer. Littleton refers to all these in his "Monody on Miss Fortescue."

Minden Boys. The 20th Foot, so called from their noted bravery at Minden, in Prussia, 1st August, 1759.

Minerva. Invita Minerva, without sufficient ability; against the grain. Thus Charles Kean acted comedy avita Minerva, his forte lying another way. Sir Philip Sidney attempted the Horatian metres in English verse avita Minerva, against the grain or genius of the language.

Minerva Press. A printing establishment in Leadenhall Street, London, famous about a century ago for its trashy, ultra-sentimental novels. These novels were remarkable for their complicated plots, and especially for the labyrinths of difficulties into which the hero and heroine got involved before they could get married to each other.

Min'iature (3 syl.). Paintings by the Miniato'ri, a set of monks noted for painting with minium or red lead. The first miniatures were the initial letters of rubrics, and as the head of the Virgin or some other saint was usually introduced into these illuminated letters, the word came to express a small likeness. The best miniature-painters have been Holbein, Nicholas Hilliard, Isaac Oliver and his son Peter, Thomas Flatman, Samuel Cooper and his brother Alexander, &c.

Minims. (Latin, Fratres Min'im'i, least of the brethren). A term of self-abasement assumed by an order of monks founded by St. Francis of Paula, in 1453. The order of St. Francis of Assisi had already engrossed the "humble" title of Fratres Min'o'res (inferior brothers). The superior of the minims is called corrector.

Min'ister means an inferior person, in opposition to magister, a superior. One is connected with the Latin min'us, and the other with magis. Our Lord says, "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister," where the antithesis is well preserved. The minister of a church is the man who serves the parish or congregation; and the minister of the crown is the sovereign's servant.

Minister. Florimond de Remond, speaking of Albert Babinot, one of the disciples of Calvin, says, "He was a student of the Institutes, read at the hall of the Equity-School in Poitiers, and was called la Ministerie." Calvin, in allusion thereto, used to call him "Mr. Minister," whence not only Babinot but all the other clergy of the Calvinistic church were called ministers.

Minna Troil. Eldest daughter of Magnus Troil, the old Udaller of Zetland. Captain Clement Cleveland (Vaughan) the pirate loved her, and Minna reciprocated his affection, but Cleveland was killed by the Spaniards in an encounter on the Spanish main. (See MERTOUN.)—Sir Walter Scott, "The Pirate."

Minnehaha (Laughing-water). The lovely daughter of the old arrow-maker of the Daco'tahs, and wife of Hiawatha. She died of famine. Two guests came uninvited into Hiawatha's wigwam, and the foremost said, "Behold me! I am Famine;" and the other said, "Behold me! I am Fever;" and Minnehaha shuddered to look on them, and hid her face, and lay trembling, freezing, burning, at the looks they cast upon her. "Ah!" cried Laughing-water, "the eyes of Pauguk (death) glare upon me, I can feel his icy fingers clasping mine amidst the darkness," and she died crying "Hiawatha! Hiawatha!"—Longfellow, "Hiawatha."

Min'nésingers. Minstrels. The earliest lyric poets of Germany were so called, because the subject of their lyrics was minne-song (love-ditties). These poets lived in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

Min'ories (London). The cloister of the Minims or rather Minoreesses (nuns of St. Clare). The Minims were certain reformed Franciscans, founded by St. Francis de Paula in the fifteenth century. They went barefooted, and wore a coarse black woollen stuff, fastened with a woollen girdle, which they never put off, day or night. The word is derived from the Latin min'imus (the least), in allusion to the text, "I am less than the least of all saints" (Eph. iii. 8).

Minos. A king and lawgiver of Crete, made at death supreme judge of the lower world, before whom all the dead appeared to give an account of their stewardship, and receive the award of their deeds.

Minotaur (Minos-bull). The body of a man and head of a bull. Theseus slew this monster.

Minot'ti. Governor of Corinth, then under the power of the doge. In 1715 the city was stormed by the Turks, and during the siege one of the magazines in the Turkish camp blew up, killing 600 men. Byron says it was Minotti himself who fired the train, and leads us to infer that he was one of those who perished in the explosion.—Byron, "Siege of Corinth."

Minstrel simply means a servant or minister. Minstrels were kept in the service of kings and princes for the entertainment of guests. James Beattie has a poem in Spenserian verse, called "The Minstrel," divided into two books.

The last minstrel of the English stage. James Shirley, with whom the school of Shakespeare expired. (1594-1666.)

Mint is the Latin minth-a; so called from the fable of Menthë, daughter of Cocy'tus, who was by Proserpine changed into this plant out of jealousy.

Min'uit (French). Enfants de la messe de minuit, pickpockets. Cotgrave gives "night-walking rakehells, such as haunt these nightly rites only to rob and play the knaves."

Min'ute. Make a minute of that. Take a note of it. A law term; a rough draft of a proceeding taken down in minute or small writing is so called; these drafts are afterwards engrossed or written out in large writing.

Min'ute Gun. A signal of distress at sea, or a gun fired at the death of a distinguished individual; so called because a minute elapses between each discharge.

Miol'ner (3 syl., the crusher). The magic hammer of Thor. It would never fail to hit a Troll; would never miss to hit whatever it was thrown at; would always return to the owner of its own accord; and became so small when not in use that it could be put into Thor's pocket.—Scandinavian mythology.

Mir'abel. A travelled, dissipated fellow, who is proof against all the wiles of the fair sex.—Baumont and Fletcher, "Wildgoose Chase."

Miracles.

Vespasian, the Roman emperor, is said to have cured a blind man and a cripple by his touch during his stay in Alexandria.

Mahomet's miracles: He took a scroll of the Koran from the horn of a bull; a white dove came from heaven to whisper in his ear a message from God; he opened the earth and found two jars, one of honey and one of milk, as emblems of abundance; he brought the moon from heaven, made it pass through his sleeve, and return to its place in heaven.

The Abbé Paris, or more correctly François de Paris, the deacon, buried at the cemetery of St. Médard. The numberless cures performed at his tomb are said by Paley to be the best authenticated of any, except those of the Bible.

Edward the Confessor is said to have cured scorbutic diseases with his touch. (See KING'S EVIL.)

Miram'olin. The title of the emperor of Morocco.

Mir'amont. An ignorant, testy old man, an ultra-admirer of learning.—Fletcher, "The Elder Brother."

Miranda. Daughter of Prospero.—Shakespeare, "Tempest."

Mirror of Human Salvation. An extended "Biblia Pauperum" (q.v.) with the subject of the picture explained in rhymes. Called in Latin "Speculum humane salutatio'nis."

The mirror of king Ryence. This mirror was made by Merlin, and those who looked in it saw whatever they wished to see.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. iii.

Reynard's wonderful mirror. This mirror existed only in the brain of Master Fox; he told the queen-lion that whoever looked in it could see what was done a mile off. The wood of the frame was not subject to decay, being made of the same block as king Crampart's magic horse.—"Reynard the Fox," ch. xii.

Mirza. Emir Zulah (prince's son). It is used in two ways by the Persians: when prefixed to a surname it is simply a title of honour, but means a prince of the blood royal when annexed to the surname.

Miscreant (3 syl.) means a false believer (French, mis-creance). A term first applied to the Mahometans. The Mahometans in return call Christians infidels, and associate with the word all that we mean by "miscreants."

Misers. The most renowned are:—

(1) Baron Aguilar or Ephraim Lopes Pereira d'Aguilar, born at Vienna, and died at Islington, worth £200,000. (1740-1802.)

(2) Daniel Dancer. His sister lived with him, and was a similar character, but died before him. (1716-1794.)

(3) Colonel O'Dogherty, though owner of large estates, lived in a windowless hut, which he entered by a ladder that he pulled up after him. His horse was mere skin and bone. He wore an old night-cap for wig, and an old brimless hat. His clothes were made up of patches, and his general appearance was that of extreme destitution.

(4) Sir Harvey Elwes, who died worth £250,000, but never spent more than £110 a-year.

His sister-in-law inherited £100,000, but actually starved herself to death.

Herson John, M.P., an eminent brewer in Southwark, never bought any clothes, never suffered his shoes to be cleaned, and grudged every penny spent in food. (1714-1789.)

(5) Foscoe, farmer-general of Languedoc, who hoarded his money in a secret cellar, where he was found dead.

(6) Thomas Guy, founder of Guy's Hospital. (1644-1724.)

(7) Vulture Hopkins.

(8) Dick Jarrett died worth £10,000, but his annual expenses never exceeded £6. The beer brewed at his christening was drunk at his funeral.

(9) Messrs. Jardin, of Cambridge.

(10) William Jennings, a neighbour and friend of Elwes, died worth £200,000. (1701-1797.)

(11) The Rev. — Jonas, of Blewbury.

(12) John Little left behind him £40,000, 180 wigs, 173 pairs of breeches, and an endless variety of other articles of clothing. His physician ordered him to drink a little wine for his health's sake, but he died in the act of drawing the cork of a bottle.

(13) Ostervault, the French banker, who died of starvation in 1790, possessed of £120,000.

(14) John Overs, a Southwark ferryman.

(15) The king of Patterdale, whose income was £800 a-year, but his expenses never exceeded £30. He lived at the head of lake Ulleswater. His last words were, "What a fortune a man might make if he lived to the age of Mothuselah!" He died at the age of 89.

(16) Guy Willocks, a female miser.

(See EUCLIO, HARPAGON, &c.)

Misererê. (4syl.) Our fifty-first psalm is so called. One of the evening services of Lent is called misererê, because this penitential psalm is sung, after which a sermon is delivered. The under-side of a folding seat in churches is called a misererê; when turned up it forms a ledge-seat sufficient to rest the aged in a kneeling position.

"Misfortune will never leave me till I leave it," was the expression of Charles VII., emperor of Germany. (1742-1745.)

Mishna. Instruction. A word applied by the Jews to the oral law. It is divided into six parts: (1) agriculture; (2) Sabbaths, fasts, and festivals; (3) marriage and divorce; (4) civil and penal laws; (5) sacrifices; (6) holy persons and things. The commentary of the Mishna is called the Talmud. (Hebrew, shana, to learn.)

Misnomers.

Absalom means a Father's Peace, a fatal name for David's rebellious son.

Acid (sour) applied in chemistry to a class of bodies to which sourness is only accidental and by no means a universal character—thus, rock-crystal, quartz, flint, &c., are chemical acids, though no particle of acidity belongs to them.

Go to the ant, thou sluggard. (See ANTS, HONEYCOMB.)

Arabic Figures were not invented by the Arabs, but the Indians.

Black Lead does not contain a single particle of lead, but is composed of carbon and iron.

Black Ness means the "White Headland," a corruption of Blanc Nez.

Blind-worms are no more blind than moles are; they have very quick and brilliant eyes, though somewhat small.

Brazilian Grass does not come from Brazil, or even grow in Brazil, nor is it a grass at all. It consists of strips of a palm leaf (Chamærops argentea), and is chiefly imported from Cuba.

Burgundy Pitch is not pitch, nor is it manufactured or exported from Burgundy. The best is a resinous substance prepared from common frankincense, and brought from Hamburg; but by far the larger quantity is a mixture of rosin and palm-oil.

Catgut is not the gut of cats, but of sheep.

China, as a name for porcelain, gives rise to the contradictory expressions

British China, Sèvres China, Dresden China, Dutch China, Chelsea China, &c.; like wooden mile-stones, iron mile-stones, brass shoe-horns, iron pens, &c.

Cuttle-bone is not bone at all, but a structure of pure chalk once embedded loosely in the substance of certain extinct species of cuttle-fish. It is enclosed in a membranous sac, within the body of the "fish," and drops out when the sac is opened, but it has no connection whatever with the sac or the cuttle-fish.

Cleopatra's Needle was not erected by Cleopatra, nor in honour of that queen, but by Rameses the Great.

Down for adown (the preposition) is a strange instance of caprice, in which the omission of the negative (a) utterly perverts the meaning. The Saxon dun is an upland or hill, and a-dun is its opposite—i.e., a lowland or descent. Going down stairs, really means "going upstairs" or ascending; and for descending we ought to say "Going a-down"—i.e., the contrary of "down" (or up).

Dutch Clocks are not of Dutch, but German (Deutsch) manufacture.

Fox-glove is not the glove of the fox, but of the fays called folk—the little folk's glove; or else from fosco, red.

Fusiliers. These foot-soldiers now carry Enfield rifles, and not fusils.

Galvanised Iron is not galvanised. It is simply iron coated with zinc, and this is done by dipping it in a zinc bath containing muriatic acid.

German Silver is not silver at all, nor was the metallic mixture invented by a German, but has been in use in China time out of mind.

Gothic Architecture is not the architecture of the Goths, but the ecclesiastical style employed in England and France before the Renaissance.

Honey-dew is neither honey nor dew, but an animal substance given off by certain insects, especially when hunted by ants.

Honey Soap contains no honey, nor is honey in any way employed in its manufacture. It is a mixture of palm-oil, soap, and olive-soap, each one part, with three parts of curd soap or yellow soap, scented.

Hydrophobia (Greek, dread of water) applied to mad dogs is incorrect, as they will both lap water and even swim in it.

Indians (American). A blunder of geography on the part of the early discoverers of the New World, who set their faces westward from Europe to find India, and believed they had done so when they discovered America.

Irish Stew is a dish never seen in Ireland.

Japan Lacquer contains no lac at all, but is made from the resin of a kind of nut-tree called Anacardiaceæ.

Jerusalem Artichoke has no connection with Jerusalem, but with the sunflower, girasole, which it resembles.

Kensington Palace is not in Kensington at all, but in the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster.

Kid Gloves are not kid at all, but are made of lamb-skin or sheep-skin.

Longitude and Latitude, the great dimension and little or broad dimension of the earth. According to the ancient notion, the world was bounded on the west by the Atlantic, but extended an indefinite length eastward. It was similarly terminated on the south by the tropic of Cancer, whence it extended northwards, but this extent being much less than that east and west, was called the breadth or latitude.

Louis de Bourbon, bishop of Liège, is made by Sir Walter Scott, in "Quentin Durward," an "old man;" whereas he was only eighteen, and a scholar at Louvain. He made his entry into his see in a scarlet jerkin and cap set jauntily on one side.—A. Dumas, "Charles the Bold."

Lunar Caustic is not a substance from the moon, but is simply nitrate of silver, and silver is the astrological symbol of the moon.

Lunatics are not affected by the changes of the moon more than other invalids. No doubt their disorder has its periodicities, but it is not affected by the moon.

Lycopodium (club-moss) is a corruption of leucopodium or leycopodium, lukos being a "wolf," and leukos "white," and lycopodium is not wolf-powder, but white-powder. A similar instance is seen in the river Lycus (Asia Minor), "wolf-river," instead of Leycus, "white-river," the water being remarkable for its whiteness.

Meerschauum is not petrified "sea-foam," as the word implies, but a composition of silica, magnesia, and water.

Mosaic Gold has no connection with Moses or the metal gold. It is an alloy of copper and zinc, used in the ancient musivum or tessellated work.

Mother of Pearl is the inner layer of several sorts of shell. It is not the mother of pearls, as the name indicates, but in some cases the matrix of the pearl.

Natives; oysters raised in artificial beds. Surely oysters in their own natural beds ought to be called the natives.

Oxygen means the generator of acids, but there are acids of which it is not the base, as hydrochloric acid. Indeed, chemists now restrict the term acid to compounds into which hydrogen enters, and oxy-acids are termed salts.

Pen means a feather. (Latin, penna, a wing.) A steel pen is not a very choice expression.

Philippe VI. of France was called le bien fortuné, but never was name more inappropriate. He was defeated at Sluys (Slu-iz), and again at Cressy; he lost Calais; and a fourth of all his subjects were carried off by the plague called the "Black Death."

Pompey's Pillar, in Alexandria, was neither erected by Pompey, nor yet to Pompey, but either to Septimius Seve'rus or one of the caliphs.

Prussian Blue does not come from Prussia, but is the precipitate of the salt of protoxide of iron with red prussiate of potass.

Rice Paper is not made from rice, but from the pith of Tung-tsau, or hollow-plant, so called because it is hollow when the pith has been pushed out.

Salad Oil is not oil for salads, but oil for cleaning sallets or salades—i.e., helmets.

Salt is no salt at all, and has long been wholly excluded from the class of bodies denominated salts.

Salt of Lemon is in reality a binoxalate of potash, with a little of the quadroxalate.

Salts. The substance of which junk bottles, French mirrors, window-panes, and opera glasses are made is placed among the salts, but analysts have declared the character of this substance to be wholly misunderstood, if it is supposed to be a salt.

Scuttle, to open a hole in a ship, means really to bolt or bar. (See SCUTTLE.)

Sealing Wax is not wax at all, nor does it contain a single particle of wax. It is made of shellac, Venice turpentine, and cinnabar. Cinnabar gives it the deep red colour, and turpentine renders the shellac soft and less brittle.

Slave means noble, illustrious (slavi), but is now applied to the most ignoble and debased. (See BARON.)

Sperm Oil properly means "seed oil" (Latin, sperma), from the notion that it was sperma ceti (the spawn or melt of a whale). The "sperma-ceti" whale is the whale that gives this "seed oil," which is taken chiefly but not wholly from the head.

Tube-rose is no rose, but the tuberous polianth (Polianthes tuberosa).

Turkeys do not come from Turkey, but North America, through Spain, or India. The French call them "dindon"—i.e., d'Inde or coq d'Inde, a term equally incorrect.

Turkey Rhubarb neither grows in Turkey, nor is it exported from Turkey. It grows in the great mountain chain between Tartary and Siberia, and is a Russian monopoly.

Turkish Baths are not of Turkish origin, nor are they baths, but hot-air rooms or thermæ.

Vallambrosa. Milton says—

Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallambrosa. "Paradise Lost," i. 302.

But the trees of Vallambrosa, being pines, do not fall thick in autumn, and the brooks are not strewn with them.

Ventriloquism is not voice from the stomach at all, but from the mouth.

Well-beloved. Louis XIV. A most inappropriate title for this most detestable and detested of all kings.

Whale-bone is no bone at all, nor does it possess any properties of bone. It is a substance attached to the upper jaw of the whale, and serves to strain the water which the creature takes up in large mouthfuls.

Wolf's-bane. A strange corruption. Bane is the Teutonic word for all poisonous herbs. The Greeks, mistaking banes for beans, translated it kuamos, as they did hen-bane (huos-kuamos). Now wolf's-bane is an aconite, with a pale-yellow flower, and therefore called white-bane to distinguish it from the blue aconite. The Greek for white is leukos, hence "leukos-kuamos;" but lukos is the Greek for wolf, and by a blunder leukos-kuamos (white-bean) got muddled into lukos-kuamos (wolf-bean). Now comes in science to make confusion worse confounded. Botanists, seeing the absurdity of calling aconite a bean, restored the original word "bane," but retained the corrupt word lukos (a wolf), and hence we get the name wolf's-bane for white aconite.

* * Several other examples are given under their respective names.

Misprision. Concealment, neglect of. (French, mépris.)

Misprision of clerks. Mistakes in accounts arising from neglect.

Misprision of felony. Neglecting to reveal a felony when known.

Misprision of treason. Neglecting to disclose or purposely concealing a treasonable design.

Miss, Mistress, Mrs. German, meister-ess (master-ess, lady master). Miss used to be written Mis, and is the first syllable of Mistress; Mrs. is the contraction of meisteress, called Mis'ess. Even in the reign of George II. unmarried ladies used to be styled Mrs., as Mrs. Lepel, Mrs. Bellenden, Mrs. Blount, all unmarried ladies. (See "Pope's Letters.")

Early in Charles II.'s reign, Evelyn tells us that "lewd women began to be styled Misse;" now Mistress is more frequently applied to them. (See LAD.)

Mississipp'i Bubble. The French "South-Sea Scheme," and equally disastrous. It was projected by John Law, a Scotchman, and had for its object the payment of the National Debt of France, which amounted to 208 millions sterling, on being granted the exclusive trade of Louisiana, on the banks of the Mississippi. (1717-1720.) (See SOUTH SEA.)

Mistletoe. Shakespeare calls it "the baleful mistletoe" ("Titus Andronicus," ii. 3), in allusion to the Scandinavian story that it was with an arrow made of mistletoe that Balder was slain. (See below.)

The word mistletoe is a corruption of mistel-ta, where mist is the German for "dung," or rather the "droppings of a bird," from the notion that the plant was so propagated, especially by the mistle-thrush. Ta is for tan, Old Norse tein, meaning "a plant" or "shoot."

Kissing under the mistletoe is a relic of Scandinavian mythology. Loki hated Balder, the Apollo of the North, and as "everything that springs from fire, air, earth, and water" had been sworn not to hurt the celestial favourite, the wicked spirit made an arrow of mistletoe, which he gave to blind Höder to test. The god of darkness shot the arrow, and killed Balder. Being restored to life, at the urgent request of the gods and goddesses, the mistletoe was given to the goddess of love to keep, and every one who passed under it received a kiss, to show that the branch was the emblem of love, and not of death.

Mistletoe Bough. The tale referred to in this song, about lord Lovell's daughter, is related by Rogers in his "Italy," where the lady is called "Ginevra." A similar narrative is given by Collet in his "Relics of Literature," and another is among the "Causes Célèbres."

Marwell Old Hall, once the residence of the Seymour and afterwards of the Dacre family, has a similar tradition attached to it, and (according to the "Post Office Directory") "the very chest is now the property of the Rev. J. Haygarth, rector of Upham."

Mistress of the World. Ancient Rome was so called, because all the known world gave it allegiance.

Mistress Roper. The Marines, or any one of them; so called by the regular sailors, because they handle the ropes like girls, not being used to them.

Mita. Sister of Aude, surnamed "the Little Knight of Pearls," in love with Sir Miton de Rennes, Roland's friend. Charlemagne greeted her after a tournament with the Saracens at Fronsac, saying, "Rise, countess of Rennes." Mita and Sir Miton were the parents of Mitaine (q.v.).—"Croquemitaine," xv.

Mitaine. Godchild of Charlemagne; her parents were Mita and Miton, count and countess of Rennes. She went in search of Fear-fortress, and found that it only existed in the minds of the fearful, vanishing into thin air as it was approached by a bold heart and clear conscience. Charlemagne made her for this achievement Roland's squire, and she followed him on her horse Vaillant to Spain, and fell in the attack at Roncesvalles.—"Croquemitaine," pt. iii.

Mite. Sir Matthew Mite. A purse-proud East Indian merchant, who gives his servants the most costly exotics, and overpowers every one with the profusion of his wealth.

Mith'ra or Mith'ras. The highest of the twenty-eight second-class divinities of the ancient Persians, and the ruler of the universe. Sometimes used as a synonym for the sun. The word means friend, and this deity is so called because he befriends man in this life, and protects him against evil spirits after death. He is represented as a young man with a Phrygian cap, a tunic, a mantle on his left shoulder, and lunging a sword into the neck of a bull. (Sanskrit, mitram, a friend.) (See "Thebais," i.)

Mith'ridate (3 syl.). A confection said to be invented by Mithridatēs, king of Pontus and Bithyn'ia, as an antidote to poison. It contains seventy-two ingredients.

What brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop....selling Mithridatum and dragon's water to infected houses.—Knight of the Burning Pestle. (1633.)

Mitre. The episcopal mitre symbolises the cloven tongues of fire which descended on the apostles on the day of Pentecost.

Mitten. The Pardoner's mitten. Whoever put this mitten on would be sure to thrive in all things.

He that his honde put in this metayn,
He shal have multiplying of his grayn,
Whan he hath sown, be it whete or otes,
So that ye offre pans (pence) or ellis grootes.
Chaucer, Prologue to "The Pardoner's Tale."

Mit'timus (Latin). A command in writing to a gaoler, to keep the person named in safe custody. Also a writ for removing a record from one court to another. So called from the first word of the writ, "Mittimus" (i.e., We send . . .).

Mitton. The Chapter of Mitton. So the battle of Mitton was called, because so many priests took part therein. Hailes says that "three hundred ecclesiastics fell in this battle, which was fought September 20th, 1319.

So many priests took part in the fight that the Scots called it the Chapter of Mitton—a meeting of the clergymen belonging to a cathedral being called a chapter.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," x.

Mixon. Better wed over the Mixon than over the Moor. A Cheshire proverb meaning, it is better to marry a Cheshire woman than a Londoner. The road to London was over the Staffordshire moor, and the Mixon is the homestead dunghill. In its extended sense it means, it is better to marry one of your own countrywomen than to marry a foreigner.—Fuller, "Worthies."

Mjölñir (pron. youl-ner). Thor's hammer. (See MJÖLNIR.)

Mnemosynë. Goddess of memory and mother of the nine muses.—Classical mythology.

Moakkibat. A class of angels, according to the Mahometan mythology. Two angels of this class attend every child of Adam from the cradle to the grave. At sunset they fly up with the record of the deeds done since sunrise. Every good deed is entered ten times by the recording angel on the credit or right side of his ledger, but when an evil deed is reported the angel waits seven hours, "if haply in that time the evil-doer may repent."—The Koran.

Moat. (See BATTLE.)

Mob. A contraction of the Latin mobilitas, vulgar (the fickle crowd). The term was first applied to the people by the members of the Green-ribbon Club, in the reign of Charles II.—"Northern Examiner," p. 574.

As mob is mobility, so nob is nobility.

Mob-cap is a plain cap, the same as mob (to dress like a slattern). Hence in "Hamlet" the Player says—

But who, ah wo! had seen the mabled queen
Run bare-foot up and down....

That is, the queen dressed like a slattern, "a clout upon her head, and for a robe a blanket, in the alarm of fear caught up." Probably mop is another form of the same word, and all come from the Latin nappa (a clout), whence our word map [a drawing on cloth], in contradistinction to a cartoon (a drawing on paper).

Mobilize. To render soldiers liable to be moved on service out of the town where they live; to call into active service men enrolled but not bonâ fide on the war establishment.

Mockery. "It will be a delusion, a mockery, and a snare." Thomas lord Denman, in his judgment on the case of O'Counell v. The Queen.

Modality in scholastic philosophy means the mode in which anything exists. Kant divides our judgment into three modalities: (1) Problematic, touching possible events; (2) Assertoric, touching real events; (3) Apodictic, touching necessary events.

Modish (Lady Betty), in "The Careless Husband," by Cibber. The name explains the character. This was Mrs. Oldfield's favourite character, and "The Tatler" (No. 10) accordingly calls this charming actress "Lady Betty Modish." (See NARCISSA.)

Mo'do. The fiend that urges to murder, and one of the five that possessed "poor Tom." (See MAHU.)—Shakespeare, "King Lear," iv. 1.

Modred, in the romance of "The Round Table," is represented as the treacherous knight. He revolts from his uncle Arthur, whose wife he seduced, is mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, and is buried in the island of Avalon.

Sir Modred. The nephew of king Arthur. He hated Sir Lancelot, sowed discord amongst the knights of the Round Table, and tampered with the "lords of the White Horse," the brood that Hengist left. When the king went to chastise Sir Lancelot for tampering with the queen, he left Sir Modred in charge of the kingdom. Modred raised a revolt, and the king was slain in his attempt to quash it.—Tennyson, "Idyls of the King" (Guinevere).

Mo'dus Operandi (Latin). The mode of operation; the way in which a thing is to be done.

Mofus'sil (East Indies). The subordinate divisions of a district; the seat of government being called sudder. Provincial.

To tell a man that fatal charges have been laid against him, and refuse him an opportunity for explanation, this is not even Mofussil justice.—The Times.

Moha'di (Mohammed). The twelfth Imaun, who is said to be living in concealment till Antichrist appears, when he will come again and overthrow the great enemy.

Mohair. A corruption of the German mohr (a Moor). It is the hair of the Ango'r goat, introduced into Spain by the Moors, and thence brought into Germany.

Mohak'abad' (Al). Abu-Rihan, the geographer and astronomer in the eleventh century.

Mohock. A class of ruffians who at one time infested the streets of London. So called from the Indian Mohawks.

One of their "new inventions" was to roll persons down Snow Hill in a tub; another was to overturn coaches on rubbish heaps. (See Gay, "Trivia," iii.)

Mohun. Captain Hill and lord Mohun made a dastardly attack on an actor named Mountford, on his way to Mrs. Bracegirdle's house in Howard Street. Hill was jealous of the actor, and induced the "noble lord" to join him in this "valiant quarrel." Mountford died next day. Hill fled, and was never heard of more; Mohun was tried for his life, but acquitted. (See ISSACHAR.)—Howell, "State Trials," vol. xii., p. 947.

Mohyroneus (Edricius). Said to cure wounds by sympathy. He did not apply his powder to the wounds, but to a cloth dipped in the blood.

Moiré Antique (French) is silk, &c., moiré (watered) in the antique style, or to resemble the materials worn in olden times. The figuring of tin, like frost-work or scales, is called moiré métallique.

Mokan'na. A name given to Hakem ben Haschem, from a veil of silver gauze worn by him. Moore in his "Lalla Rookh" terms him "The Veiled Prophet of Khorrasan." The history of this impostor is given by D'Herbelot. It is said that he killed himself by plunging into a bath of aquafortis.

Molière. The Italian Molière. Carlo Goldoni. (1707-1793.)

The Spanish Molière. Leandro Fernandez Moratin. (1760-1823.)

Molinism. The system of grace and election taught by Louis Molin'a, the Spanish Jesuit. (1535-1600.) The disciples of Molina were called Molinists.

Moll Cut-purse. Mary Frith, a woman of masculine vigour, who not unfrequently assumed a man's attire. She was a notorious thief and cut-purse, who once attacked general Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, for which she was sent to Newgate. She escaped by bribery, and died at last of dropsy in the seventy-fifth year of her age.

Moll Flanders. A woman of extraordinary beauty, born in the Old Bailey. She was twelve years a courtesan, five times a wife, twelve years a thief, eight years a transport in Virginia; but ultimately grew rich, lived honestly, and died a penitent (Charles II.'s reign). (See Daniel Defoe's "Moll Flanders.")

Moll Thomson's Mark, as "Take away this bottle, it has Moll Thomson's mark on it." Moll Thomson is M.T. (empty).

Moll (Kentish). Mary Carlton, commonly known as the German Princess. She was sentenced to transportation, but being found at large, was hanged at Tyburn in 1672.

Molly Maguires. An Irish secret society in North America.

The judge who tried the murderer was elected by the Molly Maguires; the jurors who assisted him were themselves Molly Maguires. A score of Molly Maguires came forward to swear that the assassin was sixty miles from the spot on which he had been seen to fire at William Dunn... and the jurors returned a verdict of Not guilty.—W. H. Pworth Dixon, "New America," ii. 23.

Molly Mog. This celebrated beauty was an innkeeper's daughter, at Oakingham, Berks. She was the toast of all the gay sparks in the former half of the eighteenth century, and died in 1766, at an advanced age. Gay has a ballad on this "Fair Maid of the Inn."

Molly Mog died at the age of sixty-seven, a spinster. Mr. Standen, of Arborfield, the enamoured swain alluded to in the ballad, died 1730. It is said that Molly's sister Sally was the greater beauty. A portrait of Gay still hangs in the inn.

Molmu'tius. A mythical king of Britain, who promulgated the laws called the Molmutine, and established the privilege of sanctuary. He is alluded to in "Cymbeline," iii. 1 (Shakespeare).

Moloch. Any influence which demands from us the sacrifice of what we hold most dear. Thus, war is a Moloch, king mob is a Moloch, the guillotine was the Moloch of the French revolution, &c. The allusion is to the god of the Ammonites, to whom children were "made to pass through the fire" in sacrifice. Milton says he was "worshipped in Rabba, in Argob, and Basan to the stream of utmost Arnon."—"Paradise Lost," i.

Moly. Wild garlic, called sorcerer's garlic. There are many sorts, all of which flower in May, except "the sweet moly of Montpellier," which blossoms in September. The most noted are "the great moly of Homer," the Indian moly, the moly of flungary, serpent's moly, the yellow moly, Spanish purple moly, Spanish silver-capped moly, and Dioscorides's moly. Pope describes it and its effects in one of his odes, and Milton refers to it in his "Comus." (Greek, moly.)

Mome (French), says Cotgrave, is a Momus, find-fault, carping fellow. So called from Momus, the god of railery.

Or cessent donques les momes,
De mordre les escrits mieu
J du Bellay, "à P. de Ronsard."

Mo'miers (French, men of mummery). An Evangelical party of Switzerland, somewhat resembling our Methodists. They arose in 1818, and made way both in Germany and France.

Mom mur. The realm of O'beron.—Middle Age romance.

Momus. One who carps at everything. Momus, the sleepy god, was always railing and carping. He blamed Jupiter for making man without a window in his breast through which his thoughts could be seen; hence, says Dr. Grey, every unreasonable carper is called a Momus.

Mo'naciello (little monk). A sort of incubus in the mythology of Naples. It is described as a thick little man, dressed in a monk's garment and broad-brimmed hat. Those who will follow when he beckons will be led to a spot where treasure is concealed. Sometimes, however, it is his pleasure to pull the bed-clothes off, and sometimes to sit perched on a sleeper.

Monarchi'ans. A theological party of the third century, who maintained that God is one, immutable and primary. Their opponents turned upon them and nick-named them Patripassians, saying that according to such a doctrine God the Father must have suffered on the cross.

Mon'archy. Fifth-monarchy men. Those who believed that the second coming of Christ was at hand, and that at his second coming he would establish the fifth universal monarchy. The five are these: the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, the Roman, and the Millennium.

Mondo. The spirit that favours the hunt.—Camma in Africa.

Money. Shortly after the Gallic invasion, Lucius Furius built a temple to Juno Mon'eta (the Monitress) on the spot where the house of Marcus Manlius stood. This spot of the Capitol was selected because Manlius was the first man alarmed by the cackling of the sacred geese. This temple was subsequently converted into a mint, and the "ases" there coined were called moneta, whence our money.

Money makes the mare to go. (See MARE.)

Mon'gia or Mo'gia. A seaport of Galicia.—"Orlando Furioso."

Mon'ica. Mother of Augustine.

Monim'ia, in Otway's tragedy of "The Orphan." Sir Walter Scott says, "More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Monimia, than for those of Juliet and Desdemona."

Mon'plies (Richie). An honest, self-willed Scotchman, servant of Nigel Olifaunt, in Scott's "Fortunes of Nigel."

Moni'tor, so the Romans called the nursery teacher. The Military Monitor was an officer to tell young soldiers of the faults committed against the service. The House Monitor was a slave to call the family of a morning, to announce meal times, and so on.

Monk, in printing, is a black smear or blotch made by leaving too much ink on the part. Caxton set up his printing press in the scriptorium of Westminster Abbey; and the associations of this place gave rise to the slang expressions monk and friar for black and white defects. (See FRIAR.)

Give a man a monk (French, "luy bailler le moyne"), to do one a mischief. Rabelais says that Grangousier, after the battle of Picrochole, asked "what was become of Friar John?" to which Gargantua replied, "No doubt the enemy has the monk," alluding to the pugnacious feats of this wonderful churchman, who knocked men down like ninepins.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 45.

Monk Lewis. Matthew Gregory Lewis is so called, from his novel entitled "The Monk." (1773-1818.)

Monk of Westminster. Richard of Cirencester, the historian. (14th century.)

Monkbarns (Laird of). Mr. Jonathan Oldbuck, the antiquary.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Antiquary."

Monkey (A). £500. (See MARYGOLD.)

You have a monkey or the black monkey on your back—i.e., You have a fit of the sulks. Come down, black dog (Leicestershire, &c.)—i.e., Get out of the sulks. The monkey means the devil—in ancient paintings drawn like a distorted monkey, and not unfrequently mounted on the back of the person tempted. The black dog is the devil's imp.

Monkey's Allowance. More kicks than halfpence. The allusion is to the monkeys carried about for show; they pick up the halfpence, but carry them to the master, who keeps "kicking" or ill-treating the poor creatures to urge them to incessant tricks.

Monkey Board. The step behind an omnibus on which the conductor stands, or rather skips about like a monkey.

Monkey Boat. A long, narrow boat.

Monkey Coat. A coat with no more tail than a monkey, or more strictly speaking, an ape.

Monkey's Money. I will pay you in monkey's money (en monnaie de singe)—in goods, in personal work, in mumbling and grimace. The French had a law that when a monkey passed the Petit Pont, of Paris, if it was for sale it was to pay four deniers (two-thirds of a penny) for toll; but if it belonged to a showman and was not for sale, it should suffice if the monkey went through his tricks.

It was an original by Master Charles Charmois, principal painter to king Mezisus (of France), said for in court fashion with monkey's money.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," iv. 3.

Monkir and Ne'kir, according to Mahometan mythology, are two angels who interrogate the dead immediately they are buried. The first two questions they ask are, "Who is your Lord?" and "Who is your prophet?" Their voices are like thunder, their aspects hideous, and those not approved of they lash in perdition with whips half iron and half flame.

Monmouth. The town at the mouth of the Monnow.

Monmouth. The surname of Henry V. of England, who was born there.

Monmouth Cap. A soldier's cap.

The soldiers that the Monmouth wear,
On castles' tops their ensigns rear.

The best caps were formerly made at Monmouth, where the cappers' chapel doth still remain (169.)—Fuller, "Worthies of Wales," p. 50.

Monmouth Street (London) takes its name from the unfortunate son of Charles II., executed for rebellion in 1685.

Monnaie de Basoche. Worthless coin, coin not current, counters, "Brum-magen halfpennies." Coins were formerly made and circulated by the lawyers of France, which had no currency beyond their own community. (See BASOCHE.)

Mono'nia (3 syl.). Munster.

Remember the glories of Brien the brave,

Though the days of the hero are o'er.

Though lost to Mononia and cold in the grave,

He returns to Ki iko'ra [his palace] no more.

T. Moore, "Irish Melodies," No. 1.

Monoph'agous. The eater of one sort of food only. (Greek, monos phageia.)

Monoph'ysites (4 syl.). A religious sect in the Levant, who maintained that Jesus Christ had only one nature, and that divine and human were combined in much the same way as the body and soul in man. (Greek, monos physis, one nature.)

Monothel'ism consisted in the doctrine that although Christ has two distinct natures, he never had but one will, his human will being merged in the divine. (Greek, monos-thelema, one single will.)

Monroe Doctrine. The American States are never to entangle themselves in the broils of Europe, nor to suffer the powers of the Old World to interfere in the affairs of the New; and they are to account any attempt on the part of the Old World to plant their systems of government in any part of North America, dangerous to American peace and safety. James Monroe was twice elected president of the United States (1816 and 1820).

Monsieur. Philippe, duc d'Orléans, brother to Louis XIV., was called Monsieur; other gentlemen were only Monsieur This or That.

Monsieur le Coadjuteur. Paul de Gondy, afterwards Cardinal de Retz (Ress). (1611-1679.)

Monsieur le Duc. Henri-Jules de Bourbon, eldest son of the Prince de Condé.

Monsieur le Grand. The Great Equerry of France.

Monsieur le Prince. Prince de Condé. (1621-1686.) (See MADAME.)

Monsoon is a corruption of the Malay word moosoon (year or season). For six months it is a north-east trade wind, and for six months a south-west.

Monster (The). Renwick Williams, a wretch who used to prowl about London, wounding respectable women with a double-edged knife. He was convicted of several offences in July, 1790.

The green-eyed monster. Jealousy; so called by Shakespeare in "Othello."

Beware of Jealousy!

It is a green-eyed monster that doth mock
The meat it feeds on. (iii. 3.)

Monsters. See each under its name, as COCKATRICE, CHICIVACHE, CHIMERA, ECHIDNA, FOOTMONSTERS, &c.

Mont de Piété. A pawn depôt. These depôts, called "monti di pietà" (charity loans), were first instituted under Leo X., at Rome, by charitable persons who wished to rescue the poor and needy from usurious money-lenders. They advanced small sums of money on the security of pledges, at a rate of interest barely sufficient to cover the working expenses of the institution. Both the name and system were introduced into France and Spain. The model Loan Fund of Ireland is formed on the same system. Public granaries for the sale of corn are called in Italian Monti frumentarii. "Monte" means a public or State loan; hence also a "bank."

Mont St. Michel, in Normandy, formerly called Belen. Here nine Druidesses sold to sailors the arrows to charm away storms. The arrows had to be discharged by a young man twenty-one years old.

Mont-rognon (Baron of), lord of Bourglastic, Tortebesse, and elsewhere. A huge mass of muscle, who existed only to eat and drink. He was a descendant of Esau on his father's side, and of Gargantua on his mother's. He once performed a gigantic feat—he killed 600 Saracens who happened to get in his way as he was going to dinner. He was bandy-legged, could lift immense weights, had an elastic stomach, and four rows of teeth. In Croquemitaine he is made one of the paladins of Charlemagne, and was one of the four knights sent in search of Croquemitaine and Fear-fortress.

Montagnards (the mountain party). The extreme democratic politicians in the French Revolution; so called because they occupied the highest tier of benches in the hall of National Convention. The opposite party sat on the level of the floor, called the "plain."

Montague (3 syl.). The head of a faction in Verona (Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet"). The device of the family is a mountain with sharply-peaked crest (mont-agu or acu).

Montanists. Heretics of the second century; so called from Montanus, a Phrygian, who asserted that he had received from the Holy Ghost special knowledge not vouchsafed to the apostles.

Montanto. Signior Montanto. A master of fence rather than a soldier; a tongue-doughty knight. It is a word of fence, and hence Ben Jonson says, "Your punto, your reverso, your stoccata, your imbrocata, your passada, your montanto."—"Every Man in his Humour."

Monteer Cap. So called from monteros d'Espinoza (mountaineers), who once formed the interior guard of the palace of the Spanish king. The way they came to be appointed is thus accounted for:—Sanchica, wife of Don Sancho Garcia, count of Castile, entered into a plot to poison her husband, but one of the mountaineers of Espinoza revealed the plot and saved the count's life. Ever after the sovereigns of Castile recruited their body-guards from men of this estate.

Montem. A custom formerly observed every three years by the boys of Eton School, who proceeded on Whit-Tuesday ad montem (to a mound called Salt Hill), near the Bath Road, and exacted a gratuity called salt from all who passed by. Sometimes as much as £1,000 was thus collected. The custom was abolished in 1847.

Montesinos (The Cave of). Close to the castle of Rochaforda, to which a knight of the same name, who had received some cause of offence at the French court, retired. Tradition ascribes the river Guadiana to this cave as its source, whence the river is sometimes called Montesinos.

Monteth'. A scolloped basin to cool and wash glasses in; so called from its inventor.

New things produce new names, and thus Monteth has by one vessel saved his name from death.

King.

Montezu'ma's Realm. Mexico. Montezuma, the last emperor, was seized by Cortes, and compelled to acknowledge himself a vassal of Spain (1519).

Montezu'ma's Watch. A curious stone, weighing twenty-four tons, of basaltic porphyry, in Mexico. This immense stone is cut into figures denoting the Mexican division of time, and may be termed their calendar.

Montgomery, in North Wales; so called from Roger de Montgomery, earl of Shrewsbury, who won the castle of Baldwyn, lieutenant of the marches, to William the Conqueror. Before this time it was called "Tre Faldwyn."

Montgomery's division, all on one side. This is a French proverb, and refers to the Free Companies of the sixteenth century, of which Montgomery was a noted chief. The booty he took was all given to his banditti, and nothing was left to the victims. (See LION'S SHARE.)

Months.

January. So called from "Janus," the Roman deity that kept the gates of heaven. The image of Janus is represented with two faces looking opposite ways. One face is old, and is emblematical of time past; the other is young, as the emblem of time future. The Dutch used to call this month Lauw-maand (frosty-month); the Saxons, Wulf-monath, because wolves were very troublesome then from the great scarcity of food; after the introduction of Christianity, the name was changed to Aferynula (after Christmas), it was also called Forma-monath (first-month); in the French Republican calendar it was called Nivôse (snow-month, 20th December to 20th January).

February. So called from "Februa," a name of Juno, from the Sabine word februo (to purify). Juno was so called because she presided over the purification of women, which took place in this month. The Dutch used to term the month Spokkel-maand (vegetation-month); the ancient Saxons, Sprout-kele (from the sprouting of pot-wort or kelp), they changed it subsequently to Sol-monath (from the returning sun); it was also called Hlyd-monath (boisterous month); in the French Republican calendar it was called Pluviôse (rain-month, 20th January to 20th February).

March. So called from "Mars," the Roman war-god and patron deity. The old Dutch name for it was Lent-maand (lengthening month, because the days sensibly lengthen); the old Saxon name was Rede-monath (rough month, from its boisterous winds), it was subsequently changed to Lenet-monath (lengthening-month), it was also called Hlyd-monath (boisterous-month); in the French Republican calendar it was Ventôse (windy-month, 20th February to 20th March).

April. So called from the Latin "aperio" (to open), in allusion to the unfolding of the leaves. The old Dutch name was Gras-maand (grass-month); the old Saxon, Easter-monath (orient or paschal-month); in the French Republican calendar it was Germinal (time of budding, 21st March to 19th April).

May is the old Latin magus, softened to Maui, from the root mag, similar to the Sanskrit mah, to grow, and means the growing-month. The old Dutch name was Blo-maand (blossoming month); the old Saxon, Tri-milch (three-milch), because cows were milked thrice a day in this month—it was also called Mains-monath; in the French Republican calendar it was called Floréal (the time of flowers, 20th April to 20th May).

June. So called from the "juniores" or soldiers of the state, or from Juno, the queen-goddess. The old Dutch name was Zomer-maand (summer-month); the old Saxon, Sere-monath (dry-month); in the French Republican calendar it was Prairial (meadow-month, 20th May to 18th June).

July. Mark Antony gave this month the name of Julius, from Julius Cæsar, who was born in it. It had been previously called Quintilis (fifth-month). The old Dutch name for it was Hoog-maand (hay-month); the old Saxon, Mede-monath (because the cattle were turned into the meadows to feed); and in the French Republican calendar it was Messidor (harvest-month, 19th June to 18th July).

August. So called in honour of Augustus Cæsar; not because it was his birth-month, but because it was the month in which he took possession of his first consulship, celebrated three triumphs, received the oath of allegiance from the legions which occupied the Janic'ulum, reduced Egypt, and put an end to the civil wars. He was born in September. The old Dutch name for it was Oost-maand (harvest-month); the old Saxon, Weed-monath (weed-month, where weed signifies vegetation in general); in the French Republican calendar it was Thermidor (hot-month, 19th July to 17th August).

September. The seventh month from March, where the year used to commence. The old Dutch name was Heest-maand (autumn-month); the old Saxon, Gerst-monath (barley-month), or Harfest-monath; and after the introduction of Christianity Halg-monath (holy-month, the nativity of the Virgin Mary being on the 8th, the exaltation of the Cross on the 14th, Holy-Rood day on the 26th, and St. Michael's day on the 29th); in the French Republican calendar it was Fructidor (fruit-month, 18th August to 21st September).

October. The eighth month of the Alban calendar. The Old Dutch name was Wyn-maand; the old Saxon, Wyn-monath (wine-month, or the time of vintage); it was also called Teotha-monath (tenth-month), and Wynter-fylleth, winter-summer); in the French Republican calendar, Vendémiaire (time of vintage, 22nd September to 21st October).

November. The ninth Alban month. The old Dutch name was Slagt-maand (slaughter-month, the time when the beasts were slain and salted down for winter use); the old Saxon, Wind-monath (wind-month, when the fishermen drew their boats ashore, and gave over fishing till the next spring); it was also called Blot-monath — the same as "Slaght-maand;" in the French Republican calendar it was Bumaire (fog-month, 22nd October to 21st November).

December. The tenth month of the old Alban calendar. The old Dutch name was Winter-maand (winter-month); the old Saxon, Mid-wynter-monath (mid-winter-month); after the introduction of Christianity it was sometimes called Helig-monath (holy-month, because it contained Christmas Day); in the French Republican calendar it was Frimaire (hoar-frost month, 22nd November to 20th December).

Month's Mind. A desire, a craving. Mr. Croft says the expression is founded on the irrational and wholly unaccountable irritations of women in pregnancy, which commence after the first month of conception.

I see you have a month's mind to them.
Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," i. 2.

Monthawi, Al (the destroyer). One of Mahomet's lances, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medi'na.

Montjoie St. Denis. The war-cry of the French. Montjoie is a corruption of Mons Jovis, as the little mounds were called which served as direction-posts in ancient times; hence it was applied to whatever showed or indicated the way, as the banner of St. Denis, called the Oriflamme. The Burgundians had for their war-cry, "Montjoie St. André;" the dukes of Bourbon, "Montjoie Notre Dame;" and the kings of England used to have "Montjoie St. George." There seems no sufficient reason to suppose that Montjoie St. Denis is a corruption of "St. Denis mon joie"—i.e., St. Denis is my hope.

Montjoie. The cry of the French heralds in the ancient tournaments; and the title of the French king-at-arms.

Montserrat. The Catalonians aver that this mountain was riven and shattered at the Crucifixion. Every rift is filled with evergreens. (Latin, mons serratus, the mountain jagged like a saw.)

Monumental City. Baltimore, U.S., is so called, because it abounds in monuments; witness the obelisk, the 104 churches, &c.

Monumental Figures. No. 1.

(1) Those in stone, with plain sloping roofs, and without inscriptions, are the oldest.

(2) In 1160 these plain prismatic roofs began to be ornamented.

(3) In the same century the sloping roofs gave place to armorial bearings.

(4) In the thirteenth century we see flat roofs, and figures carved on the lids.

(5) The next stage was an arch built over the monument to protect it.

(6) The sixth stage was a chapel annexed to the church.

(7) The last stage was the head bound and feet tied, with children at the base, or cherubims at the feet.

Monumental Figures. No. 2.

Figures with their hands on their breasts, and chalices, represent priests.

Figures with crozier, mitre, and pontificals, represent prelates.

Figures with armour represent knights.

Figures with legs crossed represent either crusaders or married men.

Female figures with a mantle and large ring represent nuns.

Monumental Figures. No. 3.

Those in scale armour are the most ancient (time, Henry II.).

Those in chain armour or ring mail come next (time, Richard I. to Henry III.).

Those with children or cherubims, between the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Brasses are for the most part subsequent to the thirteenth century.

Monumental Figures. No. 4.

Saints lie to the east of the altar, and are elevated above the ground; the higher the elevation, the greater the sanctity. Martyrs are much elevated.

Holy men not canonised lie on a level with the pavement.

Founders of chapels, &c., lie with their monument built into the wall.

Monumental Effigies. In the age of chivalry, the woman in monumental brasses and effigies is placed on the man's right hand; but when chivalry declined she was placed on his left-hand side.

Till 1808, all public speakers began, "Gentlemen and Ladies," but since then the order has been "Ladies and Gentlemen."

Monumental Inscriptions.

Capital letters and Latin inscriptions are of the first twelve centuries.

Lombardic capitals and French inscriptions, of the thirteenth century.

German text, of the fourteenth century.

English and Roman print, subsequent to the fourteenth century.

Tablets against the wall came in with the Reformation.

Moohel. A Jew whose office it is to circumcise the young Jewish boys.

Moon means "measurer" of time (Anglo-Saxon, mōna, masc. gen.). It is masculine in all the Teutonic languages; in the Edda the son of Mundilfori is Māni (moon), and daughter Sól (sun); so it is still with the Lithuanians and Arabians, and so was it with the ancient Mexicans, Slavi, Hindus, &c.; so that it was a most unlucky dictum of Harris, in his "Hermès," that all nations ascribe to the sun a masculine, and to the Moon a feminine gender. (Gothic, mena, masc.; Sanskrit, mās, masc., from mā, to measure.) The Sanskrit mātram is an instrument for measuring; hence the Greek metron; French, metre; English, mete.

Moon, represented in five different phases: (1) new; (2) full; (3) crescent, or with horns towards the east; (4) decrecent, or with horns towards the west; and (5) gibbous, more than half.

Moon, in pictures of the Assumption of the Virgin, is represented as a crescent under her feet; in the Crucifixion it is eclipsed, and placed on one side of the cross, the sun being on the other; in the Creation and Last Judgment it is also introduced by artists.

Hecate. The moon before she has risen and after she has set.

Astartë. The crescent moon, "the moon with crescent horns."

Diana. The moon in the open vault of heaven, who "hunts the clouds."

Cynthia. Same as Diana.

Selenë or Luna. The moon personified, properly the full moon, who loved the sleeping Endymion.

Endymion. Moon-light on a bank, field, or garden.

How sweet the Moon-light sleeps upon the bank!
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice."

Phæbe. The moon as the sister of the sun. (See ASTARTE, ASHTAROTH, MUN, &c.)

Moon. Astolpho found treasured in the moon everything wasted on this earth, such as misspent time and wealth, broken vows, unanswered prayers, fruitless tears, abortive attempts, unfulfilled desires and intentions, &c. All bribes were hung on gold and silver hooks; princes' favours were kept in bellows; wasted talent was kept in vases, each marked with the proper name; &c.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. xviii. (See "Rape of the Lock," c. v.)

Moon. For the conversion of Hahab the Wise, Mahomet made the moon perform seven circuits round the Caaba or holy shrino of Mecca, then enter the right sleeve of his mantle, and go out of the left ; at its exit it slit into two pieces, which re-united in the centre of the firmament.

The moon is called "triform" because it presents itself to us either round, or waxing with horns towards the east, or waning with horns towards the west.

Island of the Moon. Madagascar is so named by the natives.

Minions of the Moon. Thieves who rob by night.—See "1 Henry IV.," i. 2 (Shakespeare).

Mountains of the Moon means simply White Mountains. The Arabs call a white horse "moon-coloured."—Jackson.

He cries for the moon. He craves to have what is wholly beyond his reach. The allusion is to foolish children who want the moon for a plaything. The French say, He wants to take the moon between his teeth (Il veut prendre la lune avec les dents), alluding to the old proverb about "The moon" and "a green cheese."

To cast beyond the moon. To make extravagant conjectures ; to cast your thoughts or guesses beyond all reason.

To level at the moon. To be very ambitious ; to aim in shooting at the moon.

You have found an elephant in the moon—found a mare's nest. Sir Paul Neal, a conceited virtuoso of the seventeenth century, gave out that he had discovered "an elephant in the moon." It turned out that a mouse had crept into his telescope, which had been mistaken for an elephant in the moon. S. Butler has a satirical poem on the subject called "The Elephant in the Moon."

You would have me believe, I suppose, that the moon is a green cheese—i.e., the most absurd thing possible. A green cheese is a cream cheese which is eaten green or fresh, and is not kept to mature like other cheeses.

Moon in the moon. (See MAN.)

Hares sacred to the moon, not because Diana was a great huntress, but because the Hindus affirm that the outline of a hare is distinctly visible on the moon.

Moon-calf, according to Pliny, is an inanimate shapeless mass, engendered of woman only ("Natural History," x. 64). This abortion was supposed to be produced by the influence of the moon. The primary meaning of calf is not the young of a cow, but the issue arising "from throwing out," as a push, a protuberance ; hence the calves of the legs.

Moon-maker (Sagendë Nah), a surname given to the Veiled Prophet (q.v.), who caused the moon to issue from a deep well, so brilliant that the real moon was eclipsed by it.

Moon-rakers. The people of Wiltshire obtained this appellation from an old legend that a farmer's wife once took a rake to rake the moon from a river, under the delusion that it was a cream cheese. The moon not being a cream cheese may probably arise from the same story.

Moonstone. A mineral so called on account of the play of light which it exhibits. The scientific name is adularia, from Ad'ula, the summit of a Swiss mountain. Wilkie Collins has a novel called "The Moonstone."

Moors. In the middle ages, the Europeans called all Mahometans Moors, in the same manner as the Eastern nations called all inhabitants of Europe Franks. Camoëns, in the "Luciad," terms the Indians "Moors." (Bk. viii.)

Moor-slayer or Mata-moros. A name given to St. James, the patron-saint of Spain, because in almost all encounters with the Moors he came on his white horse to the aid of the Christians.

Moore (Thomas), called "Anacreon Moore," because the character of his poetry resembles that of Anacreon, the Greek poet of love and wine. (1779-1852.)

Moot Point. A doubtful or unsettled question. The Saxon motian is "to debate," and a moot point is one sub judice, or under debate.

Mop. In many places Statute Fairs are held, where servants seek to be hired. Carters fasten to their hats a piece of whipcord ; shepherds, a lock of wool ; grooms, a piece of sponge, &c. When hired they mount a cockade with streamers. Some few days after the statute fair, a second, called a Mop, is held for the benefit of those not already hired. This fair mops or wipes up the refuse of the statute fair, carrying away the dregs of the servants left.

Another etymology is the Latin mappa

(public games), the derivation of which word is thus explained: In the reign of Nero the people showed, on one occasion, great impatience for the games to begin, and the emperor threw out his dinner-napkin (mappa) as a signal for their commencement. The persons in charge of the games were called mappararii. The first a in these words is like a in "strap," "plat," &c., which has the sound of o.

Mop. One of queen Mab's attendants.

All mops and brooms. Intoxicated. The allusion is to persons who are sick with drink, when mops and brooms are required to clean up after them.

Mora-stone, near Upsa'la, where the Swedes used anciently to elect their kings.

Morasteen (great stone). The ancient Danes selected their king from the sacred line of royalty. The man chosen was taken to the Landsting, or local court, and placed on the morasteen, while the magnates ranged themselves around on stones of inferior size. This was the Danish mode of installation.

Moral. The Moral Gower. John Gower, the poet, is so called by Chaucer. (1320-1402.)

Father of Moral Philosophy. Thomas Aquinas. (1227-1274.)

Moralist. The great Moralist of Fleet Street. Dr. Johnson. (1709-1784.)

Mora'na. The Bohemian goddess of winter and death.

Morat. Morat and Marathon twin names shall stand ("Childe Harold," iii. 64). Morat, in Switzerland, is famous for the battle fought in 1476, in which the Swiss defeated Charles le Téméraire of Burgundy.

Mora'vians or Bohemian Brethren. A religious community tracing its origin from John Huss, expelled by persecution from Bohemia and Moravia in the eighteenth century. They are often called The United Brethren.

More Last Words. When Richard Baxter lost his wife, he published a broad-sheet, headed "Last Words of Mrs. Baxter," which had an immense sale; the printer, for his own profit, brought out a spurious broad-sheet, headed "More Last Words;" but Baxter issued a small handbill with this concise sentence: "Mrs. Baxter did not say anything else."

More of More-hall. A legendary hero who armed himself with an armour of spikes, and concealing himself in the cave where the dragon of Wantley dwelt, slew the monster by kicking it on the mouth, where alone it was mortal.

More the Merrier. The author of this phrase was Henry Parrot.

More'no (3 syl.). Don Antonio More'no, a gentleman of Barcelo'na, who entertained Don Quixote with mock-heroic hospitality.

Morestone. Would you remove Morestone? similar to the interrogative, What! would you move Olympus? Would you do impossibilities? The entrance of Mort Bay, Devonshire, is blocked up by a huge rock called Morestone.

Morgan le Fay, Morgaine la Fée, or Morgana the Fairy. Daughter of queen Igrayne, and half-sister of king Arthur, who revealed to him the intrigues of Sir Lancelot and Guinever. She gave him a cup containing a magic draught, and Arthur had no sooner drunk it than his eyes were opened to the perfidy of his wife and friend.

Morganatic Marriage. A marriage in which the wife does not take the husband's rank, because legally or according to court bye-laws the marriage is not recognised. This sort of marriage is effected when a man of high rank marries a woman of inferior position. The children in this case do not inherit the title or entails of the father. The word is based on the Gothic morgjan, "to curtail" or "limit;" and the marriage settlement was called morgengabe or morgengeweide, whence the Low Latin matrimonium ad lejem morganatican, in which the dowry is to be considered all the portion the wife will receive, as the estates cannot pass to her or to her children.

Morganatic Marriage, called "Left-handed," because the man pledges his troth with his left hand instead of his right. The "Hand-fasted" marriages of Scotland and Ireland were morganatic, and the "hand-fasted" bride could be put away for a fresh union.

Morgane (2 syl.). A fay to whose charge Zephyr committed young Passelyon and his cousin Beunucq. Passelyon fell in love with Morgane's daughter, and the adventures of these young lovers are related in the romance of "Perceforest," vol. iii. (See MORGAN.)

Morgan'té. A ferocious giant, converted by Orlando to Christianity. After performing the most wonderful feats, he died at last from the bite of a crab. (See below.)

Morganté Maggio'rè. A serio-comic romance in verse, by Pulci, of Florence (1494). He was the inventor of this species of poetry, called by the French bernesque, from Berni, who greatly excelled in it.

Morgia'na. The clever, faithful, female slave of Ali Baba, who pries into the forty jars, and discovers that all but one contains a man. She takes oil from the only one containing it, and having made it boiling hot, pours enough into each jar to kill the thief concealed there. At last she kills the captain of the gang, and marries her master's son.—"Arabian Nights" (Ali Baba, or the Forty Thieves).

Morgue la Faye, who watched over the birth of Ogier the Dane, and after he had finished his earthly career restored him to perpetual youth, and took him to live with her in everlasting love in the isle and castle of Av'alon. (See MORGAN.) —"Ogier le Danois" (a romance).

Moriso'nianism. The religious system of James Morison, the chief peculiarities being the doctrines of universal atonement, and the ability of man unaided to receive or reject the Gospel.

Morley (Mrs.). The name under which queen Anne corresponded with Mrs. Freeman (the duchess of Marlborough).

Morma, in Pepys' "Diary," is Elizabeth, daughter of John Dickens, who died October 22nd, 1662.

Mormon. The last of a pretended line of Hebrew prophets, and the pretended author of "The Book of Mormon," or Golden Bible, written on golden plates. This work was in reality written by the Rev. Solomon Spalding, but was claimed by Joseph Smith as a direct revelation from heaven to himself. Spalding died 1816; Smith, 1844.

Mormon Creed. (1) God is a person with the form and flesh of man. (2) Man is a part of the substance of God, and will himself become a god. (3) Man was not created by God, but existed from all eternity, and will never cease to exist. (4) There is no such thing as original or birth sin. (5) The earth is only one of many inhabited spheres. (6) God is president of men made gods, angels, good men, and spirits waiting to receive a tabernacle of flesh. (7) Man's household of wives is his kingdom not for earth only, but also in his future state. (8) Mormonism is the kingdom of God on earth.—W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," i. 24.

Mormonism. The religious and social system of the Latter-day Saints; so called from their gospel, termed "The Book of Mormon." Joe Smith, the founder of the system, was born in Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont; his partner was Rigdon. The manuscript which he declared to be written on gold plates, was a novel written by Spalding. He was cited thirty-nine times into courts of law, and was at last assassinated by a gang of ruffians who broke into his prison at Carthage, and shot him like a dog. His wife's name was Emma; he lived at Nauvoo, in Illinois; his successor is Brigham Young, a carpenter by trade, who led the "saints" (as the Mormons are called), driven from home by force, to the valley of the Salt Lake, 1,500 miles distant, generally called Utah, but by the Mormons themselves Deseret (Bee-country), the New Jerusalem. Abraham is their model man, and Sarai their model woman, and English the one language which all the saints must speak. Young's house is called the Bee-hive. Every man, woman, and child capable of work has a work to do in this busy hive. The schism of the Mormon party was led by Emma the prophet's widow, and her sons of Joe Smith, on account of polygamy. The schismatics call themselves Josephites.

Morning Star of the Reformation. John Wycliffe. (1324-1384.)

Morocco. The name of Bankes's bay horse. (See BANKES and HORSE.)

Morocco. Strong ale made from burnt malt, used in the annual feast at Seven-halls, Westmoreland (the seat of the Hon. Mary Howard), on the opening of Milntherpe fair. This liquor is put into a large glass of unique form, and the person whose turn it is to drink is called the "colt." He is required to stand on one leg, and say "Luck to Sevens as long as Kent flows," then drain the glass to the bottom, or forfeit one shilling. The act is termed "drinking the constable." The feast consists of radishes, oaten cake and butter.

Moros. The fool in the play entitled "The longer thou Livest the more Fool thou art," by William Wager.

Morpheus (2 syl., the Shaper). Son of Sleep, and god of dreams; so called because he gives these airy nothings their form and fashion.

Morrel. One of the shepherds in the "Shepherds' Calendar," by Spenser.

Morrice (Gil or Child). The natural son of an earl and the wife of lord Barnard or John Stewart, "brought forth in her father's house wi' mickle sin and shame," and brought up "in the gude grene wode." One day he sent Willie to the baron's hall, requesting his mother to come without delay to Greenwood, and by way of token sent with him a "gay mantel" made by herself. Willie went into the dinner-hall, and blurted out his message before all who were present, adding, "and there is the silken sarke, your ain hand sewd the sleive." Lord Barnard thinking the child to be a paramour of his wife, forbade her to leave the hall, and riding himself to Greenwood slew Morrice with a broadsword, and setting his head on a spear gave it to "the meanest man in a' his train" to carry to the lady. When the baron returned lady Barnard said to him, "Wi' that same spear, O pierce my heart, and put me out o' pain;" but the baron replied, "Enough of blood by me's bin spilt, sair, sair I rew the deid," adding—

I'll ay lament for Gil Morice

Agin he were mine an;

I'll neir forget the dreiry day

On which the youth was slain.

"Reliques of Ancient English Poetry," ser. iii. 1.

Dr. Percy says this pathetic tale suggested to Horne the plot of "Douglas" (a tragedy).

Morris (Mr.). Frank Osbaldistone's timid fellow-traveller, who carried a portmanteau. Osbaldistone says of him—"Of all the propensities which teach mankind to torment themselves, that of causeless fear is the most irritating, busy, painful, and pitiable."—Sir Walter Scott, "Rob Roy."

Morris Dance, brought to England in the reign of Edward III., when John of Gaunt returned from Spain. In the dance, bells were jingled, and staves or swords clashed. It was a military dancio of the Moors or Moriscoes, in which five men and a boy engaged; the boy wore a morione or head-piece, and was called Mad Morion. The Maid Marian is a corruption of Mad Morion.

Morse Alphabet. An alphabet used in telegraphic messages, invented by Professor Samuel F. B. Morse, of Massachusetts. The right-hand deflection of the electric needle corresponds to a dash, and the left-hand to a dot, and by means of dashes and dots every word may be spelt at length. Military signalling is performed in England by short and long flashes of a flag or some other instrument; the short flash corresponds with the dot, and the long with the dash. The following ten varieties will show how these two symbols are capable of endless combinations, · | ·· | ··· | ···· | ····· | — | —· | —·· | —·· | —··· | &c.

Mortal. I saw a mortal lot of people—i.e., a vast number. Mortal is the French à mort, as in the sentence, "Il y avait du monde à mort." Legonidec says, "Ce mot (mort) ne s'emploie jamais au propre, mais seulement au figuré, avec la signification de multitude, grand nombre, foule."

Mortar Board. A college cap. A corruption of the French mortier, the cap worn by the ancient kings of France, and still used officially by the chief justice or president of the court of justice. As a college cap has a square board on the top, the mortier-board was soon transformed into mortar-board.

Morte d'Arthur, compiled by Sir Thomas Malory, from French originals; edited by Southey, the poet laureate. The compilation contains—

The Prophecies of Merlin.

The Quest of the St. Graal.

The Romance of Sir Launcelot of the Lake.

The History of Sir Tristram; &c. &c. Tennyson has a "Morte d'Arthur" among his poems.

Morther. Well, Mor, where have you been this long while? (Norfolk). I say, Morther, come hither! (Norfolk). Mor or Morther means a lass, a wench. It is the Dutch moer (a woman). In Norfolk they call a lad a bor, from the Dutch boer (a farmer), English boor. "Well, bor!" and "Well, mor!" are to be heard daily in every part of the county.

When once a gigling morther you,
And I a red-faced chubby boy,
Sly tricks you played me not a few,
For mischief was your greatest joy
Bloomfield, "Richard and Kate"

Mor'timer. So called from an ancestor in crusading times, noted for his exploits on the shores of the Dead Sea (de Mortuo Mari).

Mortstone. He may remove Mortstone. A Devonshire proverb, said incredulously of husbands who pretend to be masters of their wives. Mort-bay is stopped up with a huge rock called Mortstone. It also means "If you have done what you say, you can accomplish anything."

Morven. Fingal's realm; probably Argyleshire and its neighbourhood.

Mos'a-saur. The lizard of the Mosa or Meuse; an extinct gigantic saurian first discovered in the chalk on the banks of the Meuse.

Mosaic Work is not connected with the proper name Moses, but is the Latin opus musæum or musicum, through the French mosaïque, Italian mosaico. Pliny says it was so called because these tessellated floors were first used in the grottoes consecrated to the Muses (xxxv. 21, s. 42). The most famous workman in mosaic work was Sosus of Pergamos, who wrought the rich pavement in the common-hall, called Asaroton œcon.—Pliny, "Natural History," xxxvi. 25.

Moscow. So called from the river Moscowa, on which it is built.

The Monarch of Moscow. A large bell weighing 193 tons, 21 feet high, and 21 feet in diameter.

Mosen (Spanish). A corruption of Mio Señor, corresponding to the Castilian Don.

Moses Primrose. Son of the Rev. Dr. Primrose, very green, and with a good opinion of himself. He is chiefly known for his wonderful bargain with a Jew at the neighbouring fair, when he gave a good horse in exchange for a gross of worthless green spectacles, with tortoise-shell rims and shagreen cases.

Moses' Rod. So the divining rod was usually called. The divining rod was employed to discover water or mineral treasure. In "Blackwood's Magazine" (May, 1850) we are told that nobody sinks a well in North Somersetshire without consulting the jowser (as the rod-diviner is called). The abbé Richard is stated in the "Monde" to be an extremely expert diviner of water, and amongst others discovered the "Christmas Fountain" on M. de Metternich's estate, in 1863. In the "Quarterly Review" (No. 41) we have an account of lady Noël's divining skill. (See "World of Wonders," pt. ix., p. 233.)

Mos'lem or Moslemin. Plural of Mussulman, sometimes written Mussulmans. The word is Turkish, and means true believer.

Mosse. Napping, as Mosse took his mare. Wilbraham says Mosse took his mare napping, because he could not catch her when awake.

Mosstrooper. A robber, a bandit. The marauders who infested the borders of England and Scotland were so called because they encamped on the mosses.

Moth. Page to Don Adriano de Arma'do, all jest and playfulness, cunning and versatile.—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost."

Mother. Mother and head of all Churches. So is St. John Lateran of Rome called. It occupies the site of the splendid palace of Plantius Lateranus, which escheated to the crown from treason, and was given to the Church by the emperor Constantine. From the balcony of this church the pope blesses the people of the whole world.

Mother Ann. Ann Lee, the "spiritual mother" of the Shakers. (1735-1784.)

Mother Bunch. (1) Mother Bunch whose fairy tales are notorious. These tales are in "Pasquill's Jest," with the Merriments of Mother Bunch. (1653.)

(2) The other Mother Bunch is called "Mother Bunch's Closet Newly Broke Open," containing rare secrets of art and nature, tried and experienced by learned philosophers, and recommended to all ingenious young men and maids, teaching them how to get good wives and husbands. (1760.)

Mother Carey's Chickens. Stormy petrels. Mother Carey is Mater Cara. The French call these birds oiseaux de Notre Dame, or aves Sanctæ Mariæ. Chickens are the young of any fowl, or any small bird.

Mother Carey's Goose. The great Black Petrel or gigantic Fulmar of the Pacific Ocean.

Mother Carey is plucking her goose. It is snowing. (See HULDA.)

Mother-Country. One's native country, but the term applies specially to England, in relation to America and the colonies. The inhabitants of North America, Australia, &c., are for the most part descendants of English parents, and therefore England may be termed the mother-country. The Germans call their native country Father-land.

Mother Douglas. A noted procuress, introduced in "The Minor," by Foote. She also figures in Hogarth's "March to Finchley." Mother Douglas resided at the north-east corner of Covent Garden; her house was superbly furnished and decorated. She grew very fat, and with pious up-turned eyes used to pray for the safe return of her "babes" from battle. She died 1761.

Mother Goose. A name associated with nursery rhymes. She was born in Boston, and her eldest daughter Elizabeth married Thomas Fleet, the printer. Mrs. Goose used to sing the rhymes to her grandson, and Thomas Fleet printed the first edition in 1719.

Mother Hubbard. The old lady whose whole time seems to have been devoted to her dog, who always kept her on the trot, and always made game of her. Her temper was proof against this wilfulness on the part of her dog, and her politeness never forsook her, for when she saw Master Doggie dressed in his fine clothes—

The dame made a curtsy, the dog made a bow;
The dame said "Your servant," the dog said
"Bow-wow."

Mother Shipton lived in the reign of Henry VIII., and was famous for her prophecies in which she foretold the death of Wolsey, lord Percy, &c., and many wonderful events of the future times. All her "prophecies" are still extant.

Mother-wit. Native wit; a ready reply; the wit which "our mother gave us." In ancient authors, the term is used to express a ready reply, courteous but not profound. Thus, when Louis XIV. expressed some anxiety lest Polignac should be inconvenienced by a shower of falling rain, the mother-wit of the cardinal replied "It is nothing, I assure your Majesty; the rain of Marly never makes us wet."

Mother of Believers. Ay-6-shah, the second and favourite wife of Mahomet; so called because Mahomet being the "Father of Believers," his wife of wives was Mother of Believers.

Mother of Books. Alexandria was so called from its library, which was the largest ever collected before the invention of printing.

Mother of Cities (Amu-al-Bulud). Balkh is so called.

Mother of Pearl. The shells of a bivalve mollusc, which also produces the precious pearls.

Mother of the Gracchi. A hard, strong-minded, rigid woman, without one soft point or effeminate weakness. Always in the right, and maintaining her right with the fortitude of a martyr.

Mothering Sunday is Mid-Lent, a great holiday, when the Pope blesses the golden rose, and children go home to their mothers to feast on "mothering-cakes." It is said that the day received its appellation from the ancient custom of visiting their "mother-church," and making offerings on the altar on that day.

Motley. Men of Motley. Licensed fools; so called because of their dress.

Motley is the only wear.
Shakespeare. 'As You Like It,' ii. 7.

Motu Proprio. A law brought in by Consalvi, to abolish monopolies in the Papal states (1757).

Mouchard (French). A spy, "qui fait comme les mouches, qui volent si bien sans en avoir l'air." At the close of the seventeenth century, those petits-maitres who frequented the Tuileries to see and be seen were called mouchards (fly-men).—"Dictionnaire Etymologique de Ménage."

Mound. The largest artificial mound in Europe is Silbury Hill, near Avebury (Wiltshire). It covers 5 acres 34 perches, measures at the base 2,027 feet; its diameter at top is 120 feet, its slope is 316 feet; perpendicular height, 107 feet; and it is altogether the most stupendous monument of human labour in the world.

Allyattes, in Asia Minor, described by Herodotus, is somewhat larger than Silbury Hill.

Mount Zion. The Celestial City or heaven.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

I am come from the City of Destruction, and am going to Mount Zion. (Part i.)

Mountain (The) or Montagnards. The extreme democratical party in the first French Revolution; so called because they seated themselves on the highest benches of the hall in which the National Convention met. Their leaders were Danton and Robespierre, but under them were Marat, Couthon, Thuriot, St. André, Legendre, Camille-Desmoulins, Carnot, St. Just, and Collet d'Herbois, the men who introduced the "Reign of Terror." Extreme radicals are still called in France the "mountain party" or "montagnards."

Old Man of the Mountain. Imaum Hassan ben Sabbah el Homairi. The sheik Al Jebal was so called, because his residence was in the mountain fastnesses of Syria. He was the prince of a Mahometan sect called Assassins (q.v.), and founder of a dynasty in Syria, put an end to by the Monguls in the twelfth century. In Rymer's "Fœdera" (vol. i.) two letters of this sheik are inserted. It is not the province of this "Book of Fables" to dispute their genuineness.

If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain. If what I seek will not come to me without my stir, I must exert myself to obtain it; if we cannot do as we wish, we must do as we can. When Mahomet first announced his system, the Arabs demanded supernatural proofs of his commission.

"Moses and Jesus," said they, "wrought miracles in testimony of their divine authority; and if thou art indeed the prophet of God, do so likewise." To this Mahomet replied, "It would be tempting God to do so, and bring down his anger, as in the case of Pharaoh." Not satisfied with this answer, he commanded mount Safa to come to him, and when it stirred not at his bidding, exclaimed "God is merciful. Had it obeyed my words it would have fallen on us to our destruction. I will therefore go to the mountain, and thank God that he has had mercy on a stiff-necked generation."

The mountain in labour. A mighty effort made for a small effect. The allusion is to the celebrated line of Horace, "Parturiunt montes, nascitur ridiculus mus," which Creech translates, "The travailing mountain yields a silly mouse;" and Boileau, "La montagne en travail enfante une souris."

Mountain-dew. Whisky.

Mountain of Terrors. The Schreckhorn, in the Bernese Alps.

Mourning.

Black. To express the privation of light and joy, the midnight gloom of sorrow for the loss sustained. The colour of mourning in Europe. It was also the colour of mourning in ancient Greece and in the Roman empire.

Black and white striped. To express sorrow and hope. The mourning of the South-Sea Islanders.

Greyish brown. The colour of the earth, to which the dead return. The colour of mourning in Ethiopia.

Pale brown. The colour of withered leaves. The mourning of Persia.

Sky-blue. To express the assured hope that the deceased is gone to heaven. The colour of mourning in Syria, Cappadocia, Armenia, and Turkey.

Deep blue, in Bokhara, is the colour of mourning (Hanway). The Romans in the Republic wore dark blue for mourning.

Purple and violet. To express royalty, "kings and priests to God." The colour of mourning for cardinals and the kings of France. Some say the purple signifies the "blue" or aristocratic blood of the deceased. The colour of mourning in Turkey is violet.

White. Emblem of "white-handed hope." The colour of mourning in China. Henry VIII. wore white for Anne Boleyn. The ladies of ancient Rome and Sparta wore white for mourning. It was the colour of mourning in Spain till 1493. In England it is still customary, in several of the provinces, to wear white silk handkerchiefs for the unmarried.

Yellow. The sear and yellow leaf. The colour of mourning in Egypt and in Burmah, where also it is the colour of the monastic order. In Brittany, widows' caps among the paysannes are yellow. Anne Boleyn wore yellow mourning for Catharine of Aragon. Some say yellow is in token of exaltation.

Mournival. Four cards all alike, as four aces, four kings, &c., in a game of cards called Gleek. Gleek is three cards alike.

A mournival of aces, gleek of knaves,
Just nine a-piece.

"Albunazar," act iii., s. 5.

Poole in his "English Parnassus" called the four elements Nature's first mournival.

Mouse Tower, on the Rhine, said to be so called because bishop Hatto (q.v.) was there devoured by mice. The tower, however, was built by bishop Siegfried, 200 years after the death of bishop Hatto, as a toll-house for collecting the duties upon all goods which passed by. The word maus or mouth means "toll," and the toll collected on corn being very unpopular, gave rise to the tradition referred to, and the catastrophe was fixed on bishop Hatto, a noted statesman and councillor of Otho the Great, proverbial for his cunning perfidy.

Moussa. Moses.

Moussali. A Persian musician. Haroun al Raschid was going to divorce his late favourite Maridah or Marinda, but the poet Moussali sang some verses to him which so touched his heart, that he went in search of the lady and made peace with her.—D'Herbelot.

Mouth. God of the dead; the Hadës or Pluto of classic story.—Syrian mythology.

Moutons. Revenons à nos moutons. Return we to our subject. The phrase is taken from an old French play, called "L'Avocat," by Patein, in which a woollen-draper charges a shepherd with stealing sheep. In telling his grievance he kept for ever running away from his subject; and to throw discredit on the defendant's attorney, accused him of stealing a piece of cloth. The judge had to pull him up every moment with "Mais, mon ami, revenons à nos moutons" (what about the sheep, tell me about the sheep, now return to the story of the sheep).

Moving the World. Give me where to stand, and I will move the world. So said Archimedes of Syracuse; and the instrument he would have used was the lever.

Mowis. The bridegroom of snow, who (according to American-Indian tradition) wooed and won a beautiful bride; but when morning dawned, Mowis left the wigwam, and melted into the sunshine. The bride hunted for him night and day in the forests, but never saw him more.

Mozaide (2 syl.) or Monzaïda. The "Moor," settled in Calicut, who befriended Vasco de Gama when he first landed on the Indian Continent.

The Moor attends, Mozaide, whose zealous care
To Gama's eyes revealed each treacherous snare.
Camoens, "Luciad," bk. ix.

Much. The miller, in Robin Hood dances, whose great feat was to bang with a bladder of peas the heads of the gaping spectators.

Much Ado about Nothing. The plot is from a novel of Belleforest, copied from one by Bandello (18th Vol. vi.). There is a story resembling it in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," book v.; another in the "Geneura" of Turberville; and Spenser has a similar one in the "Faery Queen," book ii., canto 4.

Much Ado about Nothing. After a war in Messina, Claudio, Benedick, and some other soldiers went to visit Leonato the governor, when the former fell in love with Hero the governor's daughter; but Benedick and Beatrice, being great rattlepates, fell to jesting, and each positively disliked the other. By a slight artifice their hatred was converted into love, and Beatrice was betrothed to the Paduan lord. In regard to Hero, the day of her nuptials was fixed; but don John, who hated Claudio and Leonato, induced Margaret, the lady's maid, to dress up like her mistress, and to talk familiarly with one Borachio, a servant of don John's; and while this chit-chat was going on, the don led Claudio and Leonato to overhear it. Each thought it to be Hero, and when she appeared as a bride next morning at church, they both denounced her as a light woman. The friar, being persuaded that there was some mistake, induced Hero to retire, and gave out that she was dead. Leonato now challenged Claudio for being the cause of Hero's death, and Benedick, urged on by Beatrice, did the same. At this crisis Borachio was arrested, and confessed the trick; don John fled, the mystery was duly cleared up, and the two lords married the two ladies.

Mucia'na Cautio. A law-quirk, so called from Mu'cius Sce'vola, a Roman pontifex, and the most learned of jurists.

Muc'klebackit. Elspeth Mucklebackit, mother of Saunders.

Little Jenny Mucklebackit, child of Saunders.

Maggie Mucklebackit, wife of Saunders.

Saunders Mucklebackit, the old fisherman at Musslecrag.

Steenie Mucklebackit, eldest son of Saunders (drowned).—Sir Walter Scott, "The Antiquary."

Muc'klewrath. Habakkuk Mucklewrath. A fanatic preacher.—Sir Walter Scott, "Old Mortality."

John Mucklewrath. Smith at Cairn-vreckan village. Dame Mucklewrath, his wife, is a perfect virago.—Sir Walter Scott, "Waverley."

Mudar'ra. Son of a Moorish princess and Gonçalo Bustos de Salas de Lara, who murdered his uncle Rodrigo while hunting, to avenge the death of his seven half-brothers. (See LARA—The Seven Infants of.)

Muffins and Crumpets. Muffins is pain-moufflet. Du Cange describes the painis moietus as bread of a more delicate nature than ordinary, for the use of prebends, &c., and says it was made fresh every day. Crumpets is crumple-ettes, cakes with little crumples.

Mufti. We went in mufti—out of uniform, incog.

The French say en pékin, and French soldiers call civilians pékins. An officer who had kept Talleyrand waiting, said he had been detained by some pékins. "What are they?" asked Talleyrand. "Oh," said the officer, "we call everybody who is not military a pékin." "And we," said Talleyrand, "call everybody military that is not civil." Mufti is an Eastern word signifying a priest.

Mug-house. An ale-house was so called in the eighteenth century. Some hundred persons assembled in a large tap-room to drink, sing, and spout. One of the number was made chairman. Ale was served to the guests in their own mugs, and the place where the mug was to stand was chalked on the table.

Muggins. A small borough magnate, a village leader. To mug is to drink, and Mr. Muggins is Mr. Drinker.

Muggleto'nian. A follower of one Lodovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, who, about 1651, set up for a prophet. He was sentenced to stand in the pillory and was fined £500.

Muggy means half stupid with beer and tobacco-smoke. Mug-houses were ale-houses (q.v.). (Gaelic, muig, cloudiness; Welsh, mygu, to smoke; British, mougu, to suffocate. Legonidec says, "Mouguz étouffant, qui rend la respiration difficile.")

Mulat'to (Spanish). A mule, a mongrel; applied to the offspring of a negress by a white man, or of a white woman by a negro.

Mulciber—i.e., Vulcan. It is said that he took the part of Juno against Jupiter, and Jupiter hurled him out of heaven. He was three days in falling, and at last was picked up half dead and with one leg broken, by the fishermen of the island of Lemnos. (See Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.)

Mule. Mahomet's favourite white mule was Daldah. (See FADDA.)

Mull. To make a mull of a job is to fail to do it properly. The failure of a peg-top to spin is called a mull, hence also any blunder or failure. (Scotch, mull, dust, or a contraction of multile.) The people of Madras are called "Mulls," because they are in a less advanced state of civilisation than the other two presidencies, in consequence of which they are held by them in low estimation.

Mulla. Awbeg, a tributary of the Blackwater, in Ireland, which flowed close by Spenser's home. Spenser is called by Shenstone "The bard of Mulla's silver stream."

Mulready's Envelope is an envelope resembling a half-sheet of letter-paper, when folded. The space left for the address formed the centre of an ornamental design by Mulready, the artist. When the penny postage envelopes were first introduced, these were the stamped envelopes of the day.

Multipliers. Alchemists, who pretended to multiply gold and silver. An act was passed (2 Henry IV., c. iv.) making the "art of multiplication" felony. In the "Canterbury Tales" the Chanoun Yeman says he was reduced to poverty by alchemy, adding: "Lo, such advantage is't to multiply."—Prologue to "Chanounes Yemanes Tale."

Multitudes. Dame Juliana Berners says, in designating companies we must not use the names of multitudes promiscuously, and examples her remark thus:

"We say a congregacyon of people, a hoost of men, a felyschynnyng of jomen, and a bevy of ladies; we must speak of a herde of dere, swaunys, cransys, or wrenys, a sepe of herous or bylourys, a muster of peccocias, a watche of nyghtyngales, a flighte of doves, a claterynge of choughes, a pryde of lyons, a sturwe of beeres, a gagle of zeyes, a skulke of foxes, a sculle of freys, a pontyfaldye of prestys, and a superflute of nonnes"—Book of St. Albans (1153).

She adds, that a strict regard to these niceties better distinguishes "gentylmen from ungentylmen," than regard to the rules of grammar, or even to the moral law.

Mum. A strong beer made in Brunswick; so called from Christian Mummer, of Brunswick, by whom it was first brewed.

Mum's the word. Keep what is told you a profound secret. (See MUMCHANCE.)

Seal up your lips, and give no words but—mum.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," 1. 2.

Mumbo Jumbo. A grotesque idol worshipped by several of the negro races. We use the term to signify unmeaning jargon.

Mumchance. Silence. Mumchance was a game of chance with dice, in which silence was indispensable. (Mum is connected with mumble; German, mumme, a muffle; Danish, mumler, to muffle.)

And for "mumchance," howe'er the chevane may fall,
You must be mum for fear of spoiling all.

"Machindell's Dogg."

Mummy is the Egyptian word mum, wax; from the custom of anointing the body with wax and wrapping it in scar-cloth. (See BEATEN.)

Mumpsimus. I am not going to change my old mumpsimus for your new sumpsimus. I am not going to change my old ways and habits for your new fangles. The reference is to an old priest in the reign of Henry VIII., who used to say Mumpsimus, Domine, instead of Sumpsimus; and when remonstrated with, replied he had used mumpsimus for thirty years, and was not going to change it for the new-fangled sumpsimus.

Munchausen (Baron). The hero of a volume of travels, who meets with the most marvellous adventures. The incidents have been compiled from various sources, and the name is said to have pointed to Hieronymus Karl Friedrich von Münchhausen, a German officer in the Russian army, noted for his marvellous stories (1720-1797). It is also supposed to be an implied satire on Bruce, whose "Travels in Abyssinia" were looked upon as mythical when they first appeared. The author is Rudolf Erich Raspe, and the sources from which the adventures were compiled are Bebel's "Facetiæ," Castiglione's "Cortegiane," Bildermann's "Utopia," and some of the baron's own stories.

Mundane Egg. In the Phœnician, Egyptian, Hindu, and Japanese systems the Creator is represented as producing an egg, from which the world was hatched. In some mythologies a bird is represented as laying the mundane egg on the primordial waters.

Mundilfro. One of the giant race, who had a son and daughter of such surpassing beauty that their father called them Mani and Sol (moon and sun).—Scandinavian mythology.

Mundungus. Bad tobacco. Probably a quibble on the German mundung, the mouth, and the words mun duny. "Mun" means rotten; hence "mun fish, and mun meaning "manure" in Cornwall.

Munera. The daughter of Pollentius, the Saracen, to whom he gave all the spoils he unjustly took from those who fell into his power. Talus, the iron page of Sir Artegal, chops off her golden hands and silver feet, and tosses her over the castle wall into the moat.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. v. 2.

Mungo, in British, is Mwingu, which means "gently dear."

Mu'nin. Memory; one of the two ravens that sit perched on the shoulders of Odin; the other is Hugin (mind).—Scandinavian mythology.

Munkar and Nakeer. Two black angels of appalling aspect, the inquisitors of the dead. The Koran says that during the inquisition the soul is united to the body. If the scrutiny is satisfactory the soul is gently drawn forth from the lips of the deceased, and the body is left to repose in peace; if not, the body is beaten about the head with iron clubs, and the soul is wrenched forth by racking torments.

Munta'bur (Mount Tabor). The royal residence of the soldan whose daughter married Otnit, king of Lombardy.

Mu'rad. Son of Hadra'ma and Mar-sillus, king of Portugal, Castile, Aragon, Leon, and Valence, when those countries were held by the Moors. He was called "Lord of the Lion," because he always led about a lion in silken fetters. When he carried defiance to Charlemagne at Fronsac, the lion fell in love with Aude the Fair; Murad chastised it, and the lion tore him to pieces.—"Croquemitaine," vii.

Murat. The Russian Murat. Michael Miloradowitch. (1770-1820.)

Muscular Christianity. Healthy or strong-minded religion, which braces a man to fight the battle of life bravely and manfully. The expression was first used by Charles Kingsley.

Muse. The tenth Muse. Marie de Jars de Gournay, a French writer. (1566-1645.)

Muse'um. The most celebrated are the British Museum in London; the Louvre at Paris; the Vatican at Rome; the Museum of Florence; that of St. Petersburg; and those of Dresden, Vienna, Munich, and Berlin.

A walking museum. So Longinus, author of a work on "The Sublime," was called. (A.D. 213-273.)

Mushkoda'sa (North-American Indian). The grouse.

Mushroom, anciently spelt mush-rump, is Welsh maes (a field), rhym (knob). Similarly the French champignon is champ (field), pignon (nut or cone). The French have also mousseron (a white mushroom).

Music. Father of Music. Giambattista Pietro Aloisio da Palestrina. Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina was called "the prince of musicians."

Father of Greek Music. Terpander. (Flo. B.C. 676.)

The Prince of Music. G. Pietro A. da Palestrina. (1529-1594.)

Music hath charms, &c.; from Congreve's "Mourning Bride" (i. 1).

Music of the Spheres. Pythagoras was the first who suggested the notion so beautifully expressed by Shakespeare—

There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims.
"Merchant of Venice," v. 1.

Plato says that a syren sits on each planet, who carols a most sweet song, agreeing to the motion of her own particular planet, but harmonising with the other seven. Hence Milton speaks of the "celestial syrens' harmony, that sit upon the nine enfolded spheres."—"Arcades."

Maximus Tyrius says that the mere proper motion of the planets must create sounds, and as the planets move at regular intervals the sounds must harmonise.

Musical. The musical small-coal man. Thomas Britton. (1654-1714)

Musical Notation. (See Do.)

Musicians. Father of Musicians. Jubal, "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ" (Gen. iv. 21).

Musido'ra. (See DAMON.)

Mu'sits or Musets. Gaps in a hedge; places through which a hare makes his way to escape the hounds.

The many musets through which he goes
Are like a labyrinth to amaze his foes.
Shakespeare, "Venus and Adonis."

The passing of the hare through these gaps is termed musings. The word is from the Italian musare (to stand gazing), muscito (to demur), from the want of decision of the hare.

Musket is the French mousquet (a sparrow-hawk); other shooting implements were named fulcon, fulconet, &c.

Muslin. So called from Mosul, in Asia, where it was first manufactured. (French, mousseline.)

Musnud. Cushioned seats, reserved in Persia for persons of distinction.

Muspel. A region of fire, whence Surtur will collect flames to set fire to the universe.—Scandinavian mythology.

Muspelheim (3 syl.). The abode of fire which at the beginning of time existed in the south. It was light, warm, and radiant; but was guarded by Surt with a flaming sword. Sparks were collected therefrom to make the stars.—Scandinavian mythology.

Musulman—that is, Moslem, plural of Moslem. A Mahometan; so called from the Arabic muslim, a believer.

Mutantur. "Omnia mutantur" (Barbonius). "Tempora mutantur, nos et muta'mur in illis" is not a quotation from any classic author.

Mutes at funerals. This was a Roman custom. The undertaker, attended with lictors dressed in black, marched with the corpse; and the undertaker, as master of the ceremonies, assigned to each follower his proper place in the procession.

Mutton (French, mouton). A gold coin impressed with the image of a lamb.

The mutton-eating king. Charles II. of England. The witty earl of Rochester wrote this mock epitaph on his patron:—

Here lies our mutton-eating king,
Whose word no man relies on:
He never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise one.

Mylltta. A female deity of the Babylonians, the personification of procreation.

Myllodon (Greek, grinder-tooth). One of the Megather genus discovered by Charles Darwin at Punta Alta, in Patagonia.

Mynheer Clossh. A Dutchman. Clossh or Claus is an abbreviation of Nicholas, a common name in Holland. Sandy, a contraction of Alexander, is a similar nickname for a Scotchman.

Mynian Sails. The ship Argo; so called because its crew were natives of Mynia.

When his black whirlwinds o'er the ocean rolled
And rent the Mynian sails.

Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. vi.

Myrmidons of the Law. Bailiffs, sheriffs' officers, and other law menials. Any rough fellow employed to annoy another is the employer's myrmidon.

The Myrmidons were a people of Thessaly who followed Achilles to the siege of Troy, and were distinguished for their savage brutality, rude behaviour, and thirst for rapine.

Myrra. An Ionian slave, the beloved concubine of Sardanapalus, the Assyrian king. She roused him from his indolence to oppose Arba'cès, the Mede who aspired to his throne, and when she found that his cause was hopeless induced him to place himself on a funeral pile, which she fired with her own hand, and springing into the flames, perished with her beloved lord and master.—Byron, "Sardanapalus."

Myrrh'ores (4 syl.; the myrrh-bearers). The three Maries who went to see the sepulchre, bearing myrrh and spices. In Christian art they are represented as carrying vases of myrrh in their hands.

Mysteries of Woods and Rivers. The art of hunting and fishing.

Mythras or Mihir'. That sacred being enthroned in the sun whom the Ghebers worship.

N

N. This letter represents a wriggling eel, and is called in Hebrew nun (a fish).

N. in Spanish, has sometimes a mark over it, thus —ñ. This mark is called a tildé, and often alters the sense of a word. Thus, "pena" means punishment, but "peña," a rock.

N, added to words for euphony or whim, is termed nunnation, from "nun," the Greek n. Examples: Nelly, Neddy, for Elly (little Ellen), Eddy (little Edward), &c.

N added to Greek words ending in a short vowel to lengthen it "by position," and "l" added to French words beginning with a vowel, when they follow a word ending with a vowel (as si l'on for si on), is called N or L "epheleystic" (tagged-on; Greek, epi helko).

Nth, or Nth plus one, in University slang, means to the utmost degree. Thus Cut to the Nth means wholly unnoticed by a friend. The expression is taken from the index of a mathematical formula, where n stands for any number, and n+1 one more than any number.

Nab. The fairy that addresses Orpheus in the infernal regions, and offers him for food a roasted ant, a flea's thigh, butterflies' brains, some sucking mites, a rainbow-tart, and other delicacies of like nature, to be washed down with dew-drops, beer made from seven barley-corns, and the supernaculum of earth-born topers.—King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Na'bob. Corruption of the Hindu word nawâb, the plural of naib. An administrator of a province and commander of the Indian army under the Mogul empire. These men acquired great wealth and lived in Eastern splendour, so that they gave rise to the phrase, "Rich as the nawâb," corrupted into "Rich as a nabob." In England we apply the phrase to a merchant who has attained great wealth in the Indies, and has returned to live in his native country.

Nabonassar or Nebo-adon-Assur (Nebo prince of Assyria). Founder of the Babylonian or Chaldean kingdom, and first of the dynasty of Nabonassar.

Era of Nabonassar begins Wednesday, February 26th, 747 B.C., the day of Nabonassar's accession. It was used by Ptolemy, and by the Babylonians, in all their astronomical calculations.

Nach Guido Reni. In the style of Guido. (Nach, German for "according to," "in the manner of," &c.)

Nadab, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for lord Howard, of Esrick or Escriek, a profligate who laid claim to great piety. Nadab offered incense with strange fire, and was slain by the Lord (Lev. x. 2); and lord Howard, while imprisoned in the Tower, is said to have mixed the consecrated wafer with a compound of roasted apples and sugar, called lamb's-wool.

Na'dir. An Arabic word, signifying that point in the heavens which is directly opposite to the zenith.

From zenith down to Nadir. From the highest point of elevation to the lowest depth.

Na'dir. A representation of the planetary system.

We then lost (1691) a most beautiful table, fabricated of different metals: . . . Saturn was of copper, Jupiter of gold, Mars of iron, the sun of latten, Mercury of amber, Venus of tin, and the Moon of silver. . . . It was the most celebrated nadir in all England. —Ingulphus.

Nadir Shah. Kouli Khan, a Persian warrior. (1687-1717.)

Nag, Nagging. Constant fault-finding. (Danish, knag, a knot in wood; Swedish, knagg; Irish, cnag; our snag, a short, rough branch, or the stumpy part of a tree left in "clearing" a plot of ground.) As these snags worry and annoy, so knots of temper expressed in words tease and irritate. We call a slight but constant pain, like a tooth-ache, a nagging pain.

Nag's Head Consecration. On the passing of the first Act of Uniformity in queen Elizabeth's reign, fourteen bishops vacated their sees, and all the other sees, except Llandaff, were at the time vacant. The question was how to obtain consecration so as to preserve the succession called "apostolic" unbroken, as Llandaff refused to officiate at Parker's consecration. In this dilemma (the story runs) Scory, a deposed bishop, was sent for, and officiated at the Nag's Head tavern in Cheapside, thus transmitting the succession.

Nâga. Deified serpents; the king of them is Sesha, the sacred serpent of Vishnu. —Hindu mythology.

Naggleton (Mr. and Mrs.). A husband and wife always nagging each other. The term arises from a series of papers which appeared in Punch in the years 1864-5, which represent this husband and wife as eternally jarring about broken straws and wilful misunderstandings.

Na'glfar. The giants' ship, in which they will embark on "the last day" to give battle to the gods. It is made of the nails of the dead. (Old Norse, nagl, a human nail, and fara, to make). —Scandinavian mythology.

Naïds. Nymphs of lakes, fountains, rivers, and streams. —Classical mythology.

Nail. To pay down upon the nail—i.e., ready money. O'Keefe says: In the centre of Limerick Exchange is a pillar with a circular plate of copper about three feet in diameter, called the nail. On this metal disk the earnest of all stock-exchange bargains has to be paid ("Recollections"). A similar custom prevailed at Bristol, where were four pillars called nails in front of the exchange for a similar purpose.

I have nailed it. Secured it to myself. The allusion is to the custom above referred to; but the Jews had a similar expression, and derived it from the wooden nails by which they made their tents fast to the ground. Ezra says God gave the Jews "a nail in his holy place . . . to give them a little reviving in their bondage" (ix. 5), meaning a permanent place in his sanctuary, a "dwelling in the house of the Lord for ever."

The nails with which our Lord was fastened to the cross were, in the Middle Ages, objects of great reverence. Sir John Maundeville says, "He had two in his bondes, and two in his feet; and of on of theise the emperour of Canstantynoble made a brydille to his hors, to bere him in bataylle; and thorge virtue thereof he overcam his enemies" (c. vii.). (See IRON CROWN.)

Nails driven into cottage walls. This was a Roman practice, under the notion that it kept off the plague. L. Manlius was named dictator (A.U.C. 390) "to drive the nail."

Our cottagers still nail horseshoes to thresholds to ward off evil spirits. Mr. Coutts, the banker, had two rusty horseshoes fastened on the highest step outside Holly Lodge.

Nail-money. Six crowns given to the "roy des harnois" for affixing the arms of a knight to the pavilion.

Naileh. An Arab idol in the form of a woman; it was brought from Syria, and placed in the El-Marweh, near the temple of Mecca.

Nain Rouge. A Lutin or goblin of Normandy, kind to fishermen. There is another called Le petit homme rouge.

Naïveté (pron. nah'-eve-ty). Ingenious simplicity; the artless innocence of one ignorant of the conventions of society. The term is also applied to poetry, painting, and sculpture. The word is formed from the Latin natus, natura, &c., meaning nature without art.

Naked Truth. The fable says that Truth and Falsehood went bathing: Falsehood came first out of the water, and dressed herself in Truth's garments. Truth, unwilling to take those of Falsehood, went naked.

Nakeer. (See MUNKAR.)

Nala, a legendary king of India, whose love for Damayanti and subsequent misfortunes have supplied subjects for numerous poems. Dean Milman has translated into English the episode from the "Mahābhārata," and W. Yates the famous Sanskrit poem called "Nalodaya."

Na'ma. A daughter of the race of man who was beloved by the angel Zaraph. Her one wish was to love purely, intensely, and holily; but she fixed her love on a seraph, a creature, more than on her Creator; therefore, in punishment, she was condemned to abide on earth "unchanged in heart and frame" so long as the earth endureth; but when time is no more, both she and her angel lover will be admitted into those courts "where love never dies."—Moore, "Loves of the Angels," story iii.

Namby Pamby. Pap for infant minds. Pope applied the word to the verses addressed to lord Carteret's children by Ambrose Phillips. The first word is a baby-way of pronouncing Amby—i.e., Ambrose. The latter is a jingling corruption of the surname. Mr. Macaulay says this sort of verse "has been so called after the name of its author."

Name.

What's in a name? that which we call a rose
By any other name would smell as sweet.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 2.

Names of the Puritans.

Praise-God Barebones. A leather-seller in Fleet Street.

If-Jesus-Christ-had-not-died-for-thee-thou-hadst-been-damned Barebones. His son; usually called Damned Dr. Barebones.

Namou'na. An enchantress, born long before any other created thing, yet still as young and beautiful as ever.—Persian mythology.

Na'mous. The envoy and familiar minister of Mahomet in Paradise.

Namus or Namo (in "Orlando Furioso"). Duke of Bavaria. He was one of Charlemagne's twelve peers.

Nancy. The sailor's choice in Dibden's exquisite song beginning "'Twas past meridian half past four." At half-past four he parted by signal from his Nancy; at eight he bade her a long adieu; next morn a storm arose, and four sailors were washed overboard, "but love forbade the waves to snatch our tar from Nancy;" when the storm ceased an enemy appeared, but when the battle was hottest our gallant friend "put up a prayer and thought on Nancy."

Miss Nancy. Mrs. Anna Oldfield, a celebrated actress, buried in Westminster Abbey. She died in 1730, and her remains lay in state, attended by two noblemen. She was buried in a "very fine Brussels lace head-dress, a holland shift with a tucker and double-ruffles of the same lace, a pair of new kid gloves," &c.

"Odious! in woollen? 'twould a saint provoke!"
Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke.
Pope, "Moral Essays."

Miss Nancy. An effeminate young man.

Nancy of the Vale. A village maiden who preferred Strephon to the gay lordlings who sought her.—Shenstone.

Nandi. Goddess of joy.—Indian mythology.

Nankeen. So called from Nankin, in China, where it is largely manufactured.

Nanna. Wife of Balder. When the blind-god slew her husband, she threw herself upon his funeral pile and was burnt to death.

Nannacus (Latin), Nannakos (Greek). The king who predicted Deucalion's Flood.

Nannie, to whom Burns has addressed several of his songs, was Miss Fleming, daughter of a farmer in the parish of Tarbolton, Ayrshire.

Nantes (1 syl.). Edict of Nantes. The decree of Henri IV. of France, published from Nantes in 1598, securing freedom of religion to all Protestants. Louis XIV. repealed this edict in 1685.

Naph'tha. The drug used by Mede'a for anointing the wedding robe of Glauce, daughter of king Cre'on, whereby she was burnt to death on the morning appointed for her marriage with Jason.

Napier's Bones. A method invented by baron Napier of Merchiston, for shortening the labour of trigonometrical calculations. Certain figures are arranged on little slips of paper or ivory, and simply by shifting these slips the result required is obtained. They are called bones because the baron used bone or ivory rods instead of cardboard.

Napoleon. (See CHAUVIN, and BOUSTRAPA.)

Napoleon of Mexico. The emperor Augusto Iturbidë. (1784-1824.)

Napoleon of Peace. Louis Philippe, king of the French. (1773, 1830-1848, 1850.)

Nappy Ale. Strong ale is so called, either because it makes one nappy, or else because it contains a nap or frothy head.

Nar'aka. The hell of the Hindus. It has twenty-eight divisions, in some of which the victims are mangled by ravens and owls; in others they will be doomed to swallow cakes boiling hot, or walk over burning sands. Each division has its name: Rurava (fearful) is for liars and false-witnesses; Rodha (obstruction) for those who plunder a town, kill a cow, or strangle a man; Sûkara (swine) for drunkards and stealers of gold; &c.

Narcissa, in the "Night Thoughts," was Elizabeth Lee, Dr. Young's step-daughter. In Night iii. the poet says she was clandestinely buried at Montpelier, because, being a Protestant, she was "denied the charity that dogs enjoy." (For Pope's Narcissa see NANCY.)

Narcissus saw his image in a fountain, and fell in love with it. He vainly attempted to kiss the shadow, but not being able to do so killed himself. His blood was changed into the narcissus flower.—Ovid, "Metamorphoses," iii. 346, &c.

Nardac. The highest title of honour in the realm of Lilliput. Gulliver received this distinction for carrying off the whole fleet of the Blefuscu'dians.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Lilliput, v.).

Nareda (3 syl.). Sons of Brahma.—Hindu mythology.

Nargal. The guardian of hidden treasure, to be approached by offerings only.—Astrological mythology.

Narrowdale Noon. One o'clock. The top of Narrowdale Hills, in Staffordshire, is so high that the inhabitants under it never see the sun for one quarter of the year, and when it reappears they do not see it till one o'clock, which they call Narrowdale Noon.

Nars. Divinity of the ancient Arabs, represented under the form of an eagle.

Narses (2 syl.). A Roman general against the Goths; the terror of children. (473-568.) (See BOGIE.)

The name of Narses was the formidable sound with which the Assyrian mothers were accustomed to terrify their infants.—Gibbon, "Decline and Fall," &c., viii. 219.

Narwhal. Drinking cups made of the bone of the narwhal used to be greatly valued, from the supposition that they counteracted the fatal effects of poison.

Naseby (Northamptonshire) is the Saxon nafula, the navel. It is so called because it was considered the navel or centre of England. Similarly Delphi was called the "navel of the earth," and in this temple was a white stone kept bound with a red ribbon, to represent the navel and umbilical cord.

Nasi. The president of the Jewish Sanhedrim.

Na'so. The "surname" of Ovid, the Roman poet, author of "Metamorphoses." Naso means "nose," hence Holofernes' pun: "And why Naso, but for smelling out the odoriferous flowers of fancy."—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 2.

Nasser. The Arabian merchant whose fables are the delight of the Arabs. D'Herbelot tells us that when Mahomet read to them the history of the Old Testament, they cried out with one voice that Nasser's tales were the best; upon which Mahomet gave his malediction on Nasser, and all who read him.

Na'strond (dead-man's region). The worst marsh in the infernal regions, where serpents pour forth venom incessantly from the high walls. Here the murderer and the perjured will be doomed to live for ever. (Old Norse, na, a dead body; and strond, a strand.)—Scandinavian mythology.

Nathan'iel (Sir). A grotesque curate in Shakespeare's "Love's Labour's Lost."

Nation of Gentlemen. So George IV. called the Scotch when, in 1822, he visited that country.

Nation of Shopkeepers. So Napoleon called the English by way of contempt.

National Anthem. Both the music and words were composed by Dr.

Henry Carey in 1740. In Antwerp Cathedral is a MS. copy of it which affirms that the words and music were by Dr. John Bull; adding that it was composed on the occasion of the discovery of Gunpowder Plot, to which the words "frustrate their knavish tricks" especially allude.

National Convention. The assembly of deputies which assumed the government of France on the overthrow of the throne in 1792. It succeeded the National Assembly.

National Debt. Money borrowed by the Government, on the security of the taxes, which are pledged to the lenders for the payment of interest.

National Debt.

In William III.'s reign, £15,730,439.

At the commencement of the American war, £128,583,635.

At the close thereof, £249,851,628.

At the close of the French war, £840,850,491.

Cancelled between 1817 and 1854, £85,538,790.

Created by Crimean war, £68,623,199.

In 1866, £802,842,949.

In 1868, £797,031,650; of which sum £741,190,328 was funded; £7,911,100 unfunded; £47,930,222 terminable annuities.

National Exhibition. So Douglas Jerrold called an execution at the Old Bailey. These scandals were abolished in 1863.

Nativity (The) means Christmas Day, the anniversary of the birth of Jesus.

The cave of the Nativity is under the chancel of the "Church of the Nativity." In the recess, a few feet above the ground, is a stone slab with a star cut in it, to mark the spot where the Saviour was born. Near it is a hollow scraped out of the rock, said to be the place where the infant Jesus was laid.

To cast a man's nativity is to construct a plan or map out of the position, &c., of the twelve houses which belong to him. This being done, the astrologer explains the scheme. (See HOUSES.)

Natty. Tidy, methodical and neat. (Italian netto, French net, Welsh nith, &c.)

Natty Bumppo, called "Leather Stockings." He appears in five of Fenimore Cooper's novels; as the Deerslayer; the Path-finder; the Hawk-eye (La Longue Carabine) in the "Last of the Mohicans;" Natty Bumppo in the "Pioneers;" and the Trapper in the "Prairie," in which he dies.

Natural (A). A born idiot; one on whom education can make no impression. As nature made him, so he remains.

A natural child. One not born in lawful wedlock. The Romans called the children of concubines natura'lēs, children according to nature, not according to law.

Naught (not "nought"). Naught is Na (negative), ought (anything). Saxon, naught, which is na-waught or na-wiht (no whit). The word appears in the adjective "naughty" (good for nothing). Aught is the affirmative, and na-ought or naught the negative.

Navigation. Father of Navigation. Don Henrique, duke of Viseo, the greatest man that Portugal ever produced. (1394-1460.)

Father of British Inland Navigation. Francis Egerton, duke of Bridgewater. (1736-1803.)

Navvi. A contraction of navigator. Some half century ago, navigators were employed on the inland canal and river navigation, and the same class of men supplied the best hands for the midland railways. Its derivation from the Danish nabbi, neighbours or mates, is improbable.

Nay-word. Pass-word. Slender, in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," says—

We have a nay-word how to know each other. I come to her in white and cry Mum, she cries Budget, and by that we know one another.—Shakespeare.

Nayres (1 syl.). The aristocratic class of India. (See POLEAS.)

Nazaræans or Nazarenes (3 syl.). A sect of Jewish Christians, who believed Christ to be the Messiah, that he was born of the Holy Ghost, and that he possessed a divine nature; but they nevertheless conformed to the Mosaic rites and ceremonies. (See below.)

Nazare'ne (3 syl.). A native of Nazareth; hence our Lord is so called (John xviii. 5, 7, Acts xxiv. 5).

Nazarite (3 syl.). One separated or set apart to the Lord by a vow. These Nazarites were to refrain from strong drinks, and to suffer their hair to grow. (Hebrew, nazar, to separate. Numb. vi. 1-21.)

Ne plus ultra (Latin). The perfection or most perfect state to which a thing can be brought. We have Ne-plus-ultra corkscrews, and a multitude of other things.

Ne Sutor, &c. (See COBBLER.)

Neæra. Any sweetheart or lady-love. She is mentioned by Horace, Virgil, and Tibullus.

To sport with Amaryllis in the shade.
Or with the tangles of Neæra's hair.
Milton, "Lycidas."

Neapolitan. A native of Naples; pertaining to Naples.

Nearer, my God, to Thee. By Sarah Flower Adams, musical composer and authoress, who died 1848.

Neb'uchadnezzar. The prophet Daniel says that Nebuchadnezzar walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon and said, "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built . . . by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?" And "the same hour . . . he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws" (iv. 29-33).

Nec. A water spright or lost spirit, according to Scandinavian mythology, doomed to live eternally in a watery grave.

Necessity. Make a virtue of necessity.—Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona," iv. 1.

Necessity the tyrant's plea.—Milton, "Paradise Lost," book iv., verse 393.

Neck. Oh that the Roman people had but one neck, that I might cut it off at a blow! The words of Calig'ula, the Roman emperor.

Neck and Crop. Entirely. The crop is the gorge of a bird.

Neck and Heels. I bundled him out neck and heels. There was a certain punishment formerly in vogue which consisted in bringing the chin and knees of the culprit forcibly together, and in this state thrusting the victim into a cage.

Neck or Nothing. Desperate. A racing phrase; to win by a neck or to be nowhere—i.e., not counted at all because unworthy notice.

Neck-verse (Psalm li. 1). "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions." This verse was so called because it was the trial-verse of those who claimed benefit of clergy; and if they could read it the ordinary of Newgate said Legit ut clericus, and the convict saved his neck, being only burnt in the hand and set at liberty.

Neck-weed. A slang term for hemp, of which the hangman's rope is made.

Necklace. A necklace of coral or white bryony beads used to be worn round the necks of children to aid their teething. Necklaces of hyoseyamus or henbane-root have been recommended for the same purpose. In Italy coral becloques are worn as a charm against the "evil eye."

The diamond necklace (1785). Cardinal de Rohan nursed for ten years a silly liking for Marie Antoinette. The countess de Lamotte, to make capital of this folly, induced the churchman to believe that the queen reciprocated his passion, and after worming from him several sums of money, persuaded him to buy for £700,000, as a present for the queen, a diamond necklace made by Boehmer for Madame Dubarry. The cardinal swallowed the bait, handed the necklace to the countess to give to the queen, and received a letter of acknowledgment signed Marie Antoinette de France. The countess in reality sold the necklace in England, but Boehmer not being paid, applied to the queen for his money, and as the queen denied all knowledge of the matter, brought an action against her. The trial lasted nine months, and created immense scandal.

The fatal necklace. Cadmos received on his wedding-day the present of a necklace, which proved fatal to every one who possessed it. Some say that Vulcan, and others that Europa gave the necklace to Cadmos.

Necromancy means prophesying by calling up the dead, as the witch of Endor called up Samuel. (Greek, nekros, the dead; manteia, prophecy.)

Nectar. Wine conferring immortality, and drunk by the gods. The Koran tells us "the righteous shall be given to drink pure wine sealed with musk." The food of the gods is Ambrosia.

Neddy. A contraction and diminutive of Mine Edward—Mine Eddy, My N'Eddy. Teddy is the French tu, toi form.

Neddy. A donkey; a variety of the word Noddy; a low cart used in Dublin. So called because its jolting keeps the riders eternally nodding.

The "Set-down" was succeeded by the Noddy, so called from its oscillating motion backwards and forwards.—"Sketches of Ireland" (1847).

Neddy. A dunce; a euphemism for "an ass."

Neddy. A life-preserver; so called from one Kennedy, whose head was broken in St. Giles's by a poker.

Need makes the old wife trot; in German, Die noht machet ein alt weib trahen; in Italian, Bisogna fa trotter la vecchia; in French, Besoin fait trotter la vieille; the Scotch say, Need gars naked men run.

Needfire. Fire obtained by friction. It has been supposed to defeat sorcery, and cure diseases assigned to witchcraft. (Swedish, gnida, to rub.)

Needham. You are on the high-road to Needham—to ruin or poverty. The pun is on the word need. Needham is in Suffolk.

Needle. To hit the needle—hit the right nail on the head, to make a perfect hit. A term in archery, equal to hitting the bull's-eye.

Negro. Fuller says a negro is "God's image cut in ebony."

Negro'ni. A princess, the friend of Lucrezia Borgia, duchess of Ferrara. She invited to a banquet the nobles who had insulted her friend, and killed them with poisoned wine.—Donizetti, "Lucrezia Borgia" (an opera).

Negus. So called from colonel Negus, who first concocted it.

Nehallenia. The Flemish deity who presided over commerce and navigation.

Ne'ithë (3 syl.). The Minerva of Egyptian mythology.

Neithe. The presiding spirit of rivers and lakes in Celtic mythology. The primitive of the word means to purify with water.

Neken. The evil spirit of the North that plays his melancholy strains in Swedish waters. — Grmm, "Deutsche Mythologie."

Neksheb. The city of Transoxia'na.

Nell's Point, in Barry Island. Famous for a well to which women resort on Holy Thursday, and having washed their eyes with the water of the well, each woman drops into it a pin.

Nem. Con. Unanimously. A contraction of the Latin nem'inē contradicentē (no one opposing).

Nem. Diss. Without a dissentient voice. (Latin, nem'inē dissentientē.)

Nem'ean Games. One of the four great national festivals of Greece, celebrated at Nem'ea, in Ar'golis, every alternate year, the first and third of each Olympiad. The victor's reward was at first a crown of olive-leaves, but subsequently a garland of ivy. Pindar has eleven odes in honour of victors at these games.

Nem'ean Lion. The first of the labours of Herculēs was to kill the Nemean lion (of Ar'golis), which infested the country and kept the people in constant alarm. Its skin was so tough that his club made no impression on the beast, so Hercules caught it in his arms and squeezed it to death. He ever after wore the skin as a mantle.

Nem'esis. Retribution, or rather the righteous anger of God. A female Greek deity, whose mother was Night.

Neol'ogy. The rationalistic interpretation of Scripture. The word is Greek, and means new-(theo)-logy. Those who accept this system are called Neol'ogians.

Neoptol'emos or Pyrrhos. Son of Achilles; called Pyrrhos from his yellow hair, and Neoptol'emos because he was a new soldier, or one that came late to the siege of Troy. According to Virgil it was this young man that slew the aged Priam. On his return home he was murdered by Orestēs, at Delphi.

Nepen'the. A drug to assuage pain and grief; a magic potion. Homer speaks of a magic potion so called, which made persons forget their sorrows and misfortunes.

Neper's Bones. (See NAPIER.)

Neph'elo-coccyg'ia. A town in the clouds built by the cuckoos. It was built to cut off from the gods the incense offered by man, so as to compel them to come to terms. — Aristoph'anes, "The Birds."

Nep'omuk. St. John Nepomuk, a native of Bohemia, was the almoner of Wenceslas IV., and refused to reveal to the emperor the confession of the empress. After having heroically endured torture, he was taken from the rack and cast into the Moldau. Nepomuk is the French né, born, and Pomuk, the village of his birth. A stone image of this saint stands on the banks of the Moldau, in Prague. (1330-1383.)

Nep'otism. An unjust elevation of our own kinsmen to places of wealth and trust at our disposal. (Latin, nepos, a nephew or kinsman.)

Nep'tune (2 syl.). The sea. In Roman mythology, the divine monarch of the ocean. (See BEN.)

Neptune opposes Apollo, in Homer's epic, which means that moisture and dryness are always antagonistic. — Eustathius.

Neptune's Horse. Hippocampēs; it had but two legs, the hinder part of the body being that of a fish.

Neptu'nian or Nept'unist. One who follows the opinion of Werner, in the belief that all the great rocks of the earth were once held in solution in water, and have been deposited as sediment. The Vulcanists or Plutonians ascribe them to the agency of fire.

Ne'reids (2 syl.). Sea-nymphs, daughters of Nereus, fifty in number.

Nereids or Nere'idēs (4 syl.). Sea-nymphs. Camoëns, in his "Lusiad," gives the names of three—Doto, Nysē, and Neri'nē; but he has spiritualised their office, and makes them the sea-guardians of the virtuous. They went before the fleet of Ga'ma, and when the treacherous pilot supplied by Zacoc'ia, king of Mozambique, steered the ship of Vasco de Gama towards a sunken rock, these guardian nymphs pressed against the prow, lifting it from the water and turning it round. The pilot looking to see the cause of this strange occurrence, beheld the rock which had nearly proved the ruin of the whole fleet (bk. ii.).

Nereus. A sea-god, represented as a very old man, whose special dominion was the Ægean Sea.

Nerine (3 syl.). One of the Nereids. (See NYSE.)

Nerissa. Portia's waiting-maid; clever, self-confident, and coquettish.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice."

Nero. Emperor of Rome. Some say he set fire to Rome to see "how Troy would look when it was in flames;" others say he forbade the flames to be put out, and went to a high tower, where he sang verses to his lute "Upon the Burning of old Troy."

A Nero. Any bloody-minded man, relentless tyrant, or evil-doer of extraordinary savagery.

Nero of the North. Christian II. of Denmark. (1480, 1534-1558, 1559.)

Nesr. An idol of the ancient Arabs. It was in the form of a vulture, and was worshipped by the tribe of Heimyer.

Nesrem. A statue some fifty cubits high, in the form of an old woman. It was hollow within for the sake of giving secret oracles.—Arabian mythology.

Nessus. Shirt of Nessus. A source of misfortune from which there is no escape; a fatal present; anything that wounds the susceptibilities. Thus *Réna*n has "the Nessus-shirt of ridicule." Hercules ordered Nessus (the centaur) to carry his wife Dejani'ra across a river. The centaur ill-treated the woman, and Hercules shot him with a poisoned arrow. Nessus, in revenge, gave Dejani'ra his tunic, saying to whomsoever she gave it would love her exclusively. Dejani'ra gave it to her husband, who was devoured by poison as soon as he put it on; but, after enduring agony, the hero threw himself on a funeral pile and was consumed.

While to my limbs th' envenomed mantle clings,
Drenched in the centaur's black malignant gore.
West, "Triumphs of the Gout" (Lucian).

Nestor. King of Pylos, in Greece; the oldest and most experienced of the chieftains who went to the siege of Troy. On his return home his kingdom was abolished and all his subjects reduced to slavery.—Homer, "Iliad."

Nestor of the chemical Revolution. A term applied by Lavoisier to Dr. Black. (1728-1799.)

Nestor of Europe. Leopold, king of Belgium. (1790, 1831-1855.)

Nestorians. Followers of Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople in the fifth century. He maintained that Christ had two distinct natures, and that Mary was the mother of his human nature, which was the mere shell or hut of the divine. (See PRESTER JOHN.)

Neth'inims. The hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of God, an office which the Gibeonites were condemned to by Joshua (Josh. ix. 27). (The word means given to God.)

Nettle. Camden says the Romans brought over the seed of this plant, that they might have nettles to chafe their limbs with when they encountered the cold of Britain.

Nettoyer (French). "Nettoyer une personne, c'est à dire luy gagner tout son argent."—Oudin, "Curiositez Françaises."

Our English phrase, "I cleaned him out," is precisely tantamount to it.

Nevers. Il conte di Nevers, the husband of Valentina. Being asked by the governor of the Louvre to join in the massacre of the Protestants, he replied that his family contained a long list of warriors, but not one assassin. He was one of the Catholics who fell in the dreadful slaughter.—Meyerbeer, "Gli Ugonotti" (an opera).

New Christians. Certain Jews of Portugal, who yielded to compulsion and suffered themselves to be baptised, but in secret observed the Mosaic ceremonies. (Fifteenth century.)

New Jerusalem. The paradise of Christians, in allusion to Rev. xxi.

New Man. The regenerated man. In Scripture phrase the unregenerated state is called the old man (q. v.).

New Style. The reformed or Gregorian calendar, adopted in England in 1753.

New Testament. The oldest MSS. extant are:—(1) The Codex Sinaiticus (S), published at the expense of Alexander II. of Russia since the Crimean war. This codex contains nearly the whole of the Old and New Testaments, and was discovered in the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, by Constantius Tischendorf. It is ascribed to the fourth century. (2) The Codex Vaticanus (B), in the Vatican Library. Written on vellum in Egypt about the fourth century. (3) The Codex Alexandrinus (A), belonging to the fifth century. It was presented to Charles I. in 1628 by Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Alexandria, and is preserved in the British Museum. It consists of four folio volumes on parchment, and contains the Old and New Testaments, except the first twenty-four chapters of St. Matthew, and the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.

New World. America; the Eastern Hemisphere is called the Old World.

New-year's Gifts. The Greeks transmitted the custom to the Romans, and the Romans to the early Britons. The Roman presents were called strenæ, whence the French term étienne (a New-year's gift). Our forefathers used to bribe the magistrates with gifts on New-year's day—a custom abolished by law in 1290, but even down to the reign of James II. the monarchs received their tokens.

N.B.—Nonius Marcellus says that Iatius, king of the Sabines, was presented with some branches of trees cut from the forest sacred to the goddess Strenia (strength), on New-year's day, and from this happy omen established the custom.

News. The letters ^NW^SE used to be prefixed to newspapers to show that they obtained information from the four quarters of the world, and the supposition that our word news is thence derived is at least ingenious; but the old-fashioned way of spelling the word, newes, is fatal to the conceit. The French nouvelles seems to be the real scion. (See NOTARICA.)

News is conveyed by letter, word, or mouth.
And comes to us from North, East, West, and South.
Walt's "Recreations."

Newcastle (Northumberland) was once called Moncaster, from the monks who settled there in the Saxon times; it was called Newcastle from the castle built there by Robert, son of the Conqueror, in 1080, to defend the neighbourhood from the Scots.

Newcastle (Staffordshire) is so called from the new castle built to supply the place of an older one which stood at Chesterton-under-Line, about two miles distant.

Carry coals to Newcastle. A work of supererogation, Newcastle being the great seat of coals. The Latins have Aquam mari infundere (to pour water into the sea); Stella cœli addere (to add stars to the sky); Noctua Athenæ (to carry owls to Athens, which abounded in them).

Newcome (Colonel). A character in Thackeray's novel called "The Newcomes."

Newcomes. Strangers newly arrived.

Newgate. Before this was set up, London had but three gates: Aldgate, Aldersgate, and Ludgate. The new one was added in the reign of Henry I.

Newgate. Nash, in his "Pierce Peni-lesse," says that Newgate is "a common name for all prisons, as homo is a common name for a man or woman."

Newgate fashion. Two by two. Prisoners used to be conveyed to Newgate coupled together in twos. (See "1 Henry IV.," iii. 3.—Bardolph.)

Newgate Fringe. The hair worn under the chin, or between the chin and the neck; so called because it occupies the position of the rope when men are about to be hanged.

Newton (Sir Isaac) discovered the prismatic colours of light. (1642-1727.)

Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night.
God said, "Let Newton be," and all was light.
Pope.

The Newton of harmony. Jean Philippe Rameau was so called from his work entitled a "Dissertation on the Principles of Harmony." (1683-1764.)

Newtonian Philosophy. The astronomical system at present received, together with that of universal gravitation. So called after Sir Isaac Newton, who established the former and discovered the latter.

Ni'belung. A mythical king of Norway, whose subjects are called the Nibelungers, and territory the Nibelungon-land. There were two contemporary kings in this realm, against whom Siegfried, prince of the Netherlands, fought. He slew the twelve giants who formed their paladins with 700 of their chiefs, and made their country tributary (Lay iii). The word is from nebel (darkness), and means the children of mist or darkness. (See NIBELUNGEN-LIED.)

Nibelungen Hoard. A mythical mass of gold and precious stones, which Siegfried obtained from the Nibelungs, and gave to his wife Kriemhild as her marriage portion. It was guarded by Albric the dwarf. After the murder of Siegfried, his widow removed the hoard to Worms; here Hagan seized it, and buried it secretly beneath "the Rhine at Loehham," intending at a future time to enjoy it, "but that was ne'er to be." Kriemhild married Etzel with the view of avenging her wrongs. In time Günther, with Hagan and a host of Burgundians, went to visit king Etzel, and Kriemhild stirred up a great broil, in which a most terrible slaughter ensued. (See KRIEMHILD.)

'Twas much as twelve huge waggons in four whole nights and days
Could carry from the mountain down to the salt-sea bay,
Though to and fro each waggon thrice journeyed every day.

It was made up of nothing but precious stones and gold;
Were all the world bought from it, and down the value told,
Not a mark the less would there be left than erst
there was, I ween. "Nibelungen-Lied," xix.

Nibelungen-Lied. A famous German epic of the thirteenth century, probably a compilation of different lays. It is divided into two parts, one ending with the death of Siegfried, and the other with the death of Kriemhild, his widow. The first part contains the marriage of Günther, king of Burgundy, with queen Brunhild; the marriage of Siegfried with Kriemhild, his death by Hagan, the removal of the "Nibelung hoard" to Burgundy, and its seizure by Hagan, who buried it somewhere under the Rhine. This part contains nineteen lays, divided into 1,138 four-line stanzas. The second part contains the marriage of the widow Kriemhild with king Etzel, the visit of the Burgundians to the court of the Hunnish king, and the death of all the principal characters, including Hagan and Kriemhild. This part, sometimes called "The Nibelungen-Nôt" from the last three words, contains twenty lays, divided into 1,271 four-line stanzas. The two parts contain thirty-nine lays, 2,459 stanzas, or 9,836 lines. The subject is based on a legend in the Sagas.

Nibelungen-Nôt. The second part of the famous German epic called the Nibelungen-Lied (q.v.).

Nibelungers. Whoever possessed the "Nibelung Hoard" (q.v.). Thus at one time certain people of Norway were so called, but when Siegfried possessed himself of the hoard he was called king of the Nibelungers; and at the death of Siegfried, when the hoard was removed to Burgundy, the Burgundians were so called. (See NIBELUNG.)

Nic Frog. (See FROG.)

Nice. The Council of Nice. The first œcumenical council of the Christian church, held under Constantine the Great, at Nice or Nicæa, in Asia Minor, to condemn the Arian heresy (325). The seventh œcumenical council was also held at Nice (787).

Nicene Creed (Ni-seen) drawn up chiefly by Hosius of Corduba. Down to the words "I believe in the Holy Ghost," formed part of the Nicene formulary; the rest was added in 391 to guard against the heresy of Macedonius.

Niche. A niche in the temple of Fame. The temple of Fame was the Pantheon, built as a receptacle for illustrious Frenchmen. A niche in the temple is a place for a monument recording your name and deeds.

Nicholas (St.). The patron saint of boys, as St. Catherine is of girls. In Germany, a person assembles the children of a family or school on the 6th December (the eve of St. Nicholas), and distributes gilt nuts and sweetmeats; but if any naughty child is present, he receives the redoubtable punishment of the klunhauf. The same as Santa Claus and the Dutch Kriss Kringle (q.v.).

St. Nicholas. Patron saint of parish clerks. This is because he was the patron of scholars, who used to be called clerks.

St. Nicholas. Patron saint of sailors, because he allayed a storm on a voyage to the Holy Land.

St. Nicholas. The patron saint of Russia.

St. Nicholas. The patron saint of Aberdeen.

St. Nicholas, in Christian art, is represented in episcopal robes, and has either three purses or golden balls, or three children, as his distinctive symbols. The three purses are in allusion to the three purses given by him to three sisters to enable them to marry. The three children allude to the legend that an Asiatic gentleman sent his three boys to school at Athens, but told them to call on St. Nicholas for his benediction; they stopped at Myra for the night, and the innkeeper, to secure their baggage, murdered them in bed, and put their mangled bodies into a pickling tub with some pork, intending to sell the whole as such. St. Nicholas had a vision of the whole affair, and went to the inn, when the man confessed the crime, and St. Nicholas raised the murdered boys to life again. (See Hone's "Everyday Book," vol. i., col. 1556; Maitre Wace, "Metrical Life of St. Nicholas.")

Clerks or Knights of St. Nicholas. Thieves, so called because St. Nicholas was their patron saint; not that he aided them in their wrong-doing, but because on one occasion he induced some thieves to restore their plunder. Probably St. Nicholas is simply a pun for Nick, and thieves may be called the devil's clerks or knights with much propriety.

I think yonder come prancing down the hills from Kingston a couple of St. Nicholas's Clerks.—Rowley, "Match at Midnight" (1333).

Nick, in Scandinavian mythology, is a water-wraith or kelpie. There are nicks in sea, lake, river, and waterfall. Both Catholic and Protestant clergy have laboured to stir up an aversion to these beings. They are sometimes represented as half child, half horse, the hoofs being reversed, and sometimes as old men sitting on rocks wringing the water from their hair. In Denmark, when one is drowned, they say Nikken tog ham bort (Nick took him away); and when a drowned body is recovered, if the nose is red, they say, Nikken har suet ham (Nick has sucked him). This kelpie must not be confounded with the nix (q.v.).

Old Nick is the Scandinavian wraith under the form and fashion of an old man. Butler says the word is derived from Nicholas Machiavel, but this can be only a poetical satire, as the term existed many years before the birth of that Florentine.

Nick Machiavel had ne'er a trick
(Though he gives name to our Old Nick)
But was below the least of these.
"Hudibras," iii. 1.

Old Nick. Grimm says the word Nick is Neken or Nikken, the evil spirit of the North. In Scandinavia there is scarcely a river without its Nikr or wraith. (See NICKA-NAN, NICKAR.)

He nicked it. Won, hit, accomplished it. The allusion is to a game still common in Paris, where a number of persons ride in a round-about; each rider is furnished with a pointed stick, and when the machine is in full career, tries to nick a ring suspended in the course. Those who nick most rings are accounted the most skilful.

In the nick of time. Just at the right moment. The allusion is to tallies marked with nicks or notches. Shakespeare has "'Tis now the prick of noon" ("Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4), in allusion to the custom of pricking tallies with a pin, as they do at Cambridge University still. If a man entered chapel just before the doors closed, he would be just in time to get nicked or pricked, and would be at the nick or prick of time.

Nicka-Nan Night. The night preceding Shrove Tuesday is so called in Cornwall, because boys play impish tricks and practical jokes on the unwary.

Nickar or Hnickar. The name assumed by Odin when he impersonates the destroying principle.—Grimm, "Deutsche Mythologie."

Nicker. One who nicks or hits a mark exactly. Certain night-larkers, whose game was to break windows with halfpence, assumed this name in the early part of the eighteenth century.

His scattered pence the flying Nicker flings,
And with the copper shower the casement rings.
Gay, "Trivia," iii.

Nickleby (Mrs.). An endless talker, always introducing something quite foreign to the matter in hand, and pluming herself on her penetration.—Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Nickname. "An eke name," written A neke name. An additional name, an ag-nomen. The "eke" of a bee-hive is the piece added to the bottom to enlarge the hive. (See NOW-A-DAYS.)

Nicknames. National Nicknames:

For an American of the United States, "Brother Jonathan" (q.v.).

For a Dutchman, "Nic Frog" (q.v.), and "Mynheer Cosh" (q.v.).

For an Englishman, "John Bull." (See BULL.)

For a Frenchman, "Crapaud" (q.v.), Johnny or Jean, Robert Macaire.

For French Canadians, "Jean Baptiste."

For French Reformers, "Brissotins" (q.v.); French Peasantry, "Jacques Bonhomme."

For a German, "Cousin Michael" (q.v.).

For an Irishman, "Paddy."

For a Londoner, "A Cockney" (q.v.).

For a Russian, "A Bear."

For a Scot, "Sawney" (q.v.).

For a Swiss, "Colin Tampon" (q.v.).

For a Turk, "Infidel."

Nick'nev'en. A gigantic malignant hag of Scotch superstition. Dunbar has well described this spirit in his "Flyting of Dunbar and Kennedy."

Nicola'itans. The followers of Nicolaös, in the second century. They were Gnostics in doctrine and Epicureans in practice.

Nicolas. (See NICHOLAS.)

Nie'otine (3 syl.) is so named from Jean Nicot, lord of Villemain, who purchased some tobacco at Lisbon in 1560, introduced it into France, and had the honour of fixing his name on the plant. Our word tobacco is from the Indian tabaco (the tube used by the Indians for inhaling the smoke, which by them is called petuni or cohoba).

Nidhögg. The monster serpent, hid in the pit Hvergelmer, which for ever gnaws at the roots of the mundane ash-tree Yggdrasil.—Scandinavian mythology.

Nie'mi. A lake and mountain in Lapland, where guardian spirits, called Haltios, are said to dwell.

Nifl-heim (2 syl., vapour-home). The region of endless cold and everlasting night, ruled over by Hela. It consists of nine worlds, to which are consigned those who die of disease or old age. This region existed "from the beginning" in the North, and in the middle thereof was the well Hvergelmeer, from which flowed twelve rivers. (Old Norse, nifl, mist; and heimr, home.) In the South was the world called Muspelheim (q.v.).—Scandinavian mythology. (See HVERGELMER.)

Nigger Songs are chiefly composed by Stephen C. Foster, of Pittsburgh, who died 1864. Among others the following are from his pen:—

Uncle Ned, published 1846.	The Old Folks at Home.
Oh Susannah.	My Old Kentucky Home.
	Old Dog Tray.

Nightingale. Tereus, king of Thrace, fetched Philome'la to visit his wife; but when he reached the "solitudes of Helas" he dishonoured her, and cut out her tongue that she might not reveal his conduct. Tereus told his wife that Philomela was dead, but Philomela made her story known by weaving it into a peplus, which she sent to her sister, the wife of Tereus, whose name was Procne. Procne, out of revenge, cut up her own son and served it to Tereus; but as soon as the king discovered it he pursued his wife, who fled to Philomela, her sister. To put an end to the sad tale, the gods changed all three into birds: Tereus became the hawk, his wife the swallow, and Philomela the nightingale.

Arcadian nightingales. Asses.

Nightmare. A sensation in sleep as if something heavy were sitting on our breast. (From the Saxon mara, an incubus; Hebrew, maria, a demon or evil spirit.) This sensation used to be called in French, Cochemar (the sow-devil), because it resembles the dull lifeless weight of a fat sow; and anciently it was not unfrequently called the Night-hag, or the riding of the witch. Färseli used to eat raw beef and pork chops for supper to produce nightmare, that he might draw the horrible creations. (See MARE'S NEST.)

I do believe that the witch we call Mara has been dealing with you.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Betrothed," ch. xv.

Nightmare of Europe. Napoleon Bonaparte. (1769, 1804-1814, 1821.)

Nightshade is called deadly, not so much because it is poisonous as because it was used to blacken the eyes in mourning. It was the plant of mourning for the dead.

Nihilo. Ex nihilo nihil fit. From nothing comes nothing—i.e., every effect must have a cause. It is an Epicurean axiom to prove the eternity of matter. We now apply the phrase as equivalent to "You cannot get blood from a stone." You cannot expect clever work from one who has no brains; you cannot expect fruits of the earth without ploughing and sowing.

Nile. The Egyptians say that the swelling of the Nile is caused by the tears of Isis. The feast of Isis is celebrated at the anniversary of the death of Osiris, when Isis is supposed to mourn for her husband.

Hero of the Nile. Horatio lord Nelson. (1758—1805.)

Nilica or Sephalica. A plant in the blossoms of which the bees sleep.

Nimbus characterises authority and power, not sanctity. The colour indicates the character of the person so invested:—the nimbus of the Trinity is gold; of angels, apostles, and the Virgin Mary, either red or white; of ordinary saints, violet; of Judas, black; of Satan, some very dark colour. The form is generally a circle or half-circle, but that of Deity is often triangular.

Nimini-Pimini. Affected firmness. Lady Emily, in the "Heiress," tells Miss Alscrip the way to become a Paphian Minp is to stand before a glass and keep pronouncing nimini pipini. "The lips cannot fail to take the right plie."—"General Burgoyne," iii. 2.

This conceit has been borrowed by Charles Dickens in his "Little Dorrit," where Mrs. General tells Amy Dorrit—

Papa gives a pretty form to the lips. Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prism. You will find it servicable if you say to yourself on entering a room, Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and prism, prunes and prism.

Nimrod. "A mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9), which the Targum says means a "sinful hunting of the sons of men." Pope says of him, he was "a mighty hunter, and his prey was man;" so also Milton interprets the phrase.—"Paradise Lost," xii.

Nimrod. Any tyrant or devastating warrior.

Nimrod, in the Quarterly Review, is the nom-de-plume of Charles James Apperley, of Denbighshire, who was passionately fond of hunting. Mr. Pittman, the proprietor, kept for him a stud of hunters. His best productions are "The Chase, the Turf, and the Road." (1777-1843.)

Nincompoop. A poor thing of a man. A corruption of the Latin non compos [mentis].

Nine. Nine, five, and three are mystical numbers—the diapa'son, diapentë, and diatri'on of the Greeks. Nine consists of a trinity of trinities. According to the Pythagorean numbers, man is a full chord, or eight notes, and deity comes next. Three, being the trinity, represents a perfect unity; twice three is the perfect dual; and thrice three is the perfect plural. This explains the use of nine as a mystical number, and also as an exhaustive plural, and consequently no definite number, but a simple representative of plural perfection. (See DIAPASON.)

(1) Nine indicating perfection or completion:—

Deucalion's ark, made by the advice of Prometheus, was tossed about for nine days, when it stranded on the top of Mount Parnassus.

Dressed to the nines or Dressed up to the nines. To perfection, from head to foot.

There are nine earths. Hela is goddess of the ninth. Milton speaks of "nine-folded spheres."—"Arcades."

There are nine worlds in Niflheim.

There are nine heavens. (See HEAVENS.)

Gods. Macaulay makes Porsenna swear by the nine gods.

There are nine orders of angels. (See ANGELS.)

There are the nine korrigan or fays of Armorica.

There were nine muses.

There were nine Gallicenæ or virgin priestesses of the ancient Gallic oracle. The serpents or Nagas of Southern Indian worship are nine in number.

There are nine worthies (q.v.); and nine worthies of London.

There were nine rivers of hell, according to classic mythology. Milton says the gates of hell are "thrice three-fold: three folds are brass, three iron, three of adamantine rock. They had nine folds, nine plates, and nine linings."—"Paradise Lost," ii. 645.

Fallen angels. Milton says, when they were cast out of heaven, "Nine days they fell."—"Paradise Lost," vi. 871.

Vulcan, when kicked out of heaven, was nine days falling, and then lighted on the island Lemnos.

Nice or nimble as ninepence (q.v.).

(2) Examples of the use of nine as an exhaustive plural:—

Nine tailors make a man, does not mean the number nine in the ordinary acceptance, but simply the plural of tailor without relation to number. As a tailor is not so robust and powerful as the ordinary run of men, it requires more than one to match a man.

A nine days' wonder is a wonder that lasts more than a day; here nine equals "several."

A cat has nine lives—i.e., a cat is more tenacious of life than animals in general.

Possession is nine points of the law—i.e., several points, or every advantage a person can have short of right.

There are nine crowns recognised in heraldry. (See HERALDRY.)

A fée asked a Norman peasant to change babes with her, but the peasant replied, "No, not if your child were nine times fairer than my own."—"Fairy Mythology," p. 473.

(3) Nine as a mystic number. Examples of its superstitious use:—

The Abrucatalabra was worn nine days, and then flung into a river.

Cadency. There are nine marks of cadency.

Cat. The whip for punishing evil-doers is a cat o' nine tails, from the superstitious notion that a flogging by a "trinity of trinities" would be both more sacred and more efficacious.

Diamonds. (See "Diamond Jousts," under the word DIAMOND.)

Fairies. In order to see the fairies, a person is directed to put "nine grains of wheat on a four-leaved clover."

Hel has dominion over nine worlds.

Hydra. The hydra had nine heads. (See HYDRA.)

Leases used to be granted for 999 years, that is three-three times three-three. Even now they run for ninety-nine years, the dual of a trinity of trinities.

At the Lemuria, held by the Romans on the 9th, 11th, and 13th of May, persons haunted threw black beans over their heads, pronouncing nine times the words: "Avaunt, ye spectres from this house!" and the exorcism was complete. (See Ovid's "Fasti.")

Muggies. To see nine magpies is most unlucky. (See MAGPIE.)

Odin's ring dropped eight other rings every ninth night.

Ordeals. In the ordeal by fire, nine hot ploughshares were laid lengthwise at unequal distances.

Peas. If a servant finds nine green peas in a peascod, she lays it on the lintel of the kitchen-door, and the first man that enters in is to be her cavalier.

Seal. The people of Feroes say that the seal casts off its skin every ninth month, and assumes a human form to sport about the land.—"Thiele," iii. 51.

Styx encompassed the infernal regions in nine circles.

Toast. We drink a Three-times-three to those most highly honoured.

Witches. The weird sisters in "Macbeth" sang, as they danced round the cauldron: "Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine, and thrice again to make up nine;" and then declared "the charm wound up."

Wresting Thread. Nine knots are made on black wool as a charm for a sprained ankle.

(4) Promiscuous examples:—

Niobe's children lay nine days in their blood before they were buried by the gods.

Nine of Diamonds (q.v.). The curse of Scotland.

There are nine Mandarins in the empire of China, distinguished by the colour of a button on the apex of their cap. (See MANDARIN.)

The followers of Jai'na, a heterodox sect of the Hindus, believe all objects are classed under nine categories. (See JAINAS.)

Nine Crosses. Altar crosses, processional crosses, roods on lofts, reliquary crosses, consecration crosses, marking crosses, pectoral crosses, spire crosses, and crosses pendant over altars.—Pugin, "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments."

Nine Crowns. (See CROWNS.)

Nine Days' Wonder. Something that causes a great sensation for a few days, and then passes into the limbo of things forgotten. In Bohn's "Handbook of Proverbs" we have, "A wonder lasts nine days, and then the puppy's eyes are open," alluding to cats and dogs, which are born blind. As much as to say the eyes of the public are blind in astonishment for nine days, but then their eyes are open, and they see too much to wonder any longer.

Nine Points of the Law. Success in a law-suit requires (1) a good deal of money; (2) a good deal of patience; (3) a good cause; (4) a good lawyer; (5) a good counsel; (6) good witnesses; (7) a good jury; (8) a good judge; and (9) good luck.

Nine Worthies. Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

Nine worthies were they called, of different rites—Three Jews, three pagans, and three Christian knights.

Dryden, "The Flower and the Leaf."

Nine Worthies (privy councillors to William III.):—

Whigs: Devonshire, Dorset, Monmouth, and Edward Russell.

Tories: Caermarthen, Pembroke, Nottingham, Marlborough, and Lowther.

Nine Worthies of London. (See WORTHIES.)

Ninepence. As nice as ninepence. Silver ninepences were common till the year 1696, when all unmilled coin was called in. These ninepences were often bent and given as love-tokens, the usual formula of presentation being To my love, from my love. (See NIMBLE.)

Nin'ian (St.). The apostle of the Picts (fourth and fifth centuries).

Ninon de Lenclos, noted for her beauty, wit, and gaiety. She had two natural sons, one of whom fell in love with her, and blew out his brains when he discovered the relationship. (1615-1706.)

Nínus. Son of Belus, husband of Semiramis, and the reputed builder of Nineveh.

Niobe (3 syl.). The personification of female sorrow. According to Grecian fable, Niobë was the mother of twelve children, and taunted Lato'na because she had only two, namely Apollo and Diana. Lato'na commanded her children to avenge the insult, and they caused all the sons and daughters of Niobë to die. Niobë was inconsolable, wept herself to death, and was changed into a stone, from which ran water. "Like Niobë, all tears" ("Hamlet").

The group of Niobë and her children, in Florence, was discovered at Rome in 1583, and was the work either of Scopas or Praxitéles.

The Niobë of Nations. So lord Byron styles Rome, the "lone mother of dead empires," with "broken thrones and temples;" a "chaos of ruins;" a "desert where we steer stumbling o'er recollections."—"Childe Harold," iv., stanza 79.

Nip-cheese or Nip-farthing. A miser, who nips or pinches closely his cheese and farthings.

Nipper (Susan). The attendant on Florence Dombey. She is affectionate and faithful, but teasing and caustic.

Nirvāna. Annihilation, or rather the final deliverance of the soul from transmigration (in Buddhism). Sanskrit, nir, out; vāna, blown. (See GAUTAMA.)

Nishapoor and Tous. Mountains in Khorassan where turquoises are found.

Nisi Prius. A Nisi Case; a cause to be tried in the assize courts. Sittings at Nisi Prius; sessions of Nisi Prius courts, which never try criminal cases. Trial at Nisi; a trial before judges of assize. An action at one time could be tried only in the court where it was brought, but Magna Charta provided that certain cases, instead of being tried at Westminster in the superior courts, should be tried in their proper counties before judges of assize. The words "Nisi Prius" are two words on which the following clause attached to the writs entirely hinges: "We command you to come before our justices at Westminster on the morrow of All Souls', NISI PRIUS justiciarii domini regis ad assisas capiendas venerint—i.e., unless previously the justices of the lord our king come to hold their assizes at (the court of your own assize town)."

Nis'roch. An idol of the Ninevites, represented in their sculptures with a hawk's head. The word means Great Eagle.

Nit. One of the attendants of queen Mab.

Nitouche (St.) or Mie Touche. (Touch-me-not). A hypocrite, a demure-looking pharisee. The French say Faire la Sainte Nitouche, to pretend to great sanctity, or look as if butter would not melt in your mouth. We use the word Maw-worm in the same signification—a name taken from "The Hypocrite," by Isaac Bickerstaff.

Nix (mas.), Nixë (fem.). Kind busy-body. Little creatures not unlike the Scotch brownie and German kobold. They wear a red cap, and are ever ready to lend a helping hand to the industrious and thrifty. (See NICK.)

Og Trolde, Hexer, Nisser i hver Vraae.
Finn Magnussen.
 And Trolls, hags, nixes in each nook.

Nizam'. A title of sovereignty in India, derived from Nizam-ul-mulk (regulator of the state), who obtained possession of the Deccan at the beginning of the last century. The name Cæsar was by the Romans used precisely in the same manner, and has descended to the present hour in the form of Kaiser (of Austria).

Njambai or Njembai. The good spirit of the Bakalai tribes of Africa.

Njörd. God of the winds and waves.
 —Edda.

No-Popery Riots. Those of Edinburgh and Glasgow, February 5, 1779. Those of London, occasioned by lord George Gordon, in 1780.

Noah's Ark. A white band spanning the sky like a rainbow: if east and west expect dry weather, if north and south expect wet.

Noah's Wife, according to a mediæval legend, was unwilling to go into the ark, and the quarrel between the patriarch and his wife forms a very prominent feature of "Noah's Flood," in the Chester and Towneley Mysteries.

Hastow nought herd, quod Nicholas, also
 The sorwe of Noë with his feluschippe
 That he had or he gat his wyf to schipe?
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 3534.

Noakes (John) or John o' Noakes. A fictitious name, formerly made use of by lawyers in actions of ejectment. His name was generally coupled with that of Tom Styles. Similarly, John Doe and Richard Roe were used. The Roman names were Tutius and Seius ("Juv. Sat." iv. 13). All these worthies are the hopeful sons of Mrs. Harris.

Nobs and Snobs. Nobles and pseudo-nobles.

Noble. An ancient coin, so called on account of the superior excellency of its gold. Nobles were originally disposed of as a reward for good news, or important service done. Edward III. was the first who coined rose nobles (q.v.), and gave 100 of them to Gobin Agace of Picardy, for showing him a ford across the river Somme, when he wanted to join his army.

The Noble. Charles III. of Navarre (1361-1425). Soliman Tcheliabi, Turkish prince at Adrianople (died 1410).

Noble-Soul. The surname given to Khosrû I., the greatest monarch of the Sassanian dynasty. (*, 531-579.)

Noblesse Oblige (French). Noble birth imposes the obligation of high-minded principles and noble actions.

Nocca. The Neptune of the Goths.

Noctës Ambrosia'næ. While Lockhart was writing "Vale'rius," he was in the habit of taking walks with Professor Wilson every morning, and of supping with Blackwood at Ambrose's, a small tavern in Edinburgh. One night Lockhart said, "What a pity there has not been a short-hand writer here to take down all the good things that have been said!" and next day he produced a paper from memory, and called it "Noctes Ambrosianæ." That was the first of the series. The part ascribed to Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, is purely supposititious.

Noddy. A Tom Noddy is a very foolish or half-witted person, "a noodle." The marine birds called Noddies are so silly, that any one can go up to them and knock them down with a stick. A donkey is called a Neddy Noddy.

Nodel. The lion in the beast-epic called "Reynard the Fox." Nodel represents the regal element of Germany; Isengrin, the wolf, represents the baronial element, and Reynard represents the church element.

Noël. Christmas day; a corruption of Dies Natalis. Welsh, nadolig; Irish, nuallag or nodlog.

Noë'tians. The followers of Noë'tus of Ephesus. They acknowledged only one person in the divinity.

Noggs (Newman). Ralph Nickleby's clerk. A tall man of middle age, with two goggle eyes, one of which was a fixture, a rubicund nose, a cadaverous face, and a suit of clothes much the worse for wear. This kind, dilapidated fellow "kept his horses and hounds once."—Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Noko'mis. Daughter of the Moon. Sporting one day with her maidens on a swing made of vine-canies, a rival cut the swing, and Nokomis fell to earth, where she gave birth to a daughter named Weno'nah.

Nolens Volens. Whether willing or not. Two Latin participles meaning "being unwilling (or) willing."

Noll. Old Noll. Oliver Cromwell was so called by the Royalists. Noll is a familiar contraction of Oliver—i.e., Ol' with an initial liquid.

Noli me Tan'gerë. A plant of the genus impatiens. The seed-vessels consist of one cell in five divisions, and when the seed is ripe each of these, on being touched, suddenly folds itself into a spiral form and leaps from the stalk.—(See Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," ii. 3.)

Nolle Pros'equi (Don't prosecute). A petition from a plaintiff to stay a suit. (See NON PROS.)

No'lo Episcopa'ri (I am unwilling to accept the office of Bishop). A very general notion prevails that every bishop at consecration uses these words. Mr. Christian, in his notes to Blackstone, says, "The origin of these words and of this vulgar notion I have not been able to discover: the bishops certainly give no such refusal at present, and I am inclined to think they never did at any time in this country." When the see of Bath and Wells was offered to Beveridge, he certainly exclaimed, "Nolo episcopari," but it was the private expression of his own heart, and not a form of words, in his case. Chamberlayne says in former times the person about to be elected bishop modestly refused the office twice, and if he did so a third time his refusal was accepted.—"Present State of England."

Nom. Nom de Guerre is French for a "war name," but really means an assumed name. It was customary at one time for every one who entered the French army to assume a name; this was especially the case in the times of chivalry, when knights went by the device of their shields or some other distinctive character in their armour, as the "Red-cross Knight," the "Black Prince," &c.

Nom de Plume. French for the "pen name," and meaning the name assumed by a writer who does not choose to give his own name to the public; as Peter Pindar, the nom de plume of Dr. John Wolcot; Peter Parley, of Mr. Goodrich; Currer Bell, of Charlotte Brontë; Cuthbert Bede, of the Rev. Edward Bradley, &c.

Nom'ads. Wanderers who live in tents. The Indians call their tents numda, made of a woollen stuff very thick. The Greeks called the people of Scythia, Libya, and Numidia Nomads, and probably derived the word from numda (a tent) and not from nemo (to feed).

Nom'inalists. A sect founded by Roscelin, canon of Compiègne (1040-1120). He maintained that if the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God, they cannot be three distinct persons, but must be simply three names of the same being; just as father, son, and husband are three distinct names of one and the same man under different conditions. Abélard, William Occam, Buridan, Hobbes, Locke, bishop Berkeley, Condillac, and Dugald Stewart are the most celebrated disciples of Roscelin. (See REALISTS.)

Non Bis in Idem (Latin, Not twice for the same thing)—i.e., no man can be tried a second time on the same charge.

Non Compos Mentis or Non Com. Not of sound mind; a lunatic, idiot, drunkard, or one who has lost memory and understanding by accident or disease.

Non Con. (See NONCONFORMIST.)

Non Est. A contraction of Non est inventus (not to be found). They are the words which the sheriff writes on a writ when the defendant is not to be found in his bailiwick.

Non Plus ("no more" can be said on the subject). When a man is come to a non-plus in an argument, it means that he is unable to deny or controvert what is advanced against him. "To non-plus" a person is to put him into such a fix.

Non Pros. for Non pros'equi (not to prosecute). The judgment of Non pros. is one for costs, when the plaintiff stays a suit.

Non Sequitur (A). A conclusion which does not follow from the premises stated. The words are Latin for It does not follow or It is not consequent.

Nonconformists. The 2,000 clergymen who, in 1662, left the Church of England, rather than conform or submit to the conditions of the Act of Uniformity—i.e., “unfeigned assent to all and everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer.” The word is loosely used for Dissenters generally.

Nonjurors. Those clergymen who refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new government after the Revolution. They were archbishop Sancroft with eight other bishops, and 400 clergymen, all of whom were ejected from their livings (1691).

Nonne Prestès Tale. A thrifty widow had a cock, “hight Chaunteclere,” who had his harem; but “Chamysel Pertilote” was his favourite, who perched beside him at night. Chaunteclere once dreamt that he saw a fox who “tried to make arrest on his body,” but Pertilote chided him for placing faith in dreams. Next day a fox came into the poultry-yard, but told Chaunteclere he merely came to hear him sing, for his voice was so ravishing he could not deny himself that pleasure. The cock, pleased with this flattery, shut his eyes and began to crow most lustily, when Dan Russell seized him by the throat and ran off with him. When they got to the wood, the cock said to the fox, “I should advise you to eat me, and that anon.” “It shall be done,” said the fox, but as he loosed the cock’s neck to speak the word, Chaunteclere flew from his back into a tree. Presently came a hue and cry after the fox, who escaped with difficulty, and Chaunteclere returned to the poultry-yard wiser and discreeter for his adventure.—Chaucer, “Canterbury Tales.”

This tale is taken from the old French “Roman de Renart.” The same story forms also one of the fables of Marie of France, called “Don Coc et Don Werpil.”

Nor. The giant, father of Night. He dwelt in Utgard.—Scandinavian mythology.

Norfolk. The folk north of Kent, Essex, and Suffolk.

Norfolk-Howards. Bugs. A person named Bugg, in 1863, changed his name into Norfolk-Howard.

Norfolk Street (Strand), with Arundel, Surrey, and Howard Streets, were the site of the house and grounds of the bishop of Bath and Wells, then of the lord high admiral Seymour, and afterwards of the Howards earls of Arundel and Surrey, from whom it came into the possession of the earl of Norfolk.

Norma. A vestal priestess who has been seduced. She discovers her paramour in an attempt to seduce her friend, also a vestal priestess, and in despair contemplates the murder of her base-born children. The libretto is a melodrama by Romani, music by Bellini (1831).

Normandy. The Poles are the Vintagers in Normandy. The Norman vintage consists of apples, beaten down by poles. The French say En Normandie l'on vendange avec la gaule, where gaule is a play on the word Gaul, but really means a pole.

The Gem of Normandy. Emma, daughter of Richard I. (*1052.)

Norna. The well of Urda, where the gods sit in judgment, and near which is that “fair building” whence proceed the three maidens called Urda, Verdandi, and Skulda (Past, Present, and Future).—Scandinavian mythology.

Norna “of the Fitful-head.” A character in Sir Walter Scott’s “Pirate,” to illustrate that singular kind of insanity which is ingenious in self-imposition, as those who fancy a lunatic asylum their own palace, the employes thereof their retinue, and the porridge provided a banquet fit for the gods. Norna’s real name was Ulla Troil, but after her amour with Basil Mertoun (Vaughan), and the birth of a son, named Clement Cleveland, she changed her name out of shame. Towards the end of the novel she gradually recovered her right mind.

Nornir or Norns. The three fates of Scandinavian mythology, Past, Present, and Future. They spin the events of human life sitting under the ash-tree Yggdrasil (Yf-dru-sil).

Norrisian Professor. A Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1760 by John Norris, Esq., of Whifton, in Norfolk. These lectures must be attended by candidates for holy orders. "Pearson on the Creed" is the text-book. (See MARGARET.)

Norroy. North-roy or king. The third king-at-arms is so called, because his office is on the north side of the river Trent; that of the south side is called Clarencieux (q.v.).

Norte. Violent northern gales, which visit the Gulf of Mexico from September to March. In March they attain their maximum force, and then immediately cease.

Norte de Los Esta'dos. By Don Francisco de Ossuna. Published 1550.

North (Christopher). A nom de plume of Professor Wilson, of Gloucester Place, Edinburgh, one of the chief contributors to Blackwood's Magazine.

North Side of a Churchyard. The poor have a great objection to be buried on the north side of a churchyard. They seem to think only evil doers should be there interred. Probably the chief reason is the want of sun. The sun shines on the south, east, and west sides; but the north side is cold, dark, damp, and gloomy.

There is, however, an ecclesiastical reason:—The east is God's side, where his throne is set; the west, man's side, the Galilee of the Gentiles; the south, the side of the "spirits made just" and angels, where the sun shines in his strength; the north, the devil's side, where Satan and his legion lurk to catch the unwary. Some churches have still a "devil's door" in the north wall, which is opened at baptisms and communions to let the devil out.

As men die, so shall they arise; if in faith in the Lord, towards the south . . . and shall arise in glory; if in unbelief . . . towards the north, then are they past all hope.—Coverdale, "Praying for the Dead."

Northamptonshire Poet. John Clare, son of a farmer at Helpstone. (1793-1864.)

Northern Bear. Russia.

Northern Gate of the Sun. The sign of Cancer, or summer solstice; so called because it marks the northern tropic.

Northern Harlot (Catin du Nord). Elizabeth Petrovna, empress of Russia, also called "The Infamous." (1709-1761.)

Northern Lights. The Aurora Borealis, ascribed by the Northern savages to the merriment of the ghosts.

Norval. An aged peasant and his son in the tragedy of "Douglas," by John Home.

Norway (Maid of). Margaret, infant queen of Scotland. She was the daughter of Eric II. king of Norway, and Margaret daughter of Alexander III. of Scotland. She never actually reigned, as she died on her passage to Scotland in 1290.

Nose. Bleeding of the nose. Sign of love.

"Did my nose ever bleed when I was in your company?" and, poor wretch, just as she spake this, to show her true heart, her nose fell a-bleeding.—Boulster, "Lectures," p. 130.

Bleeding of the nose. Grose says if it bleeds one drop only it forebodes sickness, if three drops the omen is still worse; but Melton, in his "Astrologaster," says, "If a man's nose bleeds one drop at the left nostril, it is a sign of good luck, and vice versa."

Itching of the nose. A sign that you will see a stranger.

We shall ha' guests to-day—my nose itcheth so.—Dekker, "Honest Whore."

To count noses. To count the numbers of a division. It is a horse-dealer's term, who counts horses by the nose, for the sake of convenience. Thus the Times, comparing the House of Commons to Tattersall's, says, "Such is the counting of noses upon a question which lies at the basis of our constitution."

Led by the nose. This very day, as I came down Farringdon Street, I saw a drover leading an unwilling ox by a hook in the nose, and that verse of Isaiah (xxxvii. 29) came into my mind:—"Because thy rage against me . . . is come up into mine ears, therefore will I put my hook in thy nose . . . and will turn thee back. . . ." Horses, asses, &c., led by bit and bridle, are led by the nose. Hence Iago says of Othello, he was "led by the nose as asses are" (i. 3). But buffaloes and bears are actually led by a ring inserted into their nostrils.

Paying through the nose. Grimm says that Odin had a poll-tax which was called in Sweden a nose-tax; it was a penny per nose or poll.—"Deutsche Rechts Alterthümer."

Sermon on Noses (La Diceria de' Nasi), by Annibal Caro (1584).

Chapter on Noses, in "Tristram Shandy," by L. Sterne.

On the Dignity, Gravity, and Authority of Noses, by Taglicozzi or Tagliacozzo (1597).

De Virginitate (§ 77). A chapter in Kornmann.

The Noses of Adam and Eve, by Mdlle. Bourignon.

Pious Meditations on the Nose of the Virgin Mary, by J. Petit.

Review of Noses (Louis Brovitis), by Théophile Raynaud.

Nos'not-Bo'cai or Bo'cai. Prince of purgatory. Purgatory is the "realm of Nosnot-Bocai."

Sir, I last night received command
To see you out of Fairy-land,
In the realm of Nosnot-Bocai;
But let not fear or sulphur chock-ye,
For he's a fend of sense and wit.
King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Nostradamus (Michael). An astrologer who published an annual "Almanac," very similar in character to that of "Francis Moore," and a "Recueil of Prophecies," in four-line stanzas, extending over seven centuries. (1503-1566.)

The Nostradamus of Portugal. Gonçalo Annès Bandarra, a poet-cobbler, whose lucubrations were stopped by the Inquisition. (* -1556.)

As good a prophet as Nostradamus—i.e., so obscure that none can make out your meaning. Nostradamus was a provincial astrologer of the sixteenth century, who has left a number of prophecies in verse, but what they mean no one has yet been able to discover. (French proverb.)

Nostrum means Our own. It is applied to a quack medicine, the ingredients of which are supposed to be a secret of the compounders. (Latin.)

Not'ables (in French history). An assembly of nobles or notable men, selected by the king, of the House of Valois, to form a parliament. They were convened in 1626 by Richelieu, and not again till 1787 (a hundred and sixty years afterwards), when Louis XVI. called them together with the view of relieving the nation from some of its pecuniary embarrassments. The last time they ever assembled was Nov. 6, 1788.

Notarica.

A. E. I. O. U. Austria's Empire Is Over-all Universal. (See A. E. I., &c.)

Era. A. E. R. A—i.e., Anno *E*rat Augusti. (See ERA.)

Kolis. King's Own Light Infantry (the 51st Foot).

Limp. Louis, James, Mary, Prince. (See LIMP.)

Maccabees. Mi Camaka Baclin Jehovah. (See MACCABEUS.)

News. North, East, West, South. (See NEWS.)

Smectymnus. Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, Uuilliam Speirstow. (See SMECTYMNUS.)

Tory. True Old Royal Feoman.

Uuilliam Speirstow. The notarica of the five divines who united in writing against episcopacy. (See WILLIAM.)

Whig. We Hope in God.

Wise. Wales, Ireland, Scotland, England—i.e., Wales, Ireland, and Scotland added to England.

Notation or Notes. (See DO.)

Notch. Out of all notch. Out of all bounds. The allusion is to the practice of fitting timber: the piece which is to receive the other is notched upon; the one to fit into the notch is said to be notched down.

Nothing. "A tune played by the picture of nobody."—Shakespeare, "Tempest," iii. 2.

No'thosaur (Greek, not a true lizard). An extinct saurian, found in the Triassic deposits of Germany, &c.

Notori'ety. Depraved taste for notoriety:—

Cleom'brotos, who leaped into the sea. (See CLEOMBROTOS.)

Emped'ocles, who leaped into Etna. (See EMPEDOCLES.)

Heros'tratos, who set fire to the temple of Diana. (See DIANA.)

William Lloyd, who broke in pieces the Portland vase (1845).

Jonathan Martin, who set fire to York Minster (1829).

Nottingham. (Saxon, Snottengaham, place of caves.) So called from the caverns in the soft sandstone rock. Montecute took king Edward III. through these subterranean passages to the hill castle, where he found the "gentle Mortimer" and Isabella, the dowager-queen. The former was slain, and the latter imprisoned. The passage is still called "Mortimer's Hole."

Nottingham Poet. Philip James Bailey, author of "Festus," a dramatic epic, is so called because he was born at Basford, near Nottingham. (1816.)

Nourmahal'. Sultana. The word means Light of the Haram. She was afterwards called Nourjehan (Light of the World). In "Lalla Rookh," the tale called "The Light of the Haram" is this: Nourmahal was estranged for a time from the love of Selim, son of Aebur'. By the advice of Namou'na, she prepares a love-spell, and appears as a lute-player at a banquet given by "the imperial Selim." At the close of the feast she tries the power of song, and the young sultan exclaims, "If Nourmahal had sung those strains I could forgive her all;" whereupon the sultana threw off her mask, Selim "caught her to his heart," and as Nourmahal rested her head on Selim's arm, "she whispers him, with laughing eyes, 'Remember, love, the Feast of Roses.'"—Thomas Moore.

Nous or Nouse (1 syl.). Genius, natural acumen, quick perception, ready wit. The Platonists used the word for mind, or the first cause. (Greek, nous; Gaelic, nos.)

Novatians. Followers of Novat'anus, a presbyter of Rome in the third century, who would never allow any one who had lapsed to be re-admitted into the church.

November 17. (See QUEEN'S DAY.)

Novum Organum. The great work of lord Bacon.

Now-a-days. A corruption of In our days, I' nour days. (See APRON, NICKNAME, NUGGET, &c.)

Now-now. Old Anthony Now-now. An itinerant fiddler, meant for Anthony Munday, the dramatist who wrote "City Pageants."—Chettle, "Kindhart's Dream" (1592).

No'wheres (2 syl.). (See MEDAMOTHIL.)

Noyades (2 syl.). A means of execution adopted by Carrier at Nantes, in the first French Revolution, and called Carrier's Vertical Deportation. Some 150 persons being stowed in the hold of a vessel in the Loire, the vessel was scuttled, and the victims drowned. Nero, at the suggestion of Anicetus, drowned his mother in this same manner. (French, noyer, to drown.)

Nubbles (Kit), in "The Old Curiosity Shop," by Dickens.

Nucky. Ursula, contracted from Mine Ursu, My N' ursy, N' ucky.

Nucta, or miraculous drop which falls in Egypt on St. John's day (June), is supposed to have the effect of stopping the plague. Thomas Moore refers to it in his "Paradise and the Peri."

Nude. Rabelais wittily says that a person without clothing is dressed in "grey and cold" of a comical cut, being "nothing before, nothing behind, and sleeves of the same." King Shrovetide, monarch of Sneak-island, was so arrayed.—"Gargantua and Pantagruel," iv. 29.

The nude statues of Paris are said to be draped in "cerulean blue."

Nugget of gold. A corruption of an ingot, a ningot. A correspondent in Notes and Queries says the Bengalees use the term nuggut pisa for "hard cash," from the Persian nugul (ready money); and as Australia is the sanatorium of Indian officers, it is easy to see how Indian words have been imported. (See NOW-A-DAYS, NUCKY.)

Another correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests nog (a wooden ball) used in the game of shinney. Nig in Essex means a "piece," a noggin of bread, a hunch.

In Scotland they still say a nugget of sugar (i.e., a lump).

Nulla Linea. (See LINE.)

Nulli Secun'dus Club. The Coldstream Guards.

Nu'ma. The second king of Rome, who reduced the infant state to order by wise laws.

Numan'cia. A tragedy by Cervantes, author of "Don Quixote," but never published in his life-time.

Numba. A bachelor god of Oroun-gon, in Africa; a combination of Neptune and Mercury.

Numbers.

Army of soldiers.

Batch of bread.

Bevy of beeves, roes, ladies, &c.

Brood of chickens, &c.

Catch of fish taken in nets, &c.

Clump of trees.

Cluster of grapes, nuts, stars, &c.

Covey of birds.

Crew of sailors (the complement of a ship).

Drove of horses, ponies, beasts, &c.

Fleet of ships.

Flight of bees, birds, stairs, &c.

Flock of birds, sheep, geese, &c.

Gagle of women.

Galaxy of beauties.

Gang of slaves, prisoners, &c.

Haul of fish caught.

Herd of bucks, deer, harts, &c.

Hive of bees.

House of senators.

Legion of "foul fiends."

Litter of pigs, whelps, &c.

Mob of roughs.

Nest of rabbits, ants, &c.; shelves, &c.

Pack of hounds, playing cards, &c.

Pencil of rays, &c.

Pile of books, wood stacked.

Pride of lions.

Rabble of men ill-bred and ill-clad.

Rouleau of money.

Set of china, or articles assorted.

Shock of hair, corn, &c.

Shole of mackerel.

Skulk of foxes.

Stack of corn, hay, wood (piled together).

String of horses.

Stud of mares.

Suit of clothes.

Suite of rooms.

Swarm of bees, locusts, &c.

Team of oxen, horses, &c.

Tribe of goats.

Volley of artillery.

Assembly, congregation, crowd, host, &c., of men and women. (See MULTITUDE.)

Odd Numbers. "Numero Deus imparē gaudet" (Macrobius). "This is a fact, not a superstition. Three indicates the "beginning, middle, and end." The Godhead has three persons; so in classic mythology Hecate had threefold power; Jove's symbol was a triple thunderbolt, Neptune's a sea-trident, Pluto's a three-headed dog; the Fates were three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Horæ three; the Muses three-times-three. There are seven notes, seven planets according to ancient calculation, seven days in the week, &c. &c.; five senses, five fingers on the hand and toes on the feet, five vowels, five continents, &c. &c. A volume might be filled with illustrations of the fact that "God delights in odd numbers." (See ODD, NINE.)

To consult the Book of Numbers is to call for a division of the House, or to put a question to the vote.—Parliamentary wit.

Number Nip. The gnome king of the Giant Mountains.—Musæus, "Popular Tales."

Number of the Beast. "It is the number of a man, and his number is Six hundred threescore and six" (Rev. xiii. 18). This number has been applied to divers persons previously assumed to be Antichrist: as Mahomet, the pope, Julian (the apostate), Trajan and Diocletian, Luther, Evanthes, Titan, Lampetis, Niketes, Napoleon I., and several others. Also to certain phrases supposed to be descriptive of "the man of sin," as Arnoume (I renounce), Kakos Ode'gos (bad guide), Abinu Kadescha Papa (our holy father the pope): e.g.—

M	a	o	m	e	t	i	a.
40,	1,	70,	40,	5,	300,	10,	200 = 666.
L	a	t	e	i	n	o	a.
30,	1,	300,	5,	10,	50,	70,	200 = 666.
L	u	th	r	a	n	s.
30,	40,	9,	100,	1,	50,	70,	0 = 666.

Here Lateinos means the Latin bishop or pope. These puzzles may serve to amuse, but they are of no further value, as even the sacred name of Deity may be twisted into the same mystic number.

Numero. Homme de numero—that is "un homme fin en affaires." M. Walckenaer says it is a shop phrase, meaning that he knows all the numbers of the different goods, or all the private marks indicative of price and quality.

Il n'étoit lors, de Paris jusqu'à Rome,
Galaud qui sût si bien le numero.

La Fontaine, "Richard Minutolo."

Numid'icus. Quintus Cæcilius Metellus, commander against Jugurtha, about 100 B.C.

Nun. The Secounde Nonnes Tale, in Chaucer, is almost literally the life of St. Cecilia, in the "Legenda Au'rea."

Nunc Dimittis. The canticle of Simeon is so called, from the first two words in the Latin version (Luke ii. 29-32).

Nuncupative Will. A will or testament made by word of mouth. As a general rule, no will is valid unless reduced to writing and signed; but soldiers and sailors may simply declare their wish by word of mouth. (Latin, nuncupo, to declare).

Nurr and Spell or Knor and Spill. A game resembling trapball, and played with a wooden ball called a nurr or knor. The ball is released by means of a spring from a little brass cup at the end of a tongue of steel called a spell or spill. After the player has touched the spring, the ball flies into the air, and is struck with a bat. In scoring, the distances are reckoned by the score feet, previously marked off by a Gunter's chain. The game is played frequently in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Nurse. To nurse an omnibus, is to try and run it off the road. This is done by sending a rival omnibus close at its heels, or if necessary, one before and one behind it, to pick up the passengers. As a nurse follows a child about regardless of its caprices, so these four-wheel nurses follow their rival.

Nursery Tales. "Jack and the Bean-stalk," "Jack the Giant Killer," with some others, are Scandinavian nursery tales; "Tom Thumb" is of Anglo-Saxon origin; "Prince Marcassin," "Fortunatus," "Puss in Boots," are by Straparola (the Italian), translated into French (1585); "Blue Beard," "Sleeping Beauty," "Puss in Boots," "Riquet with the Tuft," "Little Red Riding-Hood," are by Charles Perrault (a Frenchman); "Beauty and the Beast" is by Madame Villeneuve; "Goody Two-Shoes," by Oliver Goldsmith; "Gulliver's Travels," by Dean Swift; "The Devil on Two Sticks," by Lesage; "The Castle of Otranto," by Horace Walpole; "The Old English Baron," by Clara Reeve; "The Mysteries of Udolpho," and "The Romance of the Forest," by Mrs. Radcliffe; &c. &c.

Nut. That's nuts to him. A great pleasure, a fine treat. Nuts among the Romans made a standing dish at dessert; they were also common toys for children; hence to put away childish things is, in Latin, to put your nuts away.

It is time to lay our nuts aside (Latin, relinquere nucēs). To leave off our follies, to relinquish boyish pursuits. The allusion is to an old Roman marriage ceremony, in which the bridegroom, as he led his bride home, scattered nuts to the crowd, as if to symbolise to them that he gave up his boyish sports.

Nut-brown Maid. Henry lord Clifford, first earl of Cumberland, and lady Margaret Percy his wife, are the originals of this ballad. Lord Clifford had a miserly father and ill-natured step-mother, so he left home and became the head of a band of robbers. The ballad was written in 1502, and says that the "Not-browne Mayd" was wooed and won by a knight who gave out that he was a banished man. After describing the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him, and finding her love true to the test, he revealed himself to be an earl's son, with large hereditary estates in Westmoreland.—Percy, "Reliques" (series ii.).

Nutrack Night. All Hallows' Eve, when it is customary in some places to crack nuts in large quantities.

Nutrackers. The 3rd Foot; so called because at Albuera they cracked the heads of the Polish Lancers, then opened and retreated, but in a few minutes came again into the field, and did most excellent service.

Nutshell. Iliad in a nutshell. Pliny tells us that Cicero asserts that the whole Iliad was written on a piece of parchment which might be couched in a nutshell. Lalanne describes, in his "Curiosités Bibliographiques," an edition of Rochefoucault's "Maxims," published by Didot in 1829, on pages one inch square, each page containing 26 lines, and each line 44 letters. Charles Toppin, of New York, engraved on a plate one-eighth of an inch square 12,000 letters. The Iliad contains 501,930 letters, and would therefore occupy 42 such plates engraved on both sides. Huet has proved by experiment, that a parchment 27 by 21 centimètres would contain the entire Iliad, and such a parchment would go into a common-sized nut; but Mr. Toppan's engraving would get the whole Iliad into half that size. George P. Marsh says, in his "Lectures," he has seen the whole Koran in Arabic transcribed on a piece of parchment four inches wide and half an inch in diameter.

Nyctanthes begins to spread its rich odour after sunset.

Nym (Corporal). One of Falstaff's followers, and an arrant rogue. Nim is to steal.—"Merry Wives of Windsor."

Nysē (2 syl). One of the Nereids (q.v.).

The lovely Nysē and Neriñē spring,
With all the vehemence and speed of wing.
Camoens, "Lusad," bk. ii..

O

O. This letter represents an eye, and is called in Hebrew ain (an eye).

O. The fifteen O's are fifteen prayers beginning with the letter O. (See "Horæ Beatissime Virginis Marie.")

O'. An Irish patronymic. (Gaelic ogha, Irish oa, grandson.)

O.H.M.S. On Her Majesty's Service.

O.K. A telegraphic symbol for "All right" (ork korrek, a Sir William Curtis's or Artemus Ward's way of spelling "all correct").

O. P. Riot (Old Price Riot). When the new Covent Garden theatre was opened in 1809, the charges of admission were increased; but night after night for three months a throng crowded the pit shouting O.P. (old prices), much damage was done, and the manager was obliged at last to give way.

Oaf. A corruption of onph (elf). A foolish child or dolt is so called, from the notion that all idiots are changelings, left by the fairies in the place of the stolen ones.

Oak. Worn on the 29th May. The 29th May was the birthday of Charles II. It was in the month of September that he concealed himself in an oak at Boscobel. The battle of Worcester was fought on Wednesday, September 3, 1651, and Charles arrived at Whiteladies, about three-quarters of a mile from Boscobel House, early the next morning. He returned to England on his birthday, when the Royalists displayed a branch of oak in allusion to his concealment in an oak-tree.

To sport one's oak. To be "not at home" to visitors. At the universities the "chambers" have two doors, the usual room-door and another made of oak, outside it; when the oak is shut or "sported" it indicates either that the occupant of the room is out, or that he does not wish to be disturbed by visitors.

Oak and Ash. The tradition is, if the oak gets into leaf before the ash we may expect a fine and productive year; if the ash precedes the oak in foliage, we may anticipate a cold summer and unproductive autumn. In the years 1816, 1817, 1821, 1823, 1823, 1829, 1830, 1833, 1840, 1845, 1850, and 1859, the ash was in leaf a full month before the oak, and the autumns were unfavourable. In 1831, 1833, 1839, 1853, 1860, the two species of trees came into leaf about the same time, and the years were not remarkable either for plenty or the reverse; whereas in 1818, 1819, 1820, 1822, 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1842, 1846, 1854, 1865, and 1869, the oak displayed its foliage several weeks before the ash, and the summers of those years were dry and warm, and the harvests abundant.

Oaks.

(1) Owen Glendower's Oak, at Shelton, near Shrewsbury, was in full growth in 1403, for in this tree Owen Glendower witnessed the great battle between Henry IV. and Henry Percy. Six or eight persons can stand in the hollow of its trunk. Its girth is 40½ feet.

(2) Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, in Yorkshire, will hold seventy persons in its hollow. Professor Burnet states its age to be 1,600 years.

(3) Fairlop Oak, in Hainault Forest, was thirty-six feet in circumference a yard from the ground. It was blown down in 1820.

(4) The Oak of the Partisans, in Percy forest, St. Ouen, in the department of the Vosges, is 107 feet in height. It is 650 years old.

(5) The Bull Oak, Wedgenock Park, was growing at the time of the Conquest.

(6) The Winfarthing Oak was 700 years old at the time of the Conquest.

(7) William the Conqueror's Oak, in Windsor Great Park, is thirty-eight feet in girth.

(8) Queen's Oak, Huntingfield, Suffolk, is so named because from this tree queen Elizabeth shot a buck.

(9) Sir Philip Sidney's Oak, near Penshurst, was planted at his birth in 1554, and has been memorialised by Ben Jonson and Waller.

(10) The Ellerslie Oak, near Paisley, is reported to have sheltered Sir William Wallace and 300 of his men.

(11) The Swilcar Oak, in Needwood Forest, Staffordshire, is between 600 and 700 years old.

(12) The Abbot's Oak, near Woburn Abbey, is so called because the Woburn abbot was hanged on one of its branches, in 1537, by order of Henry VIII.

Oaks consecrated to the god of thunder. Because they are more liable to be struck by lightning than other trees.

The Oaks. The stakes at Epsom races so called receive their name from Lambert's Oaks, in the parish of Woodmansterne, formerly an inn. The house was erected on lease by the "Hunter's Club," and was rented from the Lambert family. It afterwards became the residence of general Burgoyne, from whom it passed to the eleventh earl of Derby. It was Edward Smith Stanley, twelfth earl of Derby, who originated the Oaks stakes, May 14, 1779. On the death of the earl of Derby in 1834, the Oaks estate was sold to Sir Charles Grey, and is now held by Joseph Smith.

Oan'nēs. The Chaldean sea-god. It had a fish's head and body, and also a human head; a fish's tail, and also feet under the tail and fish's head. In the day-time he lived with men to instruct them in the arts and sciences, but at night retired to the ocean. Anedotēs or Idotēon was a similar deity, so was the Oda'con or Ilo Dagon of the Philistines.

O'asis. A perfect o'asis. A fertile spot in the midst of a desert country, a little charmed plot of land. The reference is to those spots in the desert of Africa where wells of water or small lakes are to be found, and vegetation is pretty abundant. (Coptic, ouuhé, an inhabited place.)

Oats. He has sown his wild oats. He has left off his gay habits and is become steady. The thick vapours which rise on the earth's surface just before the lands in the North burst into vegetation, are called in Denmark Lok kens havre (Loki's wild oats). When the fine weather succeeds, the Danes say Loki has sown his wild oats.

Oath. The sacred oath of the Persians is By the Holy Grave—i.e., the Tomb of Shah Besa'de, who is buried in Casbin.—Strut.

Oaths. Rhadamanthus imposed on the Cretans the law that men should not swear by the gods, but by the dog, ram, goose, and plane-tree. Hence Socrates would not swear by the gods, but by the dog and goose.

Ob. and Sol. Objection and solution. Contractions used by controversial students.

Obadai'ah. A slang name for a Quaker.

Obadiak. The "foolish fat scullion" in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy."

Obam'bou. The devil of the Camma tribes of Africa; it is exorcised by noise like bees in flight.

Obeism. Serpent-worship. From Egyptian Ob (the sacred serpent). The African sorceress is still called Obi. The Greek ophis is of the same family. Moses forbade the Israelites to inquire of Ob, which we translate wizard.

Ob'elisk. (See DAGGER.)

O'bermann. The impersonation of high moral worth without talent, and the tortures endured by the consciousness of this defect.—Etienne Pivert de Sénan-cour, "Obermann."

O'beron. King of the Fairies, whose wife was Titan'ia. Shakespeare introduces both O'beron and Titan'ia in his "Midsummer Night's Dream." (*Auber*on, anciently Alberon, German Alberich, king of the elves.)

O'beron the Fay. A humpty dwarf only three feet high, but of angelic face, lord and king of Mominur. He told Sir Huon his pedigree, which certainly is very romantic. The lady of the Hidden Isle (Cephalo'nia) married Neptane'bus king of Egypt, by whom she had a son called Alexander the Great. Seven hundred years later Julius Cæsar, on his way to Thessaly, stopped in Cephalonia, and the same lady falling in love with him had in time another son, and that son was Oberon. At his birth the fairies bestowed their gifts—one was insight into men's thoughts, and another was the power of transporting himself to any place instantaneously. He became a friend to Huon (q.v.), whom he made his successor in the kingdom of Mommur. In the fulness of time, falling asleep in death, legions of angels conveyed his soul to Paradise.—“Huon de Bordeaux” (a romance).

Oberthal (Count). Lord of Dordrecht, near the Meuse. When Bertha, one of his vassals, asked permission to marry John of Leyden, the count refused, resolving to make her his mistress. This drove John into rebellion, and he joined the Anabaptists. The count was taken prisoner by Gíóna, a discarded servant, but liberated by John. When John was crowned Prophet-king, the count entered his banquet hall to arrest him, and perished with John in the flames of the burning palace.—Meyerbeer, “Le Prophète” (an opera).

Obí'dah. An allegory in the Rambler, designed to be a picture of human life. It is the adventures and misfortunes which a young man named Obí'dah met with in a day's journey.

Obid'icut. The fiend of lust, and one of the five that possessed “poor Tom.”—Shakespeare, “King Lear,” iv. i.

Object means forecast, or that on which you employ forecast. (Latin, ob jacio.)

Ob'olus. Give an ob'olus to old Belisarius. Tzetzes, a writer of the twelfth century, says that Belisarius, stripped of all his wealth and honours, was reduced to beggary in his grey old age; that he lived in a mud hut, from the window of which he hung an alms-bag, and that he used to cry to the passers-by “Give an ob'olus to poor old Belisarius, who rose by his merits and was cast down by envy.”

Obsequies are the funeral honours, or those which follow a person deceased. (Latin, ob-sequor.)

Obstinate. An inhabitant of the city of Destruction who advised Christian to return to his family, and not run on fools' errands.—Bunyan, “Pilgrim's Progress,” pt. i.

Oby. A river in Russia. The word means Great River. Thomson the poet says it is the ultima thulé of the habitable globe.

Occam (William), surnamed Doctor Singularis et Invincibilis. He was the great advocate of Nominalism. (1270-1347.)

Occam's Razor. Entia non sunt multiplicanda (entities are not to be multiplied). With this axiom Occam dissected every question as with a razor. An entity is something which is; perhaps the nearest “synonym” is an element.

Occasion. A famous old hag, quite bald behind. Sir Guyon seized her by the forelock and threw her to the ground; still she railed and reviled, till Sir Guyon gagged her with an iron lock; she then began to use her hands, but Sir Guyon bound them behind her.—Spenser, “Faëry Queen,” bk. ii.

Occult Sciences. Magic, alchemy, and astrology; so called because they were occult or mysteries (secrets).

Ocea'na. An ideal republic by James Harrington, on the plan of Plato's Atlantis.

Oc'hiltree (Edie). A gaberlunzie man or blue-coat beggar in Sir Walter Scott's “Antiquary.”

Ocoucou. An evil spirit in the mythology of several African tribes.

Octa'vian. Hero of a drama so eailed, by George Colman the younger. He goes mad out of love for donna Floranthë, whom he suspects of loving another; but Roque, a blunt yet feeling old man, finds him out, tells him Floranthë is true to him, and induces him to return home.

Octa'vo. A book where each sheet of paper is folded into eight leaves; contracted thus—Svo. (Italian, un'ottavo; French, in octavo; Latin, octo, eight.)

Ocypus, son of Podalirius and As-tasia, was eminent for his strength, agility, and beauty; but used to deride those afflicted with the gout. This provoked the anger of the goddess who presided over that distemper, and she sent it to plague the scoffer.—Lucian.

Od. (See OLYLE.)

Odd Numbers. Luck in odd numbers. A major chord consists of a fundamental or tonic, its major third, and its just fifth. Seven notes complete the octave, and nine is deity. According to the Pythagorean system "all nature is a harmony;" man is a full chord; and all beyond is deity, so that nine represents deity. As the odd numbers are the fundamental notes of nature, the last being deity, it will be easy to see how they came to be considered the great or lucky numbers. (See DIAPASON and NUMBER.)

Good luck lies in odd numbers . . . they say, there is divinity in odd numbers, either in nativity, chance, or death.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," v. 1.

Odd's or Od's, used in oaths, as—

Odd's bodikins! or Od'sbody! means "God's body," of course referring to incarnate Deity.

Od's heart! God's heart.

Od's pittikins! God's pity.

Od's plessed will.—"Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 1.

Ode. Prince of The Ode. Pierre de Ronsard, a French lyrist. (1524-1585.)

Odin. Chief god of the Scandinavians.

His real name was Siggë, son of Fridulph, but he assumed the name of Odin when he left the Tanais, because he had been priest of Odin, supreme god of the Scythians. He became the All-wise by drinking from Mimir's fountain, but purchased the distinction at the cost of one eye.

His brothers are Vilë and Ve.

His wife is Frigga or Freyja.

His sons, Thor and Balder.

His seat, Valaskjalf; but his court as the god of war, Valhalla.

His two black ravens, Huginn (thought) and Muninn (memory).

His steed, Sleipner, which has eight feet and legs. It is grey, and can traverse both sea and land.

His spear, Gungner, which never fails to hit the mark aimed at.

His ring, Draupner, which every ninth night drops eight other rings of equal value.

He will be ultimately swallowed up by the wolf Fenrir.—Scandinavian mythology.

The Vow of Odin. A matrimonial or other vow made before the "Stone of Odin," in the Orkneys. This is an oval stone, with a hole in it large enough to admit a man's hand. Any one who violated a vow made before this stone was held infamous.

O'dium Theologicum. The bitter hatred of rival religionists. No wars so sanguinary as holy wars; no persecutions so relentless as religious persecutions; no hatred so bitter as theological hatred.

O'Doherty (Sir Morgan). Papers contributed to Blackwood's Magazine by William Maginn, LL.D., full of wit, fun, irony, and eloquence (1819-1842).

Odori'co (in "Orlando Furioso"). A Biscayan, to whom Zerbino commits Isabella. He proves a traitor and tries to ravish her, but being interrupted by a pirate crew, flies for safety to Alphonzo's court. Here Almo'nio defies him and overcomes him in single combat. King Alphonzo gives the traitor to the conqueror, and he is delivered bound to Zerbino, who awards him as a punishment to attend Gabri'na for one year as her champion, and to defend her against every foe. He accepts the charge, but haugs Gabri'na to an elm. Almonio in turn hangs Odorico to an elm.

Odry'sium Carmen. The poetry of Orpheus, a native of Thrace, called Odrysia tellus, because the Odrysæ were its chief inhabitants.

O'dur. Husband of Freya, whom he deserted.—Scandinavian mythology.

Od'yle (2 syl.). That which emanates from a medium to produce the several phenomena connected with mesmerism, spirit-rapping, table-turning, and so on. The production of these "manifestations" is sometimes called od'ylism. Baron Reichenbach called it Od force, a force which becomes manifest wherever chemical action is going on.

O'dyssey. The poem of Homer which records the adventures of Odusseus (Ulysses) in his home-voyage from Troy. The word is an adjective formed out of the hero's name, and means the things or adventures of Ulysses.

Æ'dipus. I am no Ædipus. I cannot guess what you mean. Ædipus guessed the riddle of the Sphinx, and saved Thebes from her ravages.

Æil. A l'œil. On credit, for nothing. Corruption of the Italian a ufo (gratis).

In the French translation of "Don Quixote" is this passage:—

Ma femme, disait Sancho Pança, ne m'a jamais dit oui que quand il fallait dire non. Or elles sont toutes de même . . . Elles sont toutes bonnes à peindre . . . passé cela, elles ne valent pas ce que j'ai dans l'œil.

Œil de Bœuf. Les Fastes de l'Œil de Bœuf. The annals of the courtiers of the Grand Monarque; anecdotes of courtiers generally. The œil de bœuf is the round window seen in entresols in the roofs of houses, like those at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, on the ground-floor. The anteroom where courtiers waited at the royal chamber of Versailles had these ox-eye windows, and hence they were called by this name.

Off with his Head! so much for Buckingham!—Colley Cibber, "The Tragical History of Richard III." (altered from Shakespeare).

Offa's Dyke, which runs from Beachley to Flintshire, was not the work of Offa, king of Mercia, but was repaired by him. It existed when the Romans were in England, for five Roman roads cross it. Offa availed himself of it as a line of demarcation sufficiently serviceable, though by no means tallying with his territory either in extent or position.

Og, in the satire of "Absalom and Aethiophel" by Dryden and Tate, is Thomas Shadwell, who succeeded Dryden as poet laureate. Dryden called him Mac Flecknoe, and says "he never deviates into sense." He is called Og because he was a very large and fat man. (Pt. ii.)

Oghams. The secret alphabet long in use among the ancient Irish and some other Celtic nations.

Oghris. The lion that followed prince Murad like a dog. The word in the Saracen tongue means throat of brass. At the death of Murad the lion was given to Aude as the price of conquest, when Roland overthrew in single combat the giant Angoulaffre.—"Croquemitaine."

O'gier the Dane, or Hogier. One of the paladins of king Charlemagne. Various fairies attended at his birth and bestowed upon him divers gifts. Among them was Morgue, who when the knight was a hundred years old embarked him for the isle and castle of Avalon, "hard by the terrestrial paradise." The vessel in which he sailed was wrecked, and Ogier was in despair, till he heard a voice that bade him "fear nothing, but enter the castle which I will show thee." So he got to the island and entered the castle, where he found a horse sitting at a banquet table. The horse, whose name was Papillon, and who had been once a mighty prince, conducted him to Morgue the Fay, who gave him (1) a ring which removed all infirmities and restored him to ripe manhood; (2) a Lethean crown which made him forget his country and past life; and (3) introduced him to king Arthur. Two hundred years rolled on, and France was invaded by the Paynims. Morgue now removed the crown from Ogier's head and sent him to defend "le bon pays de France." Having routed the invaders, Morgue took him back to Avalon, and he has never reappeared in this earth of ours.—"Ogier le Danois" (a romance).

Ogier the Dane. Represented as the Knave of Spades in the French pack. He is introduced by Ariosto in his "Orlando Furioso."

The sword of Ogier the Dane. Curta'na (the cutter).

The horse of Ogier the Dane. Papillon.

Ogleby (Lord). A superannuated nobleman who affects the gaiety and graces of a young man.—"Clandestine Marriage," by Garrick and Colman the elder.

Og'mion or Ogmios. The Heracles of the ancient Gauls, represented as an old man.

Ogres of nursery mythology are giants of very malignant dispositions, who live on human flesh. It is an Eastern invention, and the word is derived from the Ogurs, a desperately savage horde of Asia, who overran part of Europe in the fifth century. Others derive it from Oreus, the ugly cruel man-eating monster so familiar to readers of Bojardo and Ariosto. The female is Ogress.

O'Groat. (See JOHN.)

Ogygian Deluge. A flood which overran a part of Greece while Og'ygēs was king of Attica. There were two floods so called—one in Bœotia, when the lake Copaïs overflowed its banks; and another in Attica, when the whole territory was laid waste for two hundred years (B.C. 1764).

"Oh Nanny, wilt thou gang wi' me?"
By Thomas Percy, bishop of Dromore. Nanny was afterwards his wife. Nanny Isted of Ecton, near Northampton.

Oi Polloi (Greek). The commonalty, the many. In university slang the "poll men," or those who take degrees without "honours."

Oignement de Bretagne (French). A sound drubbing. Oignement is a noun corruptly formed from hogner. In Lyons boys called the little cuffs which they gave each other hognes.

Frère Eleuthère a tréchoisons,
Et j'ay orgement de Bretagne;
Qui garist de roigne et de taigne.
"Le Martyre de S. Denis," &c., p. 129.

Oignons d'Egypte. The flesh-pots of Egypt. Hence "regretter les oignons d'Egypte," to sigh for the flesh-pots of Egypt, to long for luxuries lost and gone.

Je plume oignons. I scold or grumble. Also peler des oignons in the same senso. A corruption of hogner, to scold or grumble.

Grifon.—Que fais-tu là?
Brayhault.—Je plume oignons.
"La Quatrième Journée du Mystère de la Passion."
Pas ne savoit oignons peler.
Fulton, Ballade ii.

Oil. To oil the knocker. To fee the porter. The expression is from Racine, On n'entre point chez lui sans graisser le marteau (No one enters his house without oiling the knocker).—"Les Plaideurs."

To pour oil on troubled waters. "A soft answer turneth away wrath." Professor Horsford, by emptying a vial of oil upon the sea in a stiff breeze, stilled its surface; and commodore Wilkes, of the United States, saw the same effect produced in a violent storm off the Cape of Good Hope, by oil leaking from a whale-ship.

Oil of Palms. Money. Huile is French slang for "money," as will appear from the following quotation:—"Il faudra que vostre boursou fasse les frais de vostre curiosité; il faut de la pecune, il faut de l'huile."—"La Fausse Coquette," act. ii., s. 7 (1694).

Ointment. Money. From the fable "De la Vieille qui Oint la Palme au Chevalier" (thirteenth century).

Vo'e'bant autem præfati clerici aliquem habere legatum natione Romanum, qui unguentis Anglica, auro scilicet et argento solent ad quolibet inclinari.—Gereais de Canterbury, "Chronicles" (Scriptores decem ii., 1533).

St. Olaf or Olave. The first Christian king of Norway, slain in battle by his pagan subjects in 1030. He is usually represented in royal attire, bearing the sword or halbert of his martyrdom, and sometimes carrying a loaf of bread, as a rebus on his name, which in Latin is Holofius or Whole-loaf. (Born 995.)

Olaf Tryggva-Sonar or Triggvason. A legend of historical foundation in the Sagas.

Old Bags. John Scott, lord Eldon; so called from his carrying home with him in different bags the cases still pending his judgment. (1751-1838.)

Old Bonâ Fide. Louis XIV. (1638, 1643-1715.)

Old Dominion. Virginia. Every Act of Parliament to the Declaration of Independence designated Virginia "The Colony and Dominion of Virginia." Captain John Smith, in his "History of Virginia" (1629), calls this "colony and dominion" Old Virginia, in contradistinction to New England and other British settlements.

Old England. This term was first used in 1641, twenty-one years after our American colony of New Virginia received the name of New England.

Old Faith Men. (See PHILIPPINS.)

Old Fogs. The 87th Foot; so called from the war-cry Fag-an-Bealuck (Clear the way), pronounced Fang-a-bollagh.

Old Fox. Marshal Soult; so called by the soldiers because of his strategic abilities and never-failing resources. (1769-1851.) (See Fox.)

Old Glory. The United States' Flag.

Old Grog. Admiral Edward Vernon; so called by British sailors from his wearing a grogram cloak in foul weather. (1684-1757.)

Old Harry. The devil. (See HARRY.)

Old Humphrey. The nom de plume of George Mogridge, of London, author of several interesting books for children. (Died 1854.)

Old Lady of Threadneedle Street. The Bank of England, situated in Threadneedle Street.

Old Man Eloquent. Isoc'rattis; so called by Milton. When he heard of the result of the battle of Chærone'a, which was fatal to Grecian liberty, he died of grief.

That dishonest victory
At Chærone'a fa'al to liberty.
Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.
"Sonnets."

Old Man of the Mountain. Hassan-ben-Sabah, the sheik Al Jebal, and founder of the sect called Assassins (q.v.).

Old Man of the Sea, in the story of "Sinbad the Sailor," hoisted on his shoulders, clung there and refused to dismount. Sinbad released himself from his burden by making the Old Man drunk. — "Arabian Nights."

Old Mortality. The itinerant antiquary in Sir Walter Scott's novel of that name. It is said to be a photograph of Robert Patterson, a Scotchman, who busied himself in clearing the moss from the tombstones of the Covenanters.

Old Nicka (in Runic). A spirit that came to strange people who fell into the water. — Sir William Temple. (See NICK.)

Old Noll. Oliver Cromwell; so called by the Cavaliers. (1599-1658.)

Old Noll's Fiddler. Sir Roger L'Estrange; so called because he played the bass viol at the musical parties held at John Hingston's house, which parties Cromwell attended.

Old Port School. Old-fashioned clergymen, who stick to church and state, old port and "orthodoxy."

Old Rowley. Charles II. was so called from his favourite racehorse. A portion of the Newmarket race-course is still called Rowley mile, from the same horse.

Old Scratch. The devil; so called from Skratz or Skratti, a demon of Scandinavian mythology. (See NICK.)

Old Stone. Henry Stone, statuary and painter. (Died 1653.)

Old Tom. Cordial gin. Thomas Norris, one of the men employed in Messrs. Hodges' distillery, opened a gin palaco in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, and called the gin concocted by Thomas Chamberlain, one of the firm of Hodges, "Old Tom," in compliment to his former master.

Old World. So Europe, Asia, and Africa are called when compared with North and South America (the New World).

Oldbuck. An antiquary; from the character of Jonathan Oldbuck, a whimsical virtuoso in Sir Walter Scott's "Antiquary."

Oldcastle (Sir John), called The Good Lord Cobham, the first Christian martyr among the English nobility. (December 14, 1417.)

Oldenburg Horn. A horn long in the possession of the reigning princes of the house of Oldenburg, but now in the collection of the king of Denmark. According to tradition, count Otto of Oldenburg, in 967, was offered drink in this silver-gilt horn by a "wild woman," at the Osenberg. As he did not like the look of the liquor, he threw it away, and rode off with the horn.

O'leum Adde Cami'no. To pour oil on fire; to aggravate a wound under pretence of healing it. — Horace, "Satires," ii. 3, 321.

Olib'rius (An). The wrong man in the wrong place. Olib'rius was a Roman senator, proclaimed emperor by surprise in 472, but he was wholly unsuited for the office.

Ol'ifaunt. Lord Nigel Olifaunt of Glenvarloch, on going to court to present a petition to king James I., aroused the dislike of the duke of Buckingham; lord Dalgarno gave him the cut direct, when Nigel struck him, and was obliged to seek refuge in Alsatia. After various adventures he married Margaret Ramsay, the watchmaker's daughter. — Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Oligar'chy (olty-gar'-ky). A government in which the supreme power is vested in a class. (Greek, oligos-arkê, the few bear rule.)

Olin'do. The Mahometan king of Jerusalem, at the advice of his magician, stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up as a palladium in the chief mosque. The image was stolen during the night, and the king, unable to discover the perpetrator, orders all his Christian subjects to be put to the sword. Sofronia, to prevent this wholesale massacre, accuses herself of the deed, and is condemned to be burnt alive. Olindo, her lover, hearing of this, goes to the king and takes on himself the blame; whereupon both are condemned to death, but are saved by the intercession of Clorinda.—Jerusalem Delivered."

Olio or Oglio. A mixture or medley of any sort. (Spanish, olla, a pot for boiling similar to what the French call their pot au feu. The olio is the mixture of bread, vegetables, spices, meat, &c., boiled in this pot.)

Olive (2 syl.). The olive, sacred to Pallas Athene, was regarded by the Greeks as an emblem of chastity. A crown of olive-twigs was given to a citizen who had merited well of his country, and was the highest prize of the Olympian games. An olive branch was the symbol of peace, and those who begged for peace carried one in their hands. This use of the olive branch is based on the account of Noah's dove (Gen. viii. 11). (See CROWN.)

Olive Branches. Children of a parent. It is a Scripture term: "Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine . . . thy children like olive plants round about thy table" (Psalm cxxviii. 3).

Olive Tree. Emblem of prosperity. David says, "I am like a green olive tree in the house of God" (Psalm lii. 8).

Oliver. Son and heir of Sir Rowland de Boys, who hated his youngest brother Orlando, and persuaded him to try a wrestling match with a professed wrestler, hoping thus to kill his brother; but when Orlando proved victorious, Oliver swore to set fire to his chamber when he was asleep. Orlando fled to the forest of Arden, and Oliver pursued him; but one day, as he slept in the forest, a snake and a lioness lurked near to make him their prey: Orlando happened to be passing, and slew the two monsters. When Oliver discovered this heroic deed he repented of his ill-conduct, and his sorrow so interested the princess Celia that she fell in love with him, and they were married.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Oliver or Olivier. Charlemagne's favourite paladin, who, with Roland, rode by his side. He was count of Genes, and brother of the beautiful Aude. His sword was called "Haute-claire," and his horse "Ferrant d'Espagne."

A Rowland for an Oliver. Tit for tat, quid pro quo. Dr. J. N. Scott says that this proverb is modern, and owes its rise to the Cavaliers in the time of the civil wars in England. These Cavaliers, by way of rebuff, gave the anti-monarchical party a general Monk for their Oliver Cromwell. As Monk's Christian name was George, it is hard to believe that the doctor has hit the right nail on the head.

Olive'tans. Brethren of "Our Lady of Mount Olivet," an offshoot of the Benedictine order.

Oliv'ia. Niece of Sir Toby Belch. Malvo'lio is her steward, Maria her woman, Fabian and a clown her male servants.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night."

Olivia. A female Tartuffe (q.v.) in Wycherly's "Plain Dealer." A consummate hypocrite, of most unblushing effrontery.

Olla Podri'da. Odds and ends, a mixture of scraps. In Spain it takes the place of the French pot au feu, into which every sort of eatable is thrown and stewed. It is called podri'da or putrid, because amongst the poor the bits are so often re-cooked that they become putrid.

Ollapod. An apothecary, always trying to say a witty thing, and looking for wit in the conversation of others. When he finds anything which he can construe into "point" he says, "Thank you, good sir; I owe you one." He had a military taste, and was appointed "cornet in the volunteer association of cavalry" of his own town.—G. Colman, "The Poor Gentleman."

Olombo. The spirit which favours the hunt, according to the mythology of the Camma tribes in Africa.

Olymp'ia (in "Orlando Furioso"). Countess of Holland, and wife of Berino. Cymosco of Friza wanted to force her to marry his son Arbanthes, but Arbanthes was slain. This aroused the fury of Cymosco, who seized Berino, and would have put him to death if Orlando had not slain Cymosco. Berino having deserted Olympia, she was bound naked to a rock by pirates; but Orlando delivered her and took her to Ireland. Here king Oberto espoused her cause, slew Berino, and married the young widow.

Olympiad, among the ancient Greeks, was a period of four years, being the interval between the celebrations of their Olympic Games.

Olympic Games. Games held by the Greeks at Olymp'ia in Elis, every fourth year, in the month of July.

Olympus. A mountain in Natio'ia (Asiatic Turkey), where the fabulous court of Jupiter was supposed to be held. It is used for any pantheon, as "Odin, Thor, Baldur, and the rest of the Northern Olympus." The word means All bright or clear. In Greek the word is Olump'os.

Om. A Sanskrit word, somewhat similar to Amen. When the gods are asked to rejoice in a sacrifice, the god Savitri cries out Om (Be it so). When Pravāhan is asked if his father has instructed him, he answers Om (Verily). Brahmans begin and end their lessons on the Vēda with the word Om, for "unless Om precedes his lecture, it will be like water on a rock, which cannot be gathered up; and unless it concludes the lecture, it will bring forth no fruit."

Om manē padmē hām. These are the first six syllables taught the children of Tibet and Mongolia, and the last words uttered by the dying in those lands. It is met with everywhere as a charm—on flags, rings, trees, tombs, houses, monuments, domestic implements, and so on.

O'man's Sea. The Persian Gulf.

Ombre. A Spanish game of cards called "The Royal Game of Ombre." Prior has an epigram on the subject. He says he was playing ombre with two ladies, and though he wished to lose, won everything, for Fortune gave him "success in every suit but hearts."

O'mega. The Alpha and Omega. The first and the last, the beginning and the end. Alpha is the first and Omega the last letter of the Greek alphabet.

Omeyinger Saga. An historical tradition of Scandinavia.

Om'nibus. The French have a good slang term for these conveyances. They call an omnibus a "Four Banal" (parish oven).

Om'nium (Latin, of all). The particulars of all the items, or the assignment of all the securities, of a government loan.

Om'nium Gath'erum. Dog Latin for a gathering or collection of all sorts of persons and things; a miscellaneous gathering together without regard to suitability or order.

Omorca. The goddess who was sovereign of the universe when it was first created. It was covered with water and darkness, but contained some few animals of monster forms, representations of which may be seen in the temple of Bel.—Berosius.

Om'phale (3 syl.). The masculine but attractive queen of Lydia, to whom Hercu'lēs was bound a slave for three years. He fell in love with her, and led an effeminate life spinning wool, while Om'phale wore the lion's skin and was lady paramount.

On dit (French). A rumour, a report; as "There is an on dit on Exchange that Spain will pay up its back dividends."

Onion Pennies. Roman coins dug up at Silchester; so called from one Onion, a giant who, the country people say, inhabited the buried city. Silchester used to be called by the British Ard-Oneon—i.e., Ardal Onion (the region of Einion or Onion).

Only (The). Jean Paul Friedrich Richter (1763-1825). Carlyle says, "In the whole circle of literature we look in vain for his parallel." (German, Der Einzige.)

On'slow, invoked by Thomso in his "Autumn," was Arthur Onslow, the Speaker of the House of Commons, termed clarum ac venera'bile nomen. It was said of him that "his knowledge of the Constitution was only equalled by his attachment to it."

Onu'phis. The bull consecrated to Os'ris.—Egyptian mythology.

On'us (Latin). The burden, the blame, the responsibility; as, "The whole onus must rest on your own shoulders."

On'us Proban'di. The obligation of proof; as, "The onus probandi rests with the accuser."

Onu'va. The Venus of the ancient Gauls.—Celtic mythology.

Onyx is Greek for a finger-nail; so called because its colour resembles that of the finger-nail.

Opal. (See CERAUNIUM.)

Open Ses'amē. The charm by which the door of the robbers' dungeon flew open. The reference is to the tale of "The Forty Thieves," in the "Arabian Nights."

These words were the only "open sesamē" to their feelings and sympathies.—E. Shelton.

The spell loses its power, and he who should hope to conjure with it would find himself as much mistaken as Cassim when he stood crying "Open. Wheat;" "Open, Barley," to the door which obeyed no sound but "Open, Sesame."

Ophelia. Daughter of Polo'nus the chamberlain. Hamlet fell in love with her, but after his interview with the Ghost found it incompatible with his plans to marry her. Ophelia, thinking his "strange conduct" the effect of madness, becomes herself demented, and in her attempt to gather flowers is drowned.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Opin'icus. A fabulous monster, composed of dragon, camel, and lion, used in heraldry. It forms the crest of the Barber Surgeons of London.

O'pium-eater (The English). Thomas de Quincey, author of "Confessions." (1785-1850.)

Oppidan of Eton. A student not on the foundation like a king's scholar.

Opportunity. The presence of a harbour. Timely as a port to a ship. (Latin, ob portus, near a harbour.)

Optimē (plural, op-ti-mēs), in Cambridge phraseology, is a graduate in honours below a wrangler. Of course the Latin optimus (a best-man) is the fons et origo of the term. Optimēs are of two grades: a man of the higher group is termed a senior optimē, while one of the inferior class is called a junior optimē.

Op'timism, in moral philosophy, is the doctrine that "whatever is, is right;" that everything which happens is for the best.

O'pus Ma'gus. The great work of Roger Bacon.

Opus Op'eran'tis, in theology, means that the personal piety of the person who does the act, and not the act itself, causes it to be an instrument of grace. Thus, in the Eucharist, it is the faith of the recipient which makes it efficient for grace.

Opus Opera'tum, in theology, means that the act conveys grace irrespective of the receiver. Thus baptism is said by many to convey regeneration to an infant in arms.

Or ever. Ere ever. (Saxon, ære, before.)

Oracle. The following are famous responses:—

(1) When Cræsus consulted the Delphic oracle respecting a projected war, he received for answer, "Cræsus Halyn penetrens magnam, pervertit opum vinum" (When Cræsus passes over the river Halys, he overthrows the strength of an empire). Cræsus supposed the oracle meant he would overthrow the enemy's empire, but it was his own that he destroyed.

(2) Pyrrhus, being about to make war against Rome, was told by the oracle: "Aio te, Æacidē Roma'nos vin'cerē possē" (I say, Pyrrhus, that you the Romans can conquer), which may mean either You, Pyrrhus, can overthrow the Romans, or Pyrrhus, the Romans can overthrow you.

(3) Another prince, consulting the oracle concerning a projected war, received for answer: "Ibis redi'bis nunquam per bella peribis" (You shall go shall return never you shall perish by the war). It will be seen that the whole gist of this response depends on the place of the omitted comma: it may be You shall return, you shall never perish in the war, or You shall return never, you shall perish in the war, which latter was the fact.

(4) Philip of Macedon sent to ask the oracle of Delphi if his Persian expedition would prove successful, and received for answer—

The ready victim crowned for death
Before the altar stands.

Philip took it for granted that the "ready victim" was the king of Persia, but it was Philip himself.

(5) When the Greeks sent to Delphi to know if they would succeed against the Persians, they were told—

Seed-time and harvest, weeping sires shall tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell.

But whether the Greeks or the Persians were to be "the weeping sires," deponent stateth not, nor whether the thousands "about to fall" were to be Greeks or Persians. (See PUNCTUATION.)

Oracle of the Holy Bottle, Bacbuc, near Cathay, in Upper India. Books iv. and v. of Rabelais are occupied by the search for this oracle. The ostensible object was to obtain an answer to a question which had been put to sibyl and poet, monk and fool, philosopher and witch, judge and "sort," viz., "Whether Panurge should marry or not?" The whole affair is a disguised satire on the church. The celibacy of the clergy was for a long time a moot point of great difficulty, and the "Holy Bottle" or cup to the laity was one of the moving causes of the "great schisms" from the Roman Catholic church. The crew setting sail for the Bottle refers to Anthony duke of Vendome, afterwards king of Navarre, setting out in search of religious truth. Bacbuc is the Hebrew for a bottle. The anthem sung before the fleet set sail was "When Israel went out of bondage," and all the emblems of the ships bore upon the proverb "In vino veritas." Bacbuc is both the bottle and the priestess of the bottle.

Oracle of Sieve and Shears. This method of divination is mentioned by Theocritus. The modus operandi was as follows:—The points of the shears were stuck in the rim of a sieve, and two persons supported them with their fingertips. Then a verse of the Bible was read aloud, and St. Peter and St. Paul were asked if it was A, B, or C (naming the persons suspected). When the right person was named the sieve would suddenly turn round.

Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears.
—Ben Jonson, "At hemist," i. 1.

The Oracle of the Church. St. Bernard. (1091-1153.)

Sir Oracle. A dogmatical person, one not to be gainsayed. The ancient oracles professed to be the responses of the gods, from which there could be no appeal.

I am Sir Oracle.
And when I ope my lips let no dog bark.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," i. 1.

Orange Blossoms worn at Weddings. The Saracen brides used to wear orange blossoms as an emblem of fecundity; and occasionally the same emblem may have been worn by European brides ever since the time of the crusades; but the general adoption of wreaths of orange blossoms for brides is comparatively a modern practice, due especially to the recent taste for flower-language. The subject of bridal decorations being made a study, and the orange flower being found suitable, from the use made of it by the ancient Saracens, it was introduced by modistes as a fit ornament for brides. The notion once planted soon became a custom, now very general, adopted by all brides who study the conventions of society, and follow the accepted fashions.

The Orange Lilies. The 35th Foot; so called from their orange facings.

William of Orange. William III. of England. (1650, 1669-1702.)

Orangeman. A name given by Roman Catholics to the Protestants of Ireland, on account of their adhesion to William III. of the House of Orange; they had been previously called "Peep-of-Day Boys." The Roman party were Jacobites.

Orange Peel. A nickname given to Sir Robert Peel when Chief Secretary for Ireland (1812-1818), on account of his strong anti-Catholic proclivities. (See above.)

Orange-tawny. The ancient colour appropriated to clerks and persons of inferior condition. It was also the colour worn by the Jews. Hence lord Bacon says, "Usurers should have orange-tawny bonnets, because they do Judaize" (Essay xli). Bottom the weaver asked Quince what coloured beard he was to wear for the character of Pyramus: "I will discharge it in either your straw-coloured beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-ingrain beard, or your French crown-colour, which is a perfect yellow" ("Midsummer Night's Dream," i. 2).

Oran'ia. The lady-love of Am'adis of Gaul.

Orator Henley. The Rev. John Henley, who for about thirty years delivered lectures on theological, political, and literary subjects. (1692-1756.)

Orbilian Stick (The). A cane or birch-rod.

Orbilus was the schoolmaster who taught Horace, and Horace calls him Plagosus (the flogger).—Ep. ii. 71.

Orc (in "Orlando Furioso"). A sea-monster that devoured men and women. He haunted the seas near Ireland. Orlando threw an anchor into his open jaws, and then dragged the monster to the Irish coast, where he died.

Or'ca. The Orkney Islands.

Or'chard properly means a kitchen garden, a yard for herbs. (Saxon, ort-geard—i.e., wort-yard). Wort enters into the names of numerous herbs, as mug-wort, liver-wort, spleen-wort, &c.

Or'cus. The abode of the dead; death.—Roman mythology.

Or'deal (Saxon, great judgment), instituted long before the Conquest, and not abolished till the reign of Henry III. Ordeals were of several kinds, but the most usual were by wager of battle, by hot or cold water, and by fire. This method of "trial" was introduced from the notion that God would defend the right, even by miracle if needful.

(1) Wager of battle, was when the accused person was obliged to fight any one who charged him with guilt. This ordeal was allowed only to persons of rank.

(2) Of fire, was another ordeal for persons of rank only. The accused had to hold in his hand a piece of red-hot iron, or had to walk blindfold and bare-foot among nine red-hot plough-shares laid at unequal distances. If he escaped uninjured he was accounted innocent, aliter non. This might be performed by deputy.

(3) Of hot water, was an ordeal for the common people. The accused was required to plunge his arm up to the elbow in scalding hot water, and was pronounced guilty if the skin was injured in the experiment.

(4) Of cold water, was also for the common people. The accused, being bound, was tossed into a river: if he sank he was acquitted, but if he floated he was accounted guilty.

(5) Of the bier, when a person suspected of murder was required to touch the corpse, and if guilty the "blood of the dead body would start forth afresh."

(6) Of the eucharist. This was for clergymen suspected of crime. It was supposed that the elements would choke him, if taken by a guilty man.

(7) Of the corned, or consecrated bread and cheese. Godwin earl of Kent is said to have been choked when he submitted to this ordeal, being accused of the murder of the king's brother.

(8) Of lot, two dice, one marked by a cross, being thrown.

It was a fiery ordeal. A severe test. (See above, No. 2.)

Order. When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out Order, they mean that the person speaking is transgressing the rules of the House.

To move for the order of the day. A method of putting aside a disagreeable question. If the motion is carried, the "orders" must be read and proceeded with in regular course; but this routine may be set aside by a motion "to adjourn."

Order of the Cockle. Created by St. Louis in 1269, in memory of a disastrous expedition made by sea for the succour of Christians. Perrot says it scarcely survived its foundation.

Ordigale. The otter, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox," part iii.

Or'dinary (An). One who has an "ordinary or regular jurisdiction" in his own right, and not by deputation. Thus a judge who has authority to take cognisance of causes in his own right is an ordinary. A bishop is an ordinary in his own diocese, because he has authority to take cognisance of ecclesiastical matters therein; but an archbishop is the ordinary of his province, having authority in his own right to receive appeals therein from inferior jurisdictions. The chaplain of Newgate is also called the ordinary thereof.

Ore'lio. The steed of Don Roderick, the last of the Goths, noted for its speed and symmetry.

Orella'na. The river Amazon in America; so called from Orella'na, lieutenant of Pizarro.

Orfeo and Heurodis. The tale of Orpheus and Eurydice, with the Gothic machinery of elves or fairies.

Or'gies (2 syl.). Drunken revels, riotous feasts; so called from the nocturnal festivals in honour of Bacchus. (Greek, orgē, violent emotion.)

Orgoglio (pron. Or-gole'-yo). The word is Italian, and means "Arrogant Pride," or The Man of Sin). A hideous giant as tall as three men; he was son of Earth and Wind. Finding the Red Cross Knight at the fountain of Idleness, he beats him with a club and makes him his slave. Una, hearing of these mischances, tells king Arthur, and Arthur liberates the knight and slays the giant. Moral.—The Man of Sin had power given him to "make war with the saints and to overcome them" for "forty and two months" (Rev. xiii. 5, 7), then the "Ancient of Days came," and overcame him (Dan. vii. 21, 22).—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

* * Arthur first cut off Orgoglio's left arm—i.e., Bohemia was first cut off from the Church of Rome. He then cut off the giant's right leg—i.e., England; and this being cut off the giant fell to the earth, and was afterwards dispatched.

Or'gon. Brother-in-law of Tartuffe. His credulity is proverbial: he almost disbelieved his senses, and saw every one and every thing through the couleur de rose of his own honest heart.—Molière, "Tartuffe."

Oria'na. The beloved of Am'adis of Gaul, who called himself Beltenebros when he retired to the Poor Rock.—"Am'adis de Gaul," ii. 6.

Queen Elizabeth is sometimes called the "peerless Oriana," especially in the madrigals entitled the "Triumphs of Ori'ana" (1601).

Oriu'na. The nurseling of a lioness, with whom Esplandian, son of Oriana and Am'adis of Gaul, fell in love, and for whom he underwent all his perils and exploits. She is represented as the fairest, gentlest, and most faithful of womankind.

O'riande (3 syl.). A fay who lived at Rosefleur, and brought up Maugis d'Aygrement (q.v.). When her protégé grew up she loved him "d'un si grand amour, qu'elle doute fort qu'il ne se departe d'avecques elle."—"Romançe de Maugis d'Aygrement et de Vivian son Frère."

O'riel. A fairy whose empire lay along the banks of the Thames, when king Oberon held his court in Kensington Gardens.—Tickell, "Kensington Gardens."

Or'iflamme (3 syl.). First used in France as a national banner in 1119. It consisted of a crimson flag mounted on a gilt staff (un glaive tout doré où est ataché une banière vermeille). The flag was cut into three "vandykes" to represent "tongues of fire," and between each was a silken tassell. This celebrated standard was the banner of St. Denis; but when the counts of Vexin became possessed of the abbey the banner passed into their hands. In 1082 Philippe I. united Vexin to the crown, and the sacred Oriflamme belonged to the king. It was carried to the field after the battle of Agincourt, in 1415. The romance writers say that "mescreans" (infidels) were blinded by merely looking on it. In the "Roman de Garin" the Saracens are represented as saying "If we only set eyes on it we are all dead men" (Se's attendons tuit sommes mors et pris). Froissart says it was no sooner unfurled at Rosbecq than the fog cleared off, leaving the French in light, while their enemies remained in misty darkness still. (Or, gold, referring to the staff; flumme, flame, referring to the tongues of fire.)

Origenists. An early Christian sect who drew their opinions from the writings of Origen. They maintained Christ to be the Son of God only by adoption, and denied the eternity of future punishments.

Original Sin. That corruption which is born with us, and is the inheritance of all the offspring of Adam. As Adam was the federal head of his race, when Adam fell the taint and penalty of his disobedience passed to all his posterity.

Oril'o or Orillo (in "Orlando Furioso," bk. viii.). A magician and robber who lived at the mouth of the Nile. He was the son of an imp and fairy. When any limb was leopped off he restored it by his magic power, and when his head was cut off he put it on his neck again. Astolpho encountered him, cut off his head, and fled with it. Orillo mounted his horse and gave chase. Meanwhile Astolpho with his sword cut the hair from the head. Life was in one particular hair, and as soon as that was severed the head died, and the magician's body fell lifeless.

Orin'da, called the "Incomparable," was Mrs. Katherine Philips, who lived in the reign of Charles II., and died of small-pox. Her praises were sung by Cowley, Dryden, and others. (See Dryden's ode "To the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew.")

Ori'on. A giant hunter, noted for his beauty. He was blinded by (Enopion, but Vulcan sent Cedalion to be his guide, and his sight was restored by exposing his eyeballs to the sun. Being slain by Diana, he was made one of the constellations, and is supposed to be attended with stormy weather. "Assurgens fluctu nimbo'sus Orion."—Virgil, "Æneid," i. 529.

Fair as Orion. Homer, speaking of the two sons of Neptune, says "They were as beautiful as Orion."—"Iliad," xviii. (See Dogs.)

Orkneys. Either the Teutonic Orkneys (the water or islands of the whirlpool), in allusion to the two famous whirlpools near the isle of Swinna; or else the Norwegian Orkejjar (northern islands), the Hebrides being the Sudreyjar, or southern islands.

Orlando. The youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys. Oliver, who hated him, persuaded him to wrestle with one Charles, a famous wrestler, hoping that Charles would kill him; but Orlando proved the victor. At the match the banished duke was present, with his daughter Rosalind, who took a lively interest in the young nobleman, and after the match gave him a chain, saying—"Gentleman, wear this for me." His brother Oliver now vowed to burn him in his chamber, and when Orlando was told of this vow he fled to the forest of Arden to join the party of the banished duke, his father's friend. Here he met Rosalind disguised as a country lad, seeking to join her father. In time they became acquainted with each other, and the duke assented to their union.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Orlando, called Rotolando or Roland, and Rutlandus in the Latin chronicles of the middle ages, the paladin, was lord of Anglart, knight of Brava, son of Milo d'Anglesis and Bertha, sister of Charlemagne. Though married to Aldabella, he fell in love with Angelica, daughter of the infidel king of Cathay; but Angelica married Medoro, a Moor, with whom she fled to India. When Orlando heard thereof he turned mad, or rather his wits were taken from him for three months by way of punishment, and deposited in the moon. Astolpho went to the moon in Elijah's chariot, and St. John gave him an urn containing the lost wits of Orlando. On reaching earth again Astolpho first bound the madman, then holding the urn to his nose, the errant wits returned, and Orlando, cured of his madness and love, recovered from his temporary derangement.—"Orlando Furioso." (See ANGELICA.)

Orlando or Roland was buried at Bayes, in the church of St. Raymond; but his body was removed afterwards to Roncesvallés, in Spain.

Orlando's Horn or Roland's Horn. An ivory horn called Olvant, mentioned a hundred times or more by Boiardo and Ariosto.

Peiacto bello, Rolandus ascendit in montem, et rediit retro ad viam Runciavallis. Tunc insonuit tuba sua eburnea; et tanta vir ute in-onuit quod flau omni's ejus tuba per medium scissa, et venæ colli ejus et nervi rupti fuisse ieruntur.

Orlando's Sword. Durinda'na, which once belonged to Hector.

Orlando Furioso. An epic poem in forty-six cantos, by Ariosto (digested by Hoole into twenty-four books, but retained by Rose in the original form). The subject is the siege of Paris by Agramant the Moor, when the Saracens were overthrown. In the pagan army were two heroes—Rod'omont, called the Mars of Africa, and Roge'ro. The latter became a Christian convert, and was baptised. The poem ends with a combat between these two, and the overthrow of Rodomont.

The anachronisms of this poem are most marvellous. We have Charlemagne and his paladins joined by king Edward of England, Richard earl of Warwick, Henry duke of Clarence, and the dukes of York and Gloucester (bk. vi.). We have cannons employed by Cymosco king of Friza (bk. iv.), and also in the siege of Paris (bk. vi.). We have the Moors established in Spain, whereas they were not invited over by the Saracens for nearly 300 years after Charlemagne's death. In Book xvii. we have Prester John, who died 1202; and in the last three, Constantine the Great, who died 337.

Orlando Inamora'to (Roland the paladin in love). A romantic epic in three books, by the count Boiardo of Scandiano, in Italy (1495).

There is a burlesque in verse of the same title by Berni of Tuscany (1538), author of "Burlesque Rhymes."

Orleans. Your explanation is like an Orleans comment—i.e. Your comment or explanation makes the matter more obscure. The Orleans college was noted for its wordy commentaries, which darkened the text by overlading it with words.—A French proverb.

Or'mandine (3 syl.). The necromancer who by his magic arts threw St. David for seven years into an enchanted sleep, from which he was redeemed by St. George.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," i. 9.

Or'mulum. A paraphrase of Scripture in Anglo-Saxon verse: so called from the name of the author, Orm or Ormin (13th cent.).

Ormud or Ormuzd. The principle or angel of light and good, and creator of all things, according to the Magian system. (See AHRIMAN.)

Oromas'des (4 syl.). The first of the Zoroastrian trinity. The divine goodness of Plato; the deviser of creation (the father). The second person is Mithras, the eternal intellect, architect of the world; the third, Arim'an's (Psyché), the mundane soul.

O'roön'datës. Only son of a Scythian king, whose love for Stati'ra (widow of Alexander the Great, and daughter of Darius) leads him into numerous dangers and difficulties, which he surmounts.—La Calprenède, "Cassandra" (a romance).

Oros. The Apollo of Egyptian mythology.

Oro'sius (General History of), from Creation to A.D. 417, in Latin, by a Spanish presbyter of the 5th century, was translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great.

Orotalt, according to the Greek writers, was the Bacchus of the ancient Arabs. This, however, is a mistake, for the word is a corruption of Allah Taala (God the Most High).

Orpheus (2 syl.). A Thracian poet who could move even inanimate things by his music. When his wife Eurydice died he went into the infernal regions, and so charmed king Pluto that Eurydice was released from death, on the condition that Orpheus would not look back till he reached the earth. He was just about to place his foot on the earth when he turned round, and Eurydice vanished from him in an instant. Pope introduces this tale in his "St. Cecilia's Ode."

The tale of Orpheus is thus explained: Aëdoneus, king of Thesprotia, was for his cruelty called Pluto, and having seized Eurydice assheffed from Aristæos, detained her captive. Orpheus obtained her release on certain conditions, which he violated, and lost her a second time.

Orpheus of Highwaymen. So Gay has been called on account of his "Beggars' Opera." (1688-1732.)

Orrery. An astronomical toy to show the relative movements of the planets, &c., invented by George Graham, who sent his model to Rowley, an instrument maker, to make one for prince Eugène. Rowley made a copy of it for Charles Boyle, third earl of Orrery, and Sir Richard Steele named it an Orrery out of compliment to the earl.

Orsi. The supreme deity.—Persian mythology.

Orsin. One of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. He was "famous for wise conduct and success in war." Joshua Gosling, who kept the bears at "Paris Garden," in Southwark, was the academy figure of this character.

Orsini (Maffio). A young Italian nobleman, whose life was saved by Genna'ro at the battle of Rim'ini. Orsini became the staunch friend of Genna'ro, but both were poisoned at a banquet given by the princess Neg'roni.—Donizetti, "Lucrezia Borgia" (an opera).

Orson. Brother of Valentine, and son of Bellisant, sister of king Pepin and wife of Alexander, emperor of Constantinople. The twin brothers were born in a wood near Orleans, and Orson was carried off by a bear, which suckled him with her cubs. When he grew up he was the terror of France, and was called the Wild Man of the Forest. He was reclaimed by Valentine, overthrew the Green Knight, and married

Fezon, the daughter of duke Savary of Aquitaine. (French, ourson, a little bear.)—"Valentine and Orson."

Orts. Crumbs, refuse. (Saxon, wettan, to make worthless; Gaelic, ord; Irish, orda, a fragment; our ordure.) Kilian, with more wit than truth, derives the word from over-ate—i.e., what is left after eating.

I shall not eat your orts—i.e., your leavings.

Let him have time a beggar's orts to crave.
Shakespeare, "Rape of Lucrece."

Ortus. Ortus a quercu, non a salicē. Latin for "sprung from an oak, and not from a willow"—i.e., stubborn stuff; one that cannot bend to circumstances.

Ortwine (2 syl.). Knight of Metz, sister's son of Sir Hagan of Trony, a Burgundian in the "Nibelungen-Lied."

Orvietan (3 syl.) or Venice treacle, once believed to be a sovereign remedy against poison. (See Sir Walter Scott's "Kenilworth," ch. xiii.)

Orville (Lord). Hero o "Eveli'na," a novel by Miss Burney.

Os Sacrum (the sacred bone). A triangular bone situate at the lower part of the vertebral column, of which it is a continuation. Some say this bone was so called because it was in the part used in sacrifice, or the sacred part; Dr. Nash says it is so called "because it is much bigger than any of the vertebræ;" but the Jewish rabbins say the bone is called sacred because it resists decay, and will be the germ of the "new body" at the resurrection.

Osbaldistone. Nine of the characters in Sir Walter Scott's "Rob Roy" bear this name. There are (1) the London merchant and Sir Hildebrand, the heads of two families; (2) the son of the merchant is Francis, the pretendu of Diana Vernon; (3) the "distinguished" offspring of the brother are Percival the sol, Thornecliffe the bully, John the game-keeper, Richard the horse-jockey, Wilfred the fool, and Rashleigh the scholar, by far the worst of all. This last worthy is slain by Rob Roy, and dies cursing his cousin Frank, whom he had injured in every way he could contrive.

Oseway (Dame). The ewe, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Osi'ris (in Egyptian mythology). Judge of the dead, and potentate of the kingdom of the ghosts. This brother and husband of Isis was worshipped under the form of an ox. The word means Many-eyed.

Oslade or Ouslade. God of luxury and pleasure—Slavonic mythology.

Osmand. A necromancer, who by his enchantments raised up an army to resist the Christians. Six of the Champions of Christendom were enchanted by Osmand, but St. George restored them. Osmand tore off his hair in which lay his spirit of enchantment, bit his tongue in two, embowelled himself, cut off his arms, and then died.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," i. 19.

Osnaburg. The duke of York was bishop of Osnaburg. Not prelate, but sovereign-bishop. By the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, it was decreed that the ancient bishopric should be vested alternately in a Catholic bishop and a Protestant prince of the House of Luneburg. Frederick duke of York was the last sovereign-bishop of Osnaburg. In 1803 the district was attached to Hanover, and it now forms part of the kingdom of Prussia.

Os'pray or Osprey (the bone-breaker). So called because fragments of bones have been discovered in its stomach. Hammer says that the ospray will bring up "foundling" birds with its own nestlings. (Latin, os frango.)

Ossa. Heaping Ossa upon Pelion. Adding difficulty to difficulty; fruitless efforts. The allusion is to the attempt of the giants to scale heaven by piling mount Ossa upon mount Pelion.

Osse'o. Son of the Evening Star. When "old and ugly, broken with age, and weak with coughing," he married Owenee, youngest of the ten daughters of a North hunter. She loved him in spite of his ugliness and decrepitude, because "all was beautiful within him." One day as he was walking with his nine sisters-in-law and their husbands, he leaped into the hollow of an oak-tree, and came out "tall and straight and strong and handsome;" but Owenee at the same moment was changed into a weak old woman, "wasted, wrinkled, old, and ugly:" but the love of Osseo was not weakened. The nine brothers and sisters-in-law were all transformed into birds for mocking Osseo and Oweenee when they were ugly, and Owenee recovering her beauty had a son, whose delight as he grew up was to shoot at his aunts and uncles, the birds that mocked his father and mother.—Longfellow, "Hiawatha," xii.

Ossian. The son of Fingal, a Scottish warrior-bard who lived in the third century. The poems called "Ossian's Poems" were first published by James M'Pherson in 1760, and professed to be translations from Erse manuscripts collected in the Highlands. This is not true. M'Pherson no doubt based the poems on traditions, but not one of them is a translation of an Erse manuscript; and so far as they are Ossianic at all, they are Irish and not Scotch.

Ostend' Manifesto. A declaration made in 1857 by the ministers of the United States in England, France, and Spain, "that Cuba must belong to the United States."

Oster-Monath. The Anglo-Saxon name of April. Ost is Teutonic for east, and oster means eastern, or wind from the east. The word therefore means "east-wind month."

Ostler, wittily derived from oat-stealer, but actually from the French hostelier, an innkeeper.

Os'tracis'm. Oyster-shelling, black-balling, or expelling. Clis'then'es gave the people of Attica the power of removing from the state, without making a definite charge, any leader of the people likely to subvert the government. Each citizen wrote his vote on an oyster-shell (ostrakon), whence the term.

Ostrich. When hunted the ostrich will run a certain distance and then thrust its head into a bush, thinking because it cannot see that it cannot be seen by the hunters. (See CROCODILE.)

Ostrich Brains. It was Helio-gabalus who had battues of ostriches for the sake of their brains. Smollett says "he had 600 ostriches compounded in one mess."—"Peregrine Pickle."

Ostrich Stomachs. Strong stomachs which will digest anything. The ostrich swallows large stones to aid its gizzard, and when confined where it cannot obtain them will swallow pieces of iron or copper, bricks or glass. Shakespeare alludes to the ostrich "eating iron," in "2 Henry VI.," iv. 10.

Oswald's Well commemorates the death of Oswald, Christian king of Northumbria, who fell in battle before Penda, Pagan king of Mercia, in 642.

Otarid. The Mercury of the Asad tribe.—Arabian mythology.

Othello (in Shakespeare's tragedy so called). A Moor, commander of the Venetian army, who eloped with Desdemona. Brabantio accused him of necromancy, but Desdemona being sent for refuted the charge. The Moor being then sent to drive the Turks from Cyprus, won a signal victory. On his return Iago played upon his jealousy, and persuaded him that Desdemona intrigued with Cassio. He therefore murdered her, and then stabbed himself.

Othello the Moor. Shakespeare borrowed this tale from the seventh of Giovanni Giraldo Cinthio's third decade of stories. Cinthio died 1573.

Oth'man, Os'man, or Oth'oman, surnamed the Conqueror. Founder of the Turkish power, from whom the empire is called the Ottoman, and the Turks are called Osmans, Othmans, Osmanli, &c. Peter the Great being hemmed in by the Turks on the banks of the Pruth, was rescued by his wife Catharine, who negotiated a peace with the grand vizier.

O'tium cum Dig. (dignitatē). Retirement after a person has given up business and has saved enough to live upon in comfort. The words are Latin, and mean "retirement with honour." They are more frequently used in jest, familiarity, and ridicule.

Oton-tala. The Sea of Stars.

O'Trigger (An). An Irish duellist; from Sir Lucius O'Trigger, a fortune-hunting Irishman, ready to fight every one, for any matter, at any moment.—Sheridan, "The Rivals."

Outis (Greek, no-body). A name assumed by Odusseus in the cave of Polyphemos. When the monster roared with pain from the loss of his eye, his brother giants demanded from a distance who was hurting him: "Nobody," thundered out Polyphemos, and his companions went their way. Odusseus in Latin is Ulysses.

Ou'zel. The black-bird; sometimes the thrush is so called (French, oisel, a bird). Bottom speaks of the "ousel cock, so black of hue with orange-tawny bill."—"Midsummer Night's Dream."

Ova'tion. A triumph; a triumphal reception or entry of the second order. So called from ovis, a sheep, because the Romans sacrificed a sheep to a victorious general to whom an ovation was accorded, but an ox to one who had obtained a "triumph."

Oven'gua. A sort of ghou! among the Camma negroes. He is supposed to devour men.—African mythology.

Over. Greek, hyper; Latin, super; German, über; Saxon, ober; Danish and Dutch, over.

Overs. St. Mary Overs (Southwark). John Overs was a ferryman, who used to ferry passengers from Southwark to the City, and accumulated a hoard of wealth by penurious savings. His daughter Mary, at his decease, became a nun, and founded the church of St. Mary Overs on the site of her father's house.

O'verdo (Justice), in Ben Jonson's "Bartholomew Fair."

Overreach (Sir Giles). The photograph of Sir Giles Mompesson, a noted usurer outlawed for his misdeeds. He is an unscrupulous, grasping, proud, hard-hearted rascal in "A New Way to pay Old Debts," by Massinger.

Overture. A piece of music for the opening of a concert. To "make an overture to a person" is to be the first to make an advance either towards a reconciliation or an acquaintance. (French, ouverture, opening.)

Ovid. The French Ovid. Du Bellay, one of the Pleiad poets; also called the "father of grace and elegance." (1524-1560.)

O'wain (Sir). The Irish knight who passed through St. Patrick's purgatory by way of penance.—Henry of Saltrey, "The Descent of Owain."

Owen Meredith. Robert Bulwer Lytton.

Owl is the past participle of yell (howl); owlet is the diminutive. (See ASCALAPHOS.)

Owl, the emb'em of Athens, because owls abound there. As Athéna (Minerva) and Athénae (Athens) are the same word, the owl was given to Minerva for her symbol also.

The owl was a baker's daughter. Our Saviour went into a baker's shop to ask for something to eat. The mistress of the shop instantly put a cake into the oven for him, but the daughter said it was too large, and reduced it half. The dough, however, swelled to an enormous size, and the daughter cried out "Hengh! heugh! heugh!" and was transformed into an owl. Ophelia alludes to this tradition in the line—

Well, God 'ield you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Owl-glass (German, Eulenspiegel). Tyll, son of Klaus Eulenspiegel, prototype of all the knavish fools of modern times. He was a native of Brunswick, and wandered about the world playing all manner of tricks on the people he encountered. Hence espiggle, the French for waggish; and also the noun espiggle, a wag. (Died 1350.)

Ox. Emblematic of St. Luke. It is one of the four figures which made up Ezekiel's cherub (i. 10). The ox is the emblem of the priesthood, and has been awarded to St. Luke because he dwells more than any other of the Evangelists on the priestly character of Christ.

The ox is also the emblem of St. Frideswide, St. Leonard, St. Sylvester, St. Medard, St. Julietta, and St. Blandina.

He has an ox on his tongue. (Latin, Bovem in lingua habere, to be bribed to silence). The Greeks had the same expression. The Athenian coin was stamped with the figure of an ox. The French say, Il a un os dans la bouche, referring to a dog which is bribed by a bone.

The black ox hath trampled on you ("The Antiquary"). Misfortune or death has come to your house. A black ox was sacrificed to Pluto, the infernal god, as a white one was to Jupiter.

The black ox never trod upon his foot (common proverb). He never knew sorrow. (See above.)

The dumb ox. St. Thomas Aquinas; so named by his fellow-students at Cologne, on account of his dullness and taciturnity.

Ox of the Deluge. The Irish name for a great black deer, probably the Megaceros Hibernicus, or Irish elk, now extinct

Ox-eye. A cloudy speck which indicates the approach of a storm. When Elijah heard that a speck no bigger than a "man's hand" might be seen in the sky, he told Ahab that a torrent of rain would overtake him before he could reach home (1 Kings xviii. 44, 45). Thomson alludes to this storm-signal in his "Summer."

Oxford. The College Ribbons.

St. Edmund's, red, and yellow edges.

St. Mary, white, black, white.

Magdalen, black, and blue edges.

Oxford Blues. The Royal Horse Guards.

Oxford Stroke (in rowing). A long, deep, high-feathered stroke, excellent in very heavy water. The Cambridge stroke is a clear, fine, deep sweep, with a very low feather, excellent in smooth water. The Cambridge pull is the best for smooth water and a short reach, but the Oxford for a "lumpy" river and a four-mile course.

O'yer and Ter'miner (Courts of) are general gaol deliveries, held twice a-year in every county. "Oyer" is French for to hear—i.e., hear in court or try and "terminer" is French for to conclude. The words mean that the commissioners appointed are to hear and bring to an end all the cases in the county.

O Yes! O Yes! O Yes! So all proclamations begin. A corruption of the French oyez (hear ye).

Oyster. No more sense than an oyster. This is French, Il raisonne comme une huitre, and C'est une huitre à écaille (stupid as an oyster in the shell). Oysters have a mouth, but no head.

Who eats oysters on St. James's day will never want. St. James's day is the first day of the oyster season (August 5th), when oysters are an expensive luxury eaten only by the rich. By 6, 7 Viet. c. 79, the oyster season begins September 1, and closes April 30.

P

P. This letter is a rude outline of a man's mouth, the upright being the neck. In Hebrew it is called pe (the mouth).

P. The five P's. William Oxberry was so called, because he was Printer, Poet, Publisher, Publican, and Player. (1784-1824.)

P.C. (patres conscripti.) The Roman senate. The hundred senators appointed by Romulus were called simply patres; a second hundred added by Tatius, upon the union of the Sabines with the Romans, were called patres minorum gentium; a third hundred subsequently added by Tarquinius Priscus were termed patres conscripti, an expression applied to a fourth and fifth hundred conscribed to the original patres or senators. Latterly the term was applied to the whole body.

P.P. in music is not for pianissimo, but for pia piano (more softly).

P.P.C. (pour prendre congé). For leave-taking; sometimes written on the address cards of persons about to leave a locality, when they pay their farewell visits.

P.S. (post-scriptum). Written afterwards—i.e., after the letter or book was finished. (Latin.)

P's and Q's. Mind your P's and Q's. Be very circumspect in your behaviour.

Several explanations have been suggested, but none seem to be wholly satisfactory. The following comes nearest to the point of the caution:—In the reign of Louis XIV., when wigs of unwieldy size were worn, and bows were made with very great formality, two things were especially required, a “step” with the feet, and a low bend of the body. In the latter the wig would be very apt to get deranged, and even to fall off. The constant caution therefore of the French dancing-master to his pupils was “Mind your P’s (i.e., pieds, feet) and Q’s (i.e., queues, wigs).”

Three other explanations are ingenious, but do not carry out the force of the expression. One is this:—Children are very apt to confound the p and q; this was especially the case when they were taught from a horn-book, and the old dame had to warn her child-scholar many and many a time to “mind his P’s and Q’s.”

A third solution is as follows:—When scores were kept in public-houses with a tally, p was set down for “pints,” and q for “quarts.” Mine host would then say to the person sent out to make the score “Mind your P’s and Q’s,” and not unfrequently would the customer also give the same caution, that he might not be charged for quarts instead of pints.

The next suggestion is somewhat similar:—Punch used to be sold in bowls of two sizes: the P size was a shilling, and the Q size sixpence. When two clubbed together, one might say “Mind your P’s and Q’s”—i.e., Do not take a small, but the double measure.

Paba’na (The) or Peacock Dance. A grave and stately Spanish dance, so called from the manner in which the lady held up her skirt during the performance.

Pacha-Ca’mac. The creator of the universe, according to the Peruvian mythology; so called from the valley of Pacha ca’ma, where the Incas had a splendid temple to his honour.

Pacific Ocean. So called by Magellan, because he enjoyed calm weather and a placid sea when he sailed across it, all the more striking after the stormy and tempestuous passage of the adjoining straits.

The Pacific.

Amadeus VIII., count of Savoy. (1383-1451.)

Frederick III., emperor of Germany. (1415, 1440-1493.)

Olaus III. of Norway. (Died 1093.)

Pac’olet. A dwarf in the service of lady Clerimond. He had a winged horse, which carried off Valentine, Orson, and Clerimond from the dungeon of Ferragus to the palace of king Pepin, and afterwards carried Valentine to the palace of Alexander, emperor of Constantinople, his father.—“Valentine and Orson.”

It is a horse of Pacolet (French). A very swift one, that will carry the rider anywhere; in allusion to the enchanted flying horse of wood, belonging to the dwarf Pac’olet. (See above.)

I fear neither shot nor arrow, nor any horse how swift soever he may be, not though he could outstrip the Pegasus of Perseus or of Pacolet, being assured that I can make good my escape.—Rabelais, bk ii. 24.

Pactolus. The golden sands of the Pactolus. The gold found in the Pactolian sands was from the mines of mount Tmolus; but the supply ceased at the commencement of the Christian era. (See MIDAS.)

Pad’alon. The abode of departed spirits.—Hindu mythology.

Padding. The filling-up stuff of serials. The padding of coats and gowns is the wool, &c., put in to make the figure of the wearer more ship-shape. Figuratively, stuff in books or speeches to spin them out.

Paddington Fair. A public execution. Tyburn, where executions formerly took place, is in the parish of Paddington. Public executions were abolished in 1863.

Paddle your own Canoe. Mind your own business.

Paddock. Cold as a paddock. A paddock is a toad or frog; and we have the corresponding phrases “cold as a toad,” and “cold as a frog.” Both are cold-blooded animals.

Paddy. An Irishman. A corruption of St. Patrick, Irish Padhrig.

Paddi-whack means an Irish wag, wag being from the Saxon wecg-an.

Pad’ua was long supposed by the Scotch to be the chief school of necro-mancy; hence Sir Walter Scott says of the earl of Gowrie—

He learned the art that none may name
In Padua, far beyond the sea.
"Lay of the Last Minstrel."

Paduasoy or Padësoy. A silk cloth (Padua-soie).

Pæan. The physician of the celestial gods; the deliverer from any evil or calamity. Also a song to Apollo, praying him to avert some dreaded evil; so called because it began with "Io Pæan." Homer applies it to a triumphal song in general.

Pagan properly means "belonging to a village" (Latin, pagus). The Christian church fixed itself first in cities, the centres of intelligence. Long after it had been established in towns, idolatrous practices continued to be observed in rural districts and villages, so pagan and villager meant the same thing. (See HEATHEN.)

Page (1 syl.). A boy attendant. (Russian, paj, a boy; Greek, pais; Italian, paggio; Spanish, pañe; Welsh, baçgen; our boy.)

Mr. and Mrs. Page. Inhabitants of Windsor. The lady joins with Mrs. Ford to trick Sir John Falstaff.

Anne Page. Daughter of the above, in love with Fenton. Slender, the son of a country squire, shy, awkward, and a booby, greatly admires the lady, but has too faint a heart to urge his suit further than to sigh in audible whispers "Sweet Anne Page!"

William Page. A school-boy, the brother of Anne.—Shakespeare, "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Pago'da. A temple in China, Hindustan, &c. (Hindustanee, boot-khuda, abode of God; Persian, put-gada, idol-house.)

Paint. The North-American Indians paint their faces only when they go to war; when hostilities are over they wash the paint off.

Painter. The rope which binds a ship's boat to the ship. (Irish, painter, a snare.)

I'll cut your painter for you. I'll send you to the right about in double quick time. If the painter is cut, of course the boat drifts away.

Characteristics of the painters. The brilliant truth of a Watteau, the dead reality of a Poussin, the touching grace of a Reynolds,

The colouring of Titian, the expression of Rubens, the grace of Raphael, the purity of Domenichino, the correggioso of Correggio, the learning of Poussin, the airs of Guido, the taste of the Carracci, the grand contour of Angelo.—Sterna.

Prince of Painters. Parrhas'ios, the Greek painter, so called himself. (5th century B.C.)

Apelles of Cos. (4th century B.C.)

Painter of the Graces. Andrea Appia'ni is so called. (1754-1817.)

Painter of Nature. Remi Belleau, author of "Loves and Transformations of the Precious Stones." One of the Pleiad poets is so called, and well deserves the compliment. The "Shepherd's Calendar" of Spenser is largely borrowed from Belleau's "Song on April." (1528-1577.)

Painting. It was Apelles who, being at a loss to delineate the foam of Alexander's horse, dashed his brush at the picture in despair, and did by accident what he could not accomplish by art.

Pair Off. When two members of parliament, or two opposing electors, agree to absent themselves, and not to vote, so that one neutralises the vote of the other.

Paishdad'ian Dynasty. The Kai-Omurs dynasty of Persia was so called from the third of the line (Houshung), who was surnamed Paishdad, or the just law-giver (B.C. 910-870). (See KAI OMURS.)

Paix. La Paix des Dames. The treaty concluded at Cambay, in 1529, between François I. and Charles V. of Germany; so called because it was brought about by Louise of Savoy (mother to the French king) and Margaret, the emperor's aunt.

Palace originally meant a dwelling on the Palatine Hill of Rome. This hill was so called from Pa'lès, a pastoral deity, whose festival was celebrated on April 21st, the "birthday of Rome," to commemorate the day when the wolf-child Rom'ulus drew the first furrow at the foot of the hill, and thus laid the foundation of the "Roma Quadrata," the most ancient part of the city. On this hill Augustus built his mansion, and his example was followed by Tiberius and Nero. Under the last-named emperor, all private houses on the hill had to be pulled down to make room for "The Golden House," called the Pala'tium, the palace of palaces. It continued to be the residence of the Roman emperors to the time of Alexander Severus. (See PALLACE.)

Pal'adin. An officer of the Pala'tium or Byzantine palace, a high dignitary, a chieftain.

Paladins. The knights of king Charlemagne. The most noted are Allory de l'Estoc; Astolfo; Basin de Genevois; Fieranbras or Ferumbras; Florismart; Ganelon, the traitor; Geoffroy, seigneur de Bordelois, and Geoffroy de Frises; Guerin, duc de Lorraine; Guillaume de l'Estoc, brother of Allory; Guy de Bourgogne; Hoël, comte de Nantes; Lambert, prince de Bruxelles; Malagigi; Nami or Nayme de Bavière; Ogier or Oger the Dane; Olivier, son of Regnier, comte de Gennes; Orlando (see Roland); Otuël; Richard, duc de Normandie; Rinaldo; Riol du Mans; Roland, comte de Cenouta, son of Millon and dame Berthe, Charlemagne's sister; Samson, duc de Bourgogne; and Thiry or Thiery d'Ardaine. Of these, twelve at a time seem to have formed the coterie of the king.

Who bear the bows were knights in Arthur's reign,
Twelve they, and twelve the peers of Charlemain.
Dryden, "The Flower and the Leaf."

Palæ'mon, originally called Melicertēs. Son of Ino; called Palæmon after he was made a sea-god. The Roman Portunus, the protecting god of harbours, is the same. (See PALEMON.)

Palæ'other (Greek, ancient wild beast). An extinct thick-skinned animal found in Eocene beds.

Palais des Thermes (pallay da ta'ern). Once the abode of the Roman government of Gaul, as well as of the kings of the first and second dynasties. Here Julius fixed his residence when he was Cæsar of Gaul. It is in Paris, but the only part now extant is a vast hall, formerly the chamber of cold baths (frigida'rium), restored by the present emperor.

Palame'des (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), of Lombardy, joined the squadron of adventurers with his two brothers Achilles and Sforza, in the allied Christian army. He was shot by Clorinda with an arrow.—Book xi.

He is a Palamedes. A clever ingenious person. The allusion is to the son of Nauplios, who invented measures, scales, dice, &c. He also detected that the madness of Ulysses was only assumed.

Sir Palame'des. A Saracen knight overcome in single combat by Sir Tristram. Both loved Isolde, the wife of king Mark; and after the lady was given up by the Saracen, Sir Tristram converted him to the Christian faith, and stood his godfather at the font.—Thomas the Rhymers.

Pal'amon and Arcite (2 syl.). Two young Theban knights, who fell into the hands of "duke Theseus," and were shut up in a donjon at Athens. Both fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister-in-law. In time they obtained their liberty, and the duke appointed a tournament, promising Emily to the victor. Arcite prayed to Mars to grant him victory, Pal'amon prayed to Venus to grant him Emily, and both obtained their petition. Arcite won the victory, but being thrown from his horse, died; Pal'amon therefore, though not the winner, won the prize for which he fought. The story is borrowed from "Le Teseide" of Boccaccio. "The Black Horse," a drama by John Fletcher, is the same tale; so called because it was a black horse from which Arcite was thrown.—Chaucer, "The Knight's Tale."

Palat'inate (4 syl.). The province of a palatine, as the Palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany. A palatine is an officer whose court is held in the royal palace, also called a palace-greave or psalzgrave. There were three palatine counties in England—viz., Chester, Durham, and Lancaster, in which the count exercised a royal authority, just as supreme as though he had been the regal tenant of the palace itself.

Pala'ver is not a corruption of the French parlez-vous, but comes from the Portuguese palavra (talk), which is from palaver, a council of African chiefs. (Irish, pí-labhradh, fine or soft talking; Welsh, lluvar, utterance; Spanish, palabra.)

Pale. Within the pale of my observation; without the pale of the subject; the field or scope thereof. The dominion of king John and his successors in Ireland was marked off, and the part belonging to the English crown was called the pale, or part paled off. (Dutch, paulen; German, pfählen, &c.)

Pale'mon. "The pride of swains" in Thomson's "Autumn," a poetical representation of Boaz, while the "lovely young Lavinia" is Ruth.

Palemon in love with the captain's daughter, in Falconer's "Shipwreck."

Pal'es. The god of shepherds and their flocks.—Roman mythology.

Pales'tra (3 syl.). Either the act of wrestling, &c., or the place in which the Grecian youths practised athletic exercises. (Greek, palē, wrestling.)

Palestri'na or Pelestr'na. An island six miles beyond Murra'na, near Venice, noted for its glass-houses (la fornaci).

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, called "the prince of music." (1529-1594.)

Palimpsest. A parchment on which the original writing has been effaced, and something else has been written. Greek, palin (again), psao (I rub or efface). When parchment was not supplied in sufficient quantities, the monks and others used to wash or rub out the writing in a parchment and use it again; as they did not wash or rub it out entirely, many works have been recovered by modern ingenuity. Thus Cicero's "De Republica" has been restored; it was partially erased to make room for a commentary of St. Augustine on the Psalms. Of course St. Augustine's commentary was first copied, then erased from the parchment, and the original MS. of Cicero made its appearance.

Central Asia is a palimpsest: everywhere actual barbarism overlays a bygone civilisation.—The Times.

Palindrome (3 syl.). A word or line which reads backwards and forwards alike, as Madam, also "Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor." The salutation of the first man to the first woman: "Madam, I'm Adam." (Greek, palin dromo, to run back again.)—See SOTADIC.

Pal'inode (3 syl.). A song or discourse recanting a previous one. A good specimen of the palinode is "Horace," book i., ode 16, translated by Swift. Watts has a palinode in which he retracts the praise bestowed upon queen Anne. In the first part of her reign he wrote a laudatory poem to the queen, but he says that the latter part deluded his hopes and proved him a false prophet. Samuel Butler has also a palinode to recant what he said in a previous poem to the Hon.

Edward Howard, who wrote a poem called "The British Princes." (Greek, palin odē, a song again.)

Pal'inu'rus. Any pilot; so called from Palinurus, the steersman of Æne'as.

Palissy Ware. Dishes and other similar articles covered with models from nature of fish, reptiles, shells, flowers, and leaves, most carefully coloured and in high relief, like the wares of Della Robbia. Bernard Palissy was born at Saintes. (1510-1590.)

Pall, the covering thrown over a coffin, is the Latin pallium, a square piece of cloth used by the Romans to throw over their shoulders, or to cover them in bed; hence a coverlet.

Pall, the long sweeping robe, is the Roman pallia, worn only by princes and women of honest fame. This differed greatly from the pallium, which was worn by freemen and slaves, soldiers and philosophers.

Sometimes let gorgeous Tragedy
In sceptred pall come sweeping by.
Milton, "Il Penseroso."

Pall-bearers. The custom of appointing men of mark for pall-bearers has come to us from the Romans. Julius Cæsar had magistrates for his pall-bearers; Augustus Cæsar had senators; Germanicus had tribunes and centurions; Paulus Emili'us had the chief men of Macedonia who happened to be at Rome at the time; but the poor were carried on a plain bier on the shoulders of four men.

Pall Mall. A game in which a palle or iron ball is struck through an iron ring with a mallet.

Pallace is by Phillips derived from pallicia, pales or paled fences. In Devonshire a paluce means a "storehouse;" in Totness, "a landing-place enclosed but not roofed in."

All that cellar and the chambers over the same, and the little pallace and landing-place adjoining the river Dart.—Lease granted by the Corporation of Totness in 1713.

Out of the ivory palsees (Psalm xlv. 8)—i.e., store-places or cabinets made of ivory.

Palla'dium. Something that affords effectual protection and safety. The Palla'dium was a colossal wooden statue of Pallas in the city of Troy, said to have fallen from heaven. It was believed that so long as this statue remained within the city Troy would be safe, but if removed the city would fall into the hands of the enemy. The statue was carried away by the Greeks, and the city burnt by them to the ground.

The Scotch had a similar tradition attached to the great stone of Scone, near Perth. Edward I. removed it to Westminster, and it is still framed in the coronation chair of England.

Palladium of Rome. Ancile (q.v.).

Palladium of Megara. A golden hair of king Nisus. (See SCYLLA, EDEN HALL.)

Pallas. A name of Minerva, sometimes called Pallas Minerva. The word simply means virgin. (Greek, pallax.)

Pallet. The painter in Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle." A man without one jot of reverence for ancient customs or modern etiquette.

Palliate (3 syl.) means simply to cloak. (Latin, pallium, a cloak.)

That we should not dissemble nor cloke them (our sins)...but confess them with a humble, lowly, and obedient heart.—Common Prayer Book.

Palm. An itching palm. A hand ready to receive bribes. The old superstition is that if your palm itches you are going to receive money.

Let me tell you, Cassius, you yourself
Are much condemned to have an itching palm.
Shakespeare, "Julius Caesar," iv.

To bear the palm. To be the best. The allusion is to the Roman custom of giving the victorious gladiator a branch of the palm tree.

To palm off wares, tricks, &c., upon the unwary. The allusion is to jugglers, who conceal in the palm of their hand what they pretend to dispose of in some other way. These jugglers were sometimes called palmers.

You may palm upon us new for old.

Dryden.

Palm Sunday. The Sunday next before Easter. So called in memory of Christ's triumphant entry into Jerusalem, when the multitude strewed the way with palm branches and leaves. (John xii.)

Palm Tree is said to grow faster for being weighed down. Hence it is the symbol of resolution overcoming calamity. It is believed by Orientals to have sprung from the residue of the clay of which Adam was formed.

Palmer. A pilgrim privileged to carry a palm-staff. In Fosbroke's

"British Monachism" we read that "certain prayers and psalms being said over the pilgrims, as they lay prostrate before the altar, they were sprinkled with holy water, and received a consecrated palm-staff. Palmers differed from pilgrims in this respect: A pilgrim made his pilgrimage and returned to public or private life; but a palmer spent all his days in visiting holy shrines, and lived on charity.

His sandals were with travel tore,
Staff, budget, bottle, scrap he wore;
The faded palm-branch in his hand
Showed pilgrim from the Holy Land.

Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion," l. 27.

Pal'merin of England. A romance of chivalry, in which Palmerin is the hero. There is another romance called "Palmerin de Oliva." (See Southey's "Palmerin.")

Palmy Days. Prosperous or happy days, as those were to a victorious gladiator when he went to receive the palm-branch as the reward of his prowess.

Pam. A familiar contraction of Palmerston, the statesman. (1784-1866.)

Pam'ela. The title of the finest of Richardson's novels, which once enjoyed a popularity almost equal to that of the romances of Sir Walter Scott.

Pamela. Lady Edward Fitzgerald. (Died 1831.)

Pampas. Treeless plains, some 2,000 miles long and from 300 to 500 broad, in South America. They cover an area of 750,000 square miles. It is an Indian word meaning flats or plains.

Pamper, according to Junius, is from the Latin pam'pinus, French pampré (vine-tendrill). A vineyard overgrown with leaves and fruitless branches is called pampré (pamprer dicitur vinea supervacuo pampino'rum ger'minè exuberans, ac nimia crescendi luxu'ria quodammodo sylvescene). Hence Milton—

Where any row
Of fruit-trees, over-woody, reached too far
Their pampered boughs, and needed hands to check Fruitless embraces. "Paradise Lost," v.

The Italian pampera'to (well-fed) is a compound of pamē (bread) and bere (drink).

Pamphlet. Dr. Johnson suggests the derivation of this word to be the French par-un-filet (held "by a thread"), a book stitched but not bound; another derivation is pag'inae filo'te (pages tacked together), in corroboration of which etymology we find the word anciently written panfletus, panflete, and by Caxton paunflet.

Pan. The personification of deity displayed in creation and pervading all things. As flocks and herds were the chief property of the pastoral age, Pan was called the god of flocks and herds. He is also called the god of hylē, not the "woods" only, but "all material substances." The lower part was that of a goat, because of the asperity of the earth; the upper part was that of a man, because ether is the "hegemonic of the world;" the lustful nature of the god symbolised the spermatric principle of the world; the libbard's skin was to indicate the immense variety of created things; and the character of "blameless Pan" symbolised that wisdom which governs the world. (Greek, pan, everything.)—Phornutus, "De Natura Deorum," xxviii. 203.

Universal Pan,
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance,
Led on the eternal spring.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv.

The Great Pan. François Marie Aronnet de Voltaire, also called the Dictator of Letters. (1694-1778.)

Panacea. A universal cure. Panacea was the daughter of Esculāpius (god of medicine). The name is evidently composed of two Greek words pan-aceomai (all I cure). Of course the medicine that cures is the daughter or child of the Healing art.

Panacea. An Orkney proverb says the well of Kildinguie and the dulse (sea-weed) of Guiodin will cure all maladies save Black Death.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Pirate," ch. xxix. (See AZOTH.)

Pancake (2 syl.) is a pudding or "cake" made in a frying-pan. It was originally to be eaten after dinner, to stay the stomachs of those who went to be shriven. The Shrove-bell was called the Pancake Bell, and the day of shriving "Pancake Tuesday."

Pancaste (3 syl.), an Athenian hetera, and her companion in sin, Phryniē, were the models of Venus Rising from the Sea, by Apellēs. (See PHRYNĒ.)

Pancras (St.). Patron saint of children. He was a noble Roman youth, martyred by Diocletian at the age of fourteen (A.D. 304). (See NICHOLAS.)

St. Pancras, in Christian art, is represented as treading on a Saracen and bearing either a stone and sword, or a book and palm-branch. The allusions are to his hatred of infidelity, and the implements of his martyrdom.

Pan'darus. Leader of the Lycians in the Trojan war, but represented as a pimp in mediæval romances. (See PANDER.)

Pandects of Justin'ian, found at Amalphi (1137), gave a spur to the study of civil law which changed the whole literary and legal aspect of Europe. The word means much the same as "cyclopædia." (Greek, pan, everything; dech'omai, I receive.)

Pandemo'nium. A perfect pandemonium. A bear-garden for disorder and licentiousness. In allusion to the parliament of hell in Milton's "Paradise Lost," bk. i. (Greek, pan dæmon, every demon.)

Pander. To pander to one's vices is to act as an agent to them, and such an agent is termed a pander, from Pan'darus, who procures for Troilus the love and good graces of Cressida. In "Much Ado about Nothing" it is said that Troilus was "the first employer of pandars" (v. 2).—Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida;" Chaucer, "Troilus and Cresseide."

Let all pitiful coers between be called to the world's end after my name, call them all "Pandars." Let all constant men be "Troil'uses," all false women
"Cressids," and all brokers-between "Pandars."
Say Amen.—"Troilus and Cressida," iii. 2.

Pando'ra's Box (A). A present which seems valuable, but which is in reality a curse; as when Midas was permitted, according to his request, to turn whatever he touched into gold, and found his very food became gold, and therefore uneatable. Prometheus made an image and stole fire from heaven to endow it with life. In revenge, Jupiter told Vulcan to make a female statue, and gave her a box which she was to present to the man who married her. Prometheus distrusted Jove and his gifts, but Epimetheus, his brother, married the beautiful Pando'ra, and received the box. Immediately the bridegroom opened the box, all the evils that flesh is heir to flew forth, and have ever since continued to afflict the world. The last thing that flew from the box was Hope.

Panel means simply a piece of rag or skin. (Latin, pannus; Greek, peños.) In law it means a piece of parchment containing the names of jurors. To empanel a jury is to enter their names on the panel or roll. The panels of a room are the framed wainscot which supplies the place of tapestry, and the panels of doors are the thin boards like wainscot.

Pangloss (Dr.). A learned pedant, very poor and very conceited, pluming himself on the titles of LL.D. and A.SS. (Greek, "All-tongue.")—Colman, "Heir-at-Law."

Panic. On one occasion Bacchus, in his Indian expeditions, was encompassed with an army far superior to his own; one of his chief captains, named Pan, advised him to command all his men at the dead of night to raise a simultaneous shout. The shout was rolled from mountain to mountain by innumerable echoes, and the Indians, thinking they were surrounded on all sides, took to sudden flight. From this incident, all sudden fits of great terror have been termed panics. (See Judges vii. 18-21.)

Theon gives another derivation, and says that the god Pan struck terror into the hearts of the giants, when they warred against heaven, by blowing into a sea-shell.

Pantagruel. (Greek, panta, all; Hagarene, gruel, thirsty.) So called because he was born during the drought which lasted thirty and six months, three weeks, four days, thirteen hours, and a little more, in that year of grace noted for having "three Thursdays in one week." His father was Gargantua, the giant, who was four hundred fourscore and forty-four years old at the time; his mother Baddebec died in giving him birth; his grandfather was Grangousier (q.v.). He was so strong that he was chained in his cradle with four great iron chains, like those used in ships of the largest size; being angry at this, he stamped out the bottom of his bassanet, which was made of weavers' beams, and when loosed by the servants, broke his bonds into five hundred thousand pieces with one blow of his infant fist. When he grew to manhood he knew all languages, all sciences, and all knowledge of every sort, out-Solomoning Solomon in wisdom. Having defeated Anarchus, king of the Dipisodes, all submitted except the Almirods. Marching against these people, a heavy rain fell, and Pantagruel covered his whole army with his tongue. While so doing, Alcofribas crawled into his mouth, where he lived six months, taking toll of every morsel that his lord ate. His immortal achievement was his voyage from Utopia in quest of the "oracle of the Holy Bottle" (q.v.).

Wouldst thou not issue forth . . .
To see the third part in this earthy cell
Of the brave acts of good Pantagruel?
Rabelais, "To the Spirit of the Queen of Navarre."

Pantagruel (meant for Henri II., son of François I), in the satirical romance of Rabelais, entitled "History of Gargantua and Pantagruel."

The great Pantagruel case (lord Busqueue v. lord Sucklist). This case, having nonplussed all the judges of Paris, was referred to lord Pantagruel for decision. The writs, &c., were as much as four asses could carry, but the arbiter determined to hear the plaintiff and defendant state their own cases. Lord Busqueue spoke first, and pleaded such a rigmarole that no one on earth could unravel its meaning; lord Sucklist replied, and the bench declared "We have not understood one single circumstance of the defence." Then Pantagruel gave sentence, but his judgment was as obscure and unintelligible as the case itself. So as no one understood a single sentence of the whole affair, all were perfectly satisfied, "a thing unparalleled in the annals of the law."—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," bk. ii.

Pantagruelion Herb. Hemp; so called "because Pantagruel was the inventor of a certain use which it serves for, exceeding hateful to felons, unto whom it is more hurtful than strangledweed to flax."

The figure and shape of the leaves are not much different from those of the ash-tree or the Agrimony, the herb itself being so like the Eupatorio that many herbalists have called it the "Domestic Eupatorio," and the Eupatorio the "Wild Pantagruelion."—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 49.

Pantaloon. A feeble-minded old man, the cully of the clown, whom he aids and abets in all his knavery. The word is derived from the dress he used to wear, panu talon, a loose suit down to the heels.

That Licentio that comes awooing is my man Tranio bearing my port, that we might beguile the old pantaloon.—Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew,"
iii. 1

Pantaloon. Lord Byron says the Venetians were called the Planters of the Lion—i.e., the Lion of St. Mark, the standard of the republic; and further tells us that the character of "pantaloon," being Venetian, was called Piantalone (Planter of the Lion).—"Childe Harold," bk. iv., stanza 14, note 9.

Playing Pantaloon. Playing second fiddle; being the cat's-paw of another; servily imitating.

Panthea (Greek). Statues carrying symbols of several deities, as in the medal of Antoninus Pius, where Sera'pis is represented by a modius, Apollo by rays, Jupiter Ammon by ram's horns, Pluto by a large beard, and Escula'pios by a wand around which a serpent is twined.

Panthe'on. The finest is that erected in Rome by Agrippa (son-in-law of Augustus). It is circular, 150 feet in diameter, and the same in height. It is now a church, with statues of heathen gods, and is called the Rotunda. In Paris the Pantheon or church of St. Geneviève was built by Louis XV., at the solicitation of Madame de Pompadour, to enshrine those Frenchmen whom their country wished to recognise (aux grands hommes la patrie reconnaissante).

Panther. The spotted panther in Dryden's "Hind and Panther" means the Church of England full of the spots of error, whereas the Church of Rome is faultless as the milk-white hind.

The panther, sure the noblest next the hind,
And fairest creature of the spotted kind;
Oh, could her inborn stains be washed away
She were too good to be a beast of prey.—(pt. 1)

Pantile. A hat. (See TILE.)

Pantomime (3 syl.), originally meant the actor of a dumb spectacle, one who acted altogether by mimicry. The best pantomi'mi among the Romans were Bathyllus (a freedman of Mæce'nas), Pyl'adēs, and Hylas. The emperor Nero often acted with the pantomimes. It is strange how words change their meaning: thus pantomime is the actor, and harlequin is the piece performed; but in modern parlance pantomime is the piece performed, and harlequin an actor.

According to etymology, pantomime should be all dumb show, but in modern practice it is partly dumb show and partly grotesque speaking. Harlequin and Columbine never speak, but Clown and Pantaloon keep up a constant fire of fun. Dr. Clarke says that Harlequin is the god Mercury, with his short sword called "herpē," he is supposed to be invisible, and to be able to transport himself to the ends of the earth as quick as thought. Columbine, he says, is Psyche (the soul); the old man is Charon; and the clown, Momus (the buffoon of heaven), whose large gaping mouth is an imitation of the ancient masks.—"Travels," iv. 459.

Panton Gates. Old as Panton Gates. A corruption of Pandon Gates at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

Panurge (2 syl.). A companion of Pantagruel's, not unlike our Rochester and Buckingham in the reign of the mutton-eating king. He was a desperate rake, was always in debt, had a dodge for every scheme, knew everything and something more, was a boon companion of the mirthfullest temper and most licentious bias; but was timid of danger, and a coward. He enters upon ten thousand adventures for the solution of this knotty point: "Whether or not he ought to marry?" and although every response is in the negative, disputes the ostensible meaning, and stoutly maintains that no means yes. (Greek, factotum.)—Rabelais.

Panurge, probably meant for Calvin, though some think it is cardinal Lorrain. He is a licentious intemperate libertine, a coward and knave. Of course the satire points to the celibacy of the clergy.

Sam Slick is the thorough-bred Yankee, bold, cunning, and above all a merchant. In short, he is a sort of republican Panurge.—Globe.

As Panurge asked if he should marry. Asking advice merely to contradict the giver of it. Panurge asked Pantagruel whether he advised him to marry. "Yes," said Pantagruel, when Panurge urged some strong objection. "Then don't marry," said Pantagruel, to which the favourite replied, "His whole heart was bent on so doing." "Marry then, by all means," said the prince, but again found some insuperable barrier; and so they went on: every time Pantagruel said "Yea," new reasons were found against this advice; and every time he said

"Nay," reasons no less cogent were discovered for the affirmative.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. iii. 9.

Panyer's Alley (London). So called from a stone built into the wall of one of the houses. On the stone is rudely chiselled (1) a pannier surmounted by a boy, and (2) the following inscription:—

When you have sought the city round,
Yet still this is the highest ground.

Pap. He gives pap with a hatchet. He does or says a kind thing in a very brusque and ungracious manner. The Spartan children were fed by the point of a sword, and the Teuton children with hatchets, or instruments so called—probably of the doll type. "Ursus," in Victor Hugo's novel of "L'Homme qui Rit," gives "pap with a hatchet."

Papa, Father. The former is Norman-French, the latter Saxon. The former is still retained in aristocratic families, but the latter is usual with rustics and artisans. The Normans were the lords, the Saxons the serfs and rustics.

Paper. So called from the papyrus or Egyptian reed used at one time for the manufacture of a writing material. Bryan Donkin, in 1803, perfected a machine for making a sheet of paper to any required length.

Paper House in theatrical language is one where the stall and box occupants have not paid cash for their places, but have come in with orders.

Paper King. John Law, the projector of the Mississippi Scheme. (1671-1729.)

Paper Marriages. Weddings of dons, who pay their fees in bank-notes.

Paph'ian. Relating to Venus, or rather to Paphos, a city of Cyprus where Venus was worshipped; a Cyprian; a prostitute.

Papimany. The country of the Papimans; the country subject to the pope, or any priest-ridden country, as Spain.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," iv. 45.

Papy'ra. The goddess of printing; so called from papyrus, the Nile reed, from which at one time paper was made, and from which it borrows its name.

Still to astonished realms Papyra taught
To paint in mystic colours sound and thought,
With Wisdom's voice to print the page sublime,
And mark in adamant the steps of Time.

Darwin, "Loves of the Plants" canto ii.

Papy'ri. Written scrolls made of the Papyrus, found in Egypt and Herculaneum.

Paracelsists. Disciples of Paracelsus in medicine, physics, and mystic sciences.

Paraclete. The advocate; one called to aid or support another. (The word paraclete is the Greek para-kalēō, to call to; and advocate is the Latin ad-voco, the same thing.)

Paradise. The Greeks used this word to denote the extensive parks and pleasure-grounds of the Persian kings. (Persian, pardēs; Arabic, firdawz; Sanskrit, parade'sa.) (See CALAY.)

An old word "paradise," which the Hebrews had borrowed from the Persians, and which at first designated the "parks of the Achaemenidae," summed up the general dream.—Renan, "Life of Jesus," xi.

Upper and Lower Paradise. The rabbins say there is an earthly or lower paradise under the equator, divided into seven dwellings, and twelve times ten thousand miles square. A column reaches from this paradise to the upper or heavenly one, by which the souls mount upwards after a short sojourn on the earthly one.

The ten dumb animals admitted to the Moslem's paradise are—

(1) The dog Kratim, which accompanied the Seven Sleepers.

(2) Balaam's ass, which spoke with the voice of a man to reprove the disobedient prophet.

(3) Solomon's ant, of which he said "Go to the ant, thou sluggard . . ."

(4) Jonah's whale.

(5) The ram caught in the thicket, and offered in sacrifice in lieu of Isaac.

(6) The calf of Abraham.

(7) The camel of Saleh.

(8) The cuckoo of Belkis.

(9) The ox of Moses.

(10) Mahomet's mare, called Borak.

Paradise Lost. Satan rouses the panic-stricken host of fallen angels to tell them about a rumour current in Heaven of a new world about to be created. He calls a counsel to deliberate what should be done, and they agree to send Satan to search out for the new world. Satan, passing the gulf between Hell and Heaven and the limbo of Vanity, enters the orb of the Sun (in the guise of an ordinary angel) to make inquiries of the new planet's whereabouts; and having obtained the necessary information alights on mount Nepht'ës, and goes to Paradise in the form of a cormorant. Seating himself on the Tree of Life, he overhears Adam and Eve talking about the prohibition made by God, and at once resolves upon the nature of his attack. Gabriel sends two angels to watch over the bower of Paradise, and Satan flees. Raphael is sent to warn Adam of his danger, and tells him the story of Satan's revolt and expulsion out of Heaven, and why and how this world was made. After a time Satan returns to Paradise in the form of a mist, and entering the serpent, induces Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit. Adam eats "that he may perish with the woman whom he loved." Satan returns to Hell to tell his triumph, and Michael is sent to lead the guilty pair out of the garden.—Milton.

Paradise Regained, in four books. The subject is the Temptation. Eve, being tempted, fell, and lost Paradise: Jesus, being tempted, resisted, and regained Paradise.—Milton.

Paradise of Fools. The Hindus, Mahometans, Scandinavians, and Roman Catholics have devised a place between Paradise and "Purgatory," to get rid of a theological difficulty. If there is no sin without intention, then infants and idiots cannot commit sin, and if they die cannot be consigned to the purgatory of evil-doers; but not being believers or good-doers, they cannot be placed with the saints. The Roman Catholics place them in the Paradise of Infants and the Paradise of Fools.

Paradise and the Peri. The second tale in Moore's poetical romance of "Lalla Rookh." The Peri laments her expulsion from Heaven, and is told she will be re-admitted if she will bring to the Gate of Heaven the "gift most dear to the Almighty." First she went to a battle-field, where the tyrant Mahmoud, having won a victory, promised life to a young warrior, but the warrior struck the tyrant with a dart. The wound, however, was not mortal, so "The tyrant lived, the hero fell." The Peri took to Heaven's Gate the last drop of the patriot's blood as her offering, but the gates would not open to her. Next she flew to Egypt, where the plague was raging, and saw a young man dying; presently his betrothed bride sought him out, caught the disease, and both died. The Peri took to Heaven's Gate the last sigh of that self-sacrificed damsel, but the offering was not good enough to open the gates to her. Lastly, she flew to Syria, and there saw an innocent child and guilty old man. The vesper bell rang, and the child knelt down to prayer. The old man wept with repentance, and knelt to pray beside the child. The Peri offered the Repentant Tear, and the gates flew open to receive her.

Paramatta. So called from a town in New South Wales, famous for the manufacture.

Paraphernalia means all that a woman can claim at the death of her husband beyond her jointure. In the Roman law her paraphernalia included the furniture of her chamber, her wearing-apparel, her jewels, &c. Hence personal attire, fittings generally, anything for show or decoration. (Greek, paraphernê, beyond dower.)

Parasite (3 syl.) means the warder of a granary or parasi'ton. The priests appointed in Greece to garner the corn for the public sacrifices were called parasites, or warders of the "parasi'ton." In the Commonwealth the general public was relieved of the parasite tax, and the ministering priests were billeted on the wealthy citizens, where they made themselves agreeable for their own sakes. Hence a hanger-on or trencher companion is called a parasite. (Greek, para siton.)

Parbutta or Devi. Wife of Siva, and goddess of war, murder, and bloodshed, in Hindu mythology. The idols of the goddess are most frightful.

Parc aux Cerfs (Deer Park). A mansion fitted up in a remote corner of Versailles, whither girls were inveigled for the licentious pleasure of Louis XV. The rank of the person who visited them was scrupulously kept concealed; but one girl, more bold than the rest, rifled the pockets of M. le Comte, and found that he was no other than the king. Madame de Pompadour did not shrink from superintending the labours of the royal valets to procure victims for this infamous establishment. The term is now used for an Alsa'tia, or haven of shipwrecked characters.

Boulogne may be proud of being the "parc aux ceris" to those whom remorseless greed drives from their island home.—Saturday Review.

Parcæ. The Fates. The three were Clotho, Lach'esis, and At'ropos (Latin mythology). Parcæ is from pars, a lot; and the corresponding Moiræ is from meros, a lot. The Fates were so called because they decided the lot of every man.

Parchment. So called from Per'gamos in Lesser Asia, where it was used for purposes of writing when Ptolemy prohibited the exportation of paper from Egypt.

Parda'lo. The demon-steed given to Iniguez Guerra by his goblin mother, that he might ride to Toledo and liberate his father, don Diego Lopez, lord of Biscay, who had fallen into the hands of the Moors.—Spanish tradition.

Pardon Bell or Avè Bell. The bell tolled after full service, to call those who wish to stay to the invocation of the Virgin for pardon.

Par'dounerës Tale, in Chaucer, is "Death and the Rioters." Three rioters in a tavern agreed to hunt down Death and kill him. As they went their way they met an old man, who told them that he had just left him sitting under a tree in the lane close by. Off posted the three rioters, but when they came to the tree they found a great treasure which they agreed to divide equally. They cast lots which was to carry it home, and the lot fell to the youngest, who was sent to the village to buy food and wine. While he was gone the two who were left agreed to kill him, and so increase their share; but the third bought poison to put into the wine, in order to kill his two confreres. On his return with his stores, the two set upon him and slew him, then sat down to drink and be merry together; but the wine being poisoned, all the three rioters found Death under the tree as the old man had said.

Pari Passu. At the same time; two or more schemes carried on at once, and driven forward with equal energy, are said to be carried on pari passu, which is Latin for equal strides or the equally measured pace of persons marching together.

Pa'rian Chronicle. A chronological register of the chief events in the mythology and history of ancient Greece during a series of 1,318 years, beginning with the reign of Cærops, and ending with the archonship of Diognotos. It is engraved on marble, and was found in the island of Paros. It is one of the Arundelian Marbles (q.v.).

Pa'rian Verse. Ill-natured satire; so called from Archilochos, a native of Paros.

Pa'rias or Par'iah. The lowest class of the Hindu population, below the four castes.

The lodgers overhead may perhaps be able to take a more comprehensive view of public questions; but they are political Helots, they are the Parians of our constitutional Brahminism.—The Times (March 29, 1867).

Par'idel. A young gentleman that travels about and seeks adventure, because he is young, rich, and at leisure. (See below.)

Thou too, my Paridel, she marked thee there,
Stretched on the rack of a too-easy chair,
And heard thy everlasting yawn confess
The pains and penalties of idleness.

"Dunciad," iv. 341.

Sir Paridel. A male coquette, whose delight was to win women's hearts, and then desert them. The model was the earl of Westmoreland.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. iii.

Paris or Alexander. Son of Priam, and cause of the siege of Troy. He was hospitably entertained by Menelaos, king of Sparta, and eloped with Helen, his host's wife. This brought about the siege. Post-Homeric tradition says that Paris slew Achilles, and was himself slain either by Pyrrhos or Philoctetes.—Homer, "Iliad."

Paris. Kinsman to the prince of Verona, the unsuccessful suitor of Juliet.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."

Paris. Rabelais says that Gargantua played on the Parisians who came to stare at him a practical joke, and the men said it was a sport "par ris" (to be laughed at); wherefore the city was called Par'is. It was called before Leuco'ia, from the "white skin of the ladies" (Greek, leukotēs, whiteness).—"Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 17.

Paris, called by the Romans "Lute'ia Parisio'rum" (the mud-city of the Parisii). The Parisii were the Gallic tribe which dwelt in the "Ile du Palais" when the Romans invaded Gaul. (See Isis.)

Mons. de Paris. The public executioner of Paris.

Little Paris.

The "Galleria di Cristofers" of Milan is so called on account of its brilliant shops, its numerous cafés, and its general gay appearance.

Brussels, the capital of Belgium, situate on the Senne.

Paris-Garden. A bear-garden; a noisy, disorderly place. In allusion to the bear-garden so called on the Thames bank-side, kept by Robert de Paris in the reign of Richard II.

Paris'ian. Made at Paris; after the mode of Paris; a native of Paris; like a native of Paris.

Parisienne (La). A celebrated song by Casimir Delavigne, called the Marsellaise of 1830.

Paris n'a plus qu'un cri de gloire:

En avant marchons,

Contre leurs caïons,

A travers le fer, le feu des bataillons,
Courons à la victoire!

Parisina, the beautiful young wife of Azo, falls in love with Hugo, her stepson, and betrays herself to her husband in a dream. Azo condemns his son to be executed, but the fate of Parisina, says Byron, is unknown.—"Parisina."

Frizzi, in his "History of Ferrara," tells us that Parisina Malatesta was the second wife of Niccolo, marquis of Esté; that she fell in love with Hugo, her stepson, and that the infidelity of Parisina was revealed by a servant named Zoe'sé. He says that both Hugo and Parisina were beheaded, and that the marquis commanded all the faithless wives he knew to be beheaded to the moloch of his passion.

Parish Registers. Bills of mortality. George Crabbe, author of "The Borough," has a poem in three parts, in ten-syllable verse with rhymes, entitled "The Parish Register."

Pariza'de (4 syl.). A lady whose adventures in search of the Talking Bird, Singing Tree, and Yellow Water, are related in the "Story of the Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister," in the "Arabian Nights." This tale has been closely imitated in "Chery and Fairstar" (q. v.).

Parkership. The office of pound-keeper; from parcus (a pound).

Parks. There are in England 334 parks stocked with deer; red deer are kept in 31 of them. The oldest is Eridge park, in Sussex, called in Domesday Book Reredfelle (Rotherfield). The largest private deer park is lord Egerton's, Tatton, in Cheshire, which contains 2,500 acres. Blenheim park contains 2,800 acres, but only 1,150 acres of it is open to deer. Almost as extensive as Tatton park are Richmond park, in Surrey; Eastwell park, in Kent; Grims-thorpe park, in Lincolnshire; Thoresby park, in Notts; and Knowesley park, in Lancashire.—E. P. Shirley, "English Deer Parks."

Parlance. In common parlance. In the usual or vulgar phraseology. An English-French word; the French have parler, parlant, langage, &c.—to speak, speaking, talk—but not parlance.

Parlement (French). A crown court where, in the old régime, councillors were allowed to plead, and where justice was administered in the king's name. The Paris Parlement received appeals from all inferior tribunals, but its own judgments were final. It took cognizance of all offences against the crown, the peers, the bishops, the corporations, and all high officers of state; and though it had no legislative power, had to register the royal edicts before they could become law. Abolished by the Constituent Assembly in 1790.

Parliament.

My lord Coke tells us Parliament is derived from "parler le ment" (to speak one's mind). He might as honestly have taught us that firmament is "firmamentis" (a farm for the mind); or "fundament" the bottom of the mind.—Bymer, "On Parliaments."

The Addled Parliament. Between April 5th, 1614, and June 7th, 1615; so called because it remonstrated with the king on his levying "benevolences," but passed no acts.

Barebone's Parliament. The Parliament convened July 4th, 1653; so called from Praise-God Barebone, who ruled it, and overrode its members.

The Devil's Parliament. The Parliament convened at Coventry by Henry VI. in 1459; so called because it passed attainders on the duke of York and his chief supporters.

The Drunken Parliament. The Parliament assembled at Edinburgh, January 1st, 1661, of which Burnet says the members "were almost perpetually drunk."

The Good Parliament, in the reign of Edward III., while the Black Prince was still alive; so called from the severity with which it pursued the unpopular party of the duke of Lancaster.

The Long Parliament. Same as the "Pensioner Parliament" (q.v.). Convened November 3rd, 1640; dissolved by Cromwell, April 20th, 1653. This Parliament voted the House of Lords as useless.

Historian of the Long Parliament. Thomas May, buried in Westminster Abbey. (1595-1650.)

The Mad Parliament, in the reign of Henry III. (1258), and so called for its opposition to the king. It insisted on his confirming the Magna Charta, and even appointed twenty-four of its own members, with Simon de Montfort as president, to administer the government.

The Pensioner Parliament, in the reign of Charles I.; so called because it sat for eighteen years without dissolution, and the members seemed to have a pension or right of membership.

The Rump Parliament, in the Protectorate; so called because it contained the rump or fag-end of the Long Parliament (1659). It was this Parliament that voted the trial of Charles I.

The Running Parliament. A Scotch Parliament; so called from its constantly being shifted from place to place.

The Unmerciful Parliament, in the reign of Richard II.; so called by the people from its tyrannical proceedings.

The Useless Parliament. The Parliament convened by Charles I., on June 18th, 1625; adjourned to Oxford, August 1st; and dissolved August 12th; having done nothing but offend the king.

The Wondermaking Parliament. The same as "The Unmerciful Parliament;" convened February 3rd, 1388. By playing into the hands of the duke of Gloucester it checkmated the king.

Parliament of Dunces; convened by Henry IV. at Coventry, in 1404, and so called because all lawyers were excluded from it.

Parliamentarian. One who favoured the Parliament in opposition to Charles I.

Parlour. The room in a nunnery where the ladies went to see their friends and chat with them (French).

Parmenianists. A name given to the Donatists; so called from Parmenianus, bishop of Carthage, the great antagonist of Augustine.

Par'mesan'. A cheese made at Parma, in Italy.

Parnassos (Greek; PARNASSUS, Latin). A mountain near Delphi, in Greece. It has two summits, one of which was consecrated to Apollo and the Muses, the other to Bacchus. It was anciently called Larnassos, from larnax, an ark, because Deucalion's ark stranded there after the flood. After the oracle of Delphi was built at its foot it received the name of Parnassos, which Peuceirus says is a corruption of Har Nahas, hill of divination. The Turks call it "Licaoura."

Parnassus. The region of poetry. Properly a mountain of Phocis, in Greece, sacred to Apollo and the Muses. "Where lies your vein? Are you inclined to soar to the higher regions of Parnassus or to flutter round the base of the hill?" ("The Antiquary")—i.e., Are you going to attempt the higher walks of poetry, such as epic and dramatic, or some more modest kind, as simple song?

To climb Parnassus. To write poetry.

Parody. Father of Parody. Hippodamach of Ephesus. The word parody means an ode which perverts the meaning of another ode. (Greek, para odē.)

Parole (French). A verbal promise given by a soldier or prisoner of war, that he will not abuse the leave of absence granted to him; the watchword of the day.

Parolles (3 syl.). A man of vain words, who dubs himself "captain," pretends to knowledge which he has not, and to sentiments he never feels. (French, parolles, a creature of empty words.)—Shakespeare, "All's Well that Ends Well."

I know him a notorious liar,
Think him a great way fool, solely a coward;
Yet these fixed evils sit so fit on him
That they take place . . . —(Act I. 1.)

He was a mere Parollès in a pedagogue's wig. A pretender, a man of words, and a pedant. The allusion is to the bragging, faithless, slandering villain mentioned above.

Rust, sword; cool, blushes; and, Parollès, live
Safest in shame; being fooled, by fooling thrive;
There's place and means for every man alive.
"All's Well that Ends Well," iv. 3.

Parr. Old Parr. Thomas Parr lived in the reigns of ten sovereigns; married a second wife when he was 120 years old, and had a child by her. He was a husbandman, born at Salop in 1483, and died 1635, aged 152 years.

Par'ricide (3 syl.). La Belle Par'ricide. Beatrice Cenci (* -1599.)

Parsees or Ghebers. Fire-worshippers. We use the word for Persian refugees driven out of their country by the persecutions of the Mussulmans. They now inhabit various parts of India. (The word means People of Pars or Fars —i.e., Persia.)

Parson, says Blackstone, is "pers'na ecclesia, one that hath full rights of the parochial church." With all due deference to so great an authority, it is far more likely to be connected with the German pfarre, a benefice; pfarrer, a clergyman; pfarr-haus, a clergyman's house, &c. (See CLERICAL TITLES.)

Amour wytes and wodewes ich am ywoned sute (wont to set).
Yparoked (impaled) in puwes. The person hit knoweth.

Robert Langland, "Piers Plowman's Vision."
God give you good morrow, master person (i.e., Sir Nathaniel, a parson).—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 2.

Parson Adams. A simple-minded country clergyman of the eighteenth century, in Fielding's "Joseph Andrews."

Fielding says that Parson Adams at the age of fifty was provided with a handsome income of £23 a-year (1740). Timothy Burrell, Esq., in 1715, bequeathed to his nephew Timothy the sum of £20 a-year, to be paid during his residence at the University, and to be continued to him till he obtained some preferment with at least £30 a-year.—"Sussex Archaeological Collections," vol. iii., p. 172.

* * * When Goldsmith says that his country clergyman with "forty pounds a year" was "passing [exceedingly] rich," it is no covert satire. In Norway and Sweden to the present hour the clergy are paid from twenty to forty pounds a-year. Even in Paris the working clergy receive about the same stipends.

Parson Bate. A stalwart, choleric, sporting parson, editor of the Morning Post in the latter half of the eighteenth century. He was afterwards Sir Henry Bate Dudley, Bart.

When Sir Henry Bate Dudley was appointed an Irish dean, a young lady of Dublin said, "Oh, how

I long to see our dane! They say he is a very handsome man, and that he fights like an angel.—Ouseell's Magazine, "London Legends," iii.

Parsons (Walter), the giant porter of king James, died in 1622.—"Fuller's Worthies."

Partant pour la Syrie. The national air of the French empire. The words were composed by M. de Laborde in 1809; the music by queen Hortense, mother of Napoleon III. It is a ballad, the subject of which is as follows:—Young Dunois followed the count his lord to Syria, and prayed the Virgin "that he might prove the bravest warrior, and love the fairest maiden." After the battle, the count said to Dunois, "To thee we owe the victory, and my daughter I give to thee." Moral: "Amour à la plus belle; honneur au plus vaillant."

Parthe'nia. Mistress of Ar'galus, in the "Arcadia" of Sir Philip Sidney.

Parthen'opë (4 syl.). Naples; so called from Parthenopë, the siren, who threw herself into the sea out of love for Ulysses, and was cast up on the bay of Naples.

Parthenope'an Republic. That of Naples, from January 22, 1799, to the June following.

Particular Baptists. That branch of the Baptist Dissenters who limit the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to those who have been recipients of adult baptism. Open Baptists admit any baptised person to receive it.

Particularists. Those who hold the doctrine of particular election and reprobation.

Parting.

Parting is such sweet sorrow,
That I shall say "Good Night" till it be morrow.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," act ii., s. 2.

Partington. A Mrs. Malaprop, or Tabitha Bramble, famous for her misuse of hard words.—B. P. Skittaber (an American author).

Dame Partington and her Mop. A taunt against those who try to withstand progress. The newspapers say that a Mrs. Partington had a cottage at Sidmouth, in Devonshire. In November, 1824, a heavy gale drove the sea-waves into her house, and the old lady laboured with a mop to sop the wet up, till she was obliged to take refuge in the upper part of the house. The Rev. Sydney Smith, speaking on the Lords' rejection of the Reform Bill, October, 1831, compares them to Dame Partington with her mop, trying to push back the Atlantic. "She was excellent," he says, "at a slop or puddle, but should never have meddled with a tempest."

Part'let. The hen in Chaucer's "Nun's Priest's Tale, and in the tale of "Reynard the Fox" (14th century). So called from the partlet or loose collar of "the doublet," referring to the frill-like feathers round the neck of certain hens.

In the barn the tenant cock
Close to partlet perched on high Cunningham.

Sister Partlet with her hooded head, allegorises the cloistered community of nuns in Dryden's "Hind and Panther," where the Roman Catholic clergy are likened to barn-yard fowls.

Partridge. The attendant of Jones, half barber and half schoolmaster; shrewd, but simple as a child. His simplicity, and his strong excitement at the play-house, when he went to see Garrick in "Hamlet," are admirably portrayed.—Fielding, "Tom Jones."

Partula, according to Tertullian, was the goddess of pregnancy, who determined the time of gestation.—Aulus Gellius, iii., c. 16.

Party. Person or persons under consideration. "This is the next party, your worship"—i.e., the next case to be examined. "This is the party that stole the things"—the person or persons accused. (French, partie, a person.)

If an evil spirit trouble any, one must make a smoke.....and the party shall be no more vexed (Tobit vi. 7).

Party Spirit. The animus or feeling of a party man.

Par'venu' (French). An upstart; one who has risen from the ranks.

Parvis (London). The "place" or court before the main entrance of a cathedral. In the parvis of St. Paul's lawyers used to meet for consultation, as brokers do in exchange. The word is now applied to the room above the church-porch. (A corruption of the Latin pervius, open to passengers, whence the low Latin parvisium.)

A sergeant of lawe, war and wys,
That often haldeþ ben atig parvys.
Chaucer, "C Canterbury Tales" (Introduction).

Parviz' (Victorious). Surname of Khosru or Chosroes II., the grandson of Khosru the Magnificent. The reigns of Khosru I. and II. were the golden period of Persian history. Parviz kept 15,000 female musicians, 6,000 household officers, 20,500 saddle-mules, 950 elephants, 200 slaves to scatter perfumes when he went abroad, 1,000 sekabers to water the roads before him, and sat on a pillared throne of almost inconceivable splendour.

The horse of Chosroes Parviz. Shidbiz, the Persian Buceph'alos.

Parys'atis. Wife of Darius Nothos. A corruption of Peri' Zudchēr (fairy bird-of-Paradise), sometimes called Azad'chēr (bird-of-Paradise).

Parzival of Wolfram (Eschenbach). An Arthurian romance of the twelfth century.

Pasha of Three Tails. There are three grades of pashas distinguished by the number of horse-tails on their standard. In war the horse-tail standard is carried before the pasha, and planted in front of his tent. The highest rank of pashas are those of three tails; the grand vizier is always ex officio such a pasha. Pashas of two tails are governors of provinces; it is one of these officers that we mean when we speak of a pasha in a general way. A pasha of one tail is a sanjak or lowest of provincial governors. (The word pasha is the Persian pa, support of Shah, the ruler.)

Pasque Eggs. (See EASTER EGGS.)

Pasquina'de (3 syl.). A lampoon or political squib, having ridicule for its object; so called from Pasqui'no, an Italian tailor of the 15th century, noted for his caustic wit. Some time after his death a mutilated statue was dug up, representing either Ajax supporting Menela'os, or Menela'os carrying the dead body of Patrocl'os, or else a gladiator, and was placed at the end of the Braschi Palace near the Piazza Navo'ni. As it was not clear what the statue represented, and as it stood opposite Pasquin's house, the Italians called it "Pasquin." The Romans made this torso the depository of their political, religious, and personal satires, which were therefore called Pasquin-songs or Pasquinades. In the Capitol is a rival statue called Marforio, to which are affixed replies to the Pasquinades.

Pass. A pass or A common pass. An ordinary degree, without honours. Where a person is allowed to pass up the senate-house to his degree without being "plucked." (See PLUCK.)

Well to pass. Well to do. Here "pass" is the synonym of fare, Saxon faran, to go or pass. Shakespeare has the expression "How goes it?"—i.e., How fares it, how passes it?

Passe-partout. A sort of picture-frame. The middle is cut out to the size of the picture, and the border or edge is embossed, so as to present a raised margin. The passe-partout and picture, being backed and faced with a glass, are held together by an edging of paper which shows on the glass face. The word means something to "pass over all."

A master-key is also called a pass-partout (a pass through all the rooms).

Passelourdin (3 syl.). A great rock near Poitiers, where there is a very narrow hole on the edge of a precipice, through which the university freshmen are made to pass, to "matriculate" them. The same is done at Mantua, where the freshmen are made to pass under the arch of St. Longinus. Passe-lourdan means "booby-pass."

Pass'elyon. A young foundling brought up by Morgane la Fée. He was detected in an intrigue with Morgane's daughter, and the adventures of this amorous youth are related in the romance called "Perceforest," vol. iii.

Passet'reul (3 syl.). Sir Tristram's horse. Sir Tristram was one of king Arthur's round-table knights.

Passing. (See BELL.)

Passing fair. Admirably fair. The Dutch passen, to admire.

A man he was to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year.
Goldsmith, "Deserted Village."

Passion Flower. So named from a fanciful resemblance in different parts of the flower to various articles connected with the "passion" or crucifixion of our Lord. The five anthers symbolise the five wounds; the three styles, the three nails; the column on which the ovary is elevated, the pillar of the cross; the fleshy threads within the flower, the crown of thorns; and the calyx, the nimbus.

Passionists. Certain priests of the Roman Catholic Church, who mutually agreed to preach "Jesus Christ, and him crucified." The founder of this "congregation" was Paul Francis, surnamed Paul of the Cross. (1694-1775.)

Pass'over. A Jewish festival to commemorate the deliverance of the Israelites, when the angel of death (that slew the first-born of the Egyptians) passed over their houses, and spared all who did as Moses commanded them.

Passy-measure or Passing-measure. A slow stately dance; a corruption of the Italian passamezzo (a middle pace or step). It is called a cinque-measure, because it consists of five measures—"two singles and a double forward, with two singles side."—Collier.

Passy-measure Pavin. A pavin is a stately dance (see PAVAN); a passy-measure pavin is a reeling dance or motion like that of a drunken man from side to side. Sir Toby Belch says of "Dick Surgeon"—

He's a rogue and a passy-measure pavin. I hate a drunken rogue.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," v. i.

Pasteboard. A visiting card; so called from the material of which it is made.

Paston Letters. The first two volumes appeared in 1787, entitled "Original Letters written during the reigns of Henry VI., Edward IV., and Richard III., by various persons of rank;" edited by Mr., afterwards Sir John Fenn. They are called Paston because chiefly written by or to members of the Paston family in Norfolk. They passed from the earl of Yarmouth to Peter le Neve, antiquary; then to Mr. Martin, of Palgrave, Suffolk; were then bought by Mr. Worth, of Diss; then passed to the editor. Charles Knight calls them "an invaluable record of the social customs of the fifteenth century" (the time of the War of the Roses), but of late some doubt has been raised respecting their authenticity. Three extra volumes were subsequently added.

Pastorale of Pope Gregory, by Alfred the Great.

Patavin'ity. A provincial idiom in speech or writing; so called from Patavium (Padua), the birth-place of Livy. (See PATOIS.)

Patch. A fool; so called from the motley or patched dress worn by licensed fools.

What a pied ninny's this! thou scurvy patch!
Shakespeare, "The Tempest," iii. 2.

Cross-patch. An ill-tempered person.
(See above.)

Patches. The Whig belles wore patches of court plaister on the right, and the Tories on the left side of their faces or foreheads. (See COURT PLAISTER.)

Pat'elin. The artful dodger. The French say Savoir son Patelin (to know how to bamboozle you). Patelin is the name of an artful cheat in a farce of the fifteenth century so called. On one occasion he wanted William Josseume to sell him cloth on credit, and artfully fell on praising the father of the merchant, winding up his laudation with this ne plus ultra: "He did sell on credit, or even lend to those who wished to borrow." This farce was reproduced in 1706 by Brueys, under the name of "L'Avocat Patelin."

Consider, sir, I pray you, how the noble Patelin, having a mind to extol to the third heaven the father of William Josseume, said no more than this: "And he did lend to those who were desirous to borrow of him."—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 4.

Patelinage. Foolery, buffoonery; acting like Patelin in the French farce.

I never in my life laughed so much as at the acting of that Patelinage.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 34.

Patent Rolls. Letters patent collected together on parchment rolls. Each roll is a year, though in some cases the roll is subdivided into two or more parts. Each sheet of parchment is numbered, and called a membrane: for example, the 8th or any other sheet, say of the 10th year of Henry III., is cited thus: "Pat. 10, Hen. III., m. 8. If the document is on the back of the roll it is called dorso, and "d" is added to the citation.

Pat'er Nos'ter. The Lord's Prayer; so called from the first two words in the Latin version. Every tenth bead of a rosary is so called, because at that bead the Lord's Prayer is repeated. Loosely, the rosary itself is so called.

Paternoster Row (London) was so named from the rosary or paternoster makers. We read of "one Robert Nikke, a paternoster maker and citizen, in the reign of Henry IV." Some say it was so called because funeral processions on their way to St. Paul's began their pater noster at the beginning of the Row, and went on repeating it till they reached the church-gate.

Pater Patrum. St. Gregory of Nyssa was so entitled by the Nicæan Council. (332-395.)

Pathfinder. Major-General John Charles Fremont, who conducted four expeditions across the Rocky Mountains. (Circa, 1815.)

Pathfinder, in Fenimore Cooper's five novels, is Natty Bumppo, called the Pathfinder, the Deer-slayer, the Hawk-eye, and the Trapper. (See NATTY BUMPPPO.)

Patient (The). Albert IV., duke of Austria. (1377-1404.) (See HELENA.)

Patient Gris'el, Grisildes, Grisild, Grisildë, or Grisildis, according to Chaucer, was the wife of Wantier, marquis of Salucès ("Clerkes Tale"). According to Boccaccio, Griselda, a poor country lass, became the wife of Gualtie're, marquis of Saluzzo ("Tenth Day," novel x.). She is put upon by her husband in the most wanton and gratuitous manner, but bears it all not only without a murmur, but even without loss of temper. She is the model of patience under injuries. The allegory means that God takes away our children and goods, afflicts us in sundry ways, and tries us "so as with fire;" but we should always say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Patin. Brother of the emperor of Rome, who fights with Am'adis of Gaul, and has his horse killed under him.

Patina. A beautiful surface deposit or fine rust with which, in time, buried coins and bronzes become covered. It is at once preservative and ornamental, and may be seen to advantage in the ancient bronzes of Pompeii. (Greek, patanê, a patin.)

Patois (2 syl.). Dialectic peculiarity, provincialism. Quintilian noticed something of the kind in Livy, which he called patavinitas, from Patavium, Livy's birth-town.

Patri-Passians. One of the most ancient sectaries of the Christian Church, who maintained the oneness of the God-head. The founder was Praxeas, of Phrygia, in the second century. The appellation was given to them by their opponents, who affirmed that according to their theory the Father must have suffered on the cross.

Patrician, properly speaking, is one of the patres or fathers of Rome. These patres were the senators, and their descendants were the patricians. As they held for many years all the honours of the state, the word came to signify the magnates or nobility of a nation.

N.B.—In Rome the patrician class was twice augmented: first by Tattius, after the Sabine war, who added a whole "century;" and again by Tarquinius Priscus, who added another. The Sabine century went by the name of patricians of the senior races (majo'rum gentium), and the Tarquinian patricians were termed of the junior creation (mino'rum gentium).

Pat'rick. Chambers says, "We can trace the footsteps of St. Patrick almost from his cradle to his grave, by the names of places called after him. Thus, assuming the Scottish origin, he was born at Kilpatrick (the cell of Patrick), in Dumbarshire; he resided for some time at Dalpatrick (the district of Patrick), in Lanarkshire; and visited Crag-phadrig (the rock of Patrick), near Inverness. He founded two churches, Kirkpatrick in Kirendbright, and Kirkpatrick in Dumfries; and ultimately sailed from Portpatrick, leaving behind him such an odour of sanctity, that among the most distinguished families of the Scottish aristocracy Patrick has been a favourite name down to the present day.

Arriving in England he preached at Patterdale (Patrick's valley), in Westmoreland; and founded the church of Kirkpatrick, in Durham. Visiting Wales he walked over Sarn-badrig (causeway of Patrick), which now forms a dangerous shoal in Carnarvon Bay; and departing for the Continent sailed from Llan-badrig (church of Patrick), in the isle of Anglesea. Undertaking his mission to convert the Irish, he first landed at Innispatrick (island of Patrick), and next at Holmpatrick, on the opposite shore of the mainland, in the county of Dublin. Sailing northwards he touched at the Isle of Man, called Innispatrick, where he founded another church of Kirkpatrick, near the town of Peel. Again landing on the coast of Ireland, in the county of Down, he converted and baptised the chieftain Dichu on his own threshing-floor, an event perpetuated in the word Saul—i.e., Sabhalpatrick (barn of Patrick). He then proceeded to Templepatrick, in Antrim; and from thence to a lofty mountain in Mayo, ever since called Croaghpatrick. In East Meath he founded the abbey of *Domnach-*Padraig (house of Patrick), and built a church in Dublin on the spot where St. Patrick's Cathedral now stands. In an island of Lough Derg, in Donegal, there is St. Patrick's Purgatory; in Leinster, St. Patrick's Wood; at Cashel, St. Patrick's Rock. There are scores of St. Patrick's Wells from which he drank; and he died at Saul, March 17th, 493. —"Book of Days."

St. Patrick's Cave, through which was a descent to purgatory, for the behoof of the living who wished to expiate their evil deeds before death.

St. Patrick's Cross. The same shape as St. Andrew's cross (X), only different in colour, viz., red on a white field. (See ANDREW.)

St. Patrick's Purgatory, Ireland, described in the Italian romance called "Guerino Meschino." Here gourmands are tantalised with delicious banquets which elude their grasp, and are at the same time troubled with colic.

St. Patrick and the Serpent. According to tradition, St. Patrick cleared Ireland of its vermin; one old serpent resisted, but St. Patrick overcame it by cunning. He made a box, and invited the serpent to enter it. The serpent objected, saying it was too small; but St. Patrick insisted it was quite large enough to be comfortable. After a long contention, the serpent got in to prove its case, when St. Patrick slammed down the lid, and threw the box into the sea. To complete this wonderful tale, the legend says the waves of the sea are made by the writhings of this serpent, and the noise of the sea is that of the serpent imploring the saint to release it.

Pat'rico. An Abram-man (q.v.).

Patroc'los. The gentle and amiable friend of Achilles in Homer's "Iliad." When Achilles refused to fight in order to annoy Agamemnon, he sent Patroclos to battle, and he was slain by Euphorbos.

Patten. Martha or Patty, says Gay, was the daughter of a Lincolnshire farmer, with whom the village blacksmith fell in love. To save her from wet feet when she went to milk the cows, the village Mulciber invented a clog, mounted on iron, which he called patty, after his mistress. This pretty fable is of no literary value, as the word is the French patin (a high-heeled shoe), from the Greek patin (to walk).

The pat-ten now supports each frugal dame,
Which from the blue-eyed Patty takes its name.
Gay, "Trivia," i.

Pattens-Money (Chapins de la Reina). A subsidy levied in Spain on all crown-tenants at the time of a royal marriage.

Pat-ter. To chatter, to clack. Dr. Pusey thinks it is derived from Pater-noster (the Lord's Prayer). The priest gabbled it in a low, mumbling voice till he came to the words, "and lead us not into temptation," which he spoke aloud, and the choir responded, "but deliver us from evil." In our reformed Prayer-Book, the priest is directed to say the whole prayer "with a loud voice." Probably the "pattering of rain"—i.e., the rain coming with its pat-pat, is after all the better derivation. (Welsh, fat, a blow.)

Pattern. A corruption of patron. As a patron is a guide, and ought to be an example, so the word has come to signify an artistic model.

Pattieson (Mr. Peter). Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in the Introductions of the "Heart of Midlothian" and "Bride of Lammermoor." He is represented as "assistant" at Gandercleugh, and author of the "Tales of My Landlord," published posthumously by Jedidiah Cleish-botham.

Paul (St.). Patron saint of preachers and tentmakers, being himself the most eloquent of the sacred penmen, and a maker of tents.

His symbols are a sword and open book, the former the instrument of his martyrdom, and the latter indicative of the new law propagated by him as the apostle of the Gentiles. He is represented of short stature, with bald head and grey, bushy beard.

St. Paul the Hermit is represented as an old man, clothed with palm-leaves, and seated under a palm-tree, near which are a fountain, river, and loaf of bread.

Paul of the Cross. Paul Francis, founder of the Passionists. (1694-1775.)

Paul and Virginia. A tale by Bernardin de St. Pierre. At one time this little romance was as popular as "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Paul Pry. An idle, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is always interfering with other folk's business.—John Poole, "Paul Pry" (a comedy).

Paulianists. A sect of heretics so called from Paulinus Samosatanus (Paul of Samosata), elected bishop of Antioch in 262. He may be considered the father of the Socinians.

Paulicians. A religious sect of the Eastern empire, an offshoot of the Manichæans. It originated in an Armenian named Paul, who lived under Justinian II. Neander says they were the followers of Constantine of Mananalis, and were called Paulicians because the apostle Paul was their guide. He says they rejected the worship of the Virgin and of saints, denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, and maintained the right of every one to read the Scriptures freely.

Paulina, wife of Antigonus, a Sicilian nobleman, takes charge of queen Hermione, when unjustly sent to prison by her jealous husband, and after a time presents her again to Leontes as a statue "by that rare Italian master, Julio Romano."—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale."

Paulo. The cardinal, brother of count Guido Franceschini, who advised his scape grace bankrupt brother to marry an heiress, in order to repair his fortune.—Robert Browning, "The Ring and the Book."

Paul's Walkers. Loungers who frequented the middle of St. Paul's, which was the Bond Street of London up to the time of the Commonwealth. (See Ben Jonson's "Every Man out of his Humour," where are a variety of scenes given in the interior of St. Paul's. Harrison Ainsworth describes these "walkers" in his novel entitled "Old Saint Paul's.")

The young gallants... used to meet at the central point, St. Paul's; and from this circumstance obtained the appellation of Paul's Walkers, as we now say Bond Street Loungers.—Moser, "European Magazine," July, 1807.

Pavan or Pavin. Every pavan has its galliard (Spanish). Every sage has his moments of folly. Every white must have its black, and every sweet its sour. The pavan was a stately Spanish dance, in which the ladies and gentlemen stalked like peacocks (Latin, pavo'nes), the gentlemen with their long robes of office, and the ladies with trains like peacocks' tails. The pavan, like the minuet, ended with a quick movement called the galliard, a sort of gavot'.

Pawnbroker. The three golden balls. The Lombards were the first money-lenders in England, and those who borrowed money of them deposited some security or pawn. The Medici family, whose arms were three gilded pills, in allusion to their profession of medicine, were the richest merchants of Florence, and greatest money-lenders. (See BALLS.)

Pawnee. Brandy pawnee. Brandy grog. (Hindu, pa'ni, water.)

Pax. The "Kiss of Peace." Also a sacred utensil used when mass is celebrated by a high dignitary. It is sometimes a crucifix, sometimes a tablet, and sometimes a reliquary. In the mass of Maundy Thursday the pax is omitted, to express horror at the treacherous kiss of Judas.

Pay. I'll pay him out. I'll be a match for him, I'll punish him. (French, peiner, peine, punishment; Latin, pœna.)

They with a foxe tale him soundly did paye.
"The King and Northerne Man" (1646).

Who's to pay the piper? Who is to stand Sam? who is to pay the score? The phrase comes from the tradition about the Pied Piper of Hamelin, who agreed to cure the town of rats and mice; when he had done so the people of Hammel refused to pay him, whereupon he piped again, gathered all the children together, and drowned them in the river.

Payn'ising. A process of preserving and hardening wood invented by Mr. Payne. (See KYANISE.)

Peace. The Perpetual Peace. The peace concluded January 24th, 1502, between England and Scotland. A few years after, the battle of Flodden Field was fought between the contracting parties.

Peace of Antal'cidas, between Artaxerxes and the states of Greece. It was brought about by Antal'cidas, the Spartan (B.C. 387).

Peace of God. In 1035 the clergy interfered to prevent the constant feuds between baron and baron; they commanded all men to lay down their arms on pain of excommunication. The command and malediction were read daily from the pulpits by the officiating priests after the proper gospel:—"May they who refuse to obey be accursed, and have their portion with Cain, the first murderer; with Judas, the arch traitor; and with Dathan and Abi'ram, who went down alive into the pit. May they be accursed in the life that now is; and in that which is to come may their light be put out as a candle." So saying, all the candles were instantly extinguished, and the congregation had to make its way out of church as it best could.

Peaceful (The). Kang-wâng, third of the Thow dynasty of China, in whose reign no one was either put to death or imprisoned. (1098-1152.)

Peach. Inform, "split;" a contraction of impeach.

Peach'um. A receiver of stolen goods, whose house is the resort of pick-pockets and thieves.—Gay, "Beggars' Opera."

Mrs. Peachum. His wife.

Peacock. Let him keep peacock to himself. Let him keep to himself his eccentricities. When George III. had partly recovered from one of his attacks, his ministers got him to read the King's Speech, but he ended every sentence with the word "peacock." The minister who drilled him said that peacock was an excellent word for ending a sentence, only kings should not let subjects hear it, but should whisper it softly. The result was a perfect success: the pause at the close of each sentence had an excellent effect.

By the Peacock! A common oath which at one time was thought sacred. The fabled incorruptibility of the peacock's flesh, caused the bird to be adopted as a type of the resurrection.

Peak (Derbyshire). "The Queen of Scots' Pillar" is a column in the cave of the peak as clear as alabaster, and so called because Mary Queen of Scots proceeded thus far, and then returned.

Peal. To ring a peal is to ring 5,040 changes; any number of changes less than that is technically called a touch or flourish. Bells are first raised, and then pealed—i.e., knocked with their hammers. (The Latin pello, to knock.)

This society run a true and complete peal of 5,040 grandsire triples in three hours and fourteen minutes.—Inscription in Windsor Curfew Tower.

Pearls. Dioscoridēs and Pliny mention the belief that pearls are formed by drops of rain falling into the oyster-shells while open, and the rain-drops thus received are hardened into pearls by some secretions of the animal.

According to Richardson, the Persians say when drops of spring-rain fall into the pearl-oyster they produce pearls.

Precious the tear as that rain from the sky
Which turns into pearls as it falls on the sea.
Thomas Moore.

N.B.—Dr. Darwin thinks that pearls are formed like those calcareous productions of crabs known by the name of crabs'-eyes, which are always near the stomach of the creature; and adds that in both cases the substance is probably a natural provision either for the reparation or enlargement of the shell.—“Economy of Vegetation,” i. 3.

Pearls. Cardan says that pearls are polished by being pecked and played with by doves.—“De Rerum Varietate,” vii. 34.

Peasant Bard. Robert Burns, the lyric poet of Scotland. (1759-1796.)

Peasant War, between 1500 and 1525. It was a frequent rising of the peasantry of Swabia, Franconia, Saxony, and other German states, in consequence of the tyranny and oppression of the nobles. In 1502 was the rebellion called the Laced Shoe, from its cognisance; in 1514, the League of Poor Conrad; in 1523, the Latin War. The insurgents were put down, and whereas they had been whipped before with scourges, they were now chastised with scorpions.

Peascod. Father of Peas-blossom, if Bottom's pedigree may be accepted.

I pray you commend me to Mistress Squash your mother, and to Master Pease d your father, good Master Peasblossom.—Shakespeare, “Midsummer Night's Dream,” iii. 1.

Winter for shoeing, peascod for wooing. The allusion in the latter clause is to the custom of placing a peascod with nine peas in it on the door-lintel, under the notion that the first man who entered through the door would be the husband of the person who did so. Another custom is alluded to by Browne—

The peascod greene oft with no little toyle
Ile'd seeke for in the fattest, fertil'st soile,
And rend it from the stalke to bring it to her,
And in her bosome for acceptance woo her.
“British Pastorale.”

Pec. Eton slang for money. A contraction of the Latin pecunia.

Pecca'vi. To cry pecca'vi. To acknowledge oneself in the wrong. It is said that Sir Charles Napier, after the battle of Haidarabad, in 1843, used this word as a pun upon his victory—“I have Sinde” (sinned). (Pecca'vi is the Latin for “I have done wrong.”)

Peckham. All holiday at Peckham—i.e., no appetite, not peckish; a pun on the word peck, as going to Bedfordshire is a pun on the word bed.

Going to Peckham. Going to dinner.

Peck'sniff. A canting hypocrite, who speaks homilies of morality, does the most heartless things “as a duty to society,” and forgives wrong-doing in nobody but himself.—Dickens, “Martin Chuzzlewit.”

Peculium. My own peculium. Private and individual property or possession. The Roman slaves were allowed to acquire property, over which their masters had no right or control; this was called their peculium.

Pecuniary. From pecus, cattle, especially sheep. Varo says that sheep were the ancient medium of barter and standard of value. Ancient coin was marked with the image of an ox or sheep. We have the Gold Sheep (mouton d'or) and Gold Lamb (agnel d'or) of ancient France, so called from the figure struck on them, and worth about a shilling.

Ped'agogue (3 syl.) means a boy-leader. It was a slave whose duty it was to attend the boy whenever he left home. As these slaves influenced the education of the child, the word came to be applied to schoolmasters. (Greek, pais agogo.)

Pedlar is not a tramp who goes on his feet, as if from the Latin pedes (feet), but a man who carries a ped, or hamper without a lid, in which are stored fish or other articles to hawk about the streets. In Norwich there is a place called the Ped-market, where women expose eggs, butter, cheese, &c., in open hampers.

Pedlars Acre (Lambeth). According to tradition a pedlar of this parish left a sum of money, on condition that his picture, with a dog, should be preserved for ever in glass in one of the church-windows. In the south window of the middle aisle, sure enough, such a picture exists; but probably it is a rebus on Chapman, the name of some benefactor. In Swaffham church there is a portrait of one John Chapman, a great benefactor, who is represented as a pedlar with his pack; and in that town a similar tradition exists.

Peebles. Poor Peter Peebles. The pauper litigant in "Redgauntlet," by Sir Walter Scott.

Peel. A Peel District. A clerical district (not a parish) devised by Sir Robert Peel.

Peeler (A). Slang for a policeman. So called from Sir Robert Peel, who established the Irish constabulary. Bobby being the nickname of Robert is applied to the same force. (See BOBBY.)

Peeler. It is an extraordinary circumstance that this word, now applied to a policeman or thief-catcher, was in the sixteenth century applied to robbers. Hollinshed, in his Scottish Chronicle (1570), refers to Patrick Dunbar, who "delivered the countrie of these peelers." Thomas Mortimer, in his "British Plutarch;" Milton, in his "Paradise Regained" (book iv.); and Dryden, all use the word "peeler" as a plunderer or robber. The old Border towers were called "peels."

Peep. As a specimen of the ingenuity of certain etymologists in tracing our language to Latin and Greek sources, may be mentioned Mr. Casaubon's derivation of peep from the Greek opipteuo (to stare at).

Playing peep-bo. Hiding or sculking from creditors; in allusion to the infant nursery game.

Peep-o'-Day Boys. The Irish insurgents of 1784; so called because they used to visit the houses of their opponents (called defenders) at peep of day, searching for arms or plunder.

Peeping Tom of Coventry. Leofric, earl of Mercia and lord of Coventry, imposed some very severe imposts on the people of Coventry, which his countess, Godi'va, tried to get mitigated. The earl, thinking to silence her importunity, said he would comply when she had ridden naked from one end of the town to the other. Godi'va took him at his word, actually rode through the town naked, and Leofric remitted the imposts. Before Godi'va started, all the inhabitants voluntarily confined themselves to their houses, and resolved that any one who stirred abroad should be put to death. A tailor thought to have a peep, but was rewarded by the loss of his eyes, and has ever since been called Peeping Tom of Coventry.

Peers of the Realm. The five orders of duke, marquis, earl, viscount, and baron. The word peer is the Latin parēs (equals), and in feudal times all great vassals were held equal in rank. At the accession of Hugues Capet there were six lay peers, and six ecclesiastical. Of the lay peers, three were dukes, and three counts; of the ecclesiastics, two were archbishops, and four bishops. In modern usage these noblemen are only equal in public actions, as in votes of parliament, and trial of peers.

Peg or Peggy, for Margaret, corrupted into Meg or Meggy. Thus, Pat or Patty for Martha; Pol or Polly, for Mary, corrupted into Mol or Molly; &c.

A peg too low. Low-spirited, moody. Our Saxon ancestors were accustomed to use peg-tankards, or tankards with a peg inserted at equal intervals, that when two or more drank from the same bowl no one might exceed his fair proportion. We are told that St. Dunstan introduced the fashion to prevent brawling. I am a peg too low means, I want another draught to cheer me up.

Come, old fellow, drink down to your peg!

But do not drink any further, I beg.

Longfellow, "Golden Legend," iv.

To take one down a peg. To take the conceit out of a braggart or pretentious person. The allusion here is not to peg-tankards, but to a ship's colours, which used to be raised and lowered by pegs; the higher the colours are raised the greater the honour, and to take them down a peg would be to award less honour.

Trepanned your party with intrigue,

And took your grantees down a peg.

Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 2.

There are always more round pegs than round holes. Always more candidates for office than places to dispose of. The allusion is to Military Tactics and other similar games.

Peg'asos (Greek; Pegasus, Latin). The inspiration of poetry, or, according to Boiardo ("Orlando Inamorato"), the horse of the Muses. A poet speaks of his Peg'asus, as "My Pegasus will not go this morning," meaning his brain will not work. "I am mounting Pegasus"—i.e., going to write poetry. "I am on my Pegasus," engaged in writing verses.

Peg'asus or Pegasos, according to classic mythology, was the winged horse on which Beller'ophon rode against the Chimæra. When the Muses contended with the daughters of Pi'eros, Hel'icon rose heavenward with delight; but Peg'asos gave it a kick, stopped its ascent, and brought out of the mountain the soul-inspiring waters of Hippocrene (Hip-po-crene).

Pegg (Katharine). One of the mistresses of Charles II., daughter of Thomas Pegg, of Yeldersey, in Derbyshire, Esquire.

Peine Forte et Dure. A species of torture applied to contumacious felons. In the reign of Henry the accused was pressed to death by weights; in later reigns the practice prevailed of tying the thumbs tightly together with whipcord, to induce the accused to plead. The following persons were pressed to death by weights: Juliana Quick, in 1442; Anthony Arrowsmith, in 1598; Walter Calverly, in 1605; Major Strangways, in 1657; and even in 1741 a person was pressed to death at the Cambridge assizes.

Pela'gianism. The system or doctrines taught by Pela'gius (q.v.). He denied what is termed birth-sin or the taint of Adam, and he maintained that we have power of ourselves to receive or reject the Gospel.

Pela'gius. A Latinised Greek form of the name Morgan—the Welsh mor, like the Greek pelagos, meaning the sea.

Pel'ago-saur (Greek, sea-lizard). An extinct saurian of the Upper Jurassic formation.

Pelf. Filthy pelf. Money. The word was anciently used for refuse or rubbish. "Who steals my purse steals trash." Filthy means ungodly; the Scripture expression is "unrighteous mammon."

(Latin pelvis, or Greek pellis, the basin used by priests for the intestines and refuse of animals sacrificed; our pail; peel, meaning refuse; and pel, refuse hair, as in pell-wool, &c.) It is certainly not connected with pilfer, as it is usually given.

Pel'ias. The huge spear of Achilles, which none but the hero could wield; so called because it was cut from an ash growing on mount Pel'ion, in Thessaly.

Pel'ican, in Christian art, is a symbol of charity. It is also an emblem of Jesus Christ, by "whose blood we are healed" (Eucherius and Jerome). (See below.)

Pelican. A mystic emblem of Christ, called by Dante nostro Pelicano. St. Hieronymus gives the story of the pelican restoring its young ones destroyed by serpents, and his salvation by the blood of Christ. The "Bestiary" says that Physiologus tells us that the pelican is very fond of its brood, but when the young ones begin to grow they rebel against the male bird and provoke his anger, so that he kills them; the mother returns to the nest in three days, sits on the dead birds, pours her blood over them, revives them, and they feed on the blood.—Bibl. Nat. Belg., No. 10,074.

Than said the Pellycane,
When my byrds he slayne
With my bloude I them reuyue [revive].
Scripture doth record,
The same dyd our Lord,
And rose from deth to lyue.

Skelton, "Armoury of Birds."

Pelicans. The notion that pelicans feed their young with their blood arose from the following habit:—They have a large bag attached to their under bill. When the parent bird is about to feed its brood, it macerates small fish in this bag or pouch, then pressing the bag against its breast, transfers the macerated food to the mouths of the young ones.

A pelican in her piety is the representation of a pelican feeding her young with her blood. The Romans called filial love piety, hence Virgil's hero is called pious Æne'as, because he rescued his father from the flames of Troy.

Peli'des. Son of Peleus—that is, Achilles, the hero of Homer's "Iliad," and chief of the Greek warriors that besieged Troy.

When, like Peli'des, bold beyond control,
Homer raised high to heaven the loud impetuous song.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

Pel'ion. Heaping Ossa upon Pelion. Adding difficulty to difficulty, embarrassment to embarrassment, &c. When the giants tried to scale heaven, they placed mount Ossa upon mount Pelion for a scaling ladder.

Pell-mell. Headlong; in reckless confusion. From the players of pall-mall, who rush heedlessly to strike the ball. The "pall" is the ball (Italian, palla), and the "mall" is the mallet or bat (Italian, maglia; French, mail). The bat is sometimes called the pall-mall; sometimes the game is so called, and sometimes the ground set apart for the game, as Pall-Mall, London.

Pelle'an Conqueror. Alexander the Great, born at Pella, in Macedo'nia.

Remember that Pellean conqueror.
Milton, "Paradise Regained," ii.

Pelléas (Sir). One of the knights of the Round Table. In the "Faery Queen," he goes after the "blatant beast," when it breaks the chain with which it had been bound by Sir Calidore.

Pel'lenore (King). A noted character in the "Morte d'Arthur."

Pells. Clerk of the Pells. An officer of the Exchequer, whose duty it was to make entries on the pells or parchment rolls. Abolished in 1834.

Pel'ops. Son of Tan'talos, cut to pieces and served as food to the gods. The More'a was called Peloponne'sos or the "island of Pelops," from this mythical king.

The ivory shoulder of the sons of Pelops. The distinguishing or distinctive mark of any one. The tale is that Deme'ter ate the shoulder of Pelops when it was served up by Tan'talos, and when the gods put the body back into the cauldron to restore it to life, he came forth lacking a shoulder. Demeter supplied an ivory shoulder, and all his descendants carried this mark in their bodies. (See PYTHAGORAS.)

Pelo'rus. Capo di Faro, a promontory of Sicily.—Virgil, "Æneid," iii. 6, 7.

As when the force
Of subterranean wind transports a hill
Torn from Pelorus.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Pelos (mythol). Father of Physigna'thos, king of the Frogs.—"Battle of the Frogs and Mice."

Pelt, in printing. Untanned sheepskins used for printing-balls. (French, pelle; Latin, pellis, a skin).

Pen and Feather are varieties of the same word, the root being the Sanskrit pat, to fly. (We have the Sanskrit pattra, a wing or instrument for flying; Latin, petra or penna, pen; Greek, peteron; Teutonic, phathra, whence our "feather.")

Penat'es. The household gods of the Romans. According to tradition, Dardan brought from Samothrace the penat'es which old Anch'ses carried off from Troy, and at the death of his father, Æne'as carried them to Italy.

Pencil of Rays. All the rays that issue from one point, or that can be focused at one point (French, penicillus, little tail, whence penicillum, a painter's brush made of the hair of a cow's tail); so called because they are like the hairs of a paint-brush, except at the point where they aggregate.

Pendennis (Arthur). The hero of Thackeray's novel, entitled "The History of Pendennis," &c.

Major Pendennis. A tuft-hunter, similar in character to Macklin's celebrated Sir Pertinax M'Sycophant.

Penden'të Li'të (Latin). Pending the suit; while the suit is going on.

Pendragon. A title conferred on several British chiefs in times of great danger, when they were invested with dictatorial power: thus Uter and Arthur were each appointed to the office to repel the Saxon invaders. Cassibelaun was pendragon when Julius Cæsar invaded the island; and so on. The word pen is British for head, and dragon for leader, ruler, or chief. The word therefore means summus rex (chief of the kings).

So much for fact, and now for the fable: Geoffrey of Monmouth says, when Aure'lius, the British king, was poisoned by Ambion, during the invasion of Pascentius, son of Vortigern, there "appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a globe of fire in form of a dragon, out of whose mouth issued forth two rays, one of which extended to Gaul and the other to Ireland." Uter ordered two golden dragons to be made, one of which he presented to Winchester, and the other he carried with him as his royal standard, whence he received the name of Uter Pendragon.—(Eks. viii., xiv., xvii.)

Penelope (4 syl.). The Web or Shroud of Penelope. A work "never ending, still beginning;" never done but ever in hand. Penelope, according to Homer, was pestered by suitors while her husband, Ulysses, was absent at the siege of Troy. To relieve herself of their importunities, she promised to make her choice of one as soon as she had finished weaving a shroud for her father-in-law. Every night she unravelled what she had done in the day, and so deferred making any choice till Ulysses returned, when the suitors were sent to the right-about without ceremony.

Penel'ophon. The beggar loved by king Cophetua (q. v.).

Penel'va. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance entitled "Amadis of Gaul." The first four books of the romance and the part above referred to were by Portuguese authors—the former by Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403, the latter by an unknown author.

Penetra'lia. The private rooms of a house; the secrets of a family. That part of a Roman temple into which the priest alone had access; here were the sacred images, here the responses of the oracles were made, and here the sacred mysteries were performed. The Jewish Holy of Holies was the penetralia of their Temple.

Penfeather (Lady Penelope). The lady patroness of the Spa.—Sir Walter Scott, "St. Roman's Well."

Peninsular War. The war carried on, under the duke of Wellington, against the French in Portugal and Spain, between 1808 and 1812.

Penitential Psalms are seven psalms expressive of contrition. They are—vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., cii., cxxx., cxliii., of the "Authorised Version," or vi., xxxi., xxxvii., l., ci., cxxix., cxlii. of the Vulgate.

Penmanship.

The "Good King René," titular king of Naples in the middle of the fifteenth century, was noted for his initial letters.

St. Thecla of Isauria wrote the entire Scriptures out without a blot or mistake.

St. Theodosius wrote the Gospels in letters of gold without a single mistake or blur. (See Longfellow's "Golden Legend," iv.)

Pennals (pen-cases). So the freshmen of the Protestant universities of Germany were called.

Pennalism. The same as "fagging." The pennals or freshmen of the Protestant universities were the fags of the elder students, called schorists. Abolished at the close of the seventeenth century. (See above.)

Pennant. The common legend is, that when Tromp, the Dutch admiral, appeared on our coast, he hoisted a broom on his ship, to signify his intention of sweeping the ships of England from the sea; and that the English admiral hoisted a horse-whip, to indicate his intention of drubbing the Dutch. According to this legend, the pennant symbolises a horsewhip, and it is not unfrequently called "The Whip."

Penniless (The). The Italians called Maximilian I. of Germany Pochi Danari. (1459-1519.)

Penny, in the sense of pound. Sixpenny, eightpenny, and tenpenny nails are nails of three sizes. A thousand of the first will weigh six pounds; of the second, eight pounds; of the third, ten pounds.

Penny sometimes expresses the duodecimal part, as tenpenny and elevenpenny silver—meaning silver 10-12ths and 11-12ths fine.

One was to be tenpenny, another eleven, another sterling silver.—Wendenfeld, "Secrets of the Adepts."

My penny of observation ("Love's Labour's Lost," iii. 1). My pennyworth of wit; my natural observation or mother-wit. Probably there is some pun or confusion between penetration and "penny of observation" or "penn'orth of wit;" similar blunders among the ill-educated are plentiful as blackberries. (See PENNY-WORTH.)

Penny-a-liner. A contributor to the local newspapers, but not on the staff. At one time these collectors of news used to be paid a penny a line, and it was to their interest to spin out their report as much as possible. The word remains, but is now a misnomer.

Penny-father. A miser, a penurious person, who "husbands" his pence.

Good old penny-father was glad of his liquor,
Pasquil, "Jests" (1629).

Penny Gaff. A theatre, the admission to which is one penny. Properly a gaff is a ring for cock-fighting, a sensational amusement which has been made to yield to the scarcely less sensational drama of the Richardson type. The gaff is the iron spur attached to fighting cocks. (Irish, gaf, a hook; Spanish and Portuguese, gafa.)

Penny Weddings. Wedding banquets in Scotland, to which a number of persons were invited, each of whom paid a small sum of money not exceeding a shilling. After defraying the expenses of the feast, the residue went to the newly married pair, to aid in furnishing their house. Abolished in 1645.

Vera true, vera true. We'll have a' to pay. . . . a sort of penny-wedding it will prove, where all men contribute to the young folk's maintenance.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel," ch. xxvii.

Penny-weight. So called from being the weight of a silver penny in the reign of Edward I.

Penny Wise. Unwise thrift. The whole proverb is penny wise and pound foolish, like the man who lost his horse from his penny wisdom in saving the expense of shoeing it afresh when one of its shoes was loose.

Pennyworth, or Pen'oth. A small quantity, as much as can be bought for a penny. Butler says, "This was the pen'oth of his thought" ("Hudibras," ii. 3), meaning that its scope or amount was extremely small. (See p. 670, col. 2).

He has got his pennyworth. He has got value for his money.

Pen'sion is something weighed out. Originally money was weighed, hence our pound. When the Gauls were bribed to leave Rome the ransom money was weighed in scales, and then Brennus threw his sword into the weight-pan. (Latin, pendo, to weigh money.)

Pen'sioners at the Universities and Inns of Court; so called from the French pension (board), pensionnaire (a boarder, one who pays a sum of money to dine and lodge with some one else).

Pentacle. A five-sided head-dress of fine linen, meant to represent the five senses, and worn as a defence against demons in the act of conjuration. It is also called Solomon's Seal (signum Salomonis). A pentacle consisting of three triangles was extended by the magician towards the spirits when they proved contumacious.

And on her head, lest spirits should invade,
A pentacle, for more assurance, laid
Rose, "Orlando Furioso," iii. 21.

Pentap'olin. An imaginary chieftain, but in reality the drover of a flock of sheep. Don Quixote conceived him to be the Christian king of the Garamantians, surnamed the Naked Arm, because he always entered the field with his right arm bare. The driver of a flock from the opposite direction was dubbed by the worthy Don the emperor Alifanfaron of the isle of Taproba'na, a pagan.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote."

Pentap'olis.

(1) The five cities of the plain: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zebo'im, and Zoah; four of which were consumed with fire, and their site covered with the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea.

(2) The five cities of Cyrena'ica, in Egypt: Berenice, Arsinoe, Ptolemais, Cyrene, and Apollonia.

(3) The five cities of the Philistines: Gaza, Gath, Ascalon, Azotus, and Ekron.

(4) The five cities of Italy in the exarchate of Ravenna: Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, and Ancona. These were given by Pepin to the pope.

(5) The Dorian pentapolis: Cnidus, Cos, Lindos, Ialysos, and Camiros.

Pentateuch. The first five books of the Old Testament, supposed to be written by Moses. (Greek, pentē, five; teuchos, a book.)

The Chinese Pentateuch. The five books of Confucius:—(1) The "Shoo-King," or Book of History; (2) The "Lee-King," or Book of Rites; (3) The Book of Odes, or Chinese Homer; (4) The "Yih-King," or Book of Changes; and (5) The "Chun-Ts'eu," or Spring and Autumn Annals.

Pen'tecost. (Greek, fiftieth.) The festival held by the Jews on the fiftieth day after the Passover; our Whitsunday.

Penthesilea. Queen of the Amazons, slain by Achilles. Sir Toby Belch says to Maria, in the service of Olivia—

Good night, Penthesilea [my fine woman].—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," II. 3.

Penthouse (2 syl.). A hat with a broad brim. The allusion is to the hood of a door, or coping of a roof. Pent is the past participle of pen, to shut in, to coop (Saxon, pinan).

Pentreath (Dolly). The last person who spoke Cornish. She was visited by Sir Joseph Banks.

Pe'olphan. The great hunter of the North.

People. The People's Friend. Dr. William Gordon, the philanthropist. (1801-1849.)

Pepe. Ali Pépé. Mine host of the Crocodile Inn. He was hanged for murder.—“Croquemitaine,” iii. 6.

Pepper Gate. When your daughter is stolen close Pepper Gate. Pepper Gate used to be on the east side of the city of Chester. It is said that the daughter of the mayor eloped, and the mayor ordered the gate to be closed up. A similar proverb is “To lock the stable-door when the steed is stolen.”

Peppy Bap. A large erratic boulder, east of Leith. Bap or Baphomet was an imaginary idol which the Templars were said to employ in their mysterious rites. Peppy is a contraction of Pépé-nuth, a Saxon idol.

Per Saltum. (Latin, by a leap.) A promotion or degree given without going over the ground usually prescribed. Thus, a clergyman on being made a bishop has the degree of D.D. given him per saltum—i.e., without taking the B.D. degree, and waiting the usual five years.

Perceforest (King). A prose romance, printed at Paris in 1528, and said to have been discovered in a cabinet hid in the massive wall of an ancient tower on the banks of the Humber, named Burtimer from a king of that name who built it. The MS. was said to be in Greek, and was translated through the Latin into French.

It is also used for Perceval, an Arthurian knight, in many of the ancient romances.

Perceval (Sir), of Wales. Knight of the Round Table, son of Sir Pellinore, and brother of Sir Lame'rock. He went in quest of the St. Graal (q.v.). Chrétien de Troyes wrote the “Roman de Perceval.” (1541-1566.)

Per'cinet. A fairy prince, who thwarts the malicious designs of Grognon, the cruel step-mother of Gracio'sa.—Fairy tales.

Percy (pierce-eye). When Malcolm III. of Scotland invaded England, and reduced the castle of Alnwick, Robert de Mowbray brought to him the keys of the castle suspended on his lance; and, handing them from the wall, thrust his lance into the king's eye; from which circumstance, the tradition says, he received the name of “Pierce-eye,” which has ever since been borne by the dukes of Northumberland.

This is all a fable. The Percies are descended from a great Norman baron, who came over with William, and who took his name from his castle and estate in Normandy.—Sir Walter Scott, “Tales of a Grandfather,” iv.

Per'dita. Daughter of Leontēs and Hermionē of Sicily. She was born when her mother was imprisoned by Leontes out of causeless jealousy. Paulina, a noble lady, hoping to soften the king's heart, took the infant and laid it at its father's feet; but Leontes ordered it to be put to sea, under the expectation that it would drift to some desert island. The vessel drifted to Bohemia, where the infant was discovered by a shepherd, who brought it up as his own daughter. In time Florizel, the son and heir of the Bohemian king Polixenēs, fell in love with the supposed shepherdess. The match was forbidden by Polixenes, and the young lovers fled, under the charge of Camillo, to Sicily. Here the story is cleared up, Polixenes and Leontes become reconciled, and the young lovers are married.—Shakespeare, “Winter's Tale.”

Pere Duchêne. Jacques René Hébert, one of the most profligate characters of the French Revolution. He was editor of a vile newspaper so called, containing the grossest insinuations against Marie Antoinette. (1755-1794.)

Peregrine (3 syl.) ran away from home and obtained a loan of £10 from Job Thornbury, with which he went abroad and traded; he returned a wealthy man, and arrived in London on the very day Job Thornbury was made a bankrupt. Having paid the creditors out of the proceeds made from the hardware-man's loan, he married his daughter.—George Colman the younger, “John Bull.”

Peregrine Falcon. The female is larger than the male. The female is the falcon of falconers, and the male the vercel. It is called peregrine from its wandering habits.

Peregrine Pickle. The hero of Smollett's novel so called. A savage, ungrateful spendthrift; fond of practical jokes to the annoyance of others, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought on him by his own wilfulness.

Perfectionists. A society founded by Father Noyes in Oneida Creek. They take St. Paul for their law-giver, but read his epistles in a new light. They reject all law, saying the guidance of the Spirit is superior to all human codes. If they would know how to act in matters affecting others, they consult "public opinion," expressed by a committee; and the "law of sympathy" so expressed is their law of action. In material prosperity this society is unmatched by all the societies of North America.—W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," vii. 20, 21.

Perfide Albion! (French). The words of Napoleon I.

Perfume (2 syl.) means simply "from smoke" (Latin, per fumum), the first perfumes having been obtained by the combustion of aromatic woods and gums. Their original use was in sacrifices, to counteract the offensive odours of the burning flesh.

Peri (pl. peris). Peris are delicate, gentle, fairy-like beings of Eastern mythology, begotten by fallen spirits. They direct with a wand the pure in mind the way to heaven. These lovely creatures, according to the Koran, are under the sovereignty of Eblis, and Mahomet was sent for their conversion, as well as for that of man.

Like peris' wands, when pointing out the road
For some pure spirit to the blest abode.

Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh," pt. i.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre (Shakespeare). The story is from the "Gesta Romano-rum," where Periclēs is called "Apollo-nius, king of Tyre." The story is also related by Gower in his "Confessio Amantis," bk. viii.

Perillo Swords. Perillo is a "little stone," a mark by which Julian del Key, a famous armourer of Toledo and Zaragoza, authenticated the swords of his manufacture. All perillo swords were made of the steel produced from the mines of Mondragon. The swords given by Catharine of Aragon to Henry VIII. on his wedding-day were all Perillo blades.

The most common inscription was, Draw me not without reason, sheathe me not without honour.

Perilous Castle. The castle of lord Douglas was so called in the reign of Edward I., because good lord Douglas destroyed several English garrisons stationed there, and vowed to be revenged of any one who should dare to take possession of it. Sir Walter Scott calls it "Castle Dangerous." (See Introduction of "Castle Dangerous.")

Perion. A fabulous king of Gaul, father of "Amadis of Gaul." His encounter with the lion is one of his best exploits. It is said that he was hunting, when his horse reared and snorted at seeing a lion in the path. Perion leaped to the ground and attacked the lion, but the lion overthrew him; whereupon the king drove his sword into the belly of the beast and killed him.—"Amadis de Gaul," ch. i.

Peripatetics. Founder of the Peripatetics.—Aristotle, who used to teach his disciples in the covered walk of the Lyceum. This colonnade was called the peripatos, because it went all round the place (peri pateo).

Peris. Persia. (See PERI.)

Peris'sa (excess or prodigality; Greek, Perissos). Step-sister of Elissa and Medina. These ladies could never agree upon any subject.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Periwig. (See PERUKE.)

Periwink'le. The bind-around plant. (Saxon, perwince; French, pervenche; connected with vincio, the Latin verb "to bind.") In Italy it used to be wreathed round dead infants, and hence its Italian name fior di morto.

Perk. To perk oneself. To plume oneself on anything. (Welsh, percu, to smarten or plume feathers.)

You begin to perk up a bit—i.e., to get a little fatter and more plump after an illness. (See above.)

Perku'nos. God of the elements. The Slavonic Trinity was Perku'nos, Rikollos, and Potrimpos. — Grimm, "Deutsche Mythologie."

Pern'ian Strata. So called from Perm, in Russia, where they are most distinctly developed.

Pernelle (Mulame). A scolding old woman in Molière's "Tartuffe."

Perpet'ual Motion. Restlessness; fidgetty or nervous disquiet; also a chimerical scheme wholly impracticable. Many have tried to invent a machine that shall move of itself, and never stop; but as all materials must suffer from wear and tear, it is evident that such an invention is practically impossible.

It were better to be eaten to death with rust, than to be secured to nothing with perpetual motion — Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," act i. 2.

Perruke or Peruwig. Menage ingeniously derives these words from the Latin pilus, "hair." Thus, pilus, pelus, pelutis, peluticus, pelutica, per'ua, perruque.

Pers. Persia; called Fars. (French, Perse.)

Person. (Latin, persona, a mask; personatus, one who wears a mask, an actor.) A "person" is one who impersonates a character. Shakespeare says, "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players" or persons. When we speak of the "person of the Deity" we mean the same thing, the character represented, as that of the Father, or that of the Son, or that of the Holy Ghost. There is no more notion of corporeality connected with the word, than there is any assumption of the body of Hamlet when an actor impersonates that character.

Persecutions (The Ten Great). (1) Under Nero, A.D. 64; (2) Domitian, 95; (3) Trajan, 98; (4) Hadrian, 118; (5) Pertinax, 202, chiefly in Egypt; (6) Maximin, 235; (7) Decius, 249; (8) Valerian, 257; (9) Aurelian, 272; (10) Diocletian, 302.

Persep'olis, called by the Persians "The Throne of Jam-sheid," by whom it was founded. Jam-sheid removed the seat of government from Balk to Istakhar.

Perseus (2 syl.). A bronze statue in the Loggia dei Lanzi, at Florence.

The best work of Benvenuto Cellini. (1500-1562.)

Perseus' flying horse. A ship. "Perseus conquered the head of Medusa, and did make Peg'asë, the most swift ship, which he always calls Perseus' flying horse." — "Destruction of Troy."

The strong-ribbed bark through liquid mountains cut....

Like Perseus' horse. Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," i. 3.

Persevere (3 syl.). This word comes from an obsolete Latin verb, severo, to stick rigidly; hence severus, severe or rigid. Assoverate is to stick rigidly to what you say; persevere is to stick rigidly to what you undertake till you have accomplished it.

Persian Alexander. Sandjar. (1117-1158.) (See ALEXANDER.)

Persian Buceph'alos. Shebdiz, the charger of Chosroes Parviz. (See BUCEPHALOS.)

Perth is Celtic for a bush. The county of Perth is the county of bushes.

Fair Maid of Perth. Catharine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, glover, of Perth. Her lover is Henry Gow, alias Henry Smith, alias Gow Chrom, alias Hal of the Wynd the armourer, foster-son of Dame Shoolbred. — Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth."

The Five Articles of Perth were those passed in 1618 by order of James VI., enjoining the attitude of kneeling to receive the elements; the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost; the rite of confirmation, &c. They were ratified August 4, 1621, called Black Saturday, and condemned in the General Assembly of Glasgow in 1638.

Peru. That's not Peru. Said of something utterly worthless. A French expression, founded on the notion that Peru is the El Dorado of the world.

Peru'vian. A native of Peru, pertaining to Peru, &c.

Peru'vian Bark, called also Jesuit's Bark, because it was introduced into Spain by the Jesuits, who had it sent to them by their brethren in Peru. (See CINCHONA.)

Per'use (2 syl.). A contraction of the Greek peri ruo, ruo being a dialectic form of reo, a verb allied to our read; pe'-ruse is to read through.

Pescec'ola. The famous swimmer drowned in the pool of Charibdis. The tale says he dived once into the pool, and was quite satisfied with its horrors and wonders; but the king Frederick then tossed in a golden cup, which Pescec'ola dived for, and was never seen again. (See Sheller's "Diver.")

Pessimist. One who fancies every thing is as bad as possible. (Latin, pess'imus, the worst.)

Petard'. Hoist on his own petard. Caught in his own trap, involved in the danger he meant for others. The petard was an instrument of war in the form of a high-crowned hat, chiefly employed for blowing open gates with gunpowder. The engineers used to carry the petard to the place they intended to blow up, and having nicely adjusted the plank of the petard to the gate, fire it by a fusée. Shakespeare spells the word petar: "'Tis the sport to have the engineer hoist with his own petar."—"Hamlet," iii. 4.

Turning the muzzles of the guns Magdala-wards, and getting a piece of lighted rope, [the party] blazed away as furiously as possible, and tried to hoist Theodore on his own petard.—Daily paper.

Petaud. 'Tis the court of king Petaud, where every one is master. There is no order or discipline at all. This is a French proverb. Petaud is a corruption of peto (I beg), and king Petaud means king of the beggars, in whose court all are masters, for no one acknowledges his authority or fears his laws. (See AL-SATIA.)

Peter. (See BLUE PETER.)

Great Peter. A bell in York Minster, weighing $10\frac{3}{4}$ tons, and hung in 1845.

Lord Peter. The pope in Swift's "Tale of a Tub."

Rob Peter to pay Paul. (See ROBBING.)

St. Peter. Patron saint of fishers and fishmongers, being himself a fisherman.

St. Peter, in Christian art, is represented as an old man, bald, but with a flowing beard; he is usually dressed in a white mantle and blue tunic, and holds in his hand a book or scroll. His peculiar symbols are the keys, and a sword the instrument of his martyrdom.

He has got St. Peter's fingers—i.e., the fingers of a thief. The allusion is to the fish caught by St. Peter with a piece of money in its mouth. They say that a thief has a fish-hook on every finger.

Peter the Great of Russia built St. Petersburg, and gave Russia a place among the nations of Europe. He laid aside his crown and sceptre, came to England, and worked as a common labourer in our dockyards, that he might teach his subjects how to build ships.

Peter the Hermit (in Tasso), "the holy author of the crusade" (bk. i.). It is said that six millions of persons assumed the cross at his preaching.

Peter the Wild Boy, found 1725 in a wood near Hameln, in Hanover, at the supposed age of 13. (Died 1785.)

Peter-boat. A boat made to go either way, the stem and stern being both alike. A corruption of petitur, to run, to hurry. (Latin, peto, to go straight to a place, as Cyzicum petebamus—Cicero.)

Peter Botte Mountain, in the island of Mauritius; so called from a Dutchman who scaled its summit, but lost his life in coming down. It is a rugged cone, more than 2,800 feet in height.

Peter Parley. The nom de plume of Samuel G. Goodrich, an American. (1793-1860.)

Peter Peebles. Peter Peebles' Law-suit. In Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Redgauntlet." Peter is a litigious hard-hearted drunkard, poor as a church-mouse, and a liar to the backbone. His "ganging plea" is Hogarthian comic, as Carlyle says.

Peter-pence. An annual tribute of one penny paid at the feast of St. Peter to the see of Rome. At one time it was collected from every family, but afterwards it was restricted to those "who had the value of thirty pence in quick or live stock." This tax was collected in England from 740 till it was abolished by Henry VIII.

Peter Pindar. The nom de plume of Dr. John Welcot (Wool-cut), of Dodbroke, Devonshire. (1738-1819.)

Peter Porcupine. William Cobbett, when he was a Tory. We have "Peter Porcupine's Gazette," and the "Porcupine Papers," in twelve volumes (1762-1835.)

Peter Wilkins was written by Robert Pullock, of Clifford's Inn, and sold to Dodsley the publisher for £12.

Peter of Provence came into possession of Merlin's wooden horse. There is a French romance called "Peter of Provence and the Fair Magalo'na," the chief incidents of which are connected with this flying charger.

Peterborough (Northamptonshire). So called from the monastery of St. Peter, founded in 655. Tracts relating to this monastery are published in Sparke's collection.

Peterloo. The dispersal of a large meeting in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, by an armed force, July 16th, 1819. The assemblage consisted of operatives, and the question was parliamentary reform. The word is a parody upon Waterloo.

Petit-Maitre. A fop; a lad who assumes the manners, dress, and affectations of a man. The term arose before the Revolution, when a great dignitary was styled a grand-maitre, and a pretentious one a petit-maitre.

Petitio Princip'ii. A begging of the question, or assuming in the premises the question you undertake to prove. Thus, if a person undertook to prove the infallibility of the pope, and were to take for his premises—(1) Jesus Christ promised to keep the apostles and their successors in all the truth; (2) the popes are the regular successors of the apostles, and therefore the popes are infallible—it would be a vicious syllogism from a petitio principii.

Petitioners and Abhorrrers. Two political parties in the reign of Charles II. When that monarch was first restored he used to grant everything he was asked for; but after a time this became a great evil, and Charles enjoined his loving subjects to discontinue their practice of "petitioning." Those who agreed with the king, and disapproved of petitioning, were called Abhorrrers: those who were favourable to the objectionable practice were nicknamed Petitioners.

Petrarch. The English Petrarch. Sir Philip Sidney; so called by Sir Walter Raleigh. Cowper styles him "the warbler of poetic prose." (1554-1586.)

Petrel. The Stormy Petrel. So named, according to tradition, from the Italian Petrello (little Peter), in allusion to St. Peter, who walked on the sea. Our sailors call them "Mother Carey's Chickens." They are called stormy because in a gale they surround a ship to catch small animals which rise to the surface of the rough sea; when the gale ceases they are no longer seen. Thomson thinks the bird is called "Pewetrel from its cry."

Petrified (3 syl.). The Petrified City. Ishmooie, in Upper Egypt, is so called from the number of petrified bodies of men, women, and children to be seen there.

Petrobrusians or Petrobrustians. A religious sect, founded in 1110, and so called from Peter Bruys, a Provençal. He declaimed against churches, asserting that a stable was as good as a cathedral for worship, and a manger equal to an altar. He also declaimed against the use of crucifixes.

Petronel. Sir Petronel Flash. A braggadocio, a tongue-doughty warrior.

Give your schollar degrees, and your lawyer his fees,
And some dice for Sir Petronell Flash.
Brit. Bibl.

Petru'chio. A gentleman of Verona who undertakes to tame the haughty Katharine, called the Shrew. He marries her, and without the least personal chastisement brings her to lamb-like submission.—Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew."

Petticoat and Gown. The dress. When the gown was looped up, the petticoat formed an important item in dress.

The poppy is said to have a red petticoat and a green gown; the daffodil, a yellow petticoat and green gown; a candle, a white petticoat; and so on in our common nursery rhymes—

- 1 The king's daughter is coming to town,
With a red petticoat and a green gown.
- 2 Daffadown-dilly is now come to town.
In a yellow petticoat and a green gown.

Pettifogger. A pettifogging lawyer is not one who mystifies his client, or keeps him always in a little fog, but a corruption of the French petit voguer, "voguer" being the Norman-French for an advocate (Latin, voco); so that petit voguer is an inferior advocate.

Petto. In petto. In secrecy, in reserve (Italian, in the breast). The pope creates cardinals in petto—i.e., in his own mind—and keeps the appointment to himself till he thinks proper to announce it.

Belgium, a department of France in petto—i.e., in the intention of the people.—The Herald, 1837.

Petty Cu'ry (Cambridge) means "The Street of Cooks." It is called Parva Cokeria in a deed dated 13 Edward III. Probably at one time it was part of the Market Hall. It is a mistake to derive Curry from Ecurie. Dr. Pegge derives it from the verb cura'rë, to cure or dress food.

Peutinge'rian Map. A map of the roads of the ancient Roman world, constructed in the time of Alexander Seve'rus (A.D. 226), and made known to moderns by Conrad Peutinger of Augsburg.

Pev'eril of the Peak. Sir Geoffrey the Cavalier, and lady Margaret his wife; Julian Peveril, their son, in love with Alice Bridgenorth, daughter of Major Bridgenorth, a Roundhead; and William Peveril, natural son of William the Conqueror, ancestor of Sir Geoffrey.—Sir Walter Scott, "Peveril of the Peak."

Pewter. To scour the pewter. To do one's work, the allusion being to the slave whose office it is in beer-houses to keep the pots clean.

But if she neatly scour her pewter,
Give her the money that is due t' her.
King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Pexë Nicholas. A corruption of Pescicola (q.v.).

Phædria (wantonness). Handmaid of Acrasia the enchantress. She sails about Idle Lake in a gondola. Seeing Sir Guyon she ferries across the lake to the floating island, where Cymochles attacks him. Phædria interposes, the combatants desist, and the little wanton ferries the knight Temperance over the lake again.—Spenser, "Fæ'ry Queen," ii.

Pha'ëton. The son of Phæbus, who undertook to drive the chariot of the sun, was upset, and caused great mischief: Libya was parched into barren sands, and all Africa was more or less injured, the inhabitants blackened, and vegetation nearly destroyed.

Gallop apace, you fiery-footed steeds,
Towards Phœbus' mansion; such a waggoner
As Phaëton would whip you to the west,
And bring in cloudy night immediately.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," iii. 2.

Pha'ëton. A sort of carriage; so called from the sun-car driven by Phaëton. (See above.)

Phal'aris. The brazen bull of Phal'aris. Perillos, a brass-founder of Athens, proposed to Phal'aris, tyrant of Agri-gentum, to invent for him a new species of punishment; accordingly, he cast a brazen bull, with a door in the side. The victim was shut up in the bull and roasted to death, but the throat of the engine was so contrived that the groans of the sufferer resembled the bellowings of a mad bull. Phal'aris commended the invention, and ordered its merits to be tested by Perillos himself.

The epistles of Phal'aris. Certain letters said to have been written by Phal'aris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily. Boyle maintained them to be genuine, and Bentley affirmed that they were forgeries. No doubt Bentley is right.

Phaleg, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is Mr. Forbes, a Scotchman.

Phallas. The horse of Heraclius. (Greek, phal'ios, a grey horse.)

On the memorable day which decided the fate of Persia, Heraclius, on his horse Phallas, surpassed the bravest of his warriors. His lip was pierced with a spear, the steed was wounded in the thigh, but he carried his master safe and victorious through the triple phalanx of the barbarians.—Gibbon.

Phallos. Emblem of the generative principle in Grecian mythology. (See GROVE.)

Phantom Ship. (See CARMILHAN.)

Or of that phantom ship, whose form
Fleets like a meteor through the storm;
When the dark scud comes driving hard,
And lowered is every topsail yard....
And well the doom'd spectators know
'Tis harbinger of woe.

Sir Walter Scott, "Rokeby," ii. 11.

Pha'on. A young man greatly ill-treated by Furor, and rescued by Sir Guyon. He loved Claribel, but Phil'emmon, his friend, persuaded him that Claribel was unfaithful, and to prove his words, told him to watch in a given place. He saw what he thought was Claribel holding an assignation with what seemed to be a groom, and rushing forth, met the true Claribel, whom he slew on the spot. Being tried for the murder, it came out that the groom was Phil'emmon, and the supposed Claribel only her lady's maid. He poisoned Phil'emmon, and would have murdered the handmaid, but she escaped, and while he pursued her he was attacked by Furor. This tale is to expose the intemperance of revenge.—Spenser, "Fæ'ry Queen," ii. 4.

Phar'amond. King of the Franks and a knight of the Round Table. He is said to have been the first king of France. This reputed son of Marcômîr and father of Clô'dion, is the hero of one of Calprenède's novels.

Pharaoh (2 syl.). The-king. It is the Coptic article P and the word ouro (king). There are ten of this title mentioned in Holy Scripture:—

(1) The Pharaoh contemporary with Abraham (Gen. xii. 25).

(2) The good Pharaoh who advanced Joseph (Gen. xli.).

(3) The Pharaoh who "knew not Joseph" (Exod. i. 8).

(4) The Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 28); said to be Menephtes, son of Ram'ses II.

(5) The Pharaoh that protected Hadad (1 Kings xi. 19).

(6) The Pharaoh whose daughter Solomon married (1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 16).

(7) Pharaoh Shishak, who warred against Rehobo'am (1 Kings xiv. 25).

(8) The Pharaoh that made a league with Hezeki'ah against Sennacherib.

(9) Pharaoh Necho, who warred against Josi'ah (2 Kings xxiii. 29, &c.).

(10) Pharaoh Hophra, the ally of Zede-ki'ah (Jer. xlv. 30); said to be Apries, who was strangled B.C. 570. (See KING.)

The Arabs say that the title was first assumed by the kings of the eighteenth dynasty.

Pharaoh, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means Louis XIV. of France.

If Pharaoh's doubtful succour he [Charles II.] should use,
A foreign aid would more incense the Jews [English nation].

Pharisees means "separatists" (Heb. pharish, to separate), men who looked upon themselves as holier than other men, and therefore refused to hold social intercourse with them. The Talmud mentions the following classes:—

(1) The "Dashers," or "Bandy-legged" (Nikfi), who scarcely lifted their feet from the ground in walking, but "dashed them against the stones," that people might think them absorbed in holy thought (Matt. xxi. 44).

(2) The "Mortars," who wore a "mortier" or cap which would not allow them to see the passers-by, that their meditations might not be disturbed. "Having eyes they saw not" (Mark viii. 18).

(3) The "Bleeders," who inserted thorns in the borders of their gaberdines to prick their legs in walking. To this

St. Paul alludes when he says, "A thorn was given him in the flesh to buffet him withal" (2 Cor. xii. 7).

(4) The "Cryers" or "Inquirers," who went about crying out, "Let me know my duty, and I will do it" (Matt. xix. 16-22).

(5) The "Almsgivers," who had a trumpet sounded before them to summon the poor together (Matt. vi. 2).

(6) The "Stumblers" or "Bloody-browed" (Kizai), who shut their eyes when they went abroad that they might see no women, being "blind leaders of the blind" (Matt. xv. 14). Our Lord calls them "blind Pharisees," "Fools and blind."

(7) The "Immovables," who stood like statues for hours together, "praying in the market places" (Matt. vi. 5).

(8) The "Pestle Pharisees" (Medinkia), who kept themselves bent double like the handle of a pestle.

(9) The "Strong-shouldered" (Shikmi), who walked with their back bent as if carrying on their shoulders the whole burden of the law.

(10) The "Dyed Pharisees," called by our Lord "Whited Sepulchres," whose externals of devotion cloaked hypocrisy and moral uncleanness.—Talmud of Jerusalem, "Berakoth," ix.; "Sota," v. 7. Talmud of Babylon, "Sota," 22 b.

Pharos. A lighthouse; so called from the lighthouse built by Sostratus Cnidius in the island of Pharos, near the port of Alexandria, in Egypt. It was 450 feet high, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles. Part was blown down in 793. This Pharos was one of the Seven Wonders of the World.

Pharsalia. An epic in Latin hexameters by Lucan. The battle of Pharsalia was between Pompey and Cæsar. Pompey had 45,000 legionaries, 7,000 cavalry, and a large number of auxiliaries; Cæsar had 22,000 legionaries and 1,000 cavalry. Pompey's battle-cry was Heracles invictus; that of Cæsar was Venus victrix. Cæsar won the battle.

Phe'be (2 syl.). A shepherdess.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Phelis, called the Fair. The wife of Sir Guy, earl of Warwick. (See GUY.)

Phenom'enon (plural, phenom'ena) means simply what has appeared (Greek. phanomai, to appear). It is used in science to express the visible result of an experiment, the manifestations of nature, &c. In popular language it means a sight or prodigy.

Phid'ias. The French Phidias. Jean Goujon (1510-1572); also called the Correggio of Sculptors. He was slain in the slaughter of St. Bartholomew.

Phiga'lian Marbles. A series of twenty-three sculptures in alto-relievo, discovered in 1812 at Phiga'lia, in Arca'dia, and in 1814 purchased for the British Museum. They represent the combat of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, and that of the Greeks and Am'azons. They are part of the "Elgin Marbles" (q.v.).

Philadelph'ia Stones called Christian Bones. It is said that the walls of Philadelphia, in Turkey, were built of the bones of Christians killed in the Holy Wars. This idle tale has gained credit from the nature of the stones, full of pores and very light, not unlike petrified bones. Similar incrustations are found at Knaresborough and elsewhere.

Philan'der (in "Orlando Furioso"). A sort of Joseph; the brother of Hermon'idës, and a native of Holland. He was entertained at the house of Arge'o, a baron of Servia, when Arge'o's wife Gabri'na tempted his virtue. He fled the house, but Gabrina accused him to her husband of adultery, and he was overtaken by Arge'o and cast into a dungeon. One day Gabrina went and implored him to defend her virtue against a wicked knight. He undertook to do so, but the "wicked knight" was Arge'o, whom Philander in his ignorance slew. Gabrina now threatened to give him to the hands of justice unless he married her; and the youth, to save his life, complied. In a short time Gabrina tired of him, and murdered him by poison.

Philan'dering. Coquetting with a woman; paying court, and leading her to think you love her, but never declaring your preference. The word is coined from Philander, the Dutch knight who coquetted with Gabri'na (q.v.).

Philanthropist (The). John Howard, who spent much of his life in visiting the prisons and hospitals of Europe. (1726-1790.)

Phile'mon and Baucis entertained Jupiter and Mercury when every one else refused them hospitality. Being asked to make a request, they begged that they might both die at the same time. When they were very old, Philemon was changed into an oak, and Baucis into a linden tree.—Ovid, "Metamorphoses," iii. 631, &c.

Philip. Philip, remember thou art mortal. A sentence repeated to the Macedonian king every time he gave an audience.

Philip Sober. When a woman who asked Philip of Macedon to do her justice was snubbed by the petulant monarch, she exclaimed, "Philip, I shall appeal against this judgment." "Appeal!" thundered the enraged king, "and to whom will you appeal?" "To Philip sober," was her reply.

St. Philip is usually represented bearing a large cross, or a basket containing loaves, in allusion to St. John vi. 5-7.

Philip Nye (in "Hudibras"). One of the assembly of dissenting ministers, noted for his ugly beard.

Philip Quarl, by Defoe. A castaway sailor, solaced on a desert island by a monkey.

Philippe Egalité. Louis Philippe Joseph duc d'Orléans. (1747-1793.)

Phil'pic. A severe scolding; an invective. So called from the orations of Demos'thenës against Philip of Macedon, to rouse the Athenians to resist his encroachments. The orations of Cicero against Anthony are called "Philippics."

Philip'pins. A Russian sect; so called from the founder Philip Pustowskiat. They are called Old Faith Men, because they cling with tenacity to the old service books, old version of the Bible, old hymn-book, old prayer-book, and all customs previous to the reforms of Nekon, in the seventeenth century.

Philips (John), author of "The Spended Shilling," wrote a georgic on "Cider," in blank verse—a serious poem modelled upon Milton's epics.

Philips, Pomona's bard, the second thou
Who nobly durst, in rhyme-unfettered verse,
With British freedom sing the British song.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Philis'tines (3 syl.). Ear-wigs and other insect tormentors are so called in Norfolk. Bailiffs, constables, &c. "The Philistines are upon thee, Samson" (Judges xvi.).

Philistines. A term applied by Matthew Arnold to the middle-class of England, which he says is ignorant, narrow-minded, and deficient in great ideas, inasmuch that England has become contemptible in the eyes of foreigners.—Cornhill Magazine.

Philistinism. A cynical indifference and supercilious sneering at religion. The allusion is to the Philistines of Palestine.

Phillis. A play written in Spanish by Lupercio Leonardo of Argensola. (See "Don Quixote," vol. iii., p. 70.)

Philoclea, in Sidney's "Arcadia," is lady Penelopë Devereux, with whom he was in love; but the lady married another, and Sir Philip transferred his affections to Frances, eldest daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham.

Philoctetës, treacherously deserted by the Greeks on the island of Lemnos, because he had been bitten by serpents, was afterwards entreated in humble suit to pardon this baseness and come to their aid; for an oracle had said that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Herculës, and Hercules had given these to his Argonautic friend.

Philomel or Philomela. The story says that Pandion, king of Attica, had two daughters, Philomel and Procnë, both of whom fell in love with Tereus, king of Phocis. Tereus married the latter, but in a few weeks concealed her, and told Philomel that she was dead, whereupon Philomel became his bride. When she ascertained the truth she told her sister, and Tereus resolved to slay both. He chased them with an axe and overtook them, but at that moment Philomel was changed into a nightingale, and Procnë to a swallow.

By this, lamenting Philomel had ended
The well-tuned warble of her nightly sorrow.
Shakespeare, "Rape of Lucrece."

Philomelus. The Druid bard that accompanied Sir Industry to the Castle of Indolence.—Thomson (canto ii. 34).

Philopœmen, general of the Achaean league, made Epaminondas his model. He slew Mechanidas, tyrant of Sparta, and was himself killed by poison.

Philosopher. The sages of Greece used to be called sophs (wise men), but Pythagoras thought the word too arrogant, and adopted the compound philosophia (I love wisdom), whence "philosopher," one who courts or loves wisdom.

Philosopher. "There was never yet philosopher who could endure the toothache patiently, however they have writ the style of gods, and made a push at chance and sufferance."—Shakespeare, "Much Ado About Nothing," v. 1.

The Philosopher. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus is so called by Justin Martyr. (121, 161-180.)

Leo VI., emperor of the East (866, 886-911.)

Porphyry, the Antichristian. (233-305.)

The Philosopher of China. Confucius. His mother called him Little Hillock, from a knob on the top of his head. (B.C. 551-479.)

The Philosopher of Ferney. Voltaire; so called from his chateau of Ferney, near Geneva. (1694-1778.)

The Philosopher of Malmesbury. Thomas Hobbes, author of "Leviathan." (1588-1679.)

The Philosopher of Persia. Abon Ebn Sina, of Shiraz. (Died 1037.)

The Philosopher of Sans-Souci. Frederick the Great. (1712, 1740-1786.)

The Philosopher of Wimbledon. John Horne Took, author of "Diversions of Purley." (1736-1812.)

The Seven Sages or Wise Men of Greece. Thalès, Solon, Chilon, Pittacos, Bias, Cleobulus, Periander; to which add Sosiadës, Anacharsis the Scythian, Myson the Spartan, Epemenidës the Cretan, and Pherecydës of Scyros.

Philosophers of the Academic sect. Plato, Speusippus, Xenocratës, Polemon, Cratës, Crantor, Arcesilaos, Carneades, Clitomachos, Philo, and Antiochos.

Philosophers of the Cynic sect. Antisthenës, Diogenës of Sinopë, Menimos, Onesicritos, Cratës, Metroclës, Hipparchia, Menippos, and Menedemos of Lampsacos.

Philosophers of the Cyrenaic sect. Aristippos, Hegesias, Anniceris, Theodoros, and Bion.

Philosophers of the Eleac or Eretriac sect. Phædo, Plisthenës, and Menodemos of Eretria.

Philosophers of the Eleatic sect. Xenophanës, Parmenidës, Melissos, Zeno of Tarsos, Leucippus, Democritos, Protagoras, and Anaxarchos.

Philosophers of the Epicurean sect.

Epicu'ros, and a host of disciples too numerous for insertion here.

Philosophers of the Heraclitian sect. Heraclit'os; the names of his disciples are unknown.

Philosophers of the Ionic sect. Anaximander, Anaxime'nēs, Anaxag'oras, and Archela'os.

Philosophers of the Italic sect. Pythag'oras, Empedoclē's, Epicharmos, Archytas, Alemaeon, Hippasos, Philola'os, and Eudoxos.

Philosophers of the Megaric sect. Euclid, Eubulidēs, Alex'inos, Euphantos, Apollonios, Chrou'os, Diodo'ros, Ichthyas, Clinom'achos, and Stilpo.

Philosophers of the Peripatetic sect. Aristotle, Theophrastos, Straton, Lyco, Aristocritola'os, and Diodo'ros.

Philosophers of the Sceptic sect. Pyrrho and Timon.

Philosophers of the Socratic sect. Soc'ratus, Xen'ophon, Aeschinēs, Crito, Simon, Glauco, Simmias, and Cebes.

Philosophers of the Stoic sect. Zeno, Cleanthēs, Chrysippes, Zeno the Less, Diogenes of Babylon, Antipater, Panætios, and Posidonios.

Philosopher's Stone. The way to wealth. The ancient alchemists thought there was a substance which would convert all baser metals to gold. This substance they called the philosopher's stone. The word stone in this case is about equal to the word substratum, which is compounded of the Latin sub and stratus (spread-under), the latter being related to the verb stand, stood, and meaning something on which the experiment stands. It was in fact a red powder or amalgam to drive off the impurities of baser metals.

Philosopher's Stone. According to legend Noah was commanded to hang up the true and genuine philosopher's stone in the ark, to give light to every living creature therein.

Inventions discovered in searching for the Philosopher's Stone. It was in searching for this treasure that Bötticher stumbled on the invention of Dresden porcelain manufacture; Roger Bacon on the composition of gunpowder; Geber on the properties of acids; Van Helmont on the nature of gas; and Dr. Glauber on the "salts" which bear his name.

Philosophy. Father of Philosophy. Albrecht von Haller, of Bern. (1703-1777.)

Roger Bacon. (1214-1292.)

Father of Inductive Philosophy. Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam. (1561-1626.)

Father of Roman Philosophy. Cicero. (B.C. 106-43.)

Philotimē (lover of honour). The presiding queen of Hell, and daughter of Mammon.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. ii.

Philter. A draught or charm to incite in another the passion of love. The Thessalian philters were the most renowned, but both the Greeks and Romans used these dangerous potions, which sometimes produced insanity. Lucretius is said to have been driven mad by a love-potion, and Caligula's death is attributed to philters administered to him by his wife, Cæsonia. Brabantio says to Othello—

Thou hast practised on her (Desdemona) with foul charms.
Abused her delicate youth with drugs or minerals
That weaken motion.

Shakespeare, "Othello," i. 1.

Phineus (2 syl.). A blind king of Thrace, who had the gift of prophecy. Whenever he wanted to eat the Harpies came and took away or defiled his food.

Blind Tham'yris, and blind Mæon'idēs.
And Tre'sias, and Phineus, prophets old.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii. 34.

Phiz. Hablot K. Browne, who illustrated the "Pickwick Papers," &c.

Phleg'ethon. A river of liquid fire in Hædēs. (Greek, phlegō, to burn.)

Fierce Phlegethon,
Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," ii.

Phleg'ra, in Macedonia, was where the giants attacked the gods. Encel'ados was the chief of the giants.

Pho'ca (pl. phuce). A sea-calf, or any other monster of the deep.

Pho'cion, surnamed The Good, who resisted all the bribes of Alexander and his successor. It was this real patriot who told Alexander to turn his arms against Persia, their common enemy, rather than against the states of Greece, his natural allies.

Pho'cion the Good, in public life severe,
To virtue still inexorably firm.
Thomson, "Winter."

Phœbē. The moon, sister of Phæbus.

Phæbus. The sun or sun-god. In Greek mythology Apollo is called Phœbus (the sun-god), because he drove the chariot of the sun.

The rays divine of vernal Phœbus shine.
Thomson, Spring."

Phœnix; said to live 500 years, when it makes in Arabia a nest of spices, burns itself to ashes, and comes forth with renewed life for another 500 years.

Phœnix; said to have fifty orifices in his bill, continued to his tail. After living 1000 years he builds for himself a funeral pile, sings a melodious air through his fifty organ-pipes, flaps his wings with a velocity which sets fire to the pile, and consumes himself.—Richardson.

The enchanted pile of that lonely bird,
Who sings at the last his own death-lay,
And in music and perfume dies away.
Thomas Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

Phœnix, as a sign over chemists' shops, was adopted from the association of this fabulous bird with alchemy. Paracelsus wrote about it, and several of the alchemists employed it to symbolise their vocation.

A phoenix among women. A phoenix of his kind. A paragon, unique; because there never was but one phoenix.

If she be furnished with a mind so rare,
She is alone the Arabian bird.
Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," i. 7.

Phoenix Alley (London). The alley leading to the Phoenix theatre, now called Drury Lane.

Phoenix Park (Dublin). A corruption of the Gaelic Fion-uisc (fair water); so called from a spring at one time resorted to as a chalybeate spa.

Phoenix Period or Cycle, according to Tacitus, consisted of 250 years; but R. Stuart Poole asserts that it was a period of 1,460 Julian years, like the Sothic Cycle. Now, the phoenix is said to have appeared in Egypt five times: (1) in the reign of Sesostriis; (2) in the reign of Am-asis; (3) in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos; (4) a year or two prior to the death of Tiberius; and (5) in A.D. 334, during the reign of Constantine. These dates being accepted, a Phoenix Cycle consisted of 300 years: thus, Sesostriis, B.C. 866; Am-asis, B.C. 566; Ptolemy, B.C. 266; Tiberius, A.D. 34; Constantine, A.D. 334. In corroboration of this suggestion it must be borne in mind that Jesus Christ, who died A.D. 34, is termed the Phoenix by monastic writers.

Tacitus mentions the first three of these appearances.—"Annales," vi. 28.

Phoenix Theatre, now called Drury Lane. In Shakspeare's time it was "a private theatre." Killigrew pulled down the old house, then called a cockpit, and built on the site the "King's Theatre" (1663), burnt in 1671, and restored by Sir Christopher Wren as Drury Lane (1674).

Phoo'ka or Pooka. A spirit of most malignant disposition, who hurries people to their destruction. He sometimes comes in the form of an eagle, and sometimes in that of a horse, like the Scotch kelpy (q.v.).—Irish superstition.

Phor'cos. "The old man of the sea." He was the father of the three Graiæ, who were grey from their birth, and had but one eye and one tooth common to the three.—Greek mythology.

Phor'mio. A parasite, who accommodates himself to the humour of every one.—Terence, "Phormio."

Phrygians. An early Christian sect, so called from Phrygia, where they abounded. They regarded Montanus as their prophet, and laid claim to the spirit of prophecy.

Phry'ne (2 syl.). A courtesan or Athenian hetæra. She acquired so much wealth by her beauty, that she offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes if she might put on them this inscription: "Alexander destroyed them, but Phrynê the hetæra rebuilt them." Apelles' most celebrated picture of "Venus" was a representation of Phrynê, who entered the sea with dishevelled air as a model. The Cnidian Venus of Praxitelês was also taken from this courtesan.

Phthah or Opat. The Vulcan of Egyptian mythology.

Phylactery. A charm or amulet. The Jews wore on their wrist or forehead a slip of parchment bearing a text of Scripture. Strictly speaking, a phylactery consisted of four pieces of parchment rolled together in the form of a pyramid of boxes, enclosed in a black leather case, and fastened to the forehead or wrist of the left hand. On the slips of parchment were written four passages of Scripture—Ex. xiii. 1-10, 11-16; Deut. vi. 4-9, xi. 13-21. The idea arose from the command of Moses, "Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart . . . and bind them for a sign upon your hand . . . as frontlets between your eyes."—Deut. xi. 18.

Phyllis. A country girl.—Virgil, "Eclouges," iii. and v.

Country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses.
Milton, "L' Allegro."

Phyllis and Brunetta. Rival beauties, who for a long time vied with each other on equal terms. For a certain festival Phyllis procured some marvellous fabric of gold brocade to outshine her rival; but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in the same material, clothing herself in simple black. Upon this crushing mortification Phyllis went home and died.—Spectator.

Phyllising the Fair. Philandering—making soft speeches and winning faces at them. Garth says of Dr. Atterbury—

He passed his easy hours, instead of prayer,
In madrigals and phyllising the fair.
"The Dispensary," l.

Phynnod'deree (the Hairy-one). A Manx spirit, similar to the Scotch "brownie," and German "kobold." He is said to be an outlawed fairy, and the offence was this: He absented himself without leave from Fairy-court on the great levée-day of the Harvest-moon, being in the glen of Rushen, dancing with a pretty Manx maid whom he was courting.

Physician. The Beloved Physician. St. Luke, the evangelist.

The Prince of Physicians. Avicenna, the Arabian. (980-1037.)

Physignathos (One who swells the cheeks). King of the Frogs, and son of Pelus [mud], slain by Troxartas the Mouse-king.

Great Physignathos I, from Peleus' race,
B-got in fair Hydromedæ's embrace,
Where, by the nuptial bank that paints his side,
The swift Eridanus de lights to gli e.
Parnell, "Battle of the Frogs," bk. l.

Pi'arists, or Brethren of the Pious School. A religious congregation founded in the sixteenth century by Joseph of Calasanza, for the better instruction and education of the middle and higher classes.

Pic-nic. Originally the subscribers of a pic-nic had a bill of fare numbered; each member picked out a certain dish which he was willing to furnish, and the number was nicked or ticked off. So the entertainment was called a pick and nick. The custom dates from 1802.

Dr. John Anthony derives it from the Italian piccola nicchia (a small task), each person being set a small task towards the general entertainment. Contracted into picc. nice.

Pic'ador (Spanish). A horseman; one who in bull-fights is armed with a spear or pike.

Picards. An immoral sect of fanatics in the fifteenth century; so called from Picard of Flanders, their founder, who called himself the New Adam, and tried to introduce the custom of living nude like Adam in Paradise.

You are as hot-headed as a picard. This is a French expression, and is tantamount to our "Peppery as a Welshman."

Pica'roon'. A pirate, one who plunders wrecks. (French, picarcar, picorer, to plunder; Scotch, pikary, rapine; Spanish, picar.)

Pic'atrix. The pseudonyme of a Spanish monk, author of a book on demonology, collected from the writings of 224 Arabic magicians. It was dedicated to king Alfonso.

At the time when I was a student in the University of Toulouse, that same reverend Picatrix, rector of the Diabolical Faculty, was wont to tell us that devils did naturally tear the bright glancing of swords as much as the splendour and light of the sun.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iii. 23.

Piccadilly (London); so called from Piccadilla Hall, the chief depôt of a certain sort of lace, much in vogue during the reign of queen Elizabeth. The lace was called piccadilly lace from its little spear-points (a diminutive of pica, a pike or spear). In the reign of James I. the high ruff was called a piccadilly, though divested of its lace edging. Barnaby Rudge, speaking of the piccadillies, says—"He that some forty years sithen should have asked after a piccadilly, I wonder who would have understood him, and would have told him whether it was fish or flesh" (1614). We are told in the "Glossographia" (1681) that Piccadilly was named from Higgins' famous ordinary near St. James's, called Higgins's Pickadilly, "because he made his money by selling piccadillies, which in the last age were much in fashion" (p. 495).

Where Sackville Street now stands was Piccadilla Hall, where piec idillas or turnovers were sold, which gave name to Piccadilly.—Pennant.

Pick. To throw; same as pitch. The instrument that throws the shuttle is called the picker.

I'll pick you o'er the pales.
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," v. 3.

Pickanin'ny. A young child. A West-Indian negro word.

Pick'elher'ringē (5 syl.). A buffoon is so called by the Dutch; a corruption of Pickle-härin (hairy sprite). Ben Jonson has Puck-hairy.

Pickle. A rod in pickle. One ready to chastise with at any moment. Pickled means preserved for use.

I'm in a pretty pickle—in a quandary, or state of disorder.

How can'st thou in this pickle?
Shakespeare, "Tempest," v. 1.

Pickwick (Mr. Samuel). The hero of the "Pickwick Papers," by Charles Dickens. He is a simple-minded, benevolent old gentleman, who wears spectacles, breeches, and short black gaiters, has a bald head, and "good round belly." He founds a club, and travels with its members over England, each member being under his guardianship.

Picrochole (Pik-ro-coal). King of Lerné. A Greek compound, meaning "bitter-bile" or choleric. The rusties of Utopia one day asked the cake-bakers of Lerné, who happened to be passing by, to sell them some cakes, but received only abuse for their answer; whereupon a quarrel ensued. When Picrochole was informed thereof, he marched with all his men against Utopia. King Grangousier tried to appease the choleric king, but all his efforts were in vain. At length Gargantua arrived, defeated Picrochole, and put his army to the rout.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

King Picrochole's statesman. One who without his host reckons of mighty achievements to be accomplished. The duke of Smalltrash, earl of Swashbuckler, and captain Durtaille advised king Picrochole to divide his army into two parts; one was to be left to carry on the war in hand, and the other to be sent forth to make conquests. They were to take England, France and Spain, Asia Minor, the Greek Islands, and Turkey, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Russia, &c., and to divide the lands thus taken among the conquerors. Echeph'ron, an old soldier, replied—"A shoemaker bought a ha'poth of milk; with this he was going to make butter, the butter was to buy a cow, the cow was to have a calf, the calf was to be changed for a colt, and the man was to become a nabob; only he cracked his jug, spilt his milk, and went supperless to bed."—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 33.

Pict is not from the Latin picti (painted people). As Picts and Scots are always mentioned together, there is no reason why one should be Gaelic and the other Latin. Scot is the Gaelic 'sgod (a dweller in woods and forests), and Pict is the Gaelic pict-ish (freebooters); the two being equivalent to foresters and freebooters.

Picts' Houses. Those underground buildings more accurately termed "Earth Houses," as the Pict's House at Kettleburn, in Caithness.

Picture. A model or beau-ideal, as He is the picture of health; A perfect picture of a house.

The Picture. Massinger has borrowed the plot of this play from Bandello of Piedmont, who wrote novelles or tales in the fifteenth century.

Pictures. (See CABINET, CARTOONS, &c.)

Picture Bible. (See BIBLIA.)

Pie. Looking for a pie's nest (French). Looking for something you are not likely to find. (See below.)

He is in the pie's nest (French). In a fix, in great doubt, in a quandary. The pie places her nest out of reach, and fortifies it with thorny sticks, leaving only a small aperture just large enough to admit her body. She generally sits with her head towards the hole, watching against intruders.

Je m'en vay chercher un grand peut-estre. Il est au nid de la pie. — Rabelais.

Pie-Bald. A corruption of pie-balled, speckled like a pie. The words Ball, Dun, and Favel are frequently given as names to cows. "Ball" means the cow with a mark on its face; "Dun" means the cow of a dun or brownish-yellow colour; and "Favel" means the bay cow. (Ball, in Gaelic, means a "mark;" balluch, speckled.)

Pie Corner (London) is the French piéd cornier, a boundary tree.

Pie Poudre. A court formerly held at a fair on St. Giles's Hill, near Winchester. It was originally authorised by the bishop of Winton from a grant of Edward IV. Similar courts were held elsewhere at wakes and fairs for the rough-and-ready treatment of pedlars and hawkers, to compel them and those with whom they dealt to fulfil their contracts. (French, pie poudreux, dusty foot. A vagabond is called in French pie-poudreux.)

Have its proceedings disallowed or Allowed, at fancy of pie-powder.
Bulwer, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 2.

Pied Piper of Ham'elen. The Pyed Piper was promised a reward if he would drive the rats and mice out of Hamel (Brunswick). This he did, for he gathered them together by his pipe, and then drowned them in the river. As the people refused to pay him, he next did the same with all the children of the place (July 22nd, 1376).

To blow the pipe his lips he wrinkled,
And green and blue his sharp eyes twinkled...
And ere three notes his pipe had uttered...
Out of the houses rats came tumbling—
Great rats, small rats, lean rats, brawny rats,
Brown rats, black rats, gray rats, tawny rats—
And step by step they followed him dancing,
Till they came to the river Weser...

Robert Browning.

Pierre (pron. Peer). A conspirator in Otway's "Venice Preserved." He is described as a patriot, of the bluntest manners, and a stoical heart.

Uglier than Pierre du Coignet (French). Coignères was an advocate-general in the reign of Philippe de Valois, who stoutly opposed the encroachments of the church. The monks in revenge called, by way of pun, those grotesque monkey-like figures carved in stone, used in church architecture, pierres de Coignet or Pierre de Coignet. At Notre Dame de Paris they used to extinguish their torches in the mouths and nostrils of these figures, which thus acquired a superadded ugliness.

You may associate them with master Peter du Coignet... in the middle of the porch... to perform the office of extinguishers, and with their noses put out the lighted candles, torches, tapers, and flambeaux.—Rabelais.

Pierrot (pe'er-ro). A character in French pantomime representing a man in growth and a child in mind and manners. He is generally the tallest and thinnest man that can be got, has his face and hair covered with white powder or flour, and wears a white gown with very long sleeves, and a row of big buttons down the front. The word means Little Peter.

Piers. The shepherd who relates the fable of the "Kid and her Dam," to show the danger of bad company.—Spenser, "Shepherd's Calendar."

Piers Ploughman. The hero of a satirical poem of the fourteenth century. He falls asleep, like John Bunyan, on the Malvern Hills, and has different visions which he describes, and in which he exposes the corruptions of society, the dissoluteness of the clergy, and the allurements to sin, with considerable bitterness. The author is supposed to be Robert Langland.

Pieta'. A representation of the Virgin Mary embracing the dead body of her Son. Filial or maternal love was called piety by the Romans. (See PIOUS.)

Pietists. A sect of Lutherans in the seventeenth century, who sought to introduce a more moral life and a more "evangelical" spirit of doctrine into the reformed church. In Germany the word Pietist is about equal to our vulgar use of Methodist.

Pie'tro (3 syl.). The putative father of Pompil'ia, criminally assumed as his child for the sake of inheriting certain property which depended on his having an offspring.—Robert Browning, "The Ring and the Book." (See RING.)

Pig. In the forefeet of pigs is a very small hole, which may be seen when the hair has been carefully removed. The tradition is that the legion of devils entered by these apertures. There are also round it some six rings, the whole together not larger than a small spangle; they look as if burnt or branded into the skin, and the tradition is that they are the marks of the devil's claws when he entered the swine (Mark v. 11-15).

Pig in a poke. A blind bargain. The French say Acheter chat en poche. The reference is to a common trick in days gone by of substituting a cat for a sucking-pig, and trying to palm it off on greenhorns. If any one heedlessly bought the article without examination he bought a "cat" for a "pig;" but if he opened the sack he "let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed. The French "chat en poche" refers to the fact, while our proverb regards the trick.

He has brought his pigs to a pretty market. He has made a very bad bargain; he has managed his business in a very bad way. Pigs were the chief articles of sale with our Saxon herdsmen, and till recently the village cottager looked to pay his rent by the sale of his pigs.

He follows me about like an Anthony pig; or such and such a one is a Tantony pig; meaning a beggar, a hanger-on. Stow says that the officers of the market used to slit the ears of pigs unfit for food. One day one of the proctors of St. Anthony's Hospital tied a bell about a pig whose ear was slit, and no one would ever hurt it. The pig would follow like a dog any one who fed it.

Please the pigs. If the Virgin permits. Saxon, piga (a virgin), whence Peggy, a common name of females in Scotland. In the Danish New Testament "maiden" is generally rendered pigen. "Pig Cross," dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is Virgin Cross, or the Lady Cross. So also "Pig's Hill," "Pig's Ditch," in some instances at least, are the field and diggin' attached to the Lady's Chapel, though in others they are simply the hill and ditch where pigs were offered for sale. Another etymology is Please the pixies (fairies), a saying still common in Devonshire.

It is somewhat remarkable that pige should be Norse for maiden, and hog or og Gaelic for young generally. Thus ogua (a young man), and oige (a young woman).

The common notion that "please the pigs" is a corruption of "please the pix," is wholly unworthy of credit.

Some men there are love not a gaping pig ("Merchant of Venice," iv. 1). Marshal d'Albert always fainted at the sight of a pig. (See ANTIPATHY, CAT.)

Pigs. (See BARTHOLOMEW PIGS.)

Pig and Tinderbox. The Elephant and Castle.

Pig and Whistle. The bowl and wassail, or the was-sail-cup and wassail. A piggen is a pail, especially a milk-pail; and a pig is a small bowl, cup, or mug. Thus a crockery dealer is called a pig-wife. Another explanation is that it is a corruption of the pix and houssel; the "pix" being the box in which the sacred wafers were kept, and the "houssel" the eucharist or wafers themselves.

Pig-back, Pick-back, or a-Pigger-back, does not mean as a pig is carried by a butcher, but as a pigu or child is carried. It should be written apigga-back. A butcher carries a pig head downwards, with its legs over his shoulders; but a child is carried with its arms round your neck, and legs under your arms.

She carries the other a pickapack upon her shoulders.—L'Estrange.

Pig Iron. This is a mere play upon the word sow. When iron is melted it runs off into a channel called a sow, the lateral branches of which are called the pigs; here the iron cools, and is called pig-iron. Now sow has nothing whatever to do with swine, but is from the Saxon sawan, to scatter; German, sausen, to rush; and ought to be written saus (sows), a word in use still in the expression "He soused upon him"—i.e., swooped or rushed. Having sows or sow for the parent channel, it required no great effort of wit to make the lateral grooves the little pigs.

Pig-tails (The). The Chinese; so called because the Tartar tonsure and braided queue are very general.

We laid away telling one another of the pig-tails till we both dropped off to sleep.—Tales about the Chinese.

Pig-wiggen. A dwarf; so called from the fairy in Drayton's "Nymphidia." A corruption of Pig-widden. (See PIGGY-WIGGY.)

Pigeon. Pitt says in Mecca no one will kill the blue pigeons, because they are held sacred.

Pigeons. Two black pigeons, we are told, took their flight from Thebes, in Egypt: one flew to Libya, and the other to Dolo'na, in Greece. On the spot where the former alighted, the temple of Jupiter Ammon was erected; in the place where the other settled, the oracle of Jupiter was established, and there the responses were made by the black pigeons that inhabited the surrounding groves. This fable is probably based on a pun upon the word peleiar, which usually means "old women," but in the dialect of the Epi'rots signifies pigeons or doves.

Pigeon lays only two eggs. Hence the Queen says of Hamlet, after his fit he will be—

As patient as the female dove
When that her golden couplets are disclosed [i.e., hatched].
"Hamlet," v. 1.

Mahomet's Pigeon. This pigeon was taught to pick seeds from Mahomet's ear, so that it might be thought to be the messenger of inspired communications.

He who is sprinkled with pigeon's blood will never die a natural death. A sculptor carrying home a bust of Charles I. stopped to rest on the way; at the moment a pigeon overhead was struck by a hawk, and the blood of the bird fell on the neck of the bust. The sculptor thought it ominous, and after the king was beheaded the saying became current.

Flocks of wild pigeons presage the pestilence, at least in Louisiana. Longfellow says they come with "naught in their craws but an acorn."—"Evangeline."

To pigeon. To cheat, to gull one of his money by almost self-evident hoaxes. Pigeons are very easily gulled, caught by snares, or scared by malkins. One easily gulled is called a pigeon. The French pigeon means a dupe.

Je me deffieroy tantost que tu servis un de ceux qui ne se gaissent si facilement pigeonner à telles gens.—"Les Dialogues de Jacques Tahureau" (1555).

Pigeon-English. A conglomeration of English and Portuguese words, wrapped in a Chinese idiom, in which the European dealers "pigeon" or try to over-reach the merchants of the "Flowery Empire."

The traders care nothing for the Chinese language, and are content to carry on their business transactions in a hideous jargon called "pigeon English."—The Times.

Pigeon-livered. Timid, easily frightened, like a pigeon. The bile rules the temper, and the liver the bile.

Pigeon Pair. A boy and girl, twins. It was once supposed that pigeons always sit on two eggs, which produce a male and a female, and these twin birds live together in love the rest of their lives.

Pigg. (See under the word BREWER.)

Piggy-wiggy or Piggy-whidden. A word of endearment; a pet pig, which being the smallest of the litter is called by the diminutive Piggy, and being very white from weakness is called wiggy, a corruption of whiddy, meaning white.

Pigh'tle. A small parcel of land enclosed with a hedge. In the Eastern counties called a pikle. (Scotch, pight, fixed or determinate.)

Pigmy. A dwarf. In fabulous history the pigmies were a nation of dwarfs devoured by cranes. (See PYGMIES.)

Pig'ot. A family name, from their heraldic device, a pickaxe.

Pigwiggin. An elf in love with queen Mab. He combats the jealous O'heron with great fury.—Drayton, "Nymphidia."

Pike-staff. Plain as a pike-staff. A corruption of "Plain as a pack-staff," the staff on which pedlars carried their pack. The pike-staff would be the shaft of the pike or halbert.

Pilate Voice. A loud ranting voice. In the old mysteries all tyrants were made to speak in a rough ranting manner. Thus Bottom the Weaver, after a rant "to show his quality," exclaims, "That's 'Ercles' vein, a tyrant's vein;" and Hamlet describes a ranting actor as "out-heroding Herod."

In Pilate voyes he gan to cry,
And swor by armés, and by bloo and bones.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 3126.

Pilch. The flannel napkin of an infant; a buff or leather jerkin. (See below.)

Pilcher. A scabbard. (Saxon, pylche, a skin coat.)

Will you pluck your sword out of his pilcher?
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," iii. 1.

Pil-garlic (A). One whose hair has fallen off from disease; one avoided and forsaken by his fellows. The editor of Notes and Queries says that garlic was a prime specific for leprosy, so that garlic and leprosy became inseparably associated. As lepers had to pil or peel their own garlic, they were nick-named pil-garlics, and any one who was shunned like a leper was called so likewise. Stow refers the expression to one getting old, observing "He will soon be a peeled garlic like myself."

Pil'grimage (3 syl.). The chief places in the West were (1) Walsingham and Canterbury (England); (2) Fourvières, Puy, and St. Denis (France); (3) Rome, Loretto, Genetsano, and Assisi (Italy); (4) Compostella, Guadalupe, and Montserrat (Spain); (5) Oetting, Zell, Cologne, Trier, and Einsiedeln (Germany). Chaucer has an admirable photograph, chiefly in verse, of a pilgrimage to Becket's tomb, in Canterbury cathedral. The pilgrims beguile the weariness of the way by telling tales. These "Canterbury Tales" were never completed.

Pillar. Running from pillar to post—from one thing to another without any fixed purpose. This is an allusion to the manégo. The pillar is the centre of the manégo ground, and the posts are the columns at equal distances, placed two and two round the circumference of the ring.

Pillar Saints or Stylitēs. A class of ascetics, chiefly of Syria, who took up their abode on the top of a pillar, from which they never descended. (See STYLITES.)

Pillars of Heaven. The Atlas mountains are so called by the natives.

Pillars of Hercules. The opposite rocks at the entrance of the Mediterranean Sea, one in Spain and the other on the African continent. The tale is that they were bound together till Hercules tore them asunder in order to get to Gadēs (Cadiz). The ancients called them Calpē and Ab'yla; we call them Gibraltar Rock and Mount Hacho, on which stands the fortress of Cēn'ta.

Pillory. The following eminent men have been put in the pillory for literary offences:—Leighton, for tracts against Charles I.; Lilburn, for circulating the tracts of Dr. Bastwick; Bastwick, for attacking the Church of England; Warton the publisher; Prynne, for a satire on the wife of Charles I.; Daniel Defoe, for a pamphlet entitled "The Shortest Day with Dissenters," &c.

Pilot, according to Scaliger, is from an old French word, pile (a ship).

Pilot Fish. So called because it is supposed to pilot the shark to its prey. The shark will no more injure it than a crocodile would harm a trochilus or humming-bird.

Pilpay or Bidpay. The Indian Æsop. His compilation was in Sanskrit, and entitled "Pantcha-Tantra." Khosru (Chosroes) the Great of Persia ordered them to be translated into Pehlvi, an idiom of Medish, at that time the language of Persia. This was in the middle of the sixth century.

Pimlico (London), according to tradition, receives its name from Ben Pimlico, famous for his nut-brown ale. His tea-gardens were near Hoxton, and the road to them was a promenade called Pimlico Path. There can be no doubt of the existence of Ben Pimlico and his good audit, but the connection between him and the suburb is very questionable, especially as we find the word in Bohemia. Some five miles to the south-west of Trautenau, is a village called Pimlikau, evidently the same word, though no tea-gardens can stand godfather thereto.

Hey for old Ben Pimlico's nut-browne!
"News from Hopston" (1508).

Pin. In merry pin. In merry mood, in good spirits. Pegge, in his "Anonymiana," says that the old tankards were divided into eight equal parts, and each part was marked with a silver pin. The cups held two quarts, consequently the quantity from pin to pin was half a Winchester pint. By the rules of "good fellowship" a drinker was to stop drinking only at a pin, and if he drank beyond it was to drink to the next one. As it was very hard to stop exactly at the pin, the vain efforts gave rise to much mirth, and the drinker had generally to drain the tankard. (See PEG.)

No song, no laugh, no jovial din
Of drinking wassail to the pin.
Longfellow, "Golden Legend," i.

A merry pin. A roisterer.

We are told that St. Dunstan introduced the plan of pegging tankards, to check the intemperate habits of the English in his time.

I do not pin my faith upon your sleeve. I am not going to take your ipse dixit for gospel. In feudal times badges were worn, and the partisans of a leader used to wear his badge, which was pinned on the sleeve. Sometimes these badges were changed for specific purposes, and persons learned to doubt. Hence the phrase, "You wear the badge, but I do not intend to pin my faith on your sleeve."

He tirl'd at the pin. Rattled at the latch to give notice that he was about to enter. The pin was not only the latch of chamber-doors and cottages, but the "rasp" of castles used instead of the modern knocker. It was attached to a ring, which produced a grating sound to give notice to the warder.

Sae licht he jumped up the stair,
And tirl'd at the pin;
And wha sae ready as hersel'
To let the laddie in?
"Charlie is my Darling."

Pin Money. A lady's allowance of money for her own personal expenditure. Long after the invention of pins, in the fourteenth century, the maker was allowed to sell them in open shop only on the 1st and 2nd of January. It was then that the court ladies and city dames flocked to the depôts to buy them, having been first provided with money by their husbands. When pins became cheap and common, the ladies spent their allowances on other fancies, but the term pin-money remained in vogue.

It is quite an error to suppose that pins were invented in the reign of François I, and introduced into England by Catharine Howard, the fifth wife of Henry VIII. In 1347, just two hundred years before the death of François, 12,000 pins were delivered from the royal wardrobe for the use of the princess Joan, and in 1400 (more than a century before François ascended the throne) the duchess of Orléans purchased of Jehan le Breconnier, espinglier, of Paris, several thousand long and short pins, besides five hundred de la façon d'Angleterre. So that pins were not only manufactured in England, but were of high repute even in the reign of Henry IV.

Pinabello or Pin'abel (in "Orlando Furioso"). Son of Anselmo, king of Magauza. Marphisa having overthrown him, and taken the steed of his dame, Pinabello, at her instigation, decreed that nothing would wipe out the disgrace except a thousand dames and a thousand warriors unhorsed, and spoiled of their arms, steed, and vest. He was slain by Bradamant.

Pinch (Dr.). A schoolmaster and conjurer.—Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors." Tom Pinch, in "Martin Chuzzlewit," by Charles Dickens.

Ruth Pinch. Sister of the above.

Pinchbeck. So called from Christopher Pinchbeck, a musical-clock maker. The word is used for Brummagem, inferior, make-believe.

Where, in these pinchbeck days, can we hope to find the old agricultural virtue in all its purity?—Anthony Trollope, "Framley Parsonage."

Pinchwife (Mr. and Mrs.), in Wycherly's "Country Wife."

Pindar. The French Pindar. Jean Dorat (1507-1588). Also Ponce Denis Lebrun (1729-1807).

The Italian Pindar. Gabriello Chiabrera; whence Chiabresco is in Italian tantamount to "Pindaric." (1552-1637.)

Peter Pindar. Dr. John Wolcot. (1738-1819.)

Pindar of England. George, duke of Buckingham, declared Cowley to be the Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England.

In Westminster Abbey, the last line of Gray's tablet claims the honour of British Pindar for the author of "The Bard."

She [Britain] felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.

Pindar of Wakefield (George-a-Green) has given his name to a celebrated house on the west side of the Gray's-inn Road; and a house with that name still exists in St. Chad's Row, on the other side of the street.—The Times. (See PINDER.)

Pindaric Verse. Irregular verse; a poem of various metres, but of lofty style, in imitation of the odes of Pindar. "Alexander's Feast," by Dryden, is the best specimen in English.

Pinder. One who takes care of cattle in a pound or pen; thus George-a-Green was the "Pinder of Wakefield," and his encounter with Robin Hood, Scarlet, and Little John forms the subject of one of the Robin Hood ballads.

Pindo'rus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). One of the two heralds; the other is Arideus.

Pine-bender. Sinis, the Corinthian robber; so called because he used to fasten his victims to two pine-trees bent towards the earth, and then leave them to be rent asunder by the rebound.

Pink. The flower is so called because the edges of the petals are pinked or notched. (See below.)

Pink of Perfection. The acmé; the beau-ideal. Shakespeare has "the pink of courtesy" ("Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4). Welsh, piône, a point, an acme; our pink, to stab; pinking, cutting into points.

Pi'ony. A flower; so called from the chieftain Paion, who discovered it.—"Saxon Leechdoms," i.

Pi'ous (2 syl.). The Romans called a man who revered his father pious; hence Antoninus was called pious, because he requested that his adopted father (Hadrian) might be ranked among the gods. Æne'as was called pius because he rescued his father from the burning city of Troy. The Italian word "pieta" (q.v.) has a similar meaning.

The Pious. Ernst I., founder of the House of Gotha. (1601-1674.)

Robert, son of Hugues Capet. (971, 996-1031.)

Eric IX. of Sweden. (*, 1155-1161.)

Pip. The hero of Dickens's "Great Expectations." He is first a poor boy, and then a man of wealth.

Pip'chins (Mrs.). A wan, false-toothed, yellow-skinned scrag—Dickens, "Little Dorrit."

Pipe. To pipe your eye. To snivel; to cry. (Saxon, peopan, to weep.)

Put your pipe out. Spoil your piping or singing; make you sing another tune, or in another key. "Take your shine out" has a similar force.

Put that into your pipe and smoke it. Digest that if you can. An expression used by one who has given an adversary a severe rebuke. The allusion is to the pipes of peace and war smoked by the American Indians.

Office of the Clerk of the Pipe. A very ancient office in the Court of Exchequer, where leases of crown lands, sheriffs' accounts, &c., were made out. It existed in the reign of Henry II., and was abolished in the reign of William IV. Lord Bacon says, "The office is so called because the whole receipt of the court is finally conveyed into it by means of divers small pipes or quills, as water into a cistern."

Pipe Rolls or Great Rolls of the Pipe. The series of Great Rolls of the Exchequer, beginning 2 Henry II., and continued to 1834, when the Pipe-office was abolished. These rolls are now in the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane.

Pipe of Peace. The North-American Indians present a pipe to any one they wish to be on good terms with. To receive the pipe and smoke together is to promote friendship and good-will, but to refuse the offer is virtually a declaration of hostility.

Pipeclay. Routine; fossilised military dogmas of no real worth. In government offices the term red-tape is used to express the same idea. Pipeclay was at one time largely used by soldiers for making their gloves, accoutrements, and clothes look clean and smart.

Pipelet. A concierge or French door-porter; so called from a character of that ilk in Eugène Sue's "Mysteries of Paris."

Piper. (See PIED, PAY THE PIPER.)

Tom Piper. So the piper is called in the morris dance.

Pipes (Tom). Noted for his taciturnity.—Smollett, "Peregrine Pickle."

Piræ'us. Now called the port Leo'nē.

Pirith'oös. King of the Lapithæ, proverbial for his love of Theseus, king of Athens.

Pisa'nio. A servant noted for his attachment to Im'ogen.—Shakespeare, "Cymbeline."

Piskey. Psyche, the impersonation of the soul. Hence white moths are called souls, fairies, and piskeys.

Pistol. Falstaff's lieutenant or ancient; a bully but a coward, a rogue, and always poor.—Shakespeare, "1 and 2 Henry IV.," "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Pistols. So called from Pistoja, in Florence, where they were invented in 1545.

Pistris, Pistrix, Pristis, or Pristrix. The sea-monster sent to devour Androm'eda. In ancient art it is represented with a dragon's head, the neck and head of a beast, fins for the fore-legs, and the body and tail of a fish. In Christian art the pistris was usually employed to represent the whale which swallowed Jonah.—Aratus.

Pit-a-pat. My heart goes pit-a-pat. Pit is a corruption of beat, and pat is a gentle blow. Pit-a-pat is "beating and panting." (Hindu, pata; Burmese, potai; Welsh, jat; French, panteler; our pant, &c.)

Pitch. Pitch into him. Thrust or dart your fists into him. (Welsh, piciaw, to dart; Italian, piccare.)

Pitch'ers. Little pitchers have long ears. Little folk or children hear what is said when you little think it. The ear of a pitcher is the handle, made in the shape of a man's ear. The handle of a cream-ewer and of other small jugs is quite out of proportion to the size of the vessel, compared with the handles of large jars.

Pithos. A large jar to keep wine or oil in. Winckelmann has engraved a copy of a curious bas-relief representing Diogenes occupying a pithos and holding conversation with Alexander the Great.

Pitri (pl. Pitaras). An order of divine beings in Hindu mythology inhabiting celestial regions of their own, and receiving into their society the spirits of those mortals whose funeral rites have been duly performed.

Pitt Diamond or the Regent. Called Pitt Diamond because it once belonged to Mr. Pitt, grandfather of the famous earl of Chatham. Called the Regent diamond from the duke of Orleans, regent of France, who purchased it. This famous diamond was worn in the sword-hilt of Napoleon, and now belongs to the king of Prussia.

Pitt's Mark. The printer's name and place of business affixed to printed books, according to William Pitt's Act, 39 Geo. III., c. 79.

Pitt's Pictures or Billy Pitt's Pictures. Blind windows; so called because many windows were blocked up when William Pitt augmented the Window Tax in 1784, and again in 1797.

Pit'tacus (Greek, Pittakos). One of the "Seven Sages" of Greece. His great sayings were: (1) Know the right time ("Gno'thi kairon"); and (2) 'Tis a sore thing to be eminent ("Chalepon esthlon emmenai").

Pit'tance. An allowance of victuals over and above bread and wine. Anthony du Pinet, in his translation of Pliny, applies the term over and over again to figs and beans. The word originally comes from the people's piety in giving to poor mendicants food for their subsistence. (Monkish Latin, pietancea; Spanish, pitar, to distribute a dole of food; pitancero, one who distributes the dole, or a begging friar who subsists by charity.)

Pix'ies (2 syl.). The Devonshire Robin-Good-Fellows; said to be the spirits of infants who have died before baptism. The Pixy-monarch holds his court like Titania, and sends his subjects on their several tasks. The word is a diminutive of Pix, probably the same as Puck. Swedish, pyke; old English, pouk, bug, bugie.

Ne let the pouke nor other evil sprites....
Pray us with things that be not Spenser, "Epithalamion."

Place'bo. One of the brothers of January, an old baron of Lombardy. When January held a family council to know whether he should marry, Placebo very wisely told him to do as he liked, for says he—

A ful gret fool is eny counsellour,
That servith any lord of high honour,
That dar presume, or oones (once) 'henken it,
That his counseil' schuld pass his lord's wit,
Chaucer, "The Marchand's Tale," line 1121, &c.

Pla'giarist means strictly one who kidnaps a slave. Martial applies the word to the kidnappers of other men's brains. Literary theft unacknowledged is called plagiarism. (Latin, plagiarius.)

Pla'giary (Sir Fretful), in Sheridan's "Critic;" designed for Richard Cumberland.

Plain (The). The Girondists were so called in the National Convention, because they sat on the level floor or plain of the hall. After the overthrow of the Girondists this part of the House was called the marsh or swamp (marais), and included such members as were under the control of the Mountain (q.v.).

Plain Dealer. Wycherly was so called, from his celebrated comedy of the same title.

The countess of Drogheda, inquired for the Plain Dealer. "Madam," says Mr. Fairbeard, "since you are for the 'Plain Dealer,' there he is for you," pushing Mr. Wycherly towards her.—Cibber, "Lives of the Poets," iii., p. 252.

Plan'ets. In heraldry the arms of royal personages are blazoned by the names of planets, and those of noblemen by precious stones instead of the corresponding colours.

Sol—topaz—or (gold)—bezants.

Luna—pearl—argent (silver)—plates.

Saturn—diamond—sable (black)—pellets.

Mars—ruby—gules (red)—torteaux.

Jupiter—sapphire—azure (blue)—hurts.

Venus—emerald—vert (green)—pomeis.

Mercury—amethyst—purple (violet)—golpes.

Inferior planets. Mercury and Venus; so called because their orbits are within the orbit of the earth.

Superior planets. Mars, the Planetoids, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune; so called because their orbits are outside the earth's orbit—i.e., further from the sun.

Plank. Any one principle of a political platform. (See PLATFORM.)

Plantagenet, from planta genista (broom-plaut), the family cognisance first assumed by the earl of Anjou, the first of his race, during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, as a symbol of humility. —Buck, "Richard III."

Plaster or Chapel Plaster. A corruption of play-stow (play-ground). Saxon, plegstow.

Plat'en, among printers, is the power or weight which presses on the tympan (q.v.), to cause the impression of the letters to be given off and transferred to the sheet. (French, plat, flat.)

Platform, in the New England states, is a scheme of church government, as the Cambridge or Saybrook platform. In other parts of America it is applied to the political and other principles on which a leader builds up his party. Each separate principle is a plank of the platform.

Their declaration of principles—their "platform," to use the appropriate term—was settled and published to the world. Its distinctive elements or "planks" are financial.—The Times.

Pla'to. His original name was Aristotélēs, but he was called Platōn from the great breadth of his shoulders.

The German Plato. Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi. (1743-1819.)

The Jewish Plato. Philo Judæus, an Alexandrine philosopher. (Flourished 20-40.)

The Puritan Plato. John Howe, the Nonconformist. (1630-1706.)

Plato's Year. A revolution of 25,000 years, in which period the stars and constellations return to their former places in respect to the equinoxes.

Cut out more work than can be done
In Plato's year, but finish none
Bulter, "Hudibras," pt. iii. l.

Platonic Bodies. The five regular geometric solids described by Plato—viz., the tetrahedron, hexahedron, octahedron, dodecahedron, and icosahedron, all of which are bounded by like, equal, and regular planes.

Platonic Love. Spiritual love between persons of opposite sexes. It is the friendship of man and woman, without mixture of what is usually called love. Plato strongly advocated this pure affection, and hence its distinctive name.

Platonic Puritan. John Howe, the Nonconformist divine. (1630-1706.)

Platonism. The philosophical system of Plato; dialectics. Locke maintains that the mind is by nature a sheet of white paper, the five senses being the doors of knowledge. Plato maintained the opposite theory, drawing a strong line of demarcation between the province of thought and that of sensations in the production of ideas. (See DIALECTICS.)

In theology, he taught that there are two eternal, primary, independent, and incorruptible causes of material things—God the maker, and matter the substance.

In psychology, he maintained the ultimate unity and mutual dependence of all knowledge.

In physics, he said that God is the measure of all things, and that from God, in whom reason and being are one, proceed human reason and those "ideas" or laws which constitute all that can be called real in nature.

Platter with Three Eyes. Emblematical of St. Lucy, in allusion to her sending her two eyes to a nobleman who wanted to marry her for the exceeding beauty of her eyes. "Take them," she said, "and let me now live to God." The tale says that God accepted the sacrifice and restored her eyes.

Play. "This may be play to you, 'tis death to us." The allusion is to the fable of the boys throwing stones at some frogs.—Roger L'Estrange.

As good as a play. So said king Charles when he attended the discussion of lord Ross's "Divorce Bill."

Play the Deuce. The Irish say, Play the Pooka. Pooka or Pouke is an evil spirit in the form of a wild colt, who does great hurt to benighted travellers.

Pleasant (Mrs.), in Tom Killigrew's "Parson's Wedding."

Pleasure. It was Xerxes who offered a reward to any one who would invent a new pleasure.

Plebe'ians. Common people; properly it means the free citizens of Rome, who were neither patricians nor clients. They were, however, free landowners, and had their own "gentès." (Latin, pleo, to fill.)

Plebiscite (3 syl.). A decree of the people. In Roman history, a law enacted by the "comitia" or assembly of tribes. In France, the resolutions adopted in the Revolution by the voice of the people, and the general votes given during the second empire—such as the general vote to elect Napoleon III. emperor of the French.

Pledge. I pledge you in this wine. This custom arose in the tenth century, when it was thought necessary for one person to watch over the safety of a companion while in the act of drinking. It was by no means unusual with the fierce Danes to stab a person under such circumstances.

IF I

Were a huge man, I should fear to drink at meals,
Lest they should spy my windpipe's dangerous notes.
Great men should drink with harness on their throats,
"Timon of Athens," i. 2.

Pleiades (3 syl.) means the "sailing stars" (Greek, pléo, to sail), because the Greeks considered navigation safe at the return of the Pleiades, and never attempted it after those stars disappeared.

The Pleiad of Alexandria. A group of seven contemporary poets in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos, so called in reference to the cluster of stars in the back of Taurus. Their names are—Callimachus, Apollonios of Rhodes, Aratos, Philiseos (called Homer the Younger), Lycophron, Nicander, and Theocritos.

The literary Pleiad of Charlemagne. Alenin (Albinus), Angilbert (Homer), Adelard (Augustine), Riculfe (Damatus), Charlemagne (David), Varnefrid, and Eginhard.

The first French Pleiad. Seven contemporary poets in the sixteenth century, in the reign of Henri III., who wrote French poetry in the metres, style, and verbiage of the ancient Greek and Latin poetry. Of these Ronsard was by far the most talented; but much that would be otherwise excellent is spoilt by pedantry and Frenchified Latin. The seven names are Ronsard, Derat, Du Bellay, Remi-Belleau, Jodelle, Baïf, and Thiard.

The second French Pleiad. Seven contemporary poets in the reign of Louis XIII., very inferior to the "first Pleiad."

Their names are Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupérier, and Petit.

Plein'damour (Sir). An ancient English romance, of which no French version is extant.

Plei'o-saur. (Greek, more of a lizard "than the Plesio-saur, q.v.") A sea-reptile with short neck, large head, and strong teeth, found in the Oxford and Kimmeridge clays of the Upper Oolite period.

Plesio-saur. (Greek, akin to a lizard.) An extinct saurian common in the lias and Kimmeridge clay.

Plét is a lash like a knout, but not knotted, made of raw hides.

Pley'dell (Mr. Paulus). An advocate in Edinburgh, formerly sheriff of Ellangowan.

Mr. Counsellor Pleydell was a lively, sharp-looking gentleman, with a professional shrewdness in his eye, and, generally speaking, a professional formality in his manner; but this he could slip off on a Saturday evening, when....he joined in the ancient rattle of High Jinks.—Sir Walter Scott, "Guy Mannering," xxxix.

Pli'able. A neighbour of Christian's who went with him as far as the Slough of Despond, and then turned back again.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. i.

Pliant (Sir Paul). A foolish, uxorious old knight in Congreve's "Double Dealer."

Pliny. The German Pliny. Konrad von Gesner, of Zurich. (1516-1606.)

Pliny's Doves. In one of the rooms on the upper floor of the museum of the Capitol at Rome are the celebrated Doves of Pliny, one of the finest and most perfectly preserved specimens of ancient mosaic. It represents four doves drinking, with a beautiful border surrounding the composition. The mosaic is formed of natural stones, so small that 160 pieces cover only a square inch. It is supposed to be the work of Sosus, and is described by Pliny as a proof of the perfection to which that art had arrived. He says, "At Pergamos is a wonderful specimen of a dove drinking, and darkening the water with the shadow of her head; on the lip of the vessel are other doves pluming themselves." This exquisite specimen of art was found in Villa Adria'na, in 1737, by cardinal Furietti, from whom it was purchased by Clement XIII.

Plith. A piece of iron made hot and put into an iron box, to be held for punishment by a criminal. (See PLÉT.)

Plon-plon. Prince Napoleon, called Craint-plomb (Fear-bullet) in the Crimean war. Plon-plon is a euphonic corruption of Craint-plomb.

Plotcock. The old Scotch form of the Roman Pluto, by which Satan is meant. Chaucer calls Pluto the "king of Faerie;" and Dunbar names him "Pluto, that elrich incubus."

Plough Monday. The first Monday after Twelfth-day is so called because it is the end of the Christmas holidays, and the day when men return to their plough or daily work. It was customary on this day for farm-labourers to draw a plough from door to door of the parish, and solicit "plough-money" to spend in a frolic. The queen of the banquet was called Bessy. (See DISTAFF.)

Ploughman. The Vision of Piers Ploughman is a satirical poem by William Langland, completed in 1362. The poet supposes himself falling asleep on the Malvern Hills, and in his dream sees various visions of an allegorical character, bearing on the vices of the times. In one of the allegories, the lady Anima (the soul) is placed in a castle Caro (flesh) under the charge of Sir Constable In-wit, and his sons See-well, Hear-well, Work-well, and Go-well. The whole poem consists of nearly 15,000 verses, and is divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus or separate vision.

Plover. To live like a plover. That is, on the wind; on nothing or next to nothing; at a very cheap rate.

You live then upon faith and hope, as the plover does upon wind.—"Heptameron," Nov. 23rd.

Plowden. "The case is altered," quoth Plowden. Plowden was a priest very unpopular, and in order to bring him into trouble some men inveigled him into attending mass performed by a layman, and then impeached him for so doing. Being brought before the tribunal, the cunning priest asked the layman if it was he who officiated. "Yes," said the man. "And are you a priest?" said Plowden. "No," said the man. "Then" said Plowden, turning to the tribunal, "that alters the case, for it is an axiom with the church, 'No priest, no mass.'"

Pluck. To reject a candidate for literary honours because he is not up to the required mark. The rejected candidate is said to be plucked.

When degrees are conferred, the name of each person is read out before he is presented to the Vice-Chancellor. The proctor then walks once up and down the room, and any one who objects to the degree being conferred on any individual may signify his dissent by plucking or twitching the proctor's gown. This is occasionally done by tradesmen to whom the candidate is in debt, but generally all persons likely to be objected to either by tradesmen or examiners know it beforehand, and keep away. They are virtually plucked, but not really so.

A case of pluck. An instance of one who has been plucked; as "Tom Jones is a case of pluck"—i.e., is a plucked man.

A man of pluck. Of courage or spirit. The pluck is the heart, liver, and whatever else is "plucked" away from the chest of a sheep or hog. We also use the expressions bold heart, lily-livered, a man of another kidney, bowels of mercy, a vein of fun, it raised his bile, &c. (See LIVER)

Plum. A plum bed (Devonshire). A soft bed, in which the down lies light.

The dough plums well (Devonshire). Rises well, and will not be heavy.

The cake is nice and plum (Devonshire). Light. (Plump, swelled out.)

He is worth a plum. The Spanish pluma means both plumage and wealth. Hence tiene pluma (he has feathered his nest). We arbitrarily place this desideratum at £100,000, and the man who has realised only £50,000 has got only "half-a-plum."

Plum Puddings on Christmas Day. Emblematical of the offerings of the wise men to the infant Jesus.

Plume. The Algazel or sacred pen, made (according to Mahometan mythology) by deity itself, has eighty nibs, and writes of itself an account of everything that is to transpire in the world; but only the angel Seraphaël can decipher the writing.

Plumper. Every elector represented in Parliament by two members has the power of voting for both candidates at an election. To give a plumper is to vote for only one of the candidates, and not to use the second vote. If the two candidates are of opposite politics, and an elector votes for both, his vote is termed a split vote. (Plump means full, allied to clump and lump.)

Plunder, says Mr. Douce, is pure Dutch, plunderen in that language being the word to express property of any kind. The term was imported into England by those who returned from the wars of the Netherlands.

Plu'ralist. A clergyman who holds a plurality of livings, or more than one benefice.

Plus ultra. The motto in the royal arms of Spain. It was once Ne plus ultra, in allusion to the pillars of Hercules, the ne plus ultra of the world; but after the discovery of America, and when Charles V. inherited the crown of Aragon and Castile, with all the vast American possessions, he struck out ne, and assumed the words plus ultra for the national motto, as much as to say Spain and the plus ultra country.

Plush (John). A gorgeous footman, conspicuous for his plush breeches.

Plu'to. The grave, or the god of that region where the dead go to before they are admitted into Elysium or sent to Tartaros.

Brothers, be of good cheer, this night we shall sup with Pluto—Leonidas to the three hundred Spartans before the battle of Thermopylæ.

Give the untasted portion you have won....

To those who mock you gone to Pluto's reign.

Thomson, "Castle of Indulgence," canto i.

The horses of Pluto. Abas'ter, Ab'atos, Ameth'a, Meth'eos, No'nios, Nycte'a, &c.

Pluton'ic Rocks. Granites, and certain porphyres, supposed to be of igneous, but not of volcanic origin. So called by Lyell from Pluto, the principle of elemental fire.

Plutus. Rich as Plutus. In Greek mythology Plutos is the god of riches.

Plymouth Brethren. A sect that protests against all sectarianism, and advocates the unity of the church; some even go so far as to advocate a community of goods. So called from Plymouth, where they sprang into existence in 1830.

Plymouth Cloak. A good stout cudgel. In the time of the Crusades many men of good family used to land at Plymouth utterly destitute. They went to the neighbouring wood, cut themselves a good stout club, and stopping the first passenger that passed by, provided themselves with money and clothing.—Fuller, "Worthies."

Poav'ola. A child's doll. Florio says it is "a child's babie to play withall."—World of Wordes. (The French poupée, Latin pupa, English puppet, and even babe are of the same family.)

Pocahontas. Daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia, who rescued Captain John Smith when her father's hand was on the point of killing him. She subsequently married John Rolfe, and was baptised under the name of Rebecca. (1595-1617.)

Pocket-Pistol. A dram-flask for the pocket. The pun is on "self-defence." We take the flask in self-defence, because we cannot get a dram on the road.

Po'co, in music, means "rather," as as poco forte, rather loud; poco animato, rather animated.

Poco a poco. Little by little, gradually, as poco a poco crescendo (louder and louder), poco a poco rallentando (slower and slower).

Podgers. Toadies, venerators (real or pretended) of every thing and every one with a name.—John Hollingshead, "The Birthplace of Podgers" (a farce).

Podsnap. A type of the heavy gentry, lumbering and straight-backed as Elizabethan furniture.—Dickens, "Our Mutual Friend."

Podsnap'pery. The etiquette of the old heavy gentry, stiff-starched and extremely proper.

It may not be so in the Gospel according to Podsnap'pery....but it has been the truth since the foundations of the universe were laid.—"Our Mutual Friend."

Poets (poieo, to make, Greek).

Skalds of Scandinavia (etym., scalla, to sing, Swedish, &c.).

Minnesångers of the Holy Empire (Germany), love-singers.

Troubadours of Provence in France (troubar, to invent, in the Provençal dialect).

Trouvères of Normandy (trouver, to invent, in the Walloon dialect).

Bards of Wales (bardgan, a song, Celtic).

Prince of Poets. Edmund Spenser is so called on his monument in Westminster Abbey. (1553-1598.)

Prince of Spanish Poets. Garcilaso de la Vega, frequently so called by Cervantes. (1503-1536.)

Poet of the Poor. Rev. George Crabbe. (1754-1832.)

The Quaker Poet. Bernard Barton. (1784-1849.)

Poets are called "genus irritabilium" (the tetchy race), because they are so easily offended with trifles.

Poets' Corner. A part of the south transept of Westminster Abbey which contains tablets, busts, and monuments to British poets. Here Chaucer and Spenser, Shakespeare and Milton, Dryden and Goldsmith, are duly recognised.

The corner where they put the poets. Poor things! What have they done that they should always be put in a corner?—Douglas Jerrold, "The Heart of God."

Poets Laureate. Chaucer, Seogan, Kaye, Barnard, John Skelton, Edmund Spenser, Daniel, Ben Jonson, Sir William Davenant, Dryden, Shadwell, Nahum Tate, Nicholas Rowe, Eusden, Colly Cibber, William Whitehead, Thomas Warton, Henry J. Pye, Southey, Wordsworth, Tennyson.

Poet Squab. So Rochester calls Dryden, who was very corpulent. (1631-1701.)

Poetical. (See AONIAN.)

Poetical Justice. That ideal justice which poets exercise in making the good happy, and the bad unsuccessful in their evil schemes.

Poetry on the Greek model. (See CHIAERERESCO.)

Father of English Poetry. Geoffrey Chaucer (1328-1400); so called by Dryden. Spenser calls him "the pure well of English undefiled." He was not the first English poet, but was so superior to his predecessors that he laid the foundation of a new era. He is sometimes termed "the day-starre," and Spenser the "sun-rise" of English poetry.

Po'gram. A "creek-shoes," a Puritanical starch mawworm.

Poille. An Apulian horse. The horses of Apulia were very greatly valued at one time. Richard, archbishop of Armagh in the fourteenth century, says of St. Thomas, "Neither the mule of Spain, the coursor of Apulia, the re-pedo of Ethiopia, the elephant of Asia, the camel of Syria, nor the English ass, is bolder or more combative than he."

Therto so heraly, and so quyk of ye,
As if a gentyl Poylets coursor were;
For certes, fro his tayl unto his eere
Nature ne art ne couthe him nought amend.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," line 10,508.

Poins. One of the companions of Sir John Falstaff.—Shakespeare, "1, 2 Henry IV."

Point. Defined by Euclid as "that which hath no parts." Playfair defines it as "that which has position but not magnitude," and Legendre says it "is a limit terminating a line;" but none of these definitions can be called either philosophical or exact. A point is not necessarily a "limit terminating a line," for if so a point could not exist even in imagination without a line, and the expression, "a limit terminating," is apt to suggest Dr. Johnson's definition of a cabbage-net. Besides Legendre's definition presupposes that we know what a line is; but assuredly a "point" precedes a "line," as a line precedes a "superficies." To arrive at Legendre's idea we must begin with a solid, and say a superficies is the "limit terminating each face of a solid," lines are the "limits terminating a superficies," and points are the "limits terminating a line."

In good point. In good condition; every point in exact order. (See Stretch a Point.)

To dine on potatoes and point. To have potatoes without salt, a very meagre dinner indeed. When salt was very dear, and the cellar was empty, parents used to tell their children to point their potato to the salt cellar, and eat it. This was potato and point. In the tale of "Ralph Richards the Miser," we are told that he gave his boy dry bread, and whipped him for pointing it towards the cupboard where a bit of cheese was kept in a bottle.

To stretch a point. To exceed what is strictly right. Points were the tagged laces used in ancient dress; hence to "truss a point," to truss or tie the laces which held the breeches; to "stretch a point" is to stretch these laces, so as to adjust the dress to extra growth, or the temporary fulness of good-feeding. At Whitsuntide these points or tags were given away by the churchwardens.

Their points being broken, down fell their hose,
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," ii. 4.

To stand on points. On punctilios; delicacy of behaviour.

This fellow doth not stand upon points,
Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," v. 1.

Points of the Escutcheon. There are nine points distinguished in heraldry by the first nine letters of the alphabet—three at top, A, B, C; three down the middle, D, E, F; and three at the bottom, G, H, I. The first three are chiefs; the middle three are the collar point, fess point, and nombil or navel point; the bottom three are the base points.

Point-blank. Direct. A term in gunnery; when a cannon is so placed that the line of sight is parallel to the axis and horizontal, the discharge is point-blank, and is supposed to go direct to the object without a curve. In French point blanc is the white mark or bull's-eye of a target, to hit which the ball or arrow must not deviate in the least from the exact path.

Now art thou within point blank of our jurisdiction
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," iv. 7.

Point d'Appui (French). A standpoint; a fulcrum; a position from which you can operate; a pretext to conceal the real intention. Literally the point of support.

The material which gives name to the dish is but the point d'appui for the literary cayenne and curry-powder, by which it is recommended to the palate of the reader.—The Athenæum.

Point de Judas (French). The number 13. The twelve apostles and our Lord made thirteen at the Last Supper.

Point-devise. Punctilious; minutely exact. Holofernès says, "I abhor such insouciant and point-devise companions, such rakers of orthography." (French, point de vise.)

You are rather point-devise in your accountments.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," iii. 2.

Poison. It is said that poisons had no effect on Mithrydates, king of Pontus. This was Mithridates VI., called the Great, who succeeded his father at the age of eleven, and fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes to poisons which might at any moment be administered to him by persons about the court. (See AQUA TOFANA.)

Poison of Khaibar refers to the poisoned leg of mutton of which Mahomet partook while in the citadel of Khaibar. It was poisoned by Zaïnah, a Jewess, and Mahomet felt the effects of the morsel he tasted to the end of his life.

Poisoners (Secret).

(1) Locusta, a woman of ancient Rome, who was employed by the empress Agrippina to poison her husband Claudius. Nero employed the same woman to poison Britannicus and others.

(2) The Borgias (Pope Alexander VI. and his children, Caesar and Lucrezia) were noted poisoners.

(3) Hieronyma Spara and Toffania, of Italy. (See AQUA TOFANA.)

(4) Marquise de Brinvilliers, a young profligate Frenchwoman, taught the art by an officer named Sainte Croix, who learnt it in Italy. (See "World of Wonders," part vii., p. 203.)

(5) Lavoisin and Lavigoreux, French midwives and fortune-tellers.

In English history we have a few instances: g.e.—Sir Thomas Overbury was so murdered by viscount Rochester and his wife. James VI. was probably a victim to similar poisoning, by Villiers, duke of Buckingham.

Poisson d'Avril. An April fool. The poisson d'Avril is the mackerel, and we have the expression "You silly mackerel," and silly indeed are those who allow themselves to be caught by the palpable jokes engendered on the 1st of April. Both the French and English employ the word gudgeon as a synonym for "dupe" or simpleton.

Another suggestion may be made: In "Halliwell's Archaic Dictionary" we have the word possore, to drive about, whence the old word possed, pushed about, from the French pousser (to push); a poussin is a chicken that pushes itself through its shell. An "April posson" would be one driven from pillar to post, or pushed about from one person to another.

Poke. (See PIG.)

To poke fun at one is to make one a laughing-stock. The allusion is to poking wild beasts for the amusement of spectators.

At table he was hospitable and jocose, always poking good-natured fun at Luke.—E. Lynn Linton, "Lizzie Lorton of Greygigg," ch. xii.

Pokers. The 'squire Bedels who carry a silver mace or poker before the Vice-Chancellor are so called at Cambridge.

Poker-Pictures. Drawings executed by the point of a hot poker or "heater" of an Italian iron. By charring different parts more or less, various tints are obtained.

Pokership. The office of a porcarius, or keeper of hogs in a forest.

Polack. An inhabitant of Poland. (French, Polaque.)

So frowned he once, when, in angry parle,
He mote the sleeted Polacks on the ice,
Shakespeare, "Hamlet," i. 1.

Polarisation of Light is the absorption of those rays which are at right angles to the rays preserved: Thus A B α is one ray in which A is reflected to B, and B to A; C D is a ray, in which C is reflected to D, and D to C. In E G F H, if the light is polarised, either E F or G H is absorbed. A B and C D are the poles of light, or the directions in which the rays are reflected.

Pole. Under bare poles. Said of a ship when all her sails are furled.

Po'leas (2 syl.). The labouring class of India.

Po'leas the labouring lower clans are named.
By the proud Nayres the noble rank is claimed.

Polinesso (in "Orlando Furioso"). Duke of Albany, who falsely accused Genevra of incontinency, and was slain in single combat by Ariodantès.

Polish off. To finish out of hand. In allusion to articles polished.

I'll polish him off in no time, means I'll set him down, I'll give him a drubbing.

To polish off a meal is to eat it quickly, and not keep any one waiting.

Political Economy. This term was invented by François Quesnay, the French physician. (1694-1774.)

Polix'ene (3 syl.). The name assumed by Madelon in Molière's "Précieuses Ridicules."

Polix'enes (4 syl.), king of Bohemia, being invited to Sicily by king Leontes, excites unwittingly the jealousy of his friend, because he prolongs his stay at the entreaty of queen Hermionè. Leontes orders Camillo to poison the royal guest, but instead of doing so Camillo flees with him to Bohemia. In time, Florizel, the son and heir of Polixenes, falls in love with Perdita, the lost daughter of Leontes. Polixenes forbids the match, and the young lovers under the charge of Camillo flee to Sicily. Polixenes follows the fugitives, the mystery of Perdita is cleared up, the lovers are married, and the two kings resume their friendship.—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale."

Poll. To go out in the poll. To take an ordinary degree—a degree without university "honours."

Poll Degree. (See above.)

Poll Men. Those of the "Oi Polloi." (See above.)

Pollentè. The puissant Saracen, father of Mu'nera. He took his station on "bridge Perilous," and attacked every one who crossed it, bestowing the spoil upon his daughter. Sir Artegaal slew the monster. Pollentè is meant for Charles IX. of France, sadly notorious for the slaughter of Protestants on St. Bartholomew's day.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," book v. 2.

Pollio, to whom Virgil addresses his fourth Eclogue, and to whom he ascribes the remarkable advent of the "golden age," was the founder of the first public library of Rome. (B.C. 76—A.D. 4.)

Pollux. The horses of Castor and Pollux. Cyll'aros and Har'pagos. Soneca and Claudian give Cyllaros to Castor, but Virgil (Georgic iii.) to Pollux. The two brothers mount it alternately on their return from the infernal regions. Har'pagos, the horse from Harpa'gium in Phrygia, was common to both brothers.

Polly. Mary. The change of M for P in pet names is by no means rare; g.e.—

Margaret. Maggie or Meggy, becomes Peggy, and Pegg or Peg.

Martha. Matty becomes Patty.

Mary. Molly becomes Polly or Poll.

Here we see another change by no means unusual—that of r into l or ll. Similarly Sarah becomes Sally; Dorothea, Dora, becomes Dolly; Harry, Hal.

Polo'nus. An old courtier, garrulous, conceited, and politic. He was father of Ophe'lia, and lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Polo'ny. A vulgar corruption of Bolo'gna sausage.

Polt-foot. A club-foot. Ben Jonson calls Vulcan, who was lame, the "polt-footed philosopher." (Swedish, bult, a club; bulta, to beat; our bolt.)

Poltron. A bird of prey, with the talons of the hind-toes cut off to prevent its flying at game. (Latin, pollicē truncato, deprived of its toe or thumb.)

Poltron'. A coward. Menage derives it from the Italian poltro, a bed, because cowards feign themselves sick a-bed in times of war. Saumaise says it means "maimed of the thumb," because in times of conscription those who had no stomach for the field disqualified themselves by cutting off their right thumb. More probably a poltroon is a hawk that will not or cannot fly at game. (See above.)

Polycle'tus. A statuary of Sic'yon who deduced a canon of the proportions of the several parts of the human body, and made a statue of a Persian body-guard, which was admitted by all to be a model of the human form, and was called "The Rule" (standard).

Polycrat'icon, in eight books, by John of Salisbury. This is his chief work, and is an exposé of the frivolities of courtiers and philosophers. It is learned, judicious, and very satirical. (He died 1182.)

Polyd'amas. A Grecian athlete of immense size and strength. He killed a fierce lion without any weapon, stopped a chariot in full career, lifted a mad bull, and died at last in attempting to stop a falling rock. (See MIL.)

Polydore (3 syl.). The name assumed by Guidé'rius, in Shakespeare's "Cymbeline."

Polyph'e'me (3 syl.). One of the Cyclops, who lived in Sicily. He was an enormous giant, with only one eye, and that in the middle of his forehead. When Ulysses landed on the island, this monster made him and twelve of his crew captives; six of them he ate, and then Ulysses contrived to blind him, and make good his escape with the rest of the crew. Polypheme was most passionately in love with Galat'e'a, a sea-nymph; but Galat'e'a had set her heart on the shepherd Acis, whom Polypheme in a fit of jealousy crushed beneath a rock.

Poma'tum. So called because it was originally made by macerating over-ripe apples in grease.—Dr. John Quincy, "Lexicon Physico-Medicum" (1723).

Pommard (French). Beer. This is a pun on the word pomme. The Normans called cider pommé; whence pomat, a sort of beer.

Ils tiennent leurs chaloupes....bien pourvues ou garnies de pain, de vin, de pomat, d'cidre, ou d'autre boisson....—Cleirac, "Les Us et Coutumes de la Mer," p. 127.

Pommel. The pommel of a saddle is the apple of it, called by the French pommeau. The Spaniards use the expression pomo del la spada (the pommel of a hilt). To "pommel a person" is to beat him with the pommel of your sword. The ball used as an ornament on pointed roofs is termed a pomel. (Latin, pomum, an apple.)

Pomo'na. Fruit; goddess of fruits and fruit trees—one of the Roman divinities. (Latin, pomum.)

Bade the wide fabric unimpaired sustain
Pomo'na's store, and cheese and golden grain.
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Pom'padour, as a colour, is claret purple. The 56th Foot is called the Pompadours, from the purple facings of their regimental uniforms. There is an old song supposed to be an elegy on John Broadwood, a Quaker, which introduces the word:—

Sometimes he wore an old brown coat,
Sometimes a pompadore;
Sometimes 'twas buttoned up behind,
And sometimes down before.

Pompey's Pillar, in Alexandria. A pillar erected by Publius, prefect of Egypt, in honour of the emperor Diocletian, to record the conquest of Alexandria in 296. It has about as much right to be called Pompey's pillar as the obelisk of Heliop'olis, re-erected by Ram'es II. at Alexandria, has to be called Cleopatra's Needle, or Gibraltar Rock a pillar of Her'culës.

Pompil'ia. The bride of Count Guido Franceschi'ni, who is brutally treated by him, but makes her escape under the protection of a young priest. She subsequently gives birth to a son, but is stabbed to death by her husband.—Robert Browning, "The Ring and the Book." (See RING.)

Pon-Gyees (Great glory). The monastic fraternity of Burmah.

Pongo. The terrible monster of Sicily. A cross between a "land-tiger and sea-shark." He devoured five hundred Sicilians, and left the island for twenty miles round without inhabitant. This amphibious monster was slain by the three sons of St. George.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," iii. 2.

Ponocratēs (4 syl.). Gargantua's tutor, in the romance of "Pantagruel and Gargantua," by Rabelais.

Pons Asinorum. The Fifth Proposition, Book I. of Euclid—the first difficult theorem, which dunces rarely get over for the first time without stumbling.

Pontefract Cakes. Liquorice lozenges impressed with a castle; so called from being made at Pontefract.

Pontiff means one who has charge of the bridges. Varro says it was because a priest built the Sulpician bridge that the Roman pontiffs were so called. (Latin, pons facio.)

Well has the name of Pontifex been given
Unto the church's head, as the chief builder
And architect of the invisible bridge
That leads from earth to heaven.

Longfellow, "Golden Legend," v.

Pontius Pilate's Body-Guard. The 1st Foot Regiment. When called Le Regiment de Douglas, and in the French service, they had a dispute with the Picardy regiment about the antiquity of their respective corps. The Picardy officers declared they were on duty on the night of the Crucifixion, when the colonel of the 1st Foot replied, "If we had been on guard, we should not have slept at our posts."

Pony. Twenty-five pounds. A sporting term. (See POONA.)

Pony in Vingt-et-Un. The person on the right-hand of the dealer, whose duty it is to collect the cards for the dealer. So called from the Latin ponē, "behind," being behind the dealer.

Poona. A sovereign. Lingua Franca for pound.

Poor. Poor as Job. The allusion is to Job who was by Satan deprived of everything he possessed.

Poor as Lazarus. This is the beggar Lazarus, full of sores, who was laid at the rich man's gate, and desired to be fed from the crumbs that fell from Divès' table (Luke xvi. 19-31).

Poor as a church mouse. The allusion in this phrase is to the absence in a church of any cupboard or pantry, where mice most do congregate.

There are none poor but those whom God hates. This does not mean that poverty is a punishment, but that the only poverty worthy of the name is poverty of God's grace. In this sense Divès may be the poor man, and Lazarus the beggar abounding in that "blessing of the Lord which maketh rich."

Poor Man. The blade-bone of a shoulder of mutton, so called in Scotland. In some parts of England it is termed a "poor knight of Windsor," because it holds the same relation to Sir Loin as a Windsor knight does to a baronet. Sir Walter Scott tells of a Scotch laird who, being asked by an English landlord what he would have for dinner, produced the utmost consternation by saying, "I think I could relish a morsel of a poor man." (See "Bride of Lammermoor," ch. xix.)

Poor Richard. The assumed name of Benjamin Franklin in a series of almanacks from 1732 to 1757. These almanacks contain maxims and precepts on temperance, economy, cleanliness, chastity, and other homely virtues, and to several of the maxims are added the words, "as poor Richard says." Nearly a century before Robert Herrick had brought out a series of almanacks under the name of "Poor Robin's Almanack."

Pop. To pop the question. To propose or make an offer of marriage. As this important demand is supposed to be unexpected, the question is said to be popped. (Dutch, poep, to dart suddenly.)

Pope, the translator of "Homer," lived at Twickenham. (1688-1744.)

For though not sweeter his own Homer sings,
Yet is his life the more endearing song.
Thomson, "Summer."

Pope. The pope changing his name. According to Platinus, Sergius II. was the first pope who changed his name on ascending the papal chair. His proper name was Hogs-mouth. Chambers says his name was "Peter di Porca," and it was the name Peter he changed, out of deference to St. Peter, thinking it to be arrogant to style himself Peter II.

I know no more about it than the pope of Rome—than a man living as far off as the cham of Tartary or pope of Rome.

The pope's slave. So cardinal Cajetan calls the Church. (16th cent.)

Pope-figland. An island inhabited by the Gaillardets (French, gaillard, gay people), rich and free, till they were subjected to the Papimans, when they were reduced to a state of great wretchedness. Rabelais probably refers to the kingdom of Navarre, once Protestant, but in 1512 subjected to Ferdinand the Catholic. He says the Gaillardets, being shown one day the pope's image, exclaimed, "A fig for the pope!" whereupon the whole island was put to the sword. Its name was then changed to Pope-figland, and the people were called Pope-figs. All the reform countries are Pope-figlands, and their people Pope-figs.

Pope Joan. Said to have succeeded Leo IV. Gibbon says, "Two Protestants, Blondel and Bayle, annihilated her;" but Mosheim seems half inclined to believe there was such a person. The vulgar tale is that Joan conceived a violent passion for the monk Folda, and in order to get admission to him assumed the monastic habit. Being clever and popular, she got to be elected pope.

Popish Plot. A plot in the reign of Charles II. to massacre the Protestants, burn London, and assassinate the king. Titus Oates invented this "wise" scheme, and obtained great wealth by revealing it; but ultimately he was pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned.

Popinjay. A butterfly man, a fop; so called from the popinjay or figure of a bird shot at for practice. The jay was decked with parti-coloured feathers so as to resemble a parrot, and being suspended on a pole, served as a target. He whose ball or arrow brought down the bird by cutting the string by which it was hung, received the proud title of "Captain Popinjay," or "Captain of the Popinjay," for the rest of the day, and was escorted home in triumph. (See "Old Mortality," ch. ii.)

I then, all smarting with my wounds being cold,
To be so pestered with a popinjay,
Answered neglectingly I know not what,
He should or he should not.

Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," i. 3.

Poplar. The white poplar was consecrated to Her'culés, because he destroyed Ka'kos in a cavern of mount Aventine, which was covered with poplars. In the moment of triumph the hero plucked a branch from one of the trees, and bound it round his head. When he descended to the infernal regions, the heat caused a profuse perspiration which blanched the under surface of the leaves, while the smoke of the eternal flames blackened the upper surface. Hence the Herculean poplar has its leaves black on one side and white on the other.

Porcelain (3 syl.), from porcellana, "a little pig." So called by the Portuguese traders, from its resemblance to cowrie-shells, the shape of which is not unlike a pig's back. The Chinese earthenware being white and glossy like the inside of the shells, suggested the application of the name. (See Marryatt's "History of Pottery and Porcelain.")

Porch (The). A philosophic sect, generally called Stoics (Greek, stoa, a porch), because Zeno, the founder, gave his lectures in the Athenian picture gallery, called the porch Pœcilië.

The successors of Socrætes formed societies which lasted several centuries: the Academy the Porch, the Garden.—"Professor Seeley, "Ecce Homo."

Porcupine. (See PETER.)

Porcus. The Latins call me "porcus." A sly reproof to any one boasting, showing off, or trying to make himself appear greater than he is. The fable says that a wolf was going to devour a pig, when the pig observed that it was Friday, and no good Catholic would eat meat on a Friday. Going on together, the wolf said to the pig, "They seem to call you by many names." "Yes," said the pig; "I am called swine, grunter, hog, and I know not what besides. The Latins call me porcus." "Porpus, do they?" said the wolf, making an intentional blunder. "Well, porpoise is a fish, and we may eat fish on a Friday." So saying, he devoured him without another word.

Porcus Litera'rum. A literary glutton, one who devours books without regard to quality.

Pork! Pork! Sylvester, in his translation of Du Bartas, gives this instead of Caw, caw, as the cry of the raven.

Pork. Sir Thomas Browne says that the Jews abstain from pork not from fear of leprosy, as Tacitus alleges, but because the swine is an emblem of impurity.—“Vulgar Errors.”

Pork, Pig. The former is Norman-French, the latter Saxon.

Pork, I think, is good Norman-French: and so, when the brute lives and is in charge of a Saxon slave, she goes by her Saxon name; but becomes a Norman, and is called pork, when she is carried to the castle-hall.—Sir Walter Scott, “Ivanhoe.”

Porridge. Like the madman in Bedlam, most of my food tastes of oatmeal porridge (Sir Walter Scott). The allusion is to a madman in the Edinburgh Infirmary who was fed on oatmeal porridge, but believed he had every day at dinner a splendid banquet; “yet,” said the man, “somehow or other, everything that I eat tastes of porridge.”

Port, meaning larboard or left side, is an abbreviation of Porta la timonē (carry the helm). Porting arms is carrying them on the left hand.

“To heel to port” is to lean on the left side (Saxon, hyldan, to incline). “To lurch to port” is to leap or roll over on the left side (Welsh, llician).

She gave a heel and then a lurch to port,
And, going down head-foremost, sunk in short.
Byron, “Don Juan.”

Port. An air of music. Hence Tytler says, “I have never been able to meet with any of the ports here referred to” (“Dissertation on Scotch Music”). The word is Gaelic.

Port-royal Society. In 1637, Le Maître, a celebrated advocate, resigned the honour of being Conseiller d'Etat, and with his brother De Sericourt consecrated himself to the service of religion. The two brothers retired to a small house near the Port Royal of Paris, where in time they were joined by their three other brothers—De Sacy, De St. Elme, and De Valmont. Afterwards, being obliged to remove, they fixed their residence a short distance from the city, and called it Port Royal des Champs. These illustrious recluses were subsequently joined by other distinguished persons, and the community was called the Society of Port Royal.

Port Wine. Lord Pembroke's port wine. This renowned wine is thus made—

27 cullons of rough cider,	} To make a hogshead of port.
13 gallons of Bone Carlo wine,
3 gallons of brandy.

Porte (The) or The Sublime Porte. The Ottoman empire. In the Byzantine empire, the gates of the palace were the place of assembly for judicial and legal administration. The word sublime is French for “lofty,” and the term was adopted naturally, as French has long been the language of diplomacy. The Scripture frequently speaks of the judicial office of the gate.

The government is to blame for not having done all in its power, like the Porte.—The Times.

Porteus Riot. This notorious tumult took place at Edinburgh, in September, 1736. Porteus was captain of the city guard. At the examination of a criminal named Wilson, Captain Porteus, fearing a rescue, ordered the guards to fire on the mob, which had become tumultuous; in this discharge six persons were killed, and eleven wounded. Porteus was tried for this attack and condemned to death, but reprieved. The mob, at his reprieve, burst into the jail where he was confined, and dragging him to the Grass market (the usual place of execution), hanged him by torchlight on a dyer's pole.

Port'ia. A rich heiress in “The Merchant of Venice,” in love with Bassanio. Her father had ordained that three caskets should be offered to all who sought her hand—one of gold, one of silver, and one of lead—with this proviso: he only who selected the casket which contained the portrait of the lady should possess her hand and fortune.—Shakespeare.

Portland Stone. So called from the island of Portland, where it is quarried. It hardens by exposure to the atmosphere. Saint Paul's cathedral and Somerset House (London) are built of this stone.

Portland Vase. A cinerary urn of transparent dark-blue glass, long in possession of the Barberini family. In 1770 it was purchased by Sir William Hamilton, for 1,000 guineas, and came afterwards into the possession of the duchess of Portland. In 1810, the duke of Portland, one of the trustees of the British Museum, allowed it to be placed in that institution for exhibition. William Lloyd, in 1845, dashed it to pieces; it has since been carefully repaired, but is not now shown to the public. It is ten inches high, and six in diameter at the broadest part.

Porto-bello Arms. A public-house sign. The Mirror says: "In 1739, after the capture of Portobello, admiral Vernon's portrait dangled from every sign-post, and he may figuratively be said to have sold the ale, beer, porter, and purl of England for six years." The Portobello Arms is a mere substitution for the admiral.

Portsmouth, according to the famous Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, was so called from a man named Port.

Hér côm Port on Bretene, and his ii suna...mid ii scipum [ships] [at a place called] Pórtas-mutha...&c.

Portso'ken Ward (London). The soken or franchise at the port or gate. It was formerly a guild called the "English Knighten Guild," because it was given by king Edgar to thirteen knights for services done by them. (See KNIGHTEN-GUILD.)

Portugal is Portus Callë, a corruption of Portus Galliaë.

Portugue'se (3 syl.). A native of Portugal, the language of Portugal, pertaining to Portugal, &c.; as Camoëns was a Portuguese, and wrote in Portuguese.

Po'ser. The bishop's examining chaplain; the examiner at Eton for the King's College fellowship. (Welsh, posiaw, to interrogate; French, poser; Latin, pono.) Hence, a puzzling question.

Possë. A whole posse of men. A large number; a crowd. (See below.)

Possë Comita'tus. (Latin, power of the county.) The whole force of the county—that is, all the male members of a county over fifteen, who may be summoned by a sheriff to assist in preventing a riot, the rescue of prisoners, or other unlawful disorders. Clergymen, peers, and the infirm are exempt.

Posset properly means a drink taken before going to bed; it was milk curdled with wine. (Latin, posca, a drink made with vinegar and water.)

In his morning's draught....his concerves or cates....and when he goeth to bedde his posset smoaking hot.—"Man in the Moone" (1600).

Post means placed (Latin, positus).

Post. A piece of timber placed in the ground.

A military post. A station where a man is placed, with instructions not to quit it without orders.

An official post is where a man is placed in office.

To post accounts is to place them under certain heads in methodical order.—Trench.

Post haste. Travelling by relays of horses, or where horses are placed on the road to expedite the journey.

Post office. An office where letters are placed.

Post paper. So called from its watermark, a post-horn, employed as early as 1730.

To run your head against a post. To go to work heedlessly and stupidly, or as if you had no eyes.

Post Facto (Latin). After the act has been committed. A post facto law is a retrospective one.

Post Meridian (Latin). After noon.

"Twas post-meridian half-past four,
By signal I from Nancy par ed
Dibden, "Sea Songs."

Post Mortem (Latin). After death; as a post mortem examination for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of death.

Post Obit. An agreement to pay for a loan a larger sum of money, together with interest at death. (Latin, post obitum, after death.)

Poste Restante (French). To remain at the post till called for. In the British post-office letters so addressed are kept one month, and then returned to the writer.

Posted. Well posted up in the subject (American). Thoroughly informed. The metaphor is to posting up accounts, whereby the eye can see at a glance the pros and cons.

Posteriori. An argument a posteriori is one from effects to cause. Thus, to prove the existence of God a posteriori, we take the works of creation and show how they manifest power, wisdom, goodness, and so on, and then we claim the inference that the maker of these things is powerful, wise, and good. Robinson Crusoe found the foot-prints of a man on the sand, and inferred that there must be a man on the island besides himself. (See PRIORI.)

Post'humus (Le'onat'us). Husband of Imo'gen. Under the erroneous persuasion of his wife's infidelity he plots her death, but his plot miscarries.—Shakespeare, "Cymbeline."

Posting-Bills. Before the Great Fire the space for foot-passengers in London was defended by rails and posts; the latter served for theatrical placards and general announcements, which were therefore called posters or posting-bills.

Posy properly means a copy of verses presented with a bouquet. It now means the verses without the flowers, as the "posy of a ring," or the flowers without the verses, as a "pretty posy." A contraction of poesy.

Pct. This word, like "father," "mother," "daughter," &c., is common to the whole Aryan family. Greek, potēr, a drinking-vessel; Latin, potaculum—i.e., potaculum; Irish and Swedish, potá; French, Welsh, German, Dutch, English, &c., pot; Icelandic, potte, &c.

Gone to pot. Ruined, gone to the bad. The allusion is to the pot into which refuse metal is cast to be remelted, or to be discarded as waste. There is a current story about a tailor of Samarcand, who lived near the gate of the city on the road leading to the cemetery. It is said that this knight of the shears had outside his cottage an earthen pot, into which he dropped a pebble for every corpse that passed by, and at the end of each moon counted the number. At length the tailor himself died, and when a stranger asked the neighbours of the eccentric registrar, they replied, "Poor fellow, he now is gone to pot also."

Now and then a farm went to pot.—Dr. Arbuthnot.

The pot calls the kettle black. This is said of a person who accuses another of faults committed by himself. The French say The shovel mocks the poker (La pelle se moque du fourgon).

To betray the pot to the roses. To unravel and blab a mystery, to find out something supposed to be unknown and talk of it. French, decouvrir le pot aux roses.

Brazen and earthen pots. Gentlemen and artisans, rich and poor, men of mark and those unstamped. From the fable of the "Brazen and Earthen Pots."

Brazen and earthen pots float together in juxtaposition down the stream of life.—Pull Mall Gazette.

Pot-Luck. Come and take pot-luck with me. Come and take a family dinner at my house. The French pot au feu is the ordinary dinner of those who dine at home.

Pot Paper. A Dutch paper; so called from the water-mark, a

Pot-Pourri (French). A mixture of flowers and perfumes preserved in a vase. Also a hotch-potch or olla podrida. In music, a medley of favourite tunes strung together. (See PASTICCIO.)

Pot Valiant. Made courageous by liquor.

Pot-de-Bière. French slang for an Englishman.

Potage (Jean). The Jack Pudding of the French stage; very like the German "Hanswurst," the Dutch "Pickelherringe," and the Italian "Macaro'ni."

Pota'to-Talk (German, Kartoffel gesprach). That chit-chat common in Germany at the five o'clock tea-drinkings, when neighbours of the "gentler sex" take their work to the house of muster, and talk chiefly of the dainties of the table, their ingredients, admixture, and the methods of cooking them.

Poteen (pron. po-cheen). Whiskey that has not paid duty (Irish).

Come and taste some good poteen
That has not paid a rap to the Queen.

Pother or Bother. Mr. Garnett states this to be a Celtic word, and says it often occurs in the Irish translations of the Bible, in the sense of to be grieved or troubled in mind.

Pothooks. The 77th Foot; so called because the two sevens resemble two pothooks.

Pot'iphar's Wife. According to the Koran her name was Zuleika, but some Arabian writers call her Rail.

Potter. To go poking about, meddling and making, in a listless, purposeless manner. Pudder, podder, pother, bother, and puddle are varieties of the same word. To pudder is to stir with a puddering pole; hence, to confuse. Lear says of the tempest, "May the great gods that keep this dreadful pudder o'er our heads," meaning confusion. To puddle iron is to stir it about with a puddering-pole.

Potwallopers, before the passing of the Reform Bill, were those who claimed a vote because they had boiled their own pot in the parish for six months. (Saxon, wealan, to boil; Dutch, opwatten; our wallop.)

Poult, a young turkey. Pullet, a young chicken. (Latin, pullus, the young of any animal; whence poultry, young domestic fowls; jilly, a young horse; foal; French, poule; Italian, pollo &c.)

Pounce (Peter), in Fielding's novel of "Joseph Andrews."

Pound. The unit of weight (Latin, pondus, weight); also cash to the value of twenty shillings sterling, because in the Carolingian period, the Roman pound (twelve ounces) of pure silver was coined into 240 silver pennies. The symbols £ and lb. are for libra, the Latin for a pound. (See PENNY for POUND.)

Pound of Flesh. The whole bargain, the exact terms of the agreement, the bond literatim et verbatim. The allusion is to Shylock, in "The Merchant of Venice," who bargained with Antonio for a "pound of flesh," but was foiled in his suit by Portia, who said the bond was expressly a pound of flesh, and therefore (1) the Jew must cut the exact quantity, neither more nor less than a just pound; and (2) in so doing he must not shed a drop of blood.

Poundtext (Peter). An "indulged pastor" with the Covenanters' army.—Sir Walter Scott, "Old Mortality."

Poura'ni. Meat cooked in a peculiar manner; so called from Pouran Dokht, the daughter of Khosru Parviz, king of Persia.

Pourceaugnac, Monsieur de (pron. Poor-sone-yak). A pompous country gentleman who comes to Paris to marry Julie; but the lady has a lover of her own choice, and Monsieur is so mystified and played upon by Julie and her ami du cœur that he relinquishes his suit in despair.—Molière, "Pourceaugnac."

Poussin. The British Poussin. Richard Cooper, painter and engraver—well known for his "Views of Windsor." (* -1806.)

Gaspar Poussin. So Gaspar Dughet, the French painter, is called. (1613-1675.)

Pouting. The pouting place of princes. Leicester Square is so called by Pennant, because George II., when prince of Wales, having quarrelled with his father, retired to Leicester House; and his son Frederick, prince of Wales, did the same, for the very same reason.

Powder. I'll powder your jacket for you. A corruption of poudrer, to dust. (See DUST.)

Lo! in powder [dust] ye shall slope,
For out of powder fyrst ye came.
Quoted by Halliwell under "Poudre."

Poyning's Law or Statute of Drogheda. An Act of Parliament made in Ireland in 1495 (10 Henry VII., c. 22), declaring all general statutes hitherto made in England to be in force in Ireland also. It received its name from Sir Edward Poyning, Lieutenant of Ireland at the time.

P.P. Clerk of this Parish. The name given to a volume of memoirs, written by Dr. Arbuthnot, as a satire on Bishop Burnet's "Own Times."

Præmonstraten'sian Monks. (See PREMONSTRATENSIAN.)

Præmuni'rë. A barbarous word from the Latin præmoneri (to be forewarned). The words of the writ begin "præmunire facias A. B."—i.e., Cause A. B. to be forewarned, to appear before us to answer the contempt wherewith he stands charged. If A. B. refuses to do so he loses all civil rights, and before the reign of Elizabeth might have been slain by any one with impunity.

Pragmatic Sanction. Sanctio in Latin means a "decree or ordinance with a penalty attached," or, in other words, a "penal statute." Pragmaticus means "relating to state affairs," so that Pragmatic Sanction is a penal statute bearing on some important question of state. The term was first applied by the Romans to those statutes which related to their provinces. The French appropriated the phrase to certain statutes which limited the jurisdiction of the pope; but generally it is applied to an ordinance fixing the succession in a certain line.

Pragmatic Sanction of Charles VII. (of France), 1438, defining and limiting the power of the pope in France. By this ordinance the authority of a general council was declared superior to the dictum of the pope; the clergy were forbidden to appeal to Rome on any point affecting the secular condition of the nation; and the Roman pontiff was forbidden to appropriate a vacant benefice, or to appoint either bishop or parish priest.

Pragmatic Sanction of St. Louis (1268) forbade the court of Rome to levy taxes or collect subscriptions in France without the express sanction of the king. It also gave plaintiffs in the ecclesiastical courts the right to appeal to the civil courts. The "Constitutions of Clarendon" were to England what the "Pragmatic Sanction" was to France.

Pragmatic Sanction of Germany, 1439, whereby the succession of the empire was made hereditary in the house of Austria. In 1713 the emperor Charles VI. published another to settle the succession upon the daughter of Maria There'sa.

Pragmatic Sanction of Naples, 1759, whereby Carlos II. of Spain ceded the succession to his third son in perpetuity.

Prasil'do. A nobleman of Babylon, who fell in love with Iroldo's wife. The husband quitted Babylon for ever, and resigned his wife to his friend.—Bojardo, "Orlando Inamorato."

Prating Sophists. The doctors of the Sorbonne were so called by Budæus of Paris. (1467-1540.)

Praying-wheels. It is said that the Buddhists pray by machinery; that they put prayers into a wheel, and unroll them by the length. This notion arises from a misconception. Saky'a-muni, the Buddha, is said to have "turned the wheel of the law"—i.e., to have preached Buddhism incessantly—we should say as a horse in a mill.

Pre-Ad'amites. Before Adam was created. Isaac de la Peyreri maintained that only the Jews are descended from Adam, and that the Gentiles are descended from a race of men existing before Adam; as, however, the book of Genesis is the history of the Jews only, it does not concern itself with the Gentile race. (1655.)

Pre-Raphaelites. A term introduced by Hunt and his friends, who wished to intimate that they preferred the simplicity and truthfulness of the painters who preceded Raphael. The term now signifies a very minute imitation of nature, brilliant colouring, and not much shadow.

Preacher (The). Solomon, being the author of Ecclesiastes (the Preacher).

The Glorious Preacher. Saint John Chrysostom. (347-407.)

The King of Preachers. Louis Bourdaloue. (1632-1704.)

The Little Preacher. Samuel de Marets, Protestant controversialist. (1599-1663.)

Prebend, meaning a "clergyman attached to a prebendal stall," is a vulgarism. The prebend is the stipend given out of the revenues of the college or cathedral; he who enjoys the prebend is the prebendary. (Latin, præbeo, to give.)

Preca'rious is what depends on our prayers or requests. A precarious tenure is one that depends solely on the will of the owner to concede to our prayer; hence uncertain, not to be depended on. (Latin, precor.)

Preceptor. The superior of a preceptory was called by the Templars a Knight Preceptor; a "Grand Preceptor" was the head of all the preceptories, or houses of the Knights Templars, in an entire province, the three of highest rank being the Grand Preceptors of Jerusalem, Tripolis, and Antioch. Houses of these knights which were not preceptories were called commanderies.

Précieuses Ridicules (in Molière's comedy so called). Aminte and Polixene, who assume the airs of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, a coterie of savants of both sexes in the seventeenth century. The members of this society were termed précieuses—i.e., "persons of distinguished merit"—and the "précieuses ridicules" means a ridiculous apeing of their ways and manners.

Precio'sa. The heroine of Longfellow's "Spanish Student," threatened with the vengeance of the Inquisition.

Precious Stones. Each month, according to the Poles, is under the influence of a precious stone:—

January ..	Garnet ..	Constancy.
February ..	Amethyst ..	Sincerity.
March ..	Bloodstone ..	Courage.
April ..	Diamond ..	Innocence.

May ..	Emerald ..	Success in love.
June ..	Agate ..	Health and long life.
July ..	Cornelian ..	Content.
August ..	Sarlonyx ..	Conjugal felicity.
September ..	Chrysolite ..	Antidote to madness.
October ..	Opal ..	Hope.
November ..	Topaz ..	Fidelity.
December ..	Turquoise ..	Prosperity.

(2) In relation to the signs of the Zodiac:—

Aries ..	Ruby.	Libra ..	Jacinth.
Taurus ..	Topaz.	Scorpio ..	Agate.
Gemini ..	Carbuncle.	Sagittarius ..	Ametyst.
Cancer ..	Emerald.	Capricornus ..	Beryl.
Leo ..	Sapphire.	Aquarius ..	Onyx.
Virgo ..	Diamond.	Pisces ..	Jasper.

(3) In relation to the planets:—

Saturn ..	Turquoise ..	Lead.
Jupiter ..	Cornelian ..	Tin.
Mars ..	Emerald ..	Iron.
Sun ..	Diamond ..	Gold.
Venus ..	Ametyst ..	Copper.
Mercury ..	Leadstone ..	Quicksilver.
Moon ..	Crystal ..	Silver.

Precocious means ripened by the sun before it has attained its full growth; premature; a development of mind or body beyond one's age. (Latin, præcūquo.)

Many precocious trees, and such as have their spring in winter, may be found.—Brown.

Prelate means simply a man preferred, a man promoted to an ecclesiastical office which gives him jurisdiction over other clergymen. Cardinals, bishops, abbots, and archdeacons were at one time so called, but the term is restricted in the Protestant church to bishops. (Latin, præferro prælatus.)

Premonstratensian or Norbertine Order. Founded in the twelfth century by St. Norbert, who obtained permission, in 1120, to found a cloister in the diocese of Laon, in France. A spot was pointed out to him in a vision, and he termed the spot Præ Montre or Pratum Monstratum (the meadow pointed out). The order might be called the reformed Augustine, or the White canons of the rule of St. Augustine.

Prendre. Prendre un rat par la queue. To pick a pocket. This proverb is very old—it was popular in the reign of Louis XIII. Rata is an old German word for a purse or pocket, similar to the Italian retino, our reticule.

Prepense (2 syl.). Malice prepense is malice designed or before deliberated. (Latin, præpensus.)

Preposterous means "the cart before the horse." (Latin, præposterus, the first last, and the last first.)

Presbyterian. (See BLUE.)

Presents. Know all men by these presents—i.e., by the writings or documents now present. (Latin, per presentes, by the [writings] present.)

Preserver (Soter). Ptolemy I. of Egypt was called Soter by the Rhodians, because he compelled Deme'trios to raise the siege of Rhodes. (B.C. 367, 323-285.)

Press-money and Press-men do not mean money given to impress men into the service, and men so impressed; but ready money, and men ready for service. When a recruit has received the money, he binds himself to be ready for service whenever his attendance is required. Similarly a press-gang is a gang to get ready men. (Old French prest, now prêt; Italian, presto.)

Pressina. The French fée married to El'inas, king of Albania, and mother of Melusina (q.v.).

Prester John, according to Mandeville, a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane. This Ogier penetrated into the north of India, with fifteen barons of his own country, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Teneduc, and was called Prester because he converted the natives. Another tradition says he had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times in a year. In "Much Ado About Nothing," Beatrice says—

I will.... fetch you a tooth-picker from the farthest inch of Asia; bring you the length of Prester John's foot; fetch you a hair of the great Cham's beard.... rather than hold three words' conference with this harpy.—Shakespeare.

Prester John (in "Orlando Furioso," bk. xvii.), called by his subjects Senapus, king of Ethiopia. He was blind. Though the richest monarch of the world, he pined "in plenty's lap with endless famine," for whenever his table was spread hell-born harpies flew away with the food. This was in punishment of his great pride and impiety in wishing to add Paradise to his dominion. The plague was to cease "when a stranger came to his kingdom on a winged horse." Astolpho comes on his flying griffin, and with his magic horn chases the harpies into Cocytus. The king sends 100,000 Nubians to the aid of Charlemagne; they are provided with horses by Astolpho, who throws stones into the air which become steeds fully equipped (bk. xviii.), and are transported to France by Astolpho, who fills his hands with leaves which he casts into the sea, and they instantly become ships (bk. xix.). When Agramant is dead, the Nubians are sent back to their country, and the ships turn to leaves, and the horses to stones again.

Prestige. This word has a strangely metamorphosed meaning. The Latin prestig'ie means juggling tricks, hence the French for a juggler is prestidig'iateur. We use the word for that favourable impression which results from good antecedents. The history of the change is this: Juggling tricks were once considered a sort of enchantment; to enchant is to charm, and to charm is to win the heart.

Presto. Quick. A name given by Swift to the duchess of Shrewsbury, a foreigner, who either wilfully or playfully called the dean Presto (Swift).

Pretender. The Old Pretender. James F. E. Stuart, son of James II. (1688-1765.)

The Young Pretender. Charles Edward Stuart, son of the "Old Pretender." (1720-1788.)

God bless the king; God bless the "faith's defender."

God bless—no harm in blessing the Pretender.

Who that Pretender is, and who that king—

God bless us all! is quite another thing.

"Rejected Addresses."

Pretenders. Tanyoxarkës, in the time of Camby'ses, king of Persia, pretended to be Smerdis; but one of his wives felt his head while he was asleep, and discovered that he had no ears.

Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck, in the reign of Henry VIII.

Otrefief, a monk, pretended to be Demetrius, younger son of czar Ivan Basilowitz II., murdered by Boris in 1598. In 1605, Demetrius "The False" became czar, but was killed at Moscow the year following, in an insurrection.

Pre'text. A pretence. From the Latin prætexta, a dress embroidered in the front (præ-texo), worn by the Roman magistrates, priests, and children of the aristocracy between the age of thirteen and seventeen. The prætextæ were dramas in which actors personated those who wore the prætextæ; hence persons who pretended to be what they were not.

Prettyman (Prince), who figures sometimes as a fisherman's son, and sometimes as a prince, to gain the heart of Cloris.—Buckingham, "The Rehearsal."

Prevarica'tion. The Latin word varico is to straddle, and prævarico, to go zig-zag or crooked. The verb, says Pliny, was first applied to men who ploughed crooked ridges, and afterwards to men who gave crooked answers in the law courts, or deviated from the straight line of truth. (See DELIRIUM.)

Previous Question. (See QUESTION.)

Pri'am. King of Troy when that city was sacked by the allied Greeks. His wife's name was Hecuba; she was the mother of nineteen children, the eldest of whom was Hector. When the gates of Troy were thrown open by the Greeks concealed in the Wooden Horse, Pyrrhos, the son of Achilles, slew the aged Priam. (See Homer's "Iliad" and Virgil's "Æneid.")

Pri'amond. Son of Ag'apë, a fairy. He was very daring, and fought on foot with battle-axe and spear. He was slain by Cambalo. — Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv. (See DIAMOND.)

Pria'pus, in classical mythology, is a hideous, sensual, disgusting deity, the impersonation of the principle of fertility. (See BAAL, PEOR, &c.)

Prick the Garter. (See Fast and Loose.)

Pride, meaning ostentation, finery, or that which persons are proud of. Spenser talks of "lofty trees yelad in summer's pride" (verdure). Pope, of a "sword whose ivory sheath [was] inwrought with envious pride" (ornamentation); and in this sense the word is used by Jacques in that celebrated passage—

Why, who cries out on pride [dress]

That can thereto tax any private party.

What woman in the city do I name

When that I say "The city Woman bears

The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders?"

What is he of baser function

That says his bravery [finery] is not on my cost?

Shakespeare, "As You Like It," ii. 7.

Fly pride, says the peacock, proverbial for pride. — Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors," iv. 3.

Sir Pride. First a drayman, then a colonel in the Parliamentary army.—

Butler, "Hudibras."

Pride of the Morning. That early mist or shower which promises a fine day. The Morning is too proud to come out in her glory all at once—or the proud beauty being thwarted weeps and pouts awhile. Keble uses the phrase in a different sense when he says:

Pride of the dewy Morning,
The swan's experienced eye
From thee takes timely warning,
Nor trusts the voracious sky.
Keble (5th Sunday after Trinity).

Pride's Purge. The Long Parliament, not proving itself willing to condemn Charles I., was purged of its unruly members by colonel Pride, who entered the house with two regiments of soldiers, imprisoned sixty, drove one hundred and sixty out into the streets, and left only sixty of the most complaisant to remain.

Pridwen. The name of prince Arthur's shield.

He henge an his aweore [neck] aene sceld deore,
His nome on Brutise [in British] Pridwen ihaten [called]. Layamon, "Brut" (12th cent.).

Prid'win. Same as pridwen. This shield had represented on it a picture of the Virgin.

The temper of his sword, the tried "Excaliber,"—
The bigness and the length of "Rone," his noble spear,—

With "Pridwin," his great shield, and what the proof could bear. Drayton.

Priest, Knight. I would rather walk with Sir Priest than Sir Knight. I prefer peace to strife.

Prig. A knavish beggar in the "Beggar's Bush," by Beaumont and Fletcher.

Prig. To filch. (Saxon, priccan.) A pickpocket or thief. The clown calls Antolycus a " prig that haunts wakes, fairs, and bear-baitings."—Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Prig. A coxcomb, a conceited person. (German, frech, a saucy person.)

Prima Donna (Italian). A first-class lady; applied to public singers.

Prima Faci (Latin, at first sight). A prima facie case is a case or statement which, without minute examination into its merits, seems plausible and correct.

It would be easy to make out a strong prima facie case, but I should advise the more cautious policy of audi alteram partem.

Prime (1 syl.). The first of the "lesser hours" of the Roman breviary.

It is practically the public morning service of the Roman Catholic church. Milton terms sunrise "that sweet hour of prime."—"Paradise Lost," bk. v. 170.

Primed. Fnnl and ready to deliver a speech. We say of a man whose head is full of his subject, "He is primed to the muzzle." We also call a man "primed" when he is in a state of incipient drunkenness, and ready to "go off." Of course the allusion is to firearms.

Prime'ro. A game at cards.

I left him at primero with the duke of Suffolk.—
Shakespeare, "Henry VIII," i. 2.

Primrose (George). Son of the worthy Vicar of Wakefield. He went to Amsterdam to teach the people English, but forgot that he could not do so till he knew something of Dutch himself.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Moses Primrose. Brother of the above, noted for giving in barter a good horse for a gross of worthless green spectacles, with tortoise-shell rims and shagreen cases.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Mrs. Deborah Primrose. Mother of the above; noted for her motherly vanity, her skill in housewifery, and her desire to be genteel. Her wedding gown is a standing simile for things that "wear well." Her daughter's names are Olivia and Sophia.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

The Rev. Dr. Primrose. Husband of Mrs. Deborah, and Vicar of Wakefield. As simple-minded and unskilled in the world as Goldsmith himself; unaffectedly pious, and beloved by all who knew him.—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Primum Mobile, in the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, was the tenth (not ninth) sphere, supposed to revolve from east to west in twenty-four hours, carrying with it all the other spheres. The eleven spheres are: (1) Diana or the Moon, (2) Mercury, (3) Venus, (4) Apollo or the Sun, (5) Mars, (6) Jupiter, (7) Saturn, (8) the starry sphere or that of the fixed stars, (9) the crystalline, (10) the primum mobile, and (11) the empyrean. Ptolemy himself acknowledged only the first nine; the two latter were devised by his disciples. The motion of the crystalline, according to this system, causes the precession of the equinoxes, its axis being that of the ecliptic. The motion of the primum mobile produces the alternation of day and night; its axis is that of the equator, and its extremities the poles of the heavens.

They pass the planets seven, and pass the "fixed" ^[starry sphere]
And that crystalline sphere....and that "First-Moved." Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii.

Primum Mobile is figuratively applied to that machine which communicates motion to several others; and also to persons and ideas suggestive of complicated systems. Socrates was the primum mobile of the Dialectic, Megaric, Cyrenaic, and Cynic systems of philosophy.

Pri'mus. The archbishop, or rather "presiding bishop," of the Episcopal church of Scotland. He is elected by the other six bishops, and presides in Convocation, or meetings relative to church matters.

Prince. The Latin prin'cipēs formed one of the great divisions of the Roman infantry; so called because they were originally the first to begin the fight. After the Hasta'ti were instituted, this privilege was transferred to the new division.

Prince. (See BLACK.)

Prince of Alchemy. Rudolph II., emperor of Germany, also called The German Hermes Trismegistus.

Prince of Gossips. Samuel Pepys, noted for his gossiping Diary, commencing January 1st, 1659, and continued for nine years. (1632-1703.)

Prince of Grammarians. (See p. 359.)

Prince of Peace. The Messiah (Isaiah ix. 6).

Prince of the Power of the Air. Satan (Eph. ii. 2).

Prince of the Vegetable Kingdom. So Linnaeus calls the palm-tree.

Prince of Wales Dragoons. The 3rd Dragoon Guards.

Prince Rupert's Drops. Drops of molten glass, consolidated by falling into water. Their form is that of a tadpole. The thick end may be hammered pretty smartly without its breaking, but if the smallest portion of the thin end is nipped off, the whole flies into fine dust with explosive violence. These toys, if not invented by prince Rupert, were introduced by him into England.

Princox or Princocks. (Italian, pinchino, a cockered or spoilt child.) Capulet calls Tybalt a princox, or wilful spoilt boy.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."

Prink. She was prinked in all her finery. Adorned. Prink and prank, Dutch pronken, to make a show; German prangen, Danish prunker, Swedish prunka.

Printer's Devil. The newest apprentice lad in the press-room, whose duty it is to run errands, and to help the pressmen. As the sheets are given off by the men, he runs his eye over them to see if the ink has failed, or a dirty smudge has been made; for the former he calls out monk (q.v.), and for the latter frier (q.v.); in either case he casts the defective sheet aside. This boy is now called the fly or the fly-boy.

Printing used to be called the Black Art, and the boys who assisted the pressmen were called the imps. According to legend, Aldus Manutius, a printer of Venice, took a little negro boy, left behind by a merchant vessel, to assist him in his business. It soon got wind that Aldus was assisted by a little black imp, and to dispel the rumour he showed the boy to the assembled crowd, and said, "Be it known in Venice that I, Aldus Manutius, printer to the Holy Church and the doge, have this day made a public exposure of the 'printer's devil.' All who think he is not flesh and blood may come and pinch him." The people were satisfied, and no longer molested the little negro lad.

Printers' Marks.

? is §—that is, the first and last letters of questio (question).

! is i. Io in Latin is the interjection of joy.

§ is a Greek p (π), the initial letter of paragraph.

* is used by the Greek grammarians to arrest attention to something striking (asterisk or star).

+ is used by the Greek grammarians to indicate something objectionable (obelisk or dagger).

The asterisk shows that the line indicated shines like a star; the obelisk shows that it should be cut out with a dagger.

Printing. (See EM.)

Father of English printing. William Caxton. (1412-1491.)

Printing. It is a mistake to suppose that Caxton was the first printer in England. A book has been accidentally discovered with the date 1468 (Oxford). The Rev. T. Wilson says, "The press at Oxford existed ten years before there was any press in Europe, except those at Haarlem and Mentz. The person who set up the Oxford press was Corsellis."

Prio'ri. An argument a priori is one from cause to effect. To prove the existence of God a priori, you must show that every other hypothesis is more unlikely, and therefore this hypothesis is the most likely. All mathematical proofs are of this kind. (See POSTERIORI.)

Pris'cian's Head. To break Priscian's head (in Latin "diminuere Prisciani caput"). To violate the rules of grammar. Priscian was a great grammarian of the fifth century, whose name is almost synonymous with grammar.

Priscian's head is often bruised without remorse.
P. Thompson.

And held no sin so deeply red
As that of breaking Priscian's head.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 2.

Priscill'ianists. Followers of Priscillian, a Spaniard; an heretical sect which sprang up in Spain in the fourth century. They were a branch of the Manichæans.

Prisoner at the Bar. The prisoner in the dock, who is on his trial; so called because anciently he stood at the bar which separated the barristers from the common pleaders.

Prisoner of Chillon'. François de Bonnavard, a Frenchman confined for six years in the dungeon of the Château de Chillon, by Charles III. of Savoy. Lord Byron, in his poem so called, has welded together this incident with Dantö's "Count Ugolino."

Prithu. The favourite hero of the Indian Purānas. Vena having been slain for his wickedness, and leaving no offspring, the Saints rubbed his right arm, and the friction brought forth Prithu. Being told that the Earth had suspended for a time its fertility, Prithu went forth to punish it, and the Earth, under the form of a cow, fled at his approach; but being unable to escape, promised that in future "seed-time and harvest should never fail."

Priu'li. Senator of Venice, noted for his unbending pride, and his unnatural harshness to his daughter Belvidera.—Otway, "Venice Preserved."

Privolvans'. The antagonists of the Subvolvans, in S. Butler's satirical poem called "The Elephant in the Moon."

These silly ranting Privolvans
Have every summer their campaigns,
And muster like the warlike sons
Of Rawhead and of Bloodybones,
v. 83, &c.

Privy Council. The council chosen by the sovereign to administer public affairs. It consists of the Royal Family, the two Primates, the Bishop of London, the great officers of State, the Lord Chancellor and Judges of the courts of Equity, the Chief Justices of the courts of Common Law, the Judge Advocate, some of the Puisne Judges, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Ambassadors, Governors of Colonies, Commander-in-Chief, Master-General of the Ordnance, First Lord of the Admiralty, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, Paymaster of the Forces, President of the Poor-law Board, &c. &c.; a committee of which forms the Cabinet or Ministry. The number of neither the Privy Council nor Cabinet is fixed, but the latter generally includes about fifteen or sixteen gentlemen, specially qualified to advise on different departments of state business. Much of the business of the Privy Council is performed by Boards or sub-divisions, as the Board of Trade, the Board of Quarantine, the Committee of Council on Education, &c.

Privy Seal. The seal which the sovereign uses in proof of assent to a document. In matters of minor importance it is sufficient to pass the privy seal, but instruments of greater moment must have the great seal also.

Pro and Con. (Latin). For and against. "Con." is a contraction of contra.

Probe. I must probe that matter to the bottom—must narrowly examine into it. The allusion is to a surgeon probing a wound, or searching for some extraneous substance in the body.

Prob'ole (3 syl.) as applied to Jesus Christ is this: that he was divine only because he was divinely begotten; in fact he was a shoot of the divine stem. This heterodox notion was combated by Irenæus, but was subsequently revived by Montanus and Tertullian. The word is properly applied to the process of a bone—that is, a bone growing out of a normal bone. (Greek, pro-ballos.)

Procès-Verbal. A minute and official statement of some fact.

We (says the procès verbal) asked him what use he had made of the pistol [i.e., We, says the official report, &c.].—The Times (Law Report).

Proclaim on the Housetop. To proclaim or make known to every one: to blab in public. Dr. Jahn says that the ancient Jews “ascended their roofs to announce anything to the multitude, to pray to God, and to perform sacrifices” (Matt. x. 27).

No secret can escape being proclaimed from the housetop.—London Review.

Proclivity. His proclivities are all evil. His tendencies or propensities have a wrong bias. The word means down-hill tendency (Latin, proclivis).

Procris. Unerring as the dart of Procris. When Procris fled from Cephalus out of shame, Diana gave her a dog that never failed to secure its prey, and a dart which not only never missed aim, but which always returned of its own accord to the shooter.

Procrustes' Bed. Procrustes was a robber of Attica, who placed all who fell into his hands upon an iron bed. If they were longer than the bed, he cut off the redundant part; if shorter, he stretched them till they fitted it. Any attempt to reduce men to one standard, one way of thinking, or one way of acting, is called placing them on Procrustes' bed, and the person who makes the attempt is called Procrustes. (See GIRDLE.)

Tyrant more cruel than Procrustes old,
Who to his iron-bed by torture did
Their nobler parts, the souls of suffering wits,
Mutilate, “Verbal Criticism.”

Procrustean. Pertaining to Procrustes, and his mode of procedure. (See above.)

Prodigal. Festus says the Romans called victims wholly consumed by fire prodigæ hostiæ (victims prodigalised), and adds that those who waste their substance are therefore called prodigals. This derivation can hardly be considered correct. Prodigal is pro-ago or prod-igo (to drive forth), and persons who had spent all their patrimony were “driven forth” to be sold as slaves to their creditors.

Prodigal (The). Albert VI., duke of Austria. (1418-1463.)

Prodigy. The Prodigy of France. Guillaume Bude; so called by Erasmus. (1467-1540.)

The Prodigy of Learning. Samuel Hahnemann, the German, was so called by J. Paul Richter. (1755-1855.)

Profane means literally before the temple (Latin, pro finium). Those persons who came to the temple and were not initiated were called profane by the Romans.

Profile (2 syl.) means shown by a thread (Latin, prodo, to show; filum, a thread). An outline. In sculpture or painting it means to give the contour or side-face.

Profound (The). Richard Middleton, theologian. (* -1304.)

The Profound Doctor. Thomas Bradwarden, a schoolman. (14th century.)

Most Profound Doctor. Ægidius de Columna, a Sicilian schoolman. (Died 1316.)

Prog. Food. Probably the Dutch prachgen, to beg food. Burke says, “You are the lion, and I have been endeavouring to prog (procure food) for you.” Or it may be a corruption and contraction of provenider. Lastly, it may be a mere pun upon the word Prognë, a swallow.

So saying, with a smile she left the roque
To weave more lines of death, and plan for prog.
Dr. Wolcot, “Spider and Fly.”

Prognë or Proknë. The swallow. According to Grecian fable, Prokne was sister of Philomela, and wife of Tereus. Tereus having offered violence to Philomela, cut out her tongue that she might not expose him, and then told his wife that she was dead. The truth being discovered, Tereus would have slain both the sisters; but Philomela was changed into a nightingale, and Prokne to a swallow.

As Procnë or as Philomela mourns...
That finds the nest by cruel hands dispoiled;...
So Bradamant laments her absent knight.
“Orlando Furioso,” bk. xxiii.

Progress. To report progress, in parliamentary language, is to conclude for the night the business of a bill, and defer the consideration of all subsequent items thereof till the day nominated by the chief minister of the crown.

Projection. Powder of projection, or the “Philosophers' Stone.” A powder supposed to have the virtue of changing baser metals into gold or silver. A little of this powder, being cast into molten metal of the baser sort, was to project from it pure gold or silver. Education may be called the true "powder of projection."

Proletaire (3 syl.). One of the rabble. Proletaires in French means the lowest and poorest class in the community. Proletarian, mean or vulgar. The sixth class of Servius Tullius consisted of proletarii and the capitè censi—i.e., breeders and human heads. The proletarians could not enter the army, but were useful as breeders of the race (proles). The capitè censi were not enrolled in the census by the value of their estates, but simply by their polls.

Proletariat. Commonalty. (See PROLETAIRE.)

Italy has a clerical aristocracy, rich, idle, and corrupt; and a clerical proletariat, needy and grossly ignorant.—The Times.

Prometheus (3 syl.) made men of clay, and stole fire from heaven to animate them. For this he was chained by Zeus to mount Caucasus, where an eagle preyed on his liver daily. The word means Forethought, and one of his brothers was Epimetheus or Afterthought.

Faster bound to Aaron's charming eyes
Than is Prometheus tied to Caucasus.
Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," ii. 1.

Promethean. Capable of producing fire; pertaining to Prometheus (q.v.).

Promethean Fire. The vital principle; the fire with which Prometheus quickened into life his clay images. (See PROMETHEUS.)

I know not where is that Promethean heat
That can thy life relume.

Shakespeare, "Othello," v. 2.

Promised Land or Land of Promise. Canaan; so called because God promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob that their offspring should possess it.

Prone'sia (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her wisdom.

Proof. A printed sheet to be examined and approved before it is finally taken off. The first proof is that which contains all the workman's errors as well as those of the author; when these are corrected the impression next taken is called a clean proof; a third impression is then taken and submitted to the reader, who corrects it ad unguem, and this is termed the press proof.

Proof Prints. The first impressions of an engraving. India-proofs are those taken off on Indian paper. Proofs before lettering are those taken off before the plate is sent to the writing engraver. After the proofs the orders of merit are—(1) the prints which have the letters only in outline; (2) those in which the letters are shaded with a black line; (3) those in which some slight ornament is introduced into the letters; and (4) those in which the letters are filled up quite black.

Proof Spirit. A mixture of equal parts (by weight) of alcohol and water. The proof of spirit consists in little bubbles or beads which appear on the top of the liquor after agitation. When any mixture has more alcohol than water it is called over proof, and when less it is termed under proof.

Propagan'da. The name given to the "congregation" de propaganda fide, established at Rome by Gregory XV., in 1622, for propagating throughout the world the Roman Catholic religion. Any institution for making religious or political proselytes.

Prophet (The). Mahomet is so called. (570-632.)

The Koran says there have been 200,000 prophets, only six of whom have brought new laws or dispensations: Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet.

The Prophet. Jo'achim, abbot of Fio'rè. (1130-1202.)

Prophet of the Syrians. Ephæm Syrus. (4th century.)

The Great Prophets. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; so called because their writings are more extensive than the prophecies of the other twelve.

The Minor or Lesser Prophets. Hose'a, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habak'uk, Zephani'ah, Haggäi, Zechari'ah, and Mal'aehi; so called because their writings are less extensive than those of the four Great Prophets.

Prophetess (The). Ay-e'shah, the second wife of Mahomet; so called, not because she had any gift of prophecy, but simply because she was the favourite wife of the "prophet;" she was therefore emphatically "Mrs. Prophet."

Propositions in logic are of four kinds, called A, E, I, O. "A" is a universal affirmative, and "E" a universal negative; "I" a particular affirmative, and "O" a particular negative.

Asserit A, negat E, verum generaliter ambo;
I asserit, O negat, sed particulariter ambo.

A asserts and E denies some universal proposition;
I asserts and O denies, but with particular precision.

Prologue (2 syl.). The parliament was prorogued. Dismissed for the holidays, or suspended for a time. (Latin, pro-ro-go, to prolong.)

Proscenium. The front part of the stage, between the drop-curtain and orchestra.

Proscription. A sort of hue and cry; so called because among the Romans the names of the persons proscribed were written out, and the tablets bearing their names were fixed up in the public forum, sometimes with the offer of a reward for those who should aid in bringing them before the court. If the proscribed did not answer the summons, their goods were confiscated and their persons outlawed. In this case the name was engraved on brass or marble, the offence stated, and the tablet placed conspicuously in the market-place.

Prose means straightforward speaking or writing (Latin, oratio pro-sa—i.e., pro-versa), in opposition to foot-bound speaking or writing, oratio vincta (fettered speech—i.e., poetry).

Father of Greek Prose. Herodotus. (B.C. 484-405.)

Father of English Prose. Roger Ascham. (1515-1568.)

Father of French Prose. Villehardouin (pron. Veal-hard-win.) (1167-1213.)

Proserpina or Proserpine (3 syl.). One day, as she was amusing herself in the meadows of Sicily, Pluto seized her and carried her off in his chariot to the infernal regions for his bride. In her terror she dropped some of the lilies she had been gathering, and they turned to daffodils.

O Proserpina,

For the flowers now that, frightened, thou let'st fall
From Dis's waggon! daffodils,
That come before the swallow dares, and take
The winds of March with beauty.

Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," iv. 3.

Prosperity Robinson. Viscount Goderich earl of Ripon, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1823. In 1825 he boasted in the House of the prosperity of the nation, and his boast was not yet cold when the great financial crisis occurred. It was Cobbett who gave him the name of "Prosperity Robinson."

Prospero. Rightful duke of Milan, deposed by his brother. Drifted on a desert island, he practised magic, and raised a tempest in which his brother was shipwrecked. Ultimately Prospero broke his wand, and his daughter married the son of the king of Naples.—Shakespeare, "Tempest."

Protagoras of Abdera was the first who took the name of "Sophist." (B.C. 480-411.)

Protean. Having the aptitude to change its form: ready to assume different shapes. (See PROTEUS.)

Protectionist. One who advocates the imposition of import duties, to "protect" home produce or manufactures.

Protector. The earl of Pembroke. (1216.)

Humphrey duke of Gloucester. (1422-1447.)

Richard duke of Gloucester. (1483.)

The duke of Somerset. (1548.)

The Lord Protector of the Commonwealth. Oliver Cromwell. (1653-1658.)

Protésila'os, in Fénelon's "Télémaque," is meant to represent Louvois, the French minister of state.

Prot'estant. One of the party who adhered to Luther at the Reformation. These Lutherans in 1529 "protested" against the decree of Charles V. of Germany, and appealed from the diet of Spires to a general council. A Protestant now means one of the Reformed Church.

Protestant Pope. Clement XIV.

Proteus (pron. Pro'-tuce). As many shapes as Proteus—i.e., full of shifts, aliases, disguises, &c. Proteus was Neptune's herdsman, an old man and a prophet. He lived in a vast cave, and his custom was to tell over his herds of sea-calves at noon, and then to sleep. There was no way of catching him but by stealing upon him during sleep and binding him; if not so captured he would elude any one who came to consult him by changing his shape, for he had the power of changing it in an instant into any form he chose.

The changeful Proteus, whose prophetic mind
The secret cause of Bacchus' rage divined,
Attending, left the flocks, his scaly charge,
To graze the bitter weedsy foam at large.

Camœus, "Lusiad," vi.

Prothala'mion. Marriage-song by Edmund Spenser, peculiarly exquisite—probably the noblest ever sung.

Pro'theus. One of the two Gentlemen of Verona; his serving-man is Launce. Valentine is the other gentleman, whose serving-man is Speed.—Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Pro'tocol. The first rough draught or original copy of a despatch, which is to form the basis of a treaty. (Greek, proto-kolon, first food—kolon meaning chopped or minced food; or proto-kolla, first glue—the leaves of the draught being glued or pasted together.)

Proud (The). Otho IV., emperor of Germany. (1175, 1209-1218.)

Tarquín II. of Rome. Superbus. (Reigned B.C. 535-510, died 496.)

The Proud Duke. Charles Seymour, duke of Somerset. He would never suffer his children to sit in his presence, and would never speak to his servants except by signs. (Died 1748.)

Proudfute (Oliver). A boasting bonnet-maker of Perth. His widow is Magdalen or Mandie.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth."

Prout. (See FATHER.)

Prov'ince means a country previously conquered. (Latin, pro vinco.)

Provin'cial. Like or in the manner of those who live in the provinces.

Provincial of an Order. The superior of all the monastic houses of a province.

Prud'homme. A Mons. Prud'homme. A man of experience and great prudence, of estimable character and practical good sense. Your Mons. Prud'homme is never a man of genius and originality, but what we in England should term a "Quaker of the old school."

The council of prud'hommes. A council of arbiters to settle disputes between masters and workmen.

Prunello. Stuff. Prunello really means that woollen stuff of which common ecclesiastical gowns used to be made; it was also employed for the uppers of women's boots and shoes. A corruption of Brignoles.

Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow; The rest is all but leather and prunello.

Pope, "Essay on Man," iv.

Pru'sio (in "Orlando Furioso"). King of Alvarecchia, slain by Zerbi'no.

Prus'sia means near Russia, the country bordering on Russia. In Neo-Latin, Borussia; in Slavonic, Porussia; po in Slavonic signifying "near."

Prussian Blue. So called because it was discovered by a Prussian, viz., Diesbach, a colourman of Berlin, in 1710. It is sometimes called Berlin blue.

Prussic Acid means the acid of Prussian blue. It is now termed in science hydrocyanic acid, because it is a cyanide of iron.

Psalms. Seventy-three Psalms are inscribed with David's name; twelve with that of Asaph the singer; eleven go under the name of the Sons of Korah, a family of singers; one (i.e. Ps. xc.) is attributed to Moses. The whole compilation is divided into five books: bk. 1, from i. to xli.; bk. 2, from xlii. to lxxii.; bk. 3, from lxxiii. to lxxxix.; bk. 4, from xc. to cvi.; bk. 5, from cvii. to cl.

Psalmist. The sweet Psalmist of Israel. King David, who composed many of the Bible Psalms. (See Psalm lxxii. 20.)

Psaphon's Birds (Psaphonis avès). Puffers, flatterers. Psaphon, in order to attract the attention of the world, reared a multitude of birds, and having taught them to pronounce his name, let them fly.

To what far region have his songs not flown,
Like Psaphon's birds, speaking their master's name?
Moore, "Rhymes on the Road," iii.

Psycarpax (granary-thief). Son of Troxartas, king of the Mice. The Frog-king offered to carry the young prince over a lake, but scarcely had he got midway when a water-hydra appeared, and King-frog to save himself dived under water. The mouse being thus left at the surface was drowned, and this catastrophe brought about the Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

The soul of great Psycarpax lives in me,
Of great Troxartas' line, whose sleeky down
In love compressed Lychnis fills the brown.
Parnell, "Battle of the Frogs and Mice," i.

Psy'chē (Sy'-ke). A beautiful maiden beloved by Cupid, who visited her every night, but left her at sunrise. Cupid bade her never seek to know who he was, but one night curiosity overcame her prudence, and she went to look at him. A drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, awoke him, and he fled. Psyche next became the slave of Venus, who treated her most cruelly; but ultimately she was married to Cupid, and became immortal. Mrs. Henry Tighe has embodied in six cantos this exquisite allegory from Apulgeios.

Fair Psyche, kneeling at the ethereal throne,
Warmed the fond bosom of unconquered love.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," iv.

Pterichthys (te-rikt'-this). A fossil ganoid, peculiar to the old red sandstone. (Greek, "wing-fish.")

Pterodactyl (Greek, wing-finger). A fossil lizard with a bat-wing, found in the Oolite.

Ptolemaic System. The system of Claudius Ptolemaeus, a celebrated astronomer of Palmyra, in Egypt, of the eleventh century. He taught that the earth is fixed in the centre of the universe, and the heavens revolve round it from east to west, carrying with them the sun, planets, and fixed stars, in their respective spheres. He said that the Moon was next above the earth, then Mercury, then Venus; the Sun he placed between Venus and Mars, and after Mars, Jupiter and Saturn, beyond which came the two crystalline spheres.

Public-house Signs. Much of a nation's history, and more of its manners and feelings, may be gleaned from its public-house signs. A very large number of them are selected out of compliment to the lord of the manor, either because he is the "great man" of the neighbourhood, or because the proprietor is some servant whom "it delighted the lord to honour;" thus we have the Earl of March, in compliment to the duke of Richmond; the Green Man or gamekeeper, married and promoted "to a public." When the name and titles of the lord have been exhausted, we get his cognizance or his favourite pursuit, as the Bear and Ragged staff, the Fox and Hounds. As the object of the sign is to speak to the feelings and attract, another fruitful source is either some national hero or great battle; thus we get the Marquis of Granby and the Duke of Wellington, the Waterloo and the Alma. The proverbial loyalty of our nation has naturally shown itself in our tavern signs, giving us the Victoria, the Prince of Wales, the Albert, the Crown, and so on. Some signs indicate a speciality of the house, as the Bowling Green, the Skittles; some a political bias, as the Royal Oak; some are an attempt at wit, as the Five Alls; and some are purely fanciful. The following list will serve to exemplify the subject:—

The Angel. In allusion to the angel that saluted the Virgin Mary.

The Bag o' Nails. A corruption of the "Bacchanals."

The Bear. From the popular sport of bear-baiting.

The Bear and Bacchus, in High Street, Warwick. A corruption of Bear and Bacculus—i.e., Bear and Ragged Staff, the badge of the earl of Warwick.

The Bear and Ragged Staff. The cognizance of the earl of Warwick, the earl of Leicester, &c.

The Bell. In allusion to races, a silver bell having been the winner's prize up to the reign of Charles II.

La Belle Sauvage. (See BELL SAVAGE.)

The Blue Boar. The cognizance of Richard III.

The Blue Pig (Bevis Marks). A corruption of the "Blue Boar" (See above.)

The Boar's Head. The cognizance of the Gordons, &c.

The Bolt-in-Ton. The punning heraldic badge of prior Bolton, last of the clerical rulers of Bartholomew's, previous to the Reformation.

Bosom's Inn. A public-house sign in St. Lawrence Lane, London; a corruption of "Blossom's Inn," as it is now called, in allusion to the hawthorn blossoms surrounding the effigy of St. Lawrence on the sign.

The Bowling Green. Signifying that there are arrangements on the premises for playing bowls.

The Bull. The cognizance of Richard duke of York, and adopted by his partisans.

The Bull's Head. The cognizance of Henry VIII.

The Bully Ruffian. A corruption of the "Bellerophon" (a ship).

The Castle. This being the arms of Spain, symbolises that Spanish wines are to be obtained within. In some cases, without doubt, it is a complimentary sign of the manor castle.

The Cat and Fiddle. A corruption of Caton Fidèle—i.e., Caton, the faithful governor of Calais. In Farringdon (Devon) is the sign of La Vatte Fidèle, in commemoration of a faithful cat. Without scanning the phrase so nicely, it may simply indicate that the game of cat (trap-ball) and a fiddle for dancing are provided for customers.

The Cat and Mutton, Hackney, which gives name to the Cat and Mutton Fields.

The Cat and Wheel. A corruption of St. Catherine's Wheel; or an announcement that cat and balance-wheels are provided for the amusement of customers. (See STRUTT.)

The Chequers. (1) In honour of the Stuarts, whose shield was "checky," like a Scotch plaid. (2) In commemoration of the licence granted by the earls of Arundel or lords Warrenne. (3) An intimation that a room is set apart for merchants and accountants, where they can be private and make up their accounts, or use their "chequers" undisturbed. (See LATTICE.)

The Coach and Horses. This sign signifies that it is a posting house, a stage-coach house, or both.

The Cork and Bottle. A corruption of the "Cork and Bottle," meaning that wine is sold there in bottles. Probably in some cases it may indicate that the house provides poultry, eggs, and wine.

The Cow and Skittles. The cow is the real sign, and alludes to the dairy of the hostess, or some noted dairy in the neighbourhood. Skittles is added to indicate that there is a skittle ground on the premises.

The Cross Keys. Common in the mediæval ages, and in allusion to St. Peter, or one of the bishops whose cognizance it is—probably the lord of the manor or the patron saint of the parish church. The cross keys are emblems of the papacy, St. Peter, the bishop of Gloucester, St. Servatius, St. Hippolytus, St. Geneviève, St. Petronilla, St. Osyth, St. Martha, and St. Germainus.

The Devil. A public-house sign two doors from Temple Bar, Fleet Street. The sign represents St. Dunstan seizing the devil by the nose. (See Gone to the Devil.)

The Dog and Duck. Tea gardens at Lambeth (suppressed); to signify that the sport so called could be seen there. A duck was put into water, and a dog set to hunt it; the fun was to see the duck diving, and the dog following it under water.

The Red Dragon. The cognizance of Henry VII. or the principality of Wales.

The Spread Eagle. The arms of Germany; to indicate that German wines may be obtained within.

The Fox and Goose. To signify that there are arrangements within for playing the royal game of Fox and Goose.

St. George and the Dragon. In compliment to the patron saint of England, and his combat with the dragon. For many years the legend was stamped upon our gold coins.

The George and Cannon. A corruption of "George Canning."

The Globe. The cognizance of Alfonso, king of Portugal; and intimating that Portuguese wines may be obtained within.

The Goat in Golden Boots. A corruption of the Dutch Goed in der Gouden Boote (the god Mercury in his golden sandals).

The Goat and Compasses. A Puritan sign, a corrupt hieroglyphic reading of "God encompasses us."

The Black Goats. A public-house sign, High Bridge, Lincoln, formerly "The Three Goats"—i.e., three gowts (gutters or drains), by which the water from the Swan Pool (a large lake that formerly existed to the west of the city) was conducted into the bed of the Witham.

The Golden Cross. This refers to the ensigns carried by the crusaders.

The Grecian Stairs. A corruption of "The Greesen or Stairs" (Greesen is gree, a step, our de-gree). The allusion is to a flight of steps from the New Road to the Minster Yard. In Wickliffe's Bible, Acts xxi. 40 is rendered—"Poul stood on the greezen."

Let me sneak like yourself, and lay a sentence
Which, like a grize or step, may help these lovers
Into your iavour. Shakespeare, "Othello," I. 3.

The Green Man. The late gamekeeper of the lord of the manor turned publican. At one time these servants were dressed in green.

The Green Man and Still—i.e., the herbalist bringing his herbs to be distilled.

The Hare and Hounds. In compliment to the sporting squire or lord of the manor.

The Hole-in-the-Wall (London). So called because it was approached by a passage or "hole" in the wall of the house standing in front of the tavern.

The Iron Devil. A corruption of "Hirondelle" (the swallow). There are numerous public-house signs referring to birds; as—the "Blackbird," the "Thrush," the "Peacock," the "Martin," the "Bird-in-the-Hand," &c. &c.

The Three Kings. A public-house sign of the mediæval ages, in allusion to the three kings of Cologne, the Magi who presented offerings to the infant Jesus. Very many public-house signs of the mediæval period had a reference to ecclesiastical matters, either because their landlords were ecclesiastics, or else from a superstitious reverence for "saints" and "holy things."

The Man Laden with Mischief. A public-house sign, Oxford Street, nearly opposite to Hanway Yard. The sign is said to have been painted by Hogarth, and represents a man carrying a woman on his back.

The Marquis of Granby (London, &c.). In compliment to John Manners, eldest son of John, third duke of Rutland—a bluff, brave soldier, generous, and greatly beloved by his men.

What conquest now will Britain boast,
Or where display her banners?
Alas! in Granby she has lost
True courage and good Manners.

The Pack-horse. To signify that pack-horses could be hired there.

The Palgrave's Head. A public-house sign near Temple Bar, in honour of Frederick, palgrave of the Rhine.

The Pig and Tinder Box. A corrupt rendering of The Elephant and Castle; the "pig" is really an elephant, and the "tinder-box" the castle on its back.

The Pig and Whistle. (See PIG.)

The Plum and Feathers. A public-house sign near Stoken Church Hill, Oxford. A corruption of the "Plume of Feathers," meaning that of the Prince of Wales.

The Queen of Bohemia. In honour of lady Elizabeth Stuart. (See BOHEMIA.)

The Queer Door. A corruption of Cœur Doré (Golden Heart.)

The Rose. A symbol of England, as the Thistle is of Scotland, and the Shamrock of Ireland.

The Red Rose. The badge of the Lancastrians in the civil war of the Roses.

The White Rose. The badge of the Yorkists in the civil war of the Roses.

The Rose of the Quarter Sessions. A corruption of La Rose des Quatre Saisons.

The Salutation and Cat. The "Salutation" (which refers to the angel saluting the Virgin Mary) is the sign of the house, and the "Cat" is added to signify that arrangements are made for playing cat or tipcat.

The Saracen's Head. In allusion to what are preposterously termed "The Holy Wars;" adopted probably by some crusader after his return home, or at any rate to flatter the natural sympathy for these Quixotic expeditions.

The Ship, near Temple Bar, and opposite The Palgrave's Head; in honour of Sir Francis Drake, the circumnavigator.

The Ship and Shovel. Referring to Sir Cloudesley Shovel, a favourite admiral in Queen Anne's reign.

The Seven Stars. An astrological sign of the mediæval ages.

The Three Suns. The cognizance of Edward IV.

The Sun and the Rose. The cognizance of the House of York.

The Swan with Three Necks. A public-house sign in Lad Lane, &c.; a corruption of "three nicks" (on the bill).

The Swan and Antelope. The cognizance of Henry V.

The Talbot (a hound). The arms of the Talbot family.

The Turk's Head. Alluding to the Holy Wars, when the Crusaders fought against the Turks.

The Unicorn. The Scottish supporter in the royal arms of Great Britain.

The White Hart. The cognizance of Richard II.

The White Swan. The cognizance of Henry IV. and of Edward III.

Publicans of the New Testament were the provincial underlings of the Magister or master collector who resided at Rome. The taxes were farmed by a contractor called the Manceps; this Manceps divided his contract into different societies; each society had a Magister, under whom were a number of underlings called Publicani or servants of the state.

Pucelle (La). The Maid of Orle'ans, Jeanne d'Arc. (1410-1431.)—See Shakespeare's "1 Henry VI.," v. 4.

Puck or Robin Goodfellow. A fairy and merry wanderer of the night, "rough, knurly-limbed, faun-faced, and shock-pated, a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged" fairies around him. (See Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1; iii. 1.)

Pudding. (See JACK.)

Pudding-time properly means just as dinner is about to begin, for our forefathers took their pudding before their meat. It also means in the nick of time.

But Mars . . .
In pudding-time came to his aid.
Butler, "Hudibras," l. 2.

Pudens. A soldier in the Roman army, mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 21, in connection with Linus and Claudia. According to tradition, Claudia, the wife of Pudens, was a British lady; Linus, otherwise called Cyllen, was her brother; and Lucius, "the British king," the grandson of Linus. Tradition further adds that Lucius wrote to Eleutherus, bishop of Rome, to send missionaries to Britain to convert the people.

Puff. Exaggerated praise. The most popular etymology of this word is pouff, a coiffure employed by the ladies of France in the reign of the Grand Monarque to announce events of interest, or render persons patronised by them popular. Thus Madame d'Egmont, duke of Richelieu's daughter, wore on her head a little diamond fortress, with moving sentinels, after her father had taken port Mahon; and the duchess of Orléans wore a little nursery, with cradle, baby, and toys complete, after the birth of her son and heir. These no doubt were pouffs and puffs, but lord Bacon uses the word puff a century before the head-gear was brought into fashion. Two other etymons present themselves: the old pictures of Fame puffing forth the praises of some hero with her trumpet; and the puffing out of slain beasts and birds in order to make them look plumper and better for food—a plan universally adopted in the abattoirs of Paris. The French pouf is our puff.

Puff, in "The Critic," by Sheridan. An impudent literary quack.

Puff-ball. A sort of fungus. The word is a corruption of Puck or Pouk ball, anciently called Puck-fist. The Irish name is Pooka-foot. (Saxon, Pulker-fist, a toad-stool.) Shakespeare alludes to this superstition when Prospero summons amongst his elves—

You whose pastime
Is to make midnight mushrooms.
Shakespeare, "Tempest," v. 1.

Puffed Up. Conceited; elated with conceit or praise; filled with wind. A puff is a tartlet with a very light or puff crust.

That no one of you be puffed up one against another.—1 Cor. iv. 6.

Pug is the Saxon piga, a "little girl," and is used to a child, monkey, dog, &c., as a pet term.

You mischievous little pug. A playful reproach to a favourite.

Pug. A mischievous little goblin in Ben Jonson's drama of "The Devil is an Ass." Shakespeare has changed the name to "Puck," and with it has created the character anew.

Pugna Porcorum (Battle of the Pigs). The most celebrated poem of alliterative verse, extending to several hundred lines, in which every word begins with p.

Puisne Judges means the younger-born judges. They are the four inferior judges of the court of Queen's Bench, and the four inferior judges of the court of Common Pleas. (French, puis né, subsequently born.)

Pukwa'na (North-American Indian). The curling smoke of the Peace-pipe; a signal or beacon.

Pul'ian or Pulia'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). Leader of the Nasamo'ni, slain by Rinaldo.

Pull. A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether—i.e., a steady, energetic, and systematic co-operation. The reference may be either to a boat, where all the oarsmen must pull together with a long and strong pull at the oars; or it may be to the act of hauling with a rope, when a simultaneous strong pull is indispensable.

I have a pull on him. A hold. He is under obligations to me. Obligation is the Latin ob ligo (to bind to), and a strong hold is obtained by a slip-knot "pulled." In the pantins, figures made of card or wood, in the reign of Louis XV., the person who held the string had command of the figure, and could make it dance at option.

Pum'ble Chook (Uncle). He bullied Pip when only a poor boy, but when the boy became wealthy was his lick-spittle, fawning on him most servilely with his "May I, Mr. Pip" [have the honour of shaking hands with you]; "Might I,

Mr. Pip" [take the liberty of saluting you].—Dickens, "Great Expectations."

Pummel or Pommel. To beat black and blue. (French, pommeler, to dapple.)

Pump. To sift, to extract information by indirect questions. In allusion to pumping up water.

But pump not me for politics.—Otway.

Pumpnickel. His Transparency of Pumpnickel. So the Times satirises the minor German princes, "whose ninety men and ten drummers constituted their whole embattled host on the parade-ground before their palace, and whose revenue is supplied by a percentage on the tax levied on strangers at the Pumpnickel Kursaal."—18th July, 1866.

Pun is the Welsh pun, equivalent; it means a word equally applicable to two things. The application should be remote and odd in order to give piquancy to the play. (See CALEMBOURG.)

Punch, from the Indian word punj (five); so called from its five ingredients—viz., spirit, water, lemon, sugar, and spice. It was introduced into England from Spain, where it is called ponche. It is called "Contradiction," because it is composed of spirits to make it strong, and water to make it weak; of lemon-juice to make it sour, and sugar to make it sweet.

Mr. Punch. A Roman mime called Maccus was the original of Punch. A statnette of this buffoon was discovered in 1727, containing all the well-known features of our friend—the long nose and goggle eyes, the hunch back and protruding breast.

The most popular derivation of Punch and Judy is Pontius cum Judæis (Matt. xxvii. 19), an old mystery play of "Pontius Pilate and the Jews;" but the Italian policinello seems to be from pollicè, a thumb (Tom-thumb figures), and our Punch from paunch.

The drama or story of our Punch and Judy is attributed to Silvio Fiorillo, an Italian comedian of the seventeenth century. The tale is this: Punch, in a fit of jealousy, strangles his infant child, when Judy flies to her revenge. She fetches a bludgeon, with which she belabours her husband, till Punch, exasperated, seizes another bludgeon and beats her to death, then flings into the street the two dead bodies. The bodies attract the notice of a police-officer, who enters the house. Punch flees for his life: being arrested by an officer of the Inquisition, he is shut up in prison, from which he escapes by means of a golden key. The rest is an allegory, showing how Punch triumphs over all the ills that flesh is heir to. (1) Ennui, in the shape of a dog, is overcome; (2) Disease, in the disguise of a doctor, is kicked out; (3) Death is beaten to death; and (4) the Devil himself is outwitted.

Punctual. No bigger than a point, exact to a point or moment. (Latin, ad punctum.) Hence the angel describing this earth to Adam calls it "This opaciously earth, this punctual spot"—i.e., a spot no bigger than a point.—Milton, "Paradise Lost," viii. 23.

Punctuation. The following advice of bishop Orleton to Gonnrey and Maltravers in 1327 is an excellent example of the importance of punctuation:—Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est—"Spare not to kill king Edward is right." If the point is placed after the first word, the sentence reads "Not to kill the king is right;" but if after the second word, the direction becomes, "Spare not; to kill the king is right." (See ORACLE.)

Pundit. An East Indian scholar, skilled in Sanskrit, and learned in law, divinity, and science. We use the word for a porcus literarum, one more stocked with book lore than deep erudition.

Pu'nic Apple. A pomegranate; so called because it is the pomum or "apple" belonging to the genus Punica.

Pu'nic Faith. Treachery, violation of faith. "Punic faith" is about equal to "Spanish honesty." The Puni (a corruption of Pœni) were accused by the Romans of breaking faith with them, a most extraordinary instance of the "pot calling the kettle black;" for whatever infidelity the Carthaginians were guilty of, it could scarcely equal that of their accusers.

The Roman Pœni is the word Phœni (Phœnicians), the Carthaginians being of Phœnician descent.

Our Punic faith
Is infamous, and branded to a proverb.
Addison, "Cato," ii.

Punjab (five rivers). They are the Jelum, Chenab, Ravee, Be'as, and Sutlej; called by the Greeks penta-potamia.

Pup properly means a little boy or girl. A little dog is so called because it is a pet. An insect in the third stage of existence. (Latin, pupus, fem. pupa; French, poupée, a doll; German, puppē.)

Purbeck (Dorsetshire). Noted for a marble used in ecclesiastical ornaments. Chichester cathedral has a row of columns of this limestone. The columns of the Temple church, London; the tomb of Queen Eleanor, in Westminster Abbey; and the throne of the Archbishop in Canterbury cathedral, are other specimens.

Purita'ni (I). "The Puritans." Elvira, daughter of lord Walton, a Puritan, is affianced to lord Arthur Talbot, a Cavalier. On the day of espousals, lord Arthur aids Henrietta, the widow of Charles I., to escape; and Elvira, thinking him faithless, loses her reason. On his return to England, lord Arthur explains the circumstances, and the two lovers vow that nothing on earth shall part them more. The vow is scarcely uttered, when Cromwell's soldiers enter and arrest lord Talbot for treason; but as they lead him forth to execution, a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and free pardon to all political prisoners. Whereupon lord Arthur is liberated, and marries Elvira.—Bellini, "I Puritani" (libretto by C. Pepoli).

Pu'ritans. Seceders from the Reformed Church; so called because they rejected all human traditions and interference in religion, acknowledging the sole authority of the "pure Word of God," without "note or comment." Their motto was: "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible." The English Puritans were sometimes by the Reformers called Precisionists, from their preciseness in matters called "indifferent." Andrew Fuller gave them the name of Non-conformists, because they refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity.

Purlieu (2 syl.). French, pourallé lieu (a place free from the forest laws). Henry II., Richard I., and John made certain lands forest lands; Henry III. allowed certain portions all round to be severed. These "rués" or forest borders were freed from that servitude which was laid on the royal forests. The "perambulation" by which this was effected was technically called pourallée.

In the purlieus of this forest stands
A sheep-cote fenced about with olive trees.
Shakespeare, "As You Like It," iv. 3.

Purple (blue and red) indicates the love of truth even unto martyrdom.

Pursy, Pursiness. Broken-winded, or in a bloated state in which the wind is short and difficult. (French, pousse, poussif, same meaning.)

A fat and pursy man. Shakespeare has "pursy Insolence," the insolence of Jesurun, "who waxed fat and kicked." In "Hamlet" we have "the fatness of these pursy times"—i.e., wanton or self-indulgent times.

Purû'vas and Urva'si. An Indian myth similar to that of "Apollo and Daphnê." Purûravas is a legendary king who fell in love with Urva'si, a heavenly nymph, who consented to become his wife on certain conditions. These conditions being violated, Urvasi disappeared, and Purûravas, inconsolable, wandered everywhere to find her. Ultimately he succeeded, and they were indissolubly united.

Pu'seyite (3 syl.). A High Churchman; so called from Dr. Pusey of Oxford, a chief contributor to the Tracts for the Times. (See TRACTARIANS.)

Puss in Boots (Le Chat Botté), from the "Eleventh Night" of Straparola's Italian fairy tales, where Constantine's cat procures his master a fine castle and the king's heiress; first translated into French in 1585. Our version is taken from that of Charles Perrault. There is a similar one in the Scandinavian nursery tales. This clever cat secures a fortune and a royal partner for his master, who passes off as the marquis of Carabas, but is in reality a young miller without a penny in the world.

Put. A clown, a silly shallow-pate, a butt, one easily "put upon."

Queer country puts extol queen Bess's reign Bramson.

Putney and Mortlake Race. The annual eight-oared boat-race between the two universities of Cambridge and Oxford.

Pygmalion. A statuary of Cyprus, who hated women and resolved never to marry, but fell in love with his own marble statue of the goddess Venus. At his earnest prayer the statue was vivified, and he married it.

Few, like Pygmalion, doat on lifeless charms,
Or care to clasp a statue in their arms.
S. Jeyns, "Art of Dancing," canto i.

Pygmies (2 syl.). A nation of dwarfs on the banks of the Upper Nile. Every spring the cranes made war upon them and devoured them. They cut down every corn-ear with an axe. When Hercules went to the country they climbed up his goblet by ladders to drink from it; and while he was asleep two whole armies of them fell upon his right hand, and two upon his left; but Hercules rolled them all in his lion's skin. It is easy to see how Swift has availed himself of this Grecian legend in his "Gulliver's Travels."

Pyliadēs and Orestēs. Two model friends, whose names have become proverbial for friendship, like those of Damon and Pythias, David and Jonathan.

Pyr'amus. The lover of Thisbē. Supposing Thisbē to be torn to pieces by a lion, he stabbed himself, and Thisbē finding the dead body stabbed herself also. Both fell dead under a mulberry-tree, which has ever since borne blood-red fruit. Shakespeare has a travestie of this tale in his "Midsummer Night's Dream."—Ovid, "Metamorphoses," bk. iv.

Pyroc'lēs and Musido'rus. Heroes whose exploits, previous to their arrival in Arcadia, are detailed in the "Arcadia" of Sir Philip Sidney.

Py'rodes (3 syl.). Clias was so called, according to Pliny, because he was the first to strike fire from flint.

Pyr'rhic Dance, the most famous war-dance of antiquity, received its name from Pyrrichos, a Dorian. It was danced to the flute, and its time was very quick. Julius Cæsar introduced it into Rome. The Romaika, still danced in Greece, is a relic of the ancient Pyrrhic dance.

Pyrrho. A sceptic. Pyrrho was the founder of the Sceptical school of philosophy. He was a native of Elis, in Peloponnesos.

Blessed be the day I' escaped the wrangling crew
From Pyrrho's maze and Epicurus' sty.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

Pythag'oras, son of Mnesarchos, was called son of Apollo or Pythios, from the first two syllables of his name; but he was called Pytha-goras because the Pythian oracle predicted his birth.

Pythagoras, generally called The Long-haired Sa'mian. A native of Sa'mos, noted for his manly beauty and long hair. The Greeks applied the phrase to any venerable man or philosopher.

Pythagoras maintained that he distinctly recollected having occupied other human forms before his birth at Samos: (1) He was Æthal'ides, son of Mercury; (2) Euphorbos the Phrygian, son of Pan-thōos, in which form he ran Patroelos through with a lance, leaving Hector to dispatch the hateful friend of Achilles; (3) Hermot'imos, the prophet of Clazome'næ; (4) a fisherman; and (5) Pythagoras, son of Mnesarchos. To prove his Phrygian existence he was taken to the temple of Hera, in Argos, and asked to point out the shield of the son of Pan-thōos, which he did without hesitation. (See RAT.)

The golden thigh of Pythagoras. This thigh he showed to Abaris, the Hyperborean priest, and exhibited in the Olympic games.

Abaris, priest of the Hyperbo'reans, gave him a dart, by which he was carried through the air, over inaccessible rivers, lakes, and mountains; expelled pestilence; lulled storms; and performed other wonderful exploits.

Pythagoras maintained that the soul has three vehicles: (1) the ethereal, which is luminous and celestial, in which the soul resides in a state of bliss in the stars; (2) the luminous, which suffers the punishment of sin after death; and (3) the terrestrial, which is the vehicle it occupies on this earth.

Pythagoras asserted he could write on the moon. His plan of operation was to write on a looking-glass in blood, and place it opposite the moon, when the inscription would appear photographed or reflected on its disc.

Pythagoras. Mesmerism was practised by Pythagoras, if we may credit Iamblichus, who tells us that he tamed a savage Daunian bear by "stroking it gently with his hand," subdued an eagle by the same means, and held absolute dominion over beasts and birds by "the power of his voice," or "influence of his touch."

Pythagorean System. Pythagoras taught that the sun is a movable sphere in the centre of the universe, and that all the planets revolve around it. This is substantially the same as the Copernican and Newtonian systems.

Pythian Games. The games held by the Greeks at Pytho, in Phocis, subsequently called Delphi. They took place every fourth year, the second of each Olympiad.

Pythias. (See DAMON.)

Python. The monster serpent hatched from the mud of Deucalion's deluge, and slain near Delphi by Apollo.

Q

Q means the "tail letter" (French, queue, a tail). This letter, which is Q with a tail, was borrowed from the French.

Q in a corner. Something not seen at first, but subsequently brought to notice. The thong to which seals are attached in legal documents is in French called the queue; thus we have lettres scellées sur simple queue or sur double queue, according to whether they bear one or two seals. In documents where the seal is attached to the deed itself, the corner where the seal is placed is called the queue, and when the document is sworn to the finger is laid on the queue.

In a merry Q (cue). Humour, temper; thus Shakespeare says, "My cue is villainous melancholy" ("King Lear," i. 2.).

What signifies America when we are all in "A-merry-Q?"—George Alexander Stevens, "The Politician."

Q.E.D. Quod erat demonstrandum. Three letters appended to the theorems of Euclid, meaning: Thus have we proved the proposition stated above, as we were required to do.

Q.E.F. Quod erat facien'dum. Three letters appended to the problems of Euclid, meaning: Thus have we done or drawn the figure required by the proposition.

Q.P. Quantum placet. Two letters used in prescriptions, meaning the quantity may be as little or much as you like. Thus in a cup of tea we might say "Milk and sugar q.p."

Q.S. Quantum sufficit. Two letters appended to prescriptions, and meaning as much as is required to make the pills up. Thus, after giving the drugs in minute proportions, the apothecary is told to "mix these articles in liquorice q.s."

Q.V. (Latin, quantum vis). As much as you like.

Q. V. (Latin, quod vidē). Which see.

Quack or Quack Doctor; once called quack-salver. A vendor of salves to cure wens. (Swedish, quack-salfoare; German, kwak-salber; Dutch, kwak-salver. Kwak means a "wen," and salves "salves.")

Seek out for plants with signatures

To quack of universal cures.

Buller, "Hudibras."

Saltimbancoes, quacksalvers, and charlatans deceive the vulgar.—Sir Thomas Browne.

Quadragesima Sunday. The Sunday immediately preceding Lent; so called because it is, in round numbers, the fortieth day before Easter.

Quadragesimals. The farthings or payments made in commutation of a personal visit to the mother-church on Mid-Lent Sunday; called also Whitsun farthings.

Quadrilat'eral. The four fortresses of Peschie'ra and Mantua on the Mincio, and Vero'na and Legna'go on the Ad'igē.

The Prussian Quadrilateral. The fortresses of Luxemburg, Coblentz, Sarrelouis, and Mayence.

Quadrille (2 syl., French) means a small square; a dance in which the persons place themselves in a square. (Latin, quad'rula.)

Le Pantalon. So called from the tune to which it used to be danced.

L'Été. From a country-dance called Pas d'Été, very fashionable in 1800, which it resembles.

La Poule. Derived from a country-dance produced by Julien in 1802, the second part of which began with the imitation of a cock-crow.

Trenise. The name of a dancing-master who, in 1800, invented the figure.

La Pastourelle. So named from its melody and accompaniment, which are similar to the Vilanelles or peasants' dances.

Quad'riloqe (3 syl.). Anything written in four parts or books, as "Childe Harold." Anything compiled from four authors, as the "Life of Thomas à Becket." Any history resting on the testimony of four independent authorities, as "The Gospel History."

The very enhours of the Quadriloge itselfe or song of foure parts...doe all with one pen and mouth acknowledge the same.—Lambarde, "Perambulation," p. 515.

Quadriv'ium. The four higher subjects of scholastic philosophy up to the twelfth century. It embraced music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. The quadrivium was the "fourfold way" to knowledge; the trivium (q.v.) the "three-fold way" to eloquence; both together comprehended the seven arts or sciences. The seven arts are enumerated in the following hexameter:—

Lingua, Tropus, Ratio, Numerus, Tonus, Angulus
Astra.

And in the two following:—

Gram, loquitur, Dia. vera docet, Rhet. verba colorat.
Mus. edit, Ar. numerat, Geo. ponderat, Ast. colit
astra.

Quadroon'. A person with one-fourth of black blood; the offspring of a mulatto woman by a white man. The mulatto is half-blooded, one parent being white and the other black. (Latin, quatuor, four.)

Quad'ruple Alliance of 1674. Germany, Spain, Denmark, and Holland formed an alliance against France to resist the encroachments of Louis XIV., who had declared war against Holland. It terminated with the Treaty of Nimegue in 1678.

Quadruple Alliance of 1718-1719. An alliance between England, France, Germany, and Holland, to guarantee the succession in England to the House of Hanover; to secure the succession in France to the House of Bourbon; and to prohibit Spain and France from uniting under one crown. Signed at Paris.

Quadruple Alliance of 1834. The alliance of England, France, Spain, and Portugal for the purpose of restoring peace to the Peninsula, by putting down the Carlists or partisans of Don Carlos.

Quaint means trim, precise. A quaint phrase is a phrase dressed or trimmed, and not expressed in the ordinary way. (Latin, comptus, combed and dressed.)

Quaker. It appears from the "Journal" of George Fox, who was imprisoned for nearly twelve months in Derby, that the Quakers first obtained the appellation by which they are now generally known in 1650, from the following circumstance:—"Justice Bennet, of Derby," says Fox, "was the first to call us Quakers, because I bade him quake and tremble at the word of the Lord." The system of the Quakers is laid down by Robert Barclay in fifteen theses, called "Barclay's Apology," addressed to Charles II.

Quakers (that, like lanterns, bear
Their light within them) will not swear.
Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 2.

Quanda'ry. A perplexity; a doubt. (French, Qu'en dirai-je, What shall I say?)

Quamquam or Cancan. A slang manner of dancing quadrilles permitted in the public gardens of Paris, &c. The word cancan is a corruption of the Latin quamquam, a term applied to the exercises delivered by young theological students before the divinity professors. Hence it came to signify "babble," "jargon," anything crude, jeujeune, &c.

Quantum Suf. (sufficit). As much as is required. Latin for "as-much-as suffices." Often written q.s.

Quaranti'ne (3 syl.). The forty days that a ship suspected of being infected with some contagious disorder is obliged to lie off port. (Italian, quarantina, forty; French, quarantaine.)

To perform quarantine is to ride off port during the time of quarantine. (See Forty.)

Quarll (Philip). A sort of Robinson Crusoe, who had a chimpanzee for his "man Friday." The story relates the adventures and sufferings of an English hermit named Philip Quarll.

Quarrel. A short, stout arrow used in the cross-bow. (A corruption of carriol; Welsh, gwarel; French, carreau. So called because the head was originally carré or four-sided. Hence also a quarrel or quarry of glass, meaning a square or diamond-shaped pane; quarrier, a square wax-candle, &c.)

Quarrelles wayntly awaprez thorowe knyghtez
With iyne so wekryl, that wyche they never.
"Morte d'Arthur."

Quarrel. To quarrel over the bishop's cope—over something which cannot possibly do you any good; over goats' wool.

This is a French expression. The newly-appointed bishop of Bruges entered the town in his cope, which he gave to the people; and the people, to part it among themselves, tore it to shreds, each taking a piece.

Quarry. Prey. This is a term in falconry. When a hawk struck the object of pursuit and clung to it, she was said to "bind;" but when she flew off with it, she was said to "carry." The "carry" or "quarry," therefore, means the prey carried off by the hawk. It is an error to derive this word from the Latin quæro, to seek.

To tell the manner of it,
Were on the quarry of these murdered dees.
To add the death of you.

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," iv. 3.

Quarter. To grant quarter. To spare the life of an enemy in your power. Dr. Tusler says:—"It originated from an agreement anciently made between the Dutch and the Spaniards, that the ransom of a soldier should be the quarter of his pay." Probably it means simply to "grant conditions." In this sense quarter was commonly used at one time; hence its meanings of kindness, friendship, good-will—allied to cœur.

Quarters. Residence or place of abode; as winter quarters, the place where an army lodges during the winter months. We say "this quarter of the town," meaning this district or part; the French speak of the Latin quartier—i.e., the district or part of Paris where the medical schools, &c., are located; the Belgians speak of quartiers à louer, lodgings to let; and bachelors in England often say, "Come to my quarters"—i.e., apartments. All these are from the French verb écarteler, to locate soldiers à l'écart, in private houses.

There shall no leavened bread be seen with thee, neither shall there be leaven seen . . . in all thy quarters
[any of thy houses].—Exod. xiii. 7.

Quarter-Days in England and Ireland:—

(1) New Style: Lady day (25th March), Midsummer day (24th June), Michaelmas day (29th September), and Christmas day (25th December).

(2) Old Style: Old Lady day (6th April), Old Midsummer day (6th July), Old Michaelmas day (11th October), and Old Christmas day (6th January).

Quarter-days in Scotland:—

Candlemas day (2nd February), Whit-

Sunday (15th May), Lammas day (1st August), and Martinmas day (11th November).

Quarter-Master. The officer whose duty it is to attend to the quarters of the soldiers. (See QUARTERS.)

Quarter Waggoner. A book of sea-charts. Waggoner, or rather "Baron von Waggenaer," is a folio volume of sea-charts, pointing out the coasts, rocks, routes, &c. Dalrymple's Charts are called The English Waggoner. "Quarter" is a corruption of quarto.

Quarto. A book half the size of folio—i.e., where each sheet is folded into quarters or four leaves. (The contraction is 4to. (The Italian libro in quarto, French in quarto, from the Latin quartus.)

Quarto-De'cimans, who, after the decision of the Nicene Council, maintained that Easter ought to be held on the fourteenth day of the first lunar month near the vernal equinox, whether that day fell on a Sunday or not.

Quashee. A cant generic name of a negro; so called from Quassi of Surinam, who made known to Rolander the virtues of the quassia plant.

Quasi (Latin). Something which is not the real thing, but may be accepted in its place: thus a—

Quasi contract is not a real contract, but something which may be accepted as a contract, and which has the force of one.

Quasi tenant. The tenant of a house sub-let.

Quasimodo. A foundling, hideously deformed but of amazing strength, in Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame de Paris."

Quasimodo Sunday. The first Sunday after Easter; so called because the "Introit" or the day begins with these words:—"Quasi modo gen'iti infantes" (1 Pet. ii. 2). Also called "Low Sunday," being the first Sunday after the grand ceremonies of Easter.

Quas'sia. An American plant, or rather genus of plants, named after Quassy, a negro who brought them into notice.

Queen. Greek, gunē (a woman); Sanskrit, goni; Swedish, qvenna; Gothic, queens; Saxon, cwen. (See SIR, from anax, a king.)

Queen, "woman," is equivalent to "mother." In the translation of the Bible by Ulfilas (fourth century), we meet with gens and gino ("wife" and "woman"); and in the Scandinavian languages karl and kona still mean "man" and "wife." (See KING.)

He [Jesus] saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son! (St. John xix. 26.)

Queen Anne's Bounty. A fund created out of the first-fruits and tenths, which were part of the papal exactions before the Reformation. The first-fruits are the whole first year's profit of a clerical living, and the tenths are the tenth part annually of the profits of a living. Henry VIII. annexed both these to the crown, but queen Anne formed them into a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. The sum equals about £14,000 a year, and is now extended to the erection of parsonages.

Queen Dick. Richard Cromwell is sometimes so called; but when we say, "So-and-so happened in the reign of Queen Dick," we mean never, because there never was such a queen. (See GREEK CALEND.)

Queen Quintessence. Sovereign of Étélie (q.v.) in the romance of "Gargantua and Pantagruel," by Rabelais.

Queen-Square Hermit. Jeremy Bentham, who lived at No. 1, Queen Square, London. He was the father of the political economists called Utilitarians, whose maxim is, "The greatest happiness of the greatest number." (1748-1832.)

Queen of Hearts. Elizabeth, daughter of James I., the unfortunate queen of Bohemia, was so called in the Low Countries, in consequence of her amiable character and engaging manners, even in her lowest estate.

Queen of Heaven, with the ancient Phœnicians, was Astarté; Greeks, Hera; Romans, Juno; but with the Roman Catholics it is the Virgin Mary.

Queen of the Eastern Archipelago. The island of Java.

Queen of the North. Edinburgh. (See the proper name for other queens.)

Queen's Bench or King's Bench. One of the courts of law, in which the monarch used to preside in person.

Queen's College, Oxford, founded in 1340 by Robert de Eglesfield, and so called in compliment to queen Philippa, whose confessor he was.

Queen's College, Cambridge, founded in 1448 by Margaret of Anjou, consort of Henry VI.

Queen's Day. November 17th, the day of the accession of queen Elizabeth; first publicly celebrated in 1570, and still kept as a holiday at the Exchequer, and at the Westminster and Merchant Taylor's schools.

A rumor is spread in the court, and hath come to the ears of some of the most honourable counsell, how that I on the Queen's day last past did forbid in our college an oration to be made in praise of her Majesty's government, &c.—Dr. Whitaker to Lord Burghley (May 14th, 1590).

Queen's Weather. A fine day for a fête; so called because Queen Victoria is, for the most part, happy in having fine weather when she appears in public. (See VOLUNTEERS' WEATHER.)

Queenhithe (London). The hithe or strand for lading and unlading barges and lighters in the City. Called "queen" from being part of the dowry of Eleanor, queen of Henry II.

Queenstown (Ireland), formerly called the Cove of Cork. The name was changed in 1850, out of compliment to Queen Victoria, when she visited Ireland with her husband, and created her eldest son earl of Dublin.

Queer. Odd, singular. (German, quer, cross, oblique.)

Queer Chap is the German querkopf, a cross-grained fellow.

Quency. A corruption of quintefeuil (five-leaved), the armorial device of the family.

Querelle d'Alleman. A contention about trifles, soon provoked and soon appeased. The Alleman family occupied nearly the whole of the Dauphiné in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. They had frequent quarrels, but always settled their disputes amongst themselves. (See QUEUE.)

Quern-Biter. The sword of Haco I. of Norway.

Quern-biter of Haco the Good,
Wherewith a stroke he hewed
The millstone through and through.
Longfellow.

Quer'no. Camillo Querno, of Apulia, hearing that Leo X. was a great patron of poets, went to Rome with a harp in his hand, and sang his Alexias, a poem containing 20,000 verses. He was introduced to the pope as a buffoon, but was promoted to the laurel.

Rome in her Capitol saw Querno sit,
Throned on seven hills, the Antichrist of wit.
"Dunciad," ii.

Querpo (2 syl.). Shrill Querpo, in Garth's "Dispensary," is Dr. Howe.

In Querpo. In one's shirt-sleeves; in undress. (Spanish, en cuerpo, without a cloak.)

Boy, my cloak and rapier: it fits not a gentleman of my rank to walk the streets in querpo.—Beaumont and Fletcher, "Love's Cure," ii. l.

Question. To move the previous question, in parliamentary debate, means this: that some question put by an opponent of a measure brought forward should be put to the vote before the question itself; for example, A moves that the rate of postage should be reduced, B moves that the post-office be allowed time to consider the matter; A presses his motion, and C moves the previous question—that is, that the post-office be consulted first. This is often done to burk a troublesome motion.

Question. When members of the House of Commons or other debaters call out Question, they mean that the person speaking is wandering away from the subject under consideration.

Queu'bus. The equinoctial of Queu'bus. This line has Utopia on one side and Medam'othi on the other. It was discovered on the Greek Kalends by Outis after his escape from the giant's cave, and is ninety-one degrees from the poles.

Thou wast in very gracious fooling last night, when thou spokest of Picrogram'itus, of the Vapians passing the equinoctial of Queu'bus. 'Twas very good 'f faith.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," ii. 3.

Queue. Gare la queue des Alleman. Before you quarrel count the consequences. A troublesome neighbour entered into a quarrel with the Alleman family, but the whole clan combined in a "queue," made war upon him, and cut him to pieces. (See QUERELLE.)

Queux. The seneschal of king Arthur.

Qui. To give a man the qui. When a man in the printing business has had notice to quit, his fellow-workmen say they "have given him the qui." Here qui is the contraction of quies (discharge). (See QUIETUS.)

Qui-Tam. A lawyer; so called from the first two words in an action on a penal statute. Qui tam pro dom'nd Regi'nd, quam pro se-ipso, sequitur (Who sues on the Queen's account as much as on his own).

Qui Vive? (French). Who goes there? The challenge of a French sentinel.

To be on the qui vive. On the alert; to be quick and sharp; to be on the tip-toe of expectation, like a sentinel on guard. (See above.)

Quibble is the Welsh cwip, a quirk, and not the Latin quid libet (what you please), as is generally given.

Quick. Living; hence animated, lively; hence fast, active, brisk (Welsh, cwic, living, alive). Our expression, "Look alive," means Be brisk.

Whence He shall come to judge both the quick and the dead.—Common Prayer Book (Creed).

Quick at meat, quick at work. In French, "Bonne bête s'échauffe en mangeant," or "Hardi gagnneur, hardi mangeur." The opposite would certainly be true: A dawdle in one thing is a dawdle in all.

Quickly (Dame). Hostess of a tavern in Eastcheap. — Shakespeare, "Henry IV.," parts i. and ii.

Mistress Quickly. Servant of all-work to Dr. Caius. She says: "I wash, wring, brew, bake, scour, dress meat and drink, make the beds, and do all myself." She is the go-between of three suitors to Anne Page, and to prove her disinterestedness she says: "I would my master had Mistress Anne, or I would Master Slender had her, or in sooth I would Master Fenton had her. I will do what I can for them all three, for so I have promised; and I'll be as good as my word; but speciously for Master Fenton." — Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Quicksand is sand which shifts its place as if it were alive. (See QUICK.)

A quicksand of deceit.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," v. 4.

Quickset is living blackthorn set in a hedge, instead of dead wood, hurdles, and palings. (See QUICK.)

Quicksilver is argentum vivum (living silver), silver that moves about like a living thing. (See QUICK.)

Swift as quicksilver
It courses through the natural gases
And alleys of the body.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," l. 5.

Quid of Tobacco. A corruption of cud, a morsel. We still say "chew the cud."

Quid pro Quo or A quid for a quod. Tit for tat; a turn given as good as that received; a Rowland for an Oliver; an equivalent.

Quid Libet. Quid-libets and quod-libets. Nice and knotty points, very subtle, but of no value. Quips and quirks. (Latin.)

Quiddity. The essence of a thing. Schoolmen say Quid est, what is it? and the reply is the Quid is so and so, the What or the nature of the thing is as follows. The latter quid being formed into a barbarous Latin noun becomes Quidditas. Hence Quid est, what is it? Answer: Talis est quidditas, its essence is as follows.

He knew
Where entity and quiddity
(The ghosts of defunct bodies) fly.
Butler, "Hudibras," l. 1.

Quiddity. A crotchet; a trifling distinction. (See above.)

Quidnunc. A political Paul Pry; a pragmatical village politician; a political botcher or jobber. Quidnunc is the chief character in Murphy's farce of "The Upholsterer, or What News." The words are Latin, and mean "What now?" "What has turned up?" The original of this political busybody was the father of Dr. Arne and his sister, Mrs. Cibber, who lived in King Street, Covent Garden. (See The Tattler, 155, &c.)

Familiar to a few Quidnuncs.—The Times.

The Florentine Quidnuncs seem to lose sight of the fact that none of these gentlemen now hold office.—The Times.

Quidnunkis. Monkey politicians. Gay has a fable called "The Quidnunkis," to show that the death not even of the duke regent will cause any real gap in nature. A monkey who had ventured higher than his neighbours fell from his estate into the river below. For a few seconds the whole tribe stood panic-struck, but as soon as the stream carried off Master

Pug, the monkeys went on with their gambols as if nothing had occurred.

Ah, sir! you never saw the Ganges:
There dwell the nation of Quidnunkis
(So Monomotapa calls monkeys).

Gay, "Toles."

Qui'etist. One who believes that the most perfect state of man is when the spirit ceases to exercise any of its functions, and is wholly passive. This sect has cropped up at sundry times; but the last who revived it was Michael Moli'nos, a Spanish priest, in the seventeenth century.

Qui'e'tus. The writ of discharge formerly granted to those barons and knights who personally attended the king on a foreign expedition. At their discharge they were exempt from the claim of scutage or knight's fee. Subsequently the term was applied to the acquittance which a sheriff receives on settling his account at the Exchequer; and later still to any discharge of an account: thus Webster says—

You had the trick in audit-time to be sick
Till I had signed your quietus.
"Dulchess of Malfy" (1623).

Quietus. A severe blow; a settler; death, or discharge from life.

Who would fardels bear.....
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare bodkin?

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 1.

Quillet. An evasion. In French "pleadings" each separate allegation in the plaintiff's charge, and every distinct plea in the defendant's answer, used to begin with qu'il est; whence our quillet, to signify a false charge, or an evasive answer.

O, some authority how to proceed;
Some tricks, some quillots, how to cheat the devil!
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 3.

Quilp. A hideous dwarf, both fierce and cunning, in "The Old Curiosity Shop," by Dickens.

Quinap'alus. The Mrs. Harris of "authorities in citations." If any one wishes to clench an argument by some quotation, let him cite this ponderous collection.

What says Quinapalus: "Better a witty fool, than a foolish wit."—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," l. 5.

Quinbus Flestrin. The man-mountain—so the Lilliputians called Gulliver (chap. ii.). Gay has an ode to this giant.

Bards of old Of him told,
When they said Atlas' head
Propped the skies.

Gay, "Lilliputian Ode."

Quince (Peter). A carpenter, and manager of the play in "Midsummer Night's Dream." He is noted for some strange compounds, such as laughable tragedy, lamentable comedy, tragical mirth, &c.

Quino'nes (Suero de), in the reign of Juan II., with nine other cavaliers, held the bridge of Orbigo against all comers for thirty-six days, overthrowing in that time seventy-eight knights of Spain and France. Quinones had challenged the world, and such was the result.

Quinquages'ima Sunday (Latin, fiftieth). Shrove-Sunday, or the first day of the week which contains Ash-Wednesday. It is so called because in round numbers it is the fiftieth day before Easter.

Quintessence. The fifth essence. The ancient Greeks, like modern chemists, said there are four elements or forms in which matter can exist:—Fire, or the imponderable form; air, or the gaseous form; water, or the liquid form; and earth, or the solid form. The Pythagore'ans added a fifth, which they called ether, more subtle and pure than fire, and possessed of an orbicular motion. This element, which flew upwards at creation, and out of which the stars were made, was called the fifth essence; quintessence therefore means the most subtle extract of a body that can be procured. It is quite an error to suppose that the word means an essence five times distilled, and that the term came from the alchemists. Horace speaks of "kisses which Venus has imbued with the quintessence of her own nectar."

Swift to their several quarters hasted then
The cumbrous elements—earth, flood, air, fire;
But this ethereal quintessence of heaven
Flew upward . . . and turned to steam
Numberless as thou'art dust.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," l. iii.

Quintil'ians. Disciples of Quintil'ia, held to be a prophetess. These heretical Christians made the Eucharist of bread and cheese, and allowed women to become priests and bishops.

Quiri'tës. Romans. The word means "spear-bearers" (Latin, quiris, a spear). Varro's etymology is quite unworthy of credit; he derives the word from Curës, and says that the Quirinal Hill, being occupied by these Sabines, received its name from them. This is about as correct as the derivation of Rome from Romulus, or Britain from Brutus.

Quisquill'iaë. Light, dry fragments of things; the small twigs and leaves which fall from trees; hence rubbish, refuse. (Couscouliou means husks of beans or peas; Gaelic, gusgul, orts, idle words.)—Trench.

Quit. Discharged from an obligation, "acquitted."

To John I owed great obligation;
But John unhappily thought fit

To publish it to all the nation—

Now I and John are fairly quit.—Prior.

Cry quits. When two boys quarrel and one has had enough, he says, "Cry quits," meaning "Let us leave off, and call it a drawn game." So in an unequal distribution he who has the larger share restores a portion and "cries quits," meaning that he has made the distribution equal. Here quit means "acquittal" or discharge.

Double or quits. In gambling, especially in a small way, one of the players says to the other, "Double or quits?"—that is, the next stake shall be double the present winnings, or the winnings shall be returned to the loser, in which case both players would leave off as they began. Here quit means "requital" or repayment.

Quit Rent. A corruption of the Saxon Hwit rent (white rent) as it is called in old records, because it was paid in white or silver money, and not in coin like ordinary rents. It is an error to suppose that the name is derived from the fact that a tenant, having paid it, is quit of all further rent.

Quixa'da (Gutierre). Lord of Villagarcia. He discharged a javelin at Sire de Haburdin with such force as to pierce the left shoulder, overthrow the knight, and pin him to the ground. Don Quixote calls himself a descendant of this brave knight.

Quixote (Don) is intended for the duke of Lerma, Rawdon Brown.

Don Quixote. The romance so called is a merciless satire by Cervantës on the chivalric romances of the Middle Ages, and had the excellent effect of putting an end to this sort of literature.

Don Quixote's horse. Ros'inantë (Spanish, rocin-ante, a jade previously).

The wooden-pin wing-horse on which he and Sancho Panza mounted to achieve the liberation of Dolorí'da and her companions was called Algíe'ro Clavile'no (wooden-pin wing-bearer).

Quixote of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, sometimes called the Madman. (1682, 1697-1718.)

Quixot'ic. Dreamy, foolishly romantic, like Don Quixote, a half-crazy reformer or knight of the supposed distressed.

Quiz. One who banters or chaffs another. Daly, manager of the Dublin theatre, laid a wager that he would introduce into the language within twenty-four hours a new word of no meaning. Accordingly on every wall, or all places accessible, were chalked up the four mystic letters, and all Dublin was inquiring what they meant. The wager was won, and the word remains current in our language. It is a corruption of Quid ís't? (What is this?)

Quo Warranto. A writ against a defendant (whether an individual or a corporation) who lays claim to something he has no right to; so named because the offender is called upon to show quo warranto [rem] usurpa'vit (by what right or authority he lays claim to the matter of dispute).

Quod. To be in quod—in prison. A corruption of quod, which is a contraction of quadrangle. The quadrangle is the prison enclosure in which the prisoners are allowed to walk, and where whippings used to be inflicted.

Flogged and whipped in quod.
Hughes, "Tom Brown's School-days."

Quodling (The Rev. Mr.). Chaplain to the duke of Buckingham.—Sir Walter Scott, "Peveril of the Peak."

"Why," said the duke, "I had caused my little Quodling to go through his oration thus:—'That whatever evil reports had passed current during the life-time of the worthy matron whom they had restored to dust that day, Malice herself could not deny that she was born well, married well, lived well, and died well: since she was born in Shadwell, married to Cresswell, lived in Camberwell, and died in Briuwell.'"—"Peveril of the Peak," ch. xlv.

Quondam (Latin). Formerly. We say, He is a quondam schoolfellow—my former schoolfellow; My quondam friend, The quondam candidate, &c.; also The quondam chancellor, &c.

My quondam barber, but "his worship" now.
Dryden.

Quo'rum. Those persons essential to make up a committee or board. Commissions of the peace are addressed to several persons by name—say five or seven—of which (quo'rum) some two or three are named as essential to form the board, and without whose presence no business can be done. Thus, suppose the commission to be named A, B, C, D, E, &c., it would run—"Of these I wish A to be one" (quorum aliquem vestrum unum esse volumus). These honoured names are called "Justices of the Quo'rum." Slender calls Justico Shallow justice of the peace and quorum.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," i. 1.

Quota (Latin). The allotted portion or share; the rate assigned to each. Thus we say, "Every man is to pay his quota towards the feast."

Quotem (Caleb). A parish clerk and Jack-of-all-trades, in "The Wags of Windsor," by Colman.

R

R in prescriptions. The ornamental part of this letter is the symbol of Jupiter (♃), under whose special protection all medicines were placed. The letter itself (Recipè, take) and its flourish may be thus paraphrased: "Under the good auspices of Jove, the patron of medicines, take the following drugs in the proportions set down." It has been suggested that the symbol is for Responsum Raphaelis, from the assertion of Dr. Napier, and other physicians of the seventeenth century, that the angel Raphael imparted them.

R is called the dog-letter, because a dog in snarling utters the letter r-r-r-r, r-r, r-r-r-r, &c.—sometimes preceded by a g.

Irritata canis quod RR quam plurima dicat.
Lucilius.

[R] that's the dog's name. R is for the dog.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4.

The three R's. Sir William Curtis being asked to give a toast said, "I will give you the three R's—writing, reading, and arithmetic."

The House is aware that no payment is made except on the "three R's."—Mr. Corry, M.P., Address to the House of Commons, Feb. 2th, 1867.

Parochial education in Scotland had never been continued to the three R's.—The Times, Feb. 26th, 1869.

R. M. T. In the reign of William III. all child-stealers (comprachios) apprehended were branded with red-hot iron: R (rogue) on the shoulders; M (man-slayer) on the right hand; and T (thief) on the left.

Rabbet. To slope down two pieces of wood diagonally, so as to overlap each other, with a view to juncture. (French, rabot, a plane; rabotté, planed down.)

Rabbi Abron of Trent. A fictitious sage, and wonderful linguist, "who knew the nature of all manner of herbs, beasts, and minerals." — "Reynard the Fox," ch. xii.

Rabbi Bar-Coch'ba, in the reign of the emperor Hadrian, made the Jews believe that he was the Messiah, because he had the art of breathing fire. — Beckmann, "History of Inventions."

Rabbit. A Welsh rabbit. Toasted cheese, or rather bread and cheese toasted together. A corruption of "rare-bit" meaning a tit-bit or delicious morsel.

Rab'elais. The English Rabelais. Swift, Sterne, and Thomas Amory have all been so called.

The modern Rabelais. William Maginn. (1794-1842.)

Rabelais' Dodge. Rabelais one day was at a country inn, and finding he had no money to pay his score, got himself arrested as a traitor who was forming a project to poison the princes. He was immediately sent to Paris and brought before the magistrates; but as no tittle of evidence was found against him, was liberated forthwith. By this artifice he not only got out of his difficulty at the inn, but he also got back to Paris free of expense.

Rabelais'ian Licence. The wild grotesque of Rabelais, whether in words or artistic illustrations.

Rabica'no or Rabican. The name of Astolpho's horse. Its sire was Wind, and its dam Fire. It fed on unearthly food. — "Orlando Furioso."

Argalia's steed in "Orlando Inamorate" is called by the same name.

Raboin or Raboino (French). The devil; so called from the Spanish rabo, a tail. In the mediæval ages it was vulgarly asserted that the Jews were born with tails; this arose from a confusion of the word rabbi or rabbins with raboin or rabuino.

Rab'sheka, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Sir Thomas Player. Rab-shakeh was the officer sent by Sennacherib to summon the Jews to surrender, and he told them insolently that resistance was in vain (2 Kings xviii.).

Next him, let railing Rab'sheka have place—
So full of zeal, he has no need of grace. (Pt. ii.)

Raby (Aurora). The model of this exquisite sketch was Miss Millbank, as she appeared to lord Byron when he first knew her. Miss Millpond (a little further on in the same canto) is the same lady after marriage. In Canto I., Donna Inez is an enlarged photograph of the same person. Lord Byron describes himself in the first instance under the character of Don Juan, and in the last as Don José.

Races. Goodwood Races. So called from Goodwood Park, in which they are held. They begin the last Tuesday of July, and continue four days, of which Thursday (the "cup-day") is the principal. These races are very select, and admirably conducted. Goodwood Park was purchased by Charles, first duke of Richmond, of the Compton family, then resident in East Lavant, a village two miles north of Chichester.

The seven annual race meetings at Newmarket. (1) The Craven; (2) first spring; (3) second spring; (4) July; (5) first October; (6) second October; (7) the Houghton.

The Epsom. So called from Epsom Downs, where they are held. They last four days.

The Derby. The second day (Wednesday) of the great May meeting at Epsom, in Surrey; so called from the earl of Derby, who instituted the stakes in 1780.

The Oaks. The fourth day (Friday) of the great Epsom races; so called from "Lambert's Oaks," erected on lease by the "Hunters' Club." The Oaks estate passed to the Derby family, and the twelfth earl established the stakes so called.

St. Leger. The great Doncaster race; so called from colonel St. Leger, who founded the stakes in 1776.

Ascot, held on Ascot Heath, in Berks.

Rach'aders. The second tribe of giants or evil genii, who had frequently made the earth subject to their kings, but were ultimately punished by Shiva and Vishnoo.—Indian mythology.

Rache. A "setter," or rather a dog that hunts wild beasts, birds, and even fishes by scent. The female is called a brache—i.e., bitch-rache. (Saxon, ræce; French, braque.)

A leyshe of ratches to renne an hare.—Skelton
"Magnificence."

Rack. A refuse, ruin, wreck. (Danish, vrag; Swedish, vrack; Dutch, wrak; Saxon, wrac. Thus, rack and ruin, gone to rack.)

The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve;
And.....leave not a rack behind.
Shakespeare, "Tempest," iv. 1.

Rack. The instrument of torture so called was a frame in which a man was fastened, and his arms and legs were stretched till the body was lifted by the tension several inches from the floor. Not unfrequently the limbs were forced thereby out of their sockets. Coke says that the rack was first introduced into the Tower by the duke of Exeter, constable of the Tower in 1447, whence it was called the "duke of Exeter's daughter." (See RACK-RENT.)

Rack and manger. Housekeeping.

To lay at rack and manger. To live at reckless expense. Here "at" means out, as in the proverb "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

When Virtue was a country maide,
And had no skill to set up trade,
She came up with a carrier's jade,
And lay at rack and manger
"Life of Robin Goodfellow." (1623.)

Rack-Rent. The actual value or rent of a tenement, and not that modified form on which the rates and taxes are usually levied. (Saxon, racun, to stretch; Dutch, rek.)

Racket. Noise or confusion, like that of persons playing racket or tennis.

Racy. Having distinctive piquancy, as racy wine. It was first applied to wine, and, according to Cowley, comes to us from the Spanish and Portuguese raux (root), meaning having a radical or distinct flavour; but probably it is a corruption of "relishy," French relâché (flavorous).

Rich racy verse, in which we see
The soil from which they come, taste, smell, and see.
Cowley.

Racy Style. Piquant composition, the very opposite of mawkish.

Radcliffe Library (Orford). Founded by Dr. John Radcliffe, of Wakefield, Yorkshire. (1650-1714.)

When king William [III.] consulted [Radcliffe] on his swollen ancles and thin body, Radcliffe said "I would not have your majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms."—Leigh Hunt, The "Town," ch. vi.

Radegaste. A tutelary god of the Slavi. The head was that of a cow, the breast was covered with an ægis, the left hand held a spear, and a cock surmounted its helmet.—Slavonic mythology.

Radegond or Radigund. Queen of the Amazons, "half like a man." Getting the better of Sir Art'egal in a single combat, she compels him to dress in "woman's weeds," with a white apron before him, and to spin flax. Brit'o-mart, being informed of his captivity by Talus, goes to the rescue, cuts off the Amazon's head, and liberates her knight.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. v. 7.

St. Radégonde or Radegund, wife of Clothaire king of France, is usually depicted in royal garments, sometimes with the crown at her feet, and sometimes with wolves by her side, to indicate the legend of her familiarity with the wild beasts.

St. Radegonde's Lifted Stone. A stone sixty feet in circumference, placed on five supporting stones, said by the historians of Poitou to have been so arranged in 1478, to commemorate a great fair held on the spot in the October of that year. The country people insist that queen Radegonde brought the impost stone on her head, and the five uprights in her apron, and arranged them all with her own hands as they appear to this day.

Rad'ical. An ultra-liberal, verging on republican opinions. The term was first applied as a party name in 1818 to Henry Hunt, Major Cartwright, and others of the same elique, who wished to introduce radical reform in the representative system, and not merely to disfranchise and enfranchise a borough or two. Lord Bolingbroke, in his "Discourses on Parties," says, "Such a remedy might have wrought a radical cure of the evil that threatens our constitution." (Letter xviii.)

Rag. A tatter, hence a remnant, hence a vagabond or ragamuffin.

Lash hence these overweening rags of France.
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

Rag. A cant term for a farthing.

Money by me? Heart and good-will you might,
But surely, master, not a rag of money.
Shakespeare, "Comedy of Errors," iv. 4.

Rank Pride may be seen peering through the rags of Antisthenes' doublet. Antisthenes was the founder of the Cynic school in Athens, and affected the utmost indifference to dress. He wore a coarse ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. It was Socrates who said he could see Rank Pride peering through the holes of Antisthenes' rags.

Rags and Jags. Rags and tatters. A jagged edge is one that is toothed. (German, zacken, a tooth.)

Hark, hark! the dogs do bark:
The beggars are coming to town,
Some in rags and some in jags,
And some in silken gown.

Nursery rhyme.

Ragamuffin or Raggamuffin. A muff or muffin is a poor thing of a creature, a "regular muff;" so that a ragamuffin is a sorry creature in rags. (See MUFF.)

I have led my ragamuffins where they are peppered.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," v. 3.

Ragged-Robin. A wild-flower. The word is used by Tennyson to mean a pretty damsel in ragged clothes.

The prince
Hath picked a ragged-robin from the hedge.
Tennyson, "Idylls of the King" (Enid).

Raghu. A legendary king of Oude, belonging to the dynasty of the Sun. The poem called the Raghu-vansa, in nineteen cantos, gives the history of these mythic kings.

Ragi'nis. Nymphs who preside over music.—Indian mythology.

Ragman Roll originally meant the roll of Ragimund, a legate of Scotland, who compelled all the clergy to give a true account of their benefices, that they might be taxed at Rome accordingly. Subsequently it was applied to the four great rolls of parchment recording the acts of fealty and homage done by the Scotch nobility to Edward I. in 1296; these four rolls consisted of thirty-five pieces sewn together. The originals perished, but a record of them is preserved in the Rolls House, Chancery Lane.

Ragnarök (twilight of the gods). The day of doom, when the present world and all its inhabitants will be annihilated. Vidar and Vali will survive the conflagration, and reconstruct the universe on an imperishable basis.—Scandinavian mythology.

And, Frithiof, may'st thou sleep away
Till Ragnarök, if such thy will.
Frithiof-Saga, "Frithiof's Joy."

Ragout is something "more-ish," something you will be served twice to (Latin, re-gustus, tasted again; French, re-goûté).

Ra'han (holy man). The Pali word for a monk.

Ra'hu. The demon that causes eclipses. One day Rahu stole into Valhalla to quaff some of the nectar of immortality. He was discovered by the Sun and Moon, who informed against him, and Vishnu cut off his head. As he had already taken some of the nectar into his mouth, the head was immortal, and ever afterwards hunted the Sun and Moon, which caught occasionally, causing eclipses.—Hindu mythology.

Railway King. George Hudson, of Yorkshire, chairman of the North Midland Company, and for a time the Dictator of the Railway Speculations. In one day he cleared £100,000. His connection with the Eastern Counties Railway brought him to grief, and recently a subscription has been made to relieve his "penury." (1800-*)

Rain. To rain cats and dogs. In Northern mythology the cat is supposed to have great influence on the weather, and English sailors still say, "The cat has a gale of wind in her tail," when she is unusually frisky. Witches that rode upon the storms were said to assume the form of cats; and the stormy north-west wind is called the cat's-nose in the Harz even at the present day.

The dog is a signal of wind, like the wolf, both which animals were attendants of Odin, the storm-god. In old German pictures the wind is figured as the "head of a dog or wolf," from which blasts issue.

The cat therefore symbolises the down-pouring rain, and the dog the strong gusts of wind which accompany a rain-storm; and a "rain of cats and dogs" is a heavy rain with wind. (See CAT AND DOG.)

Rainbow. (See CIRCLE OF ULLOA.)

Rainy Day. Evil times.

Lay by something for a rainy day. Save something against evil times; provide for days of ill-fortune.

Raise the Wind. To obtain ready money by hook or crook. A sea phrase. What wind is to a ship, money is to commerce.

Rajah. (Sanskrit for king, cognate with the Latin rex or rex.) Maha-rajah means the "Great rajah."

Rak'shas. Evil spirits who guard the treasures of Kuvera, the god of riches. They haunt cemeteries, and devour human beings; assume any shape at will, and their strength increases as the day declines. Some are hideously ugly, but others, especially the female spirits, allure by their beauty.—Hindu mythology.

Raleigh. Sir Walter Scott introduces in "Kenilworth" the tradition of his laying down his cloak on a miry spot for the queen to step on.

Hark ye, Master Raleigh, see thou fail not to wear thy muddy cloak, in token of penitence, till our pleasure be further known.—Sir Walter Scott, "Kenilworth," ch. xv.

Rally is re-alligo, to bind together again. (French, re-lie.) In Spenser it is spelt re-allio—

Before they could new consels re-allie.
"Faëry Queen."

Ralph or Ralpho. The squire of Hudibras. The model was Isaac Robinson, a zealous butcher in Moorfields, always contriving some queer art of church government. He represents the Independent party, and Hudibras the Presbyterian.

He was himself under the tyranny of scruples as unreasonable as those of Ralpho.—Macaulay.

Ralph Roister Doister. The title of the earliest English comedy; so called from the chief character. Written by Nicholas Udall. (16th century.)

Ram. The usual prize at wrestling matches. Thus Chaucer says of his Mellero, "At wrastlyng he wolde bere away the ram."—"Canterbury Tales" (Prologue, 550).

Ram and Teazle, a public-house sign, is in compliment to the Clothiers' Company. The ram with the golden fleece is emblematical of wool, and the teazle is used for raising the nap of wool spun and woven into cloth.

Ram Feast. May morning is so called at Holne, near Dartmoor, because on that day a ram is run down in the "Plov Field." It is roasted whole with its skin and fur, close by a granite pillar. At mid-day a scramble takes place for a slice, which is supposed to bring luck to those who get it. This is a relic of Baal-worship in England.

Râma. There are three Indian deities so called—all gods incarnate of surpassing beauty: one seems to resemble Bacchus and his exploits in India; another may be termed the Indian Mars; and the third is the sixth incarnation of the god Vishnu, whose wife was Sitâ.

Rama-Yana. The history of Râmâ, the best great epic poem of ancient India, and worthy to be ranked with the "Iliad" of Homer.

Ram'adan. The ninth month of the Mahometan year, and the Mussulman's Lent or Holy month.

November is the financial Ramadan of the Sublime Porte.—The Times.

That is, when the Turkish government promises all kinds of financial reforms and curtailments of national expenses.

Ramazani's Feast. The Turkish or Mahometan "Lent." Also called "Ramazan" or "Ramadan" (q.v.).

Rambouillet. Hôtel de Rambouillet. The réunion of rank and literary genius on terms of equality: a coterie where sparkling wit with polished manners prevailed. The marquise de Rambouillet, in the seventeenth century, reformed the French soirées, and purged them of the gross morals and licentious conversation which at that time prevailed. The present good taste, freedom without licentiousness, wit without double entendre, equality without familiarity, was due to this illustrious Italian. The "Précieuses Ridicules" of Molière was a satire on her imitators, without her talent and good taste. Catharine marquise de Rambouillet. (1588-1665.)

Ramee Samee. The conjuror who swallowed swords, and could twist himself into a knot as if he had neither bones nor joints.

Ramesch'ne (3 syl.). A good genius of the Parsis, whose charge was to watch over the well-being of man.—Persian mythology.

Ram'esēs (3 syl.). The title of an ancient Egyptian dynasty; it means Offspring of the Sun. This title was first assumed towards the close of the eighteenth dynasty, and ran through the nineteenth. Rameses III. is called Rhampsini'tes by Herod'otos. Sesostris is supposed to be identical with Rameses the Great. (Eses, i.e., Isis.)

Ram'iel (2 syl.). One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means One that exalts himself against God.

Raminago'bris. A cat; a vile poet. La Fontaine in several of his fables gives this name to the cat. Rabelais under this name satirises Guillaume Crétin, an old French poet in the reigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and François I.—"Gargantua and Pantagruel," iii. 21.

Rampall'ian. A term of contempt; probably it means a rampant or wanton woman; hence in "A New Trick to Cheat the Devil" (1639) we have this line: "And bold rampallian-like, swear and drink drunk."

Away, you scullion! you rampallian! you fustilarian! I'll tickle your catastrophè.—Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," ii. 1.

Ramsay the Rich. Ramsay used to be called the Crescus of our English abbeys. It had only sixty monks of the Benedictine order to maintain, and its revenues allowed £1,000 a year to the abbot, and £100 a year for each of its monks.

David Ramsay. The old watchmaker near Temple Bar.

Margaret Ramsay. His daughter, who becomes the bride of lord Nigel.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Ramsbottom (Mrs.). A vile speller of the Queen's English. It was the signature of Theodore Hook in his letters published in the John Bull newspaper, 1829.

Ra'na. Goddess of the sea, and wife of the sea-god Aëger.—Scandinavian mythology.

"May Rana keep them in the deep,

As is her wont,

And no one save them from the grave,"

Cried Hekehoht.

Erithiof-Saga, "The Banishment."

Randem-Tandem. A tandem of three horses.—University term.

Random (Roderick). A young Scotch scapegrace in quest of fortune; at one time basking in prosperity, at another in utter destitution. He is led into different countries, whose peculiarities are described; and into all sorts of society, as that of wits, sharpers, courtiers, courtizans, and so on. Though occasionally lavish, he is inherently mean; and though possessing a dash of humour, is contemptibly revengeful. His treatment of Strap is revolting to a generous mind. Strap lends him money in his necessity, but the heartless Roderick wastes the loan, treats Strap as a mere servant, fleeces him at dice, and cuffs him when the game is adverse.—Smollett, "Roderick Random."

Ranks. Risen from the ranks. From mean origin; a self-made man. A military term applied to an officer who once served as a private soldier.

Rank and File. Altogether, every one. The rank is the depth, and the file the length of marching soldiers. The "rank men" stand shoulder by shoulder, the "file men" stand behind each other. Thus 100 men four deep would be twenty-five files ranged four in a row (in four ranks).

Ran'tipole (3 syl.). A harum-scarum fellow, a mad-cap (Dutch, randten, to be in a state of idiocy or insanity, and pole, a head or person). The present emperor (Napoleon III.) was called Rantipole, for his escapades at Strasbourg and Boulogne. In 1852, I myself saw a man commanded by the police to leave Paris within twenty-four hours for calling his dog Rantipole.

Ranz des Vaches. Simple melodies played by the Swiss mountaineers on their Alphorn when they drive their herds to pasture, or call them home (pour ranger des vaches, to bring the cows to their place). The Tyrolese "airs" are a polished sort of Ranz des vaches.

Rap. Not worth a rap. The rap was a base halipenny, intrinsically worth about half a farthing, issued for the nounce in Ireland in 1721, because small coin was so very scarce. There was also a coin in Switzerland called a rappe, worth the seventh of a penny.

Rape (1 syl.). The division of a county. Sussex is divided into six rapes, each of which has its river, forest, and castle. Rapp is Norwegian for a parish district, and rape in Doomsday-book is used for a district under military jurisdiction. The Saxon rāp, like the Greek schoinos, signifies not only a rope, but also a measure of land. (See RIDING.)

Raph'ael. The sociable archangel who travelled with Tobías into Me'dea and back again, instructing him on the way how to marry Sara and to drive away the wicked spirit. Milton introduces him as sent by God to advertise Adam of his danger. (See SEVEN SPIRITS.)

Raphael, the sociable spirit, that deigned
To travel with Tobias, and secured
His marriage with the seven-times-wedded wife.
"Paradise Lost," v.

Raphael, according to Longfellow, is the angel of the Sun, who brings to man the "gift of faith."

I am the angel of the Sun,
Whose flaming wheels began to run
When God Almighty's breath
Said to the darkness and the night
"Let there be light," and there was light.—
I bring the gift of faith.
"Golden Legend" (The Miracle Play, iii.).

St. Raphael, the archangel, is usually distinguished in Christian art by a pilgrim's staff, or carrying a fish, in allusion to his aiding Tobias to capture the fish which performed the miraculous cure of his father's eye-sight.

The French Raphael. Eustace Lesueur. (1617-1655.)

The Raphael of Cats. Godefroi Mind, a Swiss painter, noted for his cats. (1763-1814.)

Rapparee'. A wild Irish plunderer, so called from his being armed with a rapary or half-pike.

Rappee. A coarse species of snuff, manufactured from dried tobacco by an instrument called in French a râpe, "instrument en metal percé de plusieurs trous, dont on se sert pour réduire les corps en pulpe ou en fragments. On se sert surtout de la râpe dans les ménages, pour le sucre, le chocolat, le poivre; et dans les usines, pour le tabac, les betteraves, les pommes de terre qu'on réduit en fécule, &c.—Bouillet, "Dictionnaire des Sciences."

Ra'ra A'vis (Latin, a rare bird). A phenomenon; a prodigy; a something quite out of the common course. This bird is now familiar to us; it is a native of Australia, and has given name to the "Swan River." It is not uncommon in our own island.

Rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cyeno.
Juvenal.

Rare Ben. So Shakespeare called Ben Jonson, the dramatist. (1574-1637.) Aubrey says that this inscription on his tablet in the "Poets' Corner," Westminster Abbey, "was done at the charge of Jack Young (afterwards knighted), who, walking there when the grave was covering, gave the fellow eighteenpence to cut it." At the late relaying of the pavement, this stone was unhappily removed. When Sir William Davenant was interred in Westminster Abbey, the inscription on his covering-stone was, "O rare Sir William Davenant"—showing how nearly the sublime and the ridiculous often meet.

Rascal (Saxon). A lean, worthless deer; metaphorically, a base fellow. Hence Shakespeare says—"Horns! the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal." Hollyband gives it in his "Dictionarie" as the translation of commune (1593). Palsgrave calls a starveling animal like the lean kine of Pharaoh, "a rascall refus beest" (1530). Applied to men it means base, sorry jade. The French have rucaille (riff-raff).

Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV," v. 4.

Rascal Counters. Pitiful or paltry £ s. d. Brutus calls money paltry compared with friendship, &c.

When Marcus Brutus grows so covetous
To lock such rascal counters from his friends,
Be ready, gods, with all your thunder-bolts
Dash him to pieces.
Shakespeare, "Julius Caesar," iv. 3.

Rasher. A slice, as a rasher of bacon. (Italian, raschiare; French, raser; Welsh, rhasgyl, to slice or scrape; Latin, rasura lardi; our "razor," "erasure," &c.)

Rashleigh Osbaldistone. An accomplished but deceitful villain, called "the Scholar." He is the youngest of the six hopeful sons of Sir Hildebrand Osbaldistone. His worthy brothers were nicknamed "the Sot," "the Bully," "the Gamekeeper," "the Horse-jockey," "the Fool," and the crafty "Scholar."
—Sir Walter Scott, "Rob Roy."

Ra'siël. The angel who was the tutor of Adam.—Talmud.

Raskol'nik (separatists). So dissenters from the Greek church are called in Russia.

Ras'selas. Prince of Abyssinia, in Dr. Johnson's romance so called.

"Rasselas" is a mass of sense, and its moral precepts are certainly conveyed in striking and happy language. The mad astronomer who imagined that he possessed the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons, is an original character in romance; and the happy valley in which Rasselas resides is sketched with poetical feeling.—Young.

Rat. The Egyptians and Phrygians deified rats. The people of Bassora and Cambay to the present time forbid their destruction. In Egypt the rat symbolised "utter destruction;" it also symbolised "judgment," because rats always choose the best bread for their repast.

Rat. Pliny tells us (bk. viii., ch. 57) that the Romans drew presages from these animals, and to see a white rat foreboded good-fortune. The bucklers at Lanuvium being gnawed by rats presaged ill-fortune, and the battle of the Marses, fought soon after, confirmed this superstition. Proserpine's veil was embroidered with rats.

Irish rats rhymed to death. It was once a prevalent opinion that rats in pastures could be extirpated by anathematizing them in rhyming verse or by metrical charms. This notion is frequently alluded to by ancient authors: thus Ben Jonson says—"Rhyme them to death, as they do Irish rats" ("Poetaster"); Sir Philip Sidney says—"Though I will not wish unto you . . . to be rimed to death, as is said to be done in Ireland" ("Defence of Poesie"); and Shakespeare makes Rosalind say—"I was never so berhymed since . . . I was an Irish rat"—alluding to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls ("As You Like It," iii. 2). (See CHARM.)

I smell a rat. I perceive there is something concealed which is mischievous. The allusion is to a cat smelling a rat.

To rat. To forsake a losing side for the stronger party. It is said that rats forsake ships not weather-proof. A rat is one who rats or deserts his party.

Avorting....

The cup of sorrow from their lips,

And fly like rats from sinking ships.

Swift, "Epistle to Mr. Nugent."

Rat-killer. Apollo received this aristocratic sobriquet from the following incident:—Crisis, one of his priests, having neglected his official duties, he sent against him a swarm of rats and mice; but the priest, seeing the invaders coming, repented and obtained forgiveness of the god, who annihilated the swarms which he had sent with his far-darting arrows. For this redoubtable exploit the sun-god received the appellation of Apollo the Rat-killer.—Classic mythology.

Rat'atosk. The squirrel that runs up and down the mythological tree Yggdrasil, first listening to the eagle that sits in all the heat of the sun at the top, and then collecting news from the frost-giant in the old land of Hela.—Scandinavian mythology.

Ratja'sias. Evil spirits are so called by the Indians.

Ratten. To destroy or take away a workman's tools, or otherwise incapacitate him from doing work, for not paying his rat to a "benefit" fund, or for having offended a trades union. Rattening is the act of doing this ill turn (probably connected with rate, "to find fault;" Swedish, rata; Icelandic, reita, to chide. In the North, the word rattle means to "punish," "thrash," "revile").

Ratlin (Jack). A famous naval character in Smollett's "Roderick Random." Tom Bowling is another naval character in the same novel.

Raul. Sir Raul di Nangis, the Huguenot, in love with Valenti'na, daughter of the comte de St. Bris, governor of the Louvre. Being sent for by Marguerite, he is offered the hand of Valenti'na in marriage, but rejects it, because he fancies she is betrothed to the comte de Nevers. Nevers is slain in the Bartholomew massacre, and Valenti'na confesses her love for Raul. The two are united by Marcello, an old Puritan servant; but scarcely is the brief ceremony ended, when both are shot by the musketeers under the command of St. Bris.—Meyerbeer, "Gli Ugonotti" (an opera).

Rava'na, according to Indian mythology, was fastened down between heaven and earth for 10,000 years by Siva's leg, for attempting to move the hill of heaven to Ceylon. He is described as a demon-giant with ten faces.—Hindu mythology.

Raven. A bird of ill omen. They are said to forebode death and bring infection. The former notion arises from their following an army under the expectation of finding dead bodies to raven on; the latter notion is a mere offshoot of the former, seeing pestilence kills as fast as the sword.

The boding raven on her cottage sat,
And with hoarse croakings warned us of our fate.
Gay, "Pastorals" (the Dirge).

Like the sad-presaging raven that tolls
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
And, in the shadow of the silent night,
Does shake contagion from her sable wing.
Marlowe, "Jew of Malta" (1633).

Raven. Jovianus Pontanus relates two skirmishes between ravens and kites near Beneventum, which prognosticated a great battle. Nicetas speaks of a skirmish between crows and ravens as presaging the irruption of the Scythians into Thrace. He also tells us that his friend Mr. Draper, in the flower of his age and robust health, knew he was at the point of death, because two ravens flew into his chamber. Cicero was forewarned of his death by the fluttering of ravens, and Macaulay relates the legend that a raven entered the chamber of the great orator the very day of his murder, and pulled the clothes off his bed. Like many other birds, ravens indicate by their cries the approach of foul weather, but "it is full unfeeling to believe that God sheweth his prey counsaile to crows, as Isidore sayth."

He has the foresight of a raven. A raven was accounted at one time a prophetic bird. (See above.)

Of inspired birds ravens were accounted the most prophetic. Accordingly, in the language of that district, "to have the foresight of a raven" is to this day a proverbial expression.—Macaulay, "History of St. Kilda," p. 174.

Ravens bode famine. When a flock of ravens forsake the woods we may look for famine and mortality, because "ravens bear the characters of Saturn, the author of these calamities, and have a very early perception of the bad disposition of that planet." See "Athenian Oracle" (Supplement, p. 476).

As if the great god Jupiter had nothing else to do
But to dryve about jacke dawes and ravens.—Carneades.

The ravens were once as white as the swans, and not inferior in size; but one day a raven told Apollo that Coroënis, a Thessalian nymph whom he passionately loved, was faithless, and the god shot the nymph with his dart; but, hating the tell-tale bird—

He blacked the raven o'er,
And bid him prate in his white plumes no more.
Addison, "Translation of Ovid," bk. ii.

Ravens in Christian Art. Emblems of God's providence, in allusion to the ravens which fed Elijah. St. Oswald holds in his hand a raven with a ring in its mouth; St. Benedict has a raven at his feet; St. Paul the Hermit is drawn with a raven bringing him a loaf of bread; &c.

The "fatal Raven," consecrated to Odin, the Danish war-god, was the emblem on the Danish standard. This raven was said to be possessed of necromantic power. The standard was termed Landeydu (the desolation of the country), and miraculous powers were attributed to it. The fatal raven was the device of Odin, god of war, and was said to have been woven and embroidered in one noontide by the daughters of Regner Lodbrok, son of Sigurd, that dauntless warrior who chanted his death-song (the Krakamal) while being stung to death in a horrible pit filled with deadly serpents. If the Danish arms were destined to defeat, the raven hung his head and drooped his wings; if victory was to attend them, he stood erect and soaring, as if inviting the warriors to follow.

The Danish "Raven," lured by annual prey,
Hung o'er the land incessant.
Thomson, "Liberty," pt. iv.

The two ravens that sit on the shoulders of Odin are called Hugin and Mugin (Mind and Memory).

One raven will not pluck another's eyes out (German, "Eine rabe hacket sein andern kein auge ans"). Friends will not "peach" friends; you are not to take for granted all that a friend says of a friend.

Ravenglass (Cumberland). A corruption of Afon-glass (Blue river).

Ra'venstone. The stone gibbet of Germany; so called from the ravens which are wont to perch on it. (German, raabenstein.)

Do you think
I'll honour you so much as save your throat
From the ravenstone, by choking you myself?
Byron, "Werner," ll. 2.

Ra'venswood (Allan, lord of). A decayed Scotch nobleman of the Royalist party.

Master Edgar Ravenswood. His son, who falls in love with Lucy Ashton, daughter of Sir William Ashton, lord-keeper of Scotland. The lovers plight their troth at the Mermaid's Fountain, but Lucy is compelled to marry Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw. The bride, in a fit of insanity, attempts to murder the bridegroom, and dies in convulsions. Bucklaw recovers, and goes abroad. Colonel Ashton, seeing Edgar at the funeral of Lucy, appoints a hostile meeting; and Edgar, on his way to the place appointed, is lost in the quicksands of Kelpies-flow.—Sir Walter Scott, "Bride of Lammermoor."

In Donizetti's opera of "Lucia di Lammermoor," Bucklaw dies of the wound inflicted by the bride, and Edgar, heart-broken, comes on the stage and kills himself, that "his marriage with Lucy, forbidden on earth, may be consummated in heaven."

Rawhead and Bloody-Bones. A bogie at one time the terror of children.

Servants awe children and keep them in subjection by telling them of Rawhead and Bloody-bones.—Locke.

Raymond (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Master of 4,000 infantry, count of Toulouse, equal to Godfrey in the "wisdom of cool debate" (bk. iii.). This Nestor of the crusaders slays Aladine, the king of Jerusalem, and plants the Christian standard upon the tower of David (bk. xx.).

Rayne or Raine (Essex). Go and say your prayers at Raine. The old church of Raine, built in the time of Henry II., famous for its altar to the Virgin, and much frequented at one time by pregnant women, who went to implore the Virgin to give them safe deliverance.

Raw. To touch one on the raw. To mention something that makes a person wince, like touching a horse on a raw place in cleaning him.

Razee (raz-zä). A ship of war cut down to a smaller size, as a seventy-four reduced to a frigate. (French.)

Raz'ikah'. An idol worshipped by the tribe of Ad, in order that food might be abundant.

Razor. Hewing blocks with a razor. Livy relates how Tarquinius Priscus, defying the power of Attius Nævius the augur, said to him, "Tell me, if you are so wise, whether I can do what I am now thinking about." "Yes," said Nævius. "Ha! ha!" cried the king; "I was thinking whether I could cut in twain that whetstone with a razor." "Cut boldly!" answered the augur, and the king cleft it in twain with a blow.

In short, 'twas his fate unemployed or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, or cut blocks with a razor.
Edmund Burke.

Raz'zia. An incursion made by the military into an enemy's country, for the purpose of carrying off cattle and destroying the standing crops. It is an Arabic word much employed in connection with Algerine affairs.

War is a razzia rather than an art to the merciless Pelissier.—The Standard.

Reach of a river. The part which lies between two points or bends; so called because it reaches from point to point.

When he drew near them he would turn from each,
And loudly whistle till he passed the "Reach"
Crabbe, "Borough."

Ready (The). An elliptical expression for ready-money. Goldsmith says Æs in presenti perfectum format (ready-money makes a man perfect).—Eton Latin Grammar.

Lord Strut was not very flush in the "ready."—Dr. Arbuthnot.

Ready-to-Halt. A pilgrim that journeyed to the Celestial city on crutches. He joined the party under the charge of Mr. Greatheart, but "when he was sent for" he threw away his crutches, and lo! a chariot bore him into Paradise.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Real Presence. The doctrine that Christ himself is really and substantially present in the bread and wine of the Eucharist after consecration.

Reason. The Goddess of Reason. The wife of Momoro, the printer, was set up by the Commune of Paris to represent this goddess in 1793. Dressed in a thin white veil, and wearing on her head the cap of liberty, she was carried in a chair by four men to Notre Dame de Paris, and placed on the altar. Hymns were then sung to her, and processions formed.

Rebec'ca. Daughter of Isaac the Jew, in love with Ivanhoe. Rebecca, with her father and Ivanhoe, being taken prisoners, are confined in Front de Bœuf's castle. Rebecca is taken to the turret chamber and left with the old sibyl there, but when Brian de Bois Guilbert comes and offers her insult she spurns him with heroic disdain, and rushing to the verge of the battlements, threatens to throw herself over if he touches her. Ivanhoe, who was suffering from wounds received in a tournament, is nursed by Rebecca. Being again taken prisoner, the Grand Master commands the Jewish maiden to be tried for sorcery, and she demands a trial by combat. The demand is granted, when Brian de Bois Guilbert is appointed as the champion against her; and Ivanhoe undertakes her defence, slays Brian, and Rebecca is set free. To the general disappointment of novel-readers, after all this excitement Ivanhoe tamely marries the lady Rowena, a "vapid piece of still life." Rebecca pays the newly-married pair a wedding visit, and then goes abroad with her father to get out of the way. — Sir Walter Scott, "Ivanhoe."

Rebeccaïtes (4 syl.). Certain Welsh rioters in 1843, whose object was to demolish turnpike gates. The name was taken from Rebekah, the bride of Isaac. When she left her father's house, Laban and his family "blessed her," and said, "Let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate thee" (Gen. xxiv. 60).

Rebellion (The). The revolts in behalf of the House of Stuart in 1715 and 1745: the former in behalf of the chevalier de St. George, son of James II., called the Old Pretender, and the latter in favour of Charles Edward, usually termed the Young Pretender.

The Great Rebellion. The revolt of the Long Parliament against Charles I. (1642-1646).

Rebus (Latin, with things). A hieroglyphic riddle, "non verbis sed rebus." The origin of the word and custom is this: The basochiens of Paris, during the Carnival, used to satirise the current follies of the day in squibs called De rebus que geruntur (on the current events). That these squibs might not be accounted libellous, they employed hieroglyphics either wholly or in part. The following is an example of a rebus:—

Rose Hill I adore.

Re'chabites (3 syl.). A religious sect founded by Rechab, distinguished for their retired habits, and their custom of lodging in tents. — Jewish history.

Recla'im (2 syl.). To turn from evil ways. This is a term in falconry, and means to call back the hawk to the wrist.

This was done when it was unruly, that it might be smoothed and tamed. (Latin, re-clamo.)

Recorded. Death recorded means that the sentence of death is recorded or written by the recorder against the criminal, but not verbally pronounced by the judge. This is done when capital punishment is likely to be remitted. It is the verbal sentence of the judge that is the only sufficient warrant of an execution. The sovereign is not now consulted about any capital punishment.

Rec'reant is one who cries out (French, récrïer); alluding to the judicial combats, when the person who wished to give in cried for mercy, and was held a coward, and infamous. (See CRAVEN.)

Rector. (See CLERICAL TITLES.)

Recul'ver. The antiquities of this place are fully described in "Antiquitates Rutupinæ," by Dr. Battely (1711). It was a Roman fort in the time of Claudius.

Red Basque Cap. The cognizance of Don Carlos, pretender to the Spanish throne.

Red Book. The book which gave account of the court expenditure in France before the Revolution was so called because its covers were red. We have also a "Red Book" in manuscript, containing the names of all those who held lands per baro'niam in the reign of Henry II., with other matters pertaining to the nation before the Conquest. — Ryley, 667.

Red Cap (Mother). An old nurse "at the Hungerford Stairs." Dame Ursley or Ursula, another nurse, says of her rival—

She may do very well for skippers' wives, chandlers' daughters, and such like, but nobody shall wait on pretty Mistress Marcaret excepting and saving myself. — Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Red Com'yn. Sir John Comyn of Badenoch, son of Marjory, sister of king John Baliol; so called from his ruddy complexion and red hair, to distinguish him from his kinsman "Black Comyn," whose complexion was swarthy, and hair black. He was stabbed by Sir Robert Bruce in the church of the Minorites at Dumfries, and afterwards dispatched by Lindesay and Kirkpatrick.

Red-cross Knight, in Spenser's "Faery Queen," is the impersonation of holiness, or rather the spirit of Christianity. Politically he typifies the Church of England. The knight is sent forth by the queen to slay a dragon which ravaged the kingdom of Una's father. Having achieved this feat he marries Una (q.v.).

Red Flag. The symbol of insurrection and terrorism. The National Assembly of France ordained that a red flag should be unfurled whenever martial law was proclaimed.

Red Hand of Ireland. In an ancient expedition to Ireland, it was given out that whoever first touched the shore should possess the territory which he touched; O'Neil, seeing another boat likely to outstrip his own, cut off his left hand and threw it on the coast. From this O'Neil the princes of Ulster were descended, and the motto of the O'Neils is to this day, Lamh dearg Eirinn (red hand of Erin). (See HAND, p. 383, col. 2.)

Red-handed. In the very act; with red blood still on his hand.

I had some trouble to save him from the fury of those who had caught him red-handed.—The Times (a correspondent).

Red Heads. The Shiites are so called, because they wear red turbans. (See SHIITES.)

Red-lattice Phrases. Pot-house talk. Red-lattice at the doors and windows was formerly the sign that an ale-house was duly licensed; hence our chequers. In some cases "lattice" has been converted into lettuce, and the colour of the alternate checks changed to green; such a sign used to be in Brownlow Street, Holborn. Sometimes, without doubt, the sign had another meaning, and announced that "tables" were played within; hence Gayton, in his "Notes on Don Quixote," page 340, in speaking of our public-house signs, refers to our notices of "billiards, kettle-noddy-boards, tables, trunks, shovel-boards, fox-and-geese, and the like." It is quite certain that shops with the sign of the chequers were not uncommon among the Romans. (See a view of the left-hand street of Pompeii, presented by Sir William Hamilton to the Society of Antiquaries. See LATTICE.)

I, I, I myself sometimes, leaving the fear of heaven on the left hand....sm fan to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch; and yet you, rogue, will ensconce your rags....your red-lattice phrases....under the shelter of your honours.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 2.

Red-letter Day. A lucky day; a day to be recalled with delight. In almanacks, saints' days and holidays are printed in red ink, other days in black.

Red Man. The French say that a red man commands the elements, and wrecks off the coast of Brittany those whom he dooms to death. The legend affirms that he appeared to Napoleon and foretold his downfall.

Red Men. W. Hepworth Dixon tells us that the Mormons regard the Red Indians as a branch of the Hebrew race, who lost their priesthood, and with it their colour, intelligence, and physiognomy, through disobedience. In time the wild olive-branch will be restored, become white in colour, and will act as a nation of priests.—"New America," i. 15.

Red Republicans. Those extreme republicans of France who scruple not to dye their hands in blood in order to accomplish their political object. They used to wear a red cap. (See CARMAGNOLE.)

Red Sea or SEA OF EDOM (the red man). Esau was so called, not because he was ruddy in complexion, or had red hair like our Rufus, but because he sold his birthright for a pottage of red lentiles (Gen. xxv. 30). In the Bible the Red Sea is generally called the sedgey sea (yam-suph), because the wind drives into it a vast quantity of sedge or sea-weed.

Red-shanks. A Highlander; so called from a buskin formerly worn by them; it was made of undressed deer's hide, with the red hair outside.

Red Snow and Gory Dew. The latter is a slimy damp like blood which appears on walls. Both are due to the presence of the algae called by botanists Palmella cruenta and Hemato-coccus sanguineus, which are of the lowest forms of vegetable life.

Red Tincture. That preparation which the alchemists thought would convert any baser metal into gold. It is sometimes called the Philosopher's Stone, the Great Elixir, and the Great Magisterium. (See WHITE TINCTURE.)

Redan'. The simplest of fieldworks, and very quickly constructed. It consists simply of two faces and an angle formed thus Λ , the angle being towards the object of attack. A corruption of redens, a contraction of recedens (Latin).

Redgauntlet. A novel told in a series of letters by Sir Walter Scott. Sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, a Jacobite conspirator in favour of the Young Pretender, Charles Edward, is the hero. When George III. was crowned he persuaded his niece, Lillias Redgauntlet, to pick up the glove thrown down by the king's champion. The plot ripened, but when the prince positively refused to dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkinshaw—a sine quid non with the conspirators—the whole enterprise was given up. General Campbell arrived with the military, the prince left Scotland, Redgauntlet who embarked with him became a prior abroad, and Lillias his niece married her brother's friend, Allan Fairford, a young advocate.

Redgaunt'let. Sir Aberick. An ancestor of the family so called.

Sir Edward. Son of Sir Aberick, killed by his father's horse.

Sir Robert. An old Tory in "Wandering Willie's Tale." He has a favourite monkey called "Major Weir."

Sir John. Son and successor of Sir Robert.

Sir Redwald. Son of Sir John.

Sir Henry Darsie. Son of Sir Redwald.

Lady Henry Darsie. Wife of Sir Henry Darsie.

Sir Arthur Darsie alias Darsie Latimer. Son of Sir Henry and the above lady.

Miss Lillias alias Greenmantle. Sister of Sir Arthur; she marries Allan Fairford.

Sir Edward Hugh. A political enthusiast and Jacobite conspirator, uncle of Sir Arthur Darsie. He appears as "Laird of the Lochs," "Mr. Herries of Birrenswork," and "Mr. Ingoldsby." "When he frowned, the puckers of his brow formed a horseshoe, the special mark of his race."—Sir Walter Scott, "Redgauntlet."

Redlaw (Mr.). The haunted man, professor of chemistry in an ancient college. Being haunted, he bargained with his spectre to leave him, and the condition imposed was that "the gift given by the spectre Redlaw should give again, go where he would." From this moment the chemist carried in his touch the infection of sullenness, selfishness, discontent, and ingratitude. On Christmas-day the infection ceased, and all those who had suffered by it were restored to love and gratitude.—Dickens, "The Haunted Man."

Redmain. Magnus, earl of Northumberland, was so called not from his red or bloody hand, but on account of his long red beard or mane. He was slain in the battle of Sark (1449).

He was remarkable for his long red beard, and was therefore called by the English Magnus Redbeard; but the Scotch in derision called him "Magnus with the Red Mane."—Godscroft, fol. 178.

Redmond O'Neale. Rokeby's page, who is beloved by Rokeby's daughter Matilda. Redmond turns out to be Mortham's son and heir, and marries Matilda.—Sir Walter Scott, "Rokeby."

Reduplicated or Clack-Words, of an intensifying force. Chit-chat, click-clack, clitter-clatter, dilly-dally, ding-dong, drip-drop, eye-peep, fal-lal, fiddle-faddle, flip-flop, flify-fluffy, flippity-flappity, handy-pandy, harum-scarum, heiter-skelter, heyve-keyve (Halliwell), hibble-dy-hobble-dy, higgledy-piggledy, hob-nob, hodge-podge, hoity-toity, hurly-burly, mish-mash, mixy-maxy (Brockett), namby-pamby, niddy-noddy, niminy-piminy, nosy-posy, pell-mell, pit-pat, pitter-patter, randem-tandem, randy-dandy, ribble-rabble, riff-raff, roly-poly, rusty-fusty-crusty, see-saw, shilly-shally, slip-slop, slish-slosh, snick-snack, spitter-spatter, splitter-splutter, squish-squash, teeny-tiny, tick-tack, tilly-valley, tiny-totty, tip-top, tittle-tattle, toe-toes, wee-wee, wiggle-waggle, widdy-waddy (Halliwell), widdle-waddle, wibble-wobble, wish-wash, wishy-washy; besides a host of rhyming synonyms, as bawling-squawling, mewling-pewling, whisky-frisky, musty-fusty, gawky-pawky, slippery-sloppy, rosy-posy, right and tight, wear and tear, high and mighty, &c.; and many more with the Anglo-Saxon letter-rhyme, as safe and sound, jog-trot, &c.

Ree. Right. Thus teamers say to a leading horse, "Ree!" when they want it to turn to the right; and "Hey!" for the contrary direction. (Saxon, recht; German, recht; Latin, rectus; various English dialects, reet, whence rectle, "to put to rights.")

Who with a hey and ree the heasts command.
"Micro-Cynicon" (1599).

Riddle me, riddle me ree. Expound my riddle rightlv.

Reef. He must take in a reef or so. He must reduce his expenses; he must retrench. A reef is that part of a sail which is between two rows of eyelet-holes. The object of these eyelet-holes is to reduce the sail reef by reef as it is required.

Reeves Tale. Thomas Wright says that this tale occurs frequently in the jest and story books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Boccaccio has given it in the "Decameron," evidently from a fabliau, which has been printed in Barbazan under the title of "De Gombert et des Deux Cler." Chaucer took the story from another fabliau, which Wright has given in his "Anecdota Literaria," p. 15.

Refresh'er. A fee paid to a barrister daily in addition to his retaining fee, to remind him of the case intrusted to his charge.

Regale (2 syl.). To entertain like a king. (Latin, regalis, like a king, kingly.)

Re'gan and Gon'eril. Two of the daughters of King Lear, and types of unfilial daughters.—Shakespeare, "King Lear."

Regatta (Italian). Originally applied to the contests of the gondoliers at Venice. (Latin, remigata.)

Régime de la Calotte. Administration of government by ecclesiastics. The calotte is the small skull-cap worn over the tonsure.

Régiment de la Calotte. A society of witty and satirical men in the reign of Louis XIV. When any public character made himself ridiculous, a calotte was sent to him to "cover the bald or brainless part of his noddle." (See above.)

Reg'ina (St.), the virgin martyr, is depicted with lighted torches held to her sides, as she stands fast bound to the cross on which she suffered martyrdom.

Regiomonta'nus. The Latin equivalent of Königsberg. The name adopted by Johann Müller, the mathematician. (1436-1476.)

Re'gium Do'nium (Latin). An annual grant of public money to the Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist ministers of Ireland. It began in 1672, and was abolished in 1869.

Re'gius Professor. One who holds in an English university a professorship founded by Henry VIII. Each of the five Regius Professors of Cambridge receives a royally endowed stipend of about £40. In the universities of Scotland they are appointed by the crown.

Reign of Terror. The period in the French Revolution between the fall of the Girondists and overthrow of Robespierre. It lasted 420 days, from May 31st, 1793, to July 27th, 1794.

Rel'dresal. Principal secretary for private affairs in the court of Lilliput, and great friend of Gulliver. When it was proposed to put the Man-mountain to death for high treason, Reldresal moved as an amendment, that the "traitor should have both his eyes put out, and be suffered to live that he might serve the nation."—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Lilliput).

Rem'bha. Goddess of pleasure.—Indian mythology.

Remig'ius (St.). Rémy, bishop and confessor, is represented as carrying a vessel of holy oil, or in the act of anointing therewith Clovis, who kneels before him. When Clovis presented himself for baptism, Rémy said to him: "Sigambrian, henceforward burn what thou hast worshipped, and worship what thou hast burned." (438-533.)

Renaissance (French). A term applied in the arts to that peculiar style of decoration revived by Raphael, and which resulted from ancient paintings exhumed in the pontificate of Leo X. (16th century). The French Renaissance is a Gothic skeleton with classic details.

Renaissant Period. That period in French history which began with the Italian wars in the reign of Charles VIII., and closed with the reign of Henri II. It was the intercourse with Italy, brought about by the Italian war (1494-1557), which "regenerated" the arts and sciences in France; but as everything was Italianised—the language, dress, architecture, poetry, prose, food, manners, &c.—it was a period of great false taste and national deformity.

Renard. Une queue de renard. A mockery. At one time a common practical joke was to fasten a fox's tail behind a person against whom a laugh was designed. "Panurge never refrained from attaching a fox's tail, or the ears of a levrier, behind a Master of Arts or Doctor of Divinity, whenever he encountered them."—Rabelais, ii. 16.

*C'est une petite vipère
Qui n'épargneroit pas son père,
Et qui par nature ou par art
Sçait couper la queue au renard,
Beaucaire, "L'Embaras de la Foire."*

Renarder (French). To vomit, especially after too freely indulging in intoxicating drinks. Our word fox means also to be tipsy. (See CAT, p. 147, col. 2.)

*Il luy visite la mâchoire,
Quand l'autre luy renarde aux yeux,
Le baume qu'ils venoient de boire
Pour se le rendre a qui mieux mieux.
Sieur de St. Amant, "Chambre de Desbauché."*

Rena'ta. Renée, daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Bretagne, married Hercules, second son of Lucretia Borgia and Alphonso.

Renaud. French form of Rinaldo (q.v.).

Rendezvous. The place to which you are to repair, a meeting, a place of muster or call. Also used as a verb. (French, rendez, betake; vous, yourself.)

His house is a grand rendezvous of the élite of Paris.

The Imperial Guard was ordered to rendezvous in the Champs de Mars.

René (2 syl.) Le Bon Roi René. Son of Louis II., duc d'Aujou, comte de Provence, father of Margaret of Anjou. The last minstrel monarch, just, joyous, and debonaire; a friend to chase and tilt, but still more so to poetry and music. He gave in largesses to knights-errant and minstrels (so says Thiebault) more than he received in revenue. (1408-1480.)

Studying to promote, as far as possible, the immediate mirth and good-humour of his subjects, he was never mentioned by them excepting as Le Bon Roi René, a disinclination due to him certainly by the qualities of his heart, if not by those of his head. —Sir Walter Scott, "Anne of Geierstein," ch. xxix.

René Leblanc. Notary-public of Grand Pré (Voce Scotiæ), the father of twenty children and 159 grand-children. —Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Rep'artee properly means a smart return blow in fencing. (French, repartir, to return a blow.)

Reprive (2 syl.) meant originally "to apprehend again." French, reprandre, re-pris, to grant a respite and then bring to trial again; but the present meaning is to respite or remit the original sentence.

Republican Queen. Sophie Charlotte, wife of Frederick I. of Prussia.

Republicans. (See BLACK.)

Resolute (The). John Florio, the philologist, tutor to prince Henry; the Holofernes of Shakespeare. (1545-1625.)

The Resolute Doctor. John Baconthorpe. (*-1346.)

The Most Resolute Doctor. Guillaume Durandus de St. Pourçain. (*-1332.)

Restive (2 syl.) means inclined to resist, resistive, obstinate or self-willed. It has nothing to do with rest (quiet).

Restorationists. The followers of Origen's opinion that all persons, after a purgation proportioned to their demerits, will be restored to Divine favour and taken to paradise. Mr. Ballou, of America, has introduced an extension of the term, and maintains that all retribution is limited to this life, and at the resurrection all will be restored to life, joy, and immortality.

Resurrection Pie is pie made of broken cooked meat. Meat réchauffé is sometimes called "resurrection meat."

Retia'rius. A gladiator who made use of a net, which he threw over his adversary.

As in thronged amphitheatre of old
The wary Retiarius trapped his foe.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto ii.

Reuben Dixon. A village school-master "of ragged lads."

Mid noise, and dirt, and stench, and play, and prate,
He calmly outs the ren or views the slate.
Crabbe, "Borough," letter xxiv.

Reveillê (re-ray'-ya). The beat of drum at daybreak to warn the sentries that they may forbear from challenging, as the troops are awake. (French, réveiller, to awake.)

Rev'el. Mr. Lye derives this word from the Dutch raveelen, to wander loosely about, and refers in proof to the old term a revel-rout; but it is far more likely to be the French réveillon, a feast given in the middle of the night, from the verb réveiller, to rouse out of sleep.

Master of the Revels. (See LORD OF MISRULE.)

Revenons à nos Moutons (Return we to our sheep). Let us come back to the matter in hand; let us resume our discourse. The phrase is from an old comedy of the fifteenth century, called "L'Avocat Patelin," by De Brueys, in which a clothier giving evidence against a shepherd who had stolen some sheep, is ever running from the subject to talk about some cloth which Patelin his lawyer had swindled him of. The judge perpetually stops him by saying, "But about the sheep," "Tell us about the sheep."

Reverend. An archbishop is the Most Reverend [Father in God]; a bishop, the Right Reverend; a dean, the Very Reverend; an archdeacon, the Venerable; all the rest of the clergy, the Reverend.

Review. The British Review was nicknamed "My Grandmother." In "Don Juan," lord Byron says, "I bribed My Grandmother's Review, the British." The editor took this in dudgeon and gave Byron the lie, but the poet turned the laugh against the reviewer.

Am I flat, I tip "My Graudmother" a bit of prose.
—"Notes Ambrosianæ."

Revi'se (2 syl.). The second proof-sheet submitted to an author or "reader."

I at length reached a vaulted room, and beheld, seated by a lamp and employed in reading a blotted revise, the author of Waverley.—Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel" (Introduction).

Revival of Letters in England, dates from the commencement of the 11th century.

The Arabs first became acquainted with the literature of Greece in the eighth century, but the subjects most appreciated by them were metaphysics, mathematics, medicine, chemistry, botany, and other physical sciences.

Revival of Painting and Sculpture began with Niccola Pisano, Giunta, Cimabue, and Giotto (2 syl.).

Reviver of Religion (Mohi-eddin). A title given to Aurungzebe, the Great Mogul. (1618-1707.)

Revoke (2 syl.). When a player at cards can follow suit, but plays some other card, he makes a revoke, and by the laws of whist the adversaries are entitled to score three points.

Good Heaven! Revoke? Remember, if the set
Be lost, in honour you should pay the debt
Crabbe, "Borough."

Revolusio (in philosophy). Part of a substance set off and formed into a distinct existence, as when a slip is cut from a tree and planted to form a distinct plant of itself. Tertullian the Montanist taught that the second person of the Trinity was a revulsion of the Father. (Latin, revulsio, re-vello, to pull back.)

Reyn'ard the Fox. The hero in the beast-epic of the fourteenth century. This prose poem is a satire on the state of Germany in the middle ages. Reynard typifies the church; his uncle, Isengrin the wolf, typifies the baronial element; and Nodel the lion, the regal. The word means deep counsel or wit. (Gothic, raginohart, cunning in counsel; Old Norse, hreinn and ard; German, reineke.) Reynard is commonly used as a synonym of fox.

Where prowling Reynard trod his nightly round,
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Reynard the Fox. Professedly by Hinreck van Alckmer, tutor of the duke of Lorraine. This name is generally supposed to be a pseudonym of Hermann Barkhusen, town-clerk and book-printer in Rostock. (1498.)

False Reynard. So Dryden describes the Unitarians in his "Hind and Panther."

With greater guile
False Reynard fed on consecrated spoil;
The graceless beast by Athanasius first
Was chased from Nice, then by Socinus nursed.
Part I.

Reynardine (3 syl.). The eldest son of Reynard the Fox, who assumed the names of Dr. Pedanto and Crabron.—"Reynard the Fox."

Reynold of Montalbon. One of Charlemagne's knights and paladins.

Rhadaman'thos. One of the three judges of hell; Minos and Æacos being the other two.—Greek mythology.

Rhampsini'tos. The Greek form of Ram'esēs III., the richest of the Egyptian kings, who amassed seventy-seven millions sterling, which he secured in a treasury of stone, but by an artifice of the builder he was robbed every night.

Rhapsody means songs sewed together. The term was originally applied to the books of the Iliad and Odyssey, which at one time were in fragments. Certain bards collected together a number of the fragments, enough to make a connected "ballad," and sang them as our minstrels sang the deeds of famous heroes. Those bards who sang the Iliad wore a red robe, and those who sang the Odyssey a blue one. Pisis'tratos of Athens had all these fragments carefully compiled into their present form. (Greek, raptō, to sew or string together; odē, a song.)

Rhene (1 syl.). The Rhine. (Latin, Rhenus.)

To pass
Rhene or the Danaw [Danuë].
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. 1.

Rhine or Rhineland. The country of Gunther, king of Burgundy, is so called in the "Nibelungen-Lied."

Not a lord of Rhineland could follow where he flew.
Letsam's "Nibelungen-Lied," st. 210.

Rhi'no. Ready-money. (See NOSE.)

Rhod'alind. A princess famous for her "knightly" deeds; she would have been the wife of Gon'dibert, but he wisely preferred Bertha, a country girl, the daughter of the sage As'tragon.

Rho'dian Law. The earliest system of marine law known to history; compiled by the Rhodians about 900 B.C.

Rhone. The Rhone of Christian eloquence. St. Hil'ary; so called from the vehemence of his style. (300-365.)

Rhopalic Verse (wedge-verse). A line in which each successive word has more syllables than the one preceding it. (Greek, rhopalon, a club, which from the handle to the top grows bigger and bigger.)

Spes deus eterna est stationis conciliator.

Hope ever solaces miserable individuals.

1 2 3 4 5

Rhyme. Neither rhyme nor reason. Fit neither for amusement nor instruction. An author took his book to Sir Thomas More, chancellor in the reign of Henry VIII., and asked his opinion. Sir Thomas told the author to turn it into rhyme. He did so, and submitted it again to the lord chancellor. "Ay! ay!" said the witty satirist, "that will do, that will do. 'Tis rhyme now, but before it was neither rhyme nor reason."

Rhyming to death. The Irish at one time believed that their children and cattle could be "eybitten," that is bewitched by an evil eye, and that the "eybitter" or witch could "rime" them to death.—R. Scott, "Discovery of Witchcraft." (See RATS.)

Rhymer. Thomas the Rhymer. Thomas Learmount, of Ereildoune, who lived in the thirteenth century. This was quite a different person to Thomas Rymer, the historiographer royal to William III. (Flourished 1283.) (See TRUE THOMAS.)

Rib'aldry is the language of a ribald. (French, ribaud; Old French, ribaudie; Italian, ribulderia, the conduct of a vagabond or dare-devil.)

Ribbonism. A Catholic association organised in Ireland about 1803. Its great object was to oppose the Orange confederacy (q.v.), but it also took up the agrarian grievance. Its members have always been of the lowest class. The Fenians are an offshoot of the Ribbon society. The name arises from a ribbon worn as a badge in the button-hole of the members.

Ribston Pippin. So called from Ribston, in Yorkshire, where Sir Henry Goodricke planted three pips sent to him from Rouen, in Normandy. Two of the pips died, but the third became the parent of the Ribston apple-trees in England.

Riccardo, in the opera of "I Puritani," is Sir Richard Forth, a Puritan, commander of Plymouth fortress. Lord Walton promised to give him his daughter Elvira in marriage, but Elvira had engaged her affections to lord Arthur Talbot, a Cavalier, to whom ultimately she was married.

Ricciardetto. Son of Agmon and brother of Bradamante.—Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso."

Rice thrown after a bride. A relic of the "panis farreus," in the most honourable form of Roman marriage, called "Confarreatio."

Rich as a Jew. This expression arose in the middle ages, when Jews were almost the only merchants, and were certainly the most wealthy of the people. There are still the Rothschilds among them, and others of great wealth.

Richard Cœur de Lion. (See BOGIE.)

His tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if a horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, "Post thou think king Richard is in the bush?"—Gibbon, "Decline and Fall," &c., xi. 140.

Richard II.'s Horse. Road Barbary.

O, how it yearned my heart, when I beheld
In London streets that coronation day
When Bolingbroke rode on Road Barbary—
That horse that thou so often hast heard of—
That horse that I so carefully have dressed.
Shakespeare, "Richard II.," v. 7.

Richard III.'s Horse. White Surrey.

Saddle White Surrey for the field to-morrow.
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

Richard's Himself Again. These words are not in Shakespeare's "Richard III.," but were interpolated from Colley Cibber by John Kemble.

Richard of Cirencester. Sometimes called "The monk of Westminster," an early English chronicler. His chronicle "On the Ancient State of Britain" was first brought to light by Dr. Charles Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen in 1747, but the original (like the original of Macpherson's "Ossian" and of Joe Smith's "Book of Mormon") does not exist, and grave suspicion prevails that all three are alike forgeries.

Richard Roe. A mere nominal defendant in actions of ejectment. The name used to be coupled with John Doe, but these airy nothings are no longer the lawyer's tools.

Richar'da, wife of Nicholas d'Este. A widow who, with her son Hercules, was dispossessed of her inheritance by Lionello and Borso. Both were obliged to go into exile, but finally Hercules recovered his lordship.

Richborough, Richeboro', or Ratesburgh (a Roman fort in the time of Claudius), called by Alfred of Beverley, Richberge; by the Saxons (according to Bede) Reptacester, and by others Ruptimuth; by Orosius, the port and city of Rhutubus; by Ammianus, Rhutupia Statio; by Antoninus, Rhitupis Portus; by Tacitus, Portus Trutulensis for Rhutupensis; by Ptolemy, Rhutupia.—Camden.

Ricochet (rikko-shay). Anything repeated over and over again. The fabulous bird that had only one note was called the Ricochet; and the rebound on water termed ducks and drakes has the same name. Marshal Vauban (1633-1707) invented a battery of rebound called the Ricochet battery, the application of which was Ricochet firing.

The well-known song beginning "Oh dear, what can the matter be?" may be termed une chanson du ricochet, from its repetition of the same words line after line.

Riddle. Josephus relates how Hiram, king of Tyre, and Solomon had once a contest in riddles, when Solomon won a large sum of money; but he subsequently lost it to Abde'mon, one of Hiram's subjects.

Riddle. Plutarch states that Homer died of chagrin, because he could not solve a certain riddle. (See SPHINX.)

Father of Riddles. So the abbé Cotin dubbed himself, but posterity has not confirmed his right to the title. (1604-1682.)

Ride. To ride abroad with St. George, but at home with St. Michael; said of a hen-pecked braggart. St. George is represented as riding on a war charger whither he listed; St. Michael, on a dragon. Abroad a man rides like St. George on a horse which he can control and govern; but at home he has "a dragon" to manage like St. Michael. (French.)

Rider. An addition to a manuscript, like a codicil to a will; an additional clause tacked to a bill in parliament; so called because it over-rides the preceding matter when the two come into collision. A question added to another question in an examination paper.

Perhaps Mr. Kenneth will allow me to add the following as a rider to his suggestion.—Notes and Queries, "M.V."

Riderhood (Rogue). The villain in Dickens's novel entitled "Our Mutual Friend."

Ridicule (Father of). François Rabelais. (1495-1553.)

Riding of Yorkshire. Same as trithing in Lincolnshire; the jurisdiction of a third part of a county, under the government of a reeve (sheriff). The word ding or thing is Scandinavian, and means a legislative assembly; hence the great national diet of Norway is still called a stor-thing (great legislative assembly), and its two chambers are the lag-thing (law assembly) and the odels-thing (freeholders' assembly). Kent was divided into laths, Sussex into rapes, Lincoln into parts. The person who presided over a trithing was called the trithing-man, he who presided in the lath was called a lath-grieve.

Ridol'phus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). One of the band of adventurers that joined the Crusaders. He was slain by Argantès (bk. vii.).

Ridotto (Italian). An assembly where the company is first entertained with music, and then joins in dancing.

Rien'zi (Nicolò Gabri'ni). The Reformer at Rome. (1313-1354.) Bulwer Lytton (now Lord Lytton) has a novel called "Rienzi."

Rif or Rifle (French). Avoir rifle et rafe. To have everything. Also, the negative n'avoir ni rif ni raf; to have nothing.

Mélas! j'ai goute miseraigne,
J'ai rifle et rafe, et roigne et taigne.
"Les Miracles de Ste. Geneviève."

Riff-raff. The offscouring of society, or rather "refuse and sweepings." Ruff is Anglo-Saxon, and means a rag; Raff is also Anglo-Saxon, and means sweepings. (Danish, rips-raps.) The French have the expression avoir rifle et rafe, meaning to have everything; whence radour, one who has everything, and the phrase il n'a laissé ni rif ni raf, he has left nothing behind him.

I have neither ruff nor raff [rag to cover me nor roof over my head].—Sharp, "Coventry Myst," p. 224.

Ilka man agayne his gud he gaffe
That he had tane with rufe and raffe.
Quoted by Halliwell in his "Archaic Dictionary."

Rifle is from the German reifeln, to hollow into tubes. In 1851, the French minié rifle was partially supplied to the British army. In 1853 it was superseded by the Enfield rifle, which has three grooves. Sir William Armstrong's gun, which has numerous small sharp grooves, was adopted by the government in 1859. The Whitworth gun, which has a polygonal bore, with a twist towards the muzzle, will probably supersede the Armstrong.

Rig. A piece of frolic or fun. The Scotch say of a man who indulges in intoxication, "He goes the rig." The same word is applied in Scotland to a certain portion or division of a field. Thus, such expressions as the "lea-rig" and the "rigs o' barley" occur in the songs of Burns. A wanton used to be called a rig. (French, se rigoler, to make merry.)

He little thought when he set out
Of running such a rig.
Couper, "John Gûpin."

Rig. To dress; whence rigged out, to rig oneself, to rig a ship, well-rigged, &c.

(Saxon, wrgan, to dress; hragle, a garment.

Jack was rigged out in his gold and silver lace, with a feather in his cap.—L'Estrange.

Rig-Marie. Base coin. The word originated from one of the billon coins struck in the reign of queen Mary, which bore the words Reg. Maria as part of the legend.

Rigadoon. A French figure-dance invented by Isaac Rig'adon.

And Isaac's Rigadoon shall live as long
As Raphael's painting, or as Virgil's song.
Jenyns, "Art of Dancing," canto ii.

Rig'dum Fun'nidos, in Carey's burlesque of "Chrononhotonthologos."

Rig'dum Funnidos. A sobriquet given by Sir Walter Scott to John Ballantyne, his publisher. So called because he was full of fun. (1776-1821.)

A quick, active, intrepid little fellow....full of fun and merriment....all over quaintness and humorous mimicry....a keen and skilful oerolee of all manner of field-sports, from fox-hunting to badger-haiting inclusive.—Lockhart.

Right. Right as the trivet. The trivet is a metallic plate-stand with three legs. Some fasten to the fender, and are designed to hold the plate of hot toast. (Saxon, thriefet, three-foot, tripod.)

Declaration of Rights. An instrument submitted to William and Mary on their being called to the throne, setting forth the fundamental principles of the constitution. The chief items are these: The crown cannot levy taxes, nor keep a standing army in times of peace; the members of parliament are free to utter their thoughts, and a parliament is to be convened every year; elections are to be free, trial by jury is to be inviolate, and the right of petition is not to be interfered with.

Right Foot Foremost. In Rome a boy was always stationed at the door of a mansion to caution the visitors not to cross the threshold with their left foot, which would have been an ill-omen.

Right Hand. The right-hand side of the Speaker, meaning the ministerial benches. In the French Legislative Assembly, the right meant the Monarchymen. In the National Convention, the Girondists were called the right hand, because they occupied the Ministerial benches.

Riglet. A thin piece of wood used for stretching the canvas of pictures; and in printing, to regulate the margin,

&c. (French, reglet, a rule or regulator ; Latin, regula, a rule.)

Rig'ol. A circle or diadem. The word seems to be a corruption of ringlet (a little ring).

[Sleep] That from this golden rigol hath divorced
So many English kins.

Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV," iv. 4.

Rigolette (3 syl.). A grisette, a courtesan ; so called from Rigolette in Eugène Sue's "Mysteries of Paris."

Rigoletto. An opera describing the agony of a father obliged to witness the prostitution of his own child. The libretto is borrowed from the drama called "Le Roi s'Amuse," by Victor Hugo ; the music is by Giuseppe Verdi.

Rile. Don't rile the water. Do not stir up the water and make it muddy. The water is riled—muddy and unfit to drink. Common Norfolk expressions ; also, a boy is riled (out of temper). I' sy, together, Joe Smith was regularly riled, is quite Norfolk. The American roil has the same meaning. (French, brouiller ; our broil.)

Rime of Sir Thopas. A travestie of the ancient rhyming romances introduced by Chaucer into his "Canterbury Tales." Harry Bailly interrupts mine host with the most energetic expressions of contempt.

Ri'mer. Chief god of Damascus ; so called from the Saxon rimē, a pomegranate, "because he held a pomegranate in his right hand. The people bore a pomegranate in their coat armour. The Romans called this god Jupiter Cassius, from mount Cassius, near Damascus.

Rimfaxi (First mode). The horse of Night, the foam of whose bit causes dew.—Scandinavian mythology.

Rimmon. A Syrian god, whose seat was Damascus.

Him followed Rimmon, whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus on the fertile bank
Of Abana and Pharpar, lucid streams.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. I.

Rimthur'sar. Brother of Y'mer. They were called the "Evil Ones."—Scandinavian mythology

Rinal'do (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). The Achilles of the Christian army. "He despises gold and power, but craves renown" (bk. i.). He was the son of Bertoldo and Sophia, and nephew of Guelpho, but was brought up by Matilda. At the age of fifteen he ran away and joined the Crusaders, where he was enrolled in the adventurers' squadron. Having slain Gerlando, he was summoned by Godfrey to public trial, but went into voluntary exile. The pedigree of Rinaldo, of the noble house of Estè, is traced from Actius on the male side, and Augustus on the female to Actius VI. (Bk. xvii.)

Rinaldo (in "Orlando Furioso"). Son of the fourth marquis d'Estè, cousin of Orlando, lord of Mount Auban or Albano, eldest son of Amon or Aymon, nephew of Charlemagne, and Bradamant's brother (see ALBANO). He was the rival of his cousin Orlando, but Angelica detested him. He was called "Clarmont's leader," and brought an auxiliary force of English and Scotch to Charlemagne, which "Silence" conducted safely into Paris.

Rinaldo or Renaud, one of the paladins of Charlemagne, is always painted with the characteristics of a borderer—valiant, alert, ingenious, rapacious, and unscrupulous.

Ring. The Ring and the Book. An idyllic epic by Robert Browning, founded on a cause célèbre of Italian history (1698). Guido Franceschini, a Florentine nobleman of shattered fortune, by the advice of his brother, cardinal Paulo, marries Pompilia, an heiress, to repair his state. Now Pompilia was only a supposititious child of Pietro, supplied by Violantè for the sake of obtaining certain property dependent on his having an issue. When the bride discovered the motive of the bridegroom, she revealed to him this fact, and the first trial occurs to settle the said property. The count treats his bride so brutally that she quits his roof under the protection of Caponsacchi, a young priest, and takes refuge in Rome. Guido follows the fugitives and arrests them at an inn ; a trial ensues, and a separation is permitted. Pompilia pleads for a divorce, but, pending the suit, gives birth to a son at the house of her putative parents. The count, hearing thereof, murders Pietro, Violante, and Pompilia, but, being taken red-handed, is executed.

Ring. If a lady or gentleman is willing to marry, but not engaged, a ring should be worn on the index finger of the left hand ; if engaged, on the second finger ; if married, on the third finger, but if either has no desire to marry, on the little finger.—Madame C. De la Tour.

A ring worn on the forefinger indicates a haughty, bold, and overbearing spirit; on the long finger, prudence, dignity, and discretion; on the marriage finger, love and affection; on the little finger, a masterful spirit.

Ring. It is said that Edward the Confessor was once asked for alms by an old man, and gave him his ring. In time some English pilgrims went to the Holy Land, and happened to meet the same old man, who told them he was John the Evangelist, and gave them the identical ring to take to "Saint" Edward. This ring was preserved in Westminster Abbey.

Ring given in marriage, because it was anciently used as a seal, by which orders were signed (Gen. xxxviii. 18; Esther iii. 10-12); and the delivery of a ring was a sign that the giver endowed the person who received it with all the power he himself possessed (Gen. xli. 42). The woman who had the ring could issue commands as her husband, and was in every respect his representative.

In the Roman espousals, the man gave the woman a ring by way of pledge, and the woman put it on the third finger of her left hand, because it was believed that a nerve ran from that finger to the heart.—Macrobius, Sat. vii. 15.

Ring posy or motto:

- (1) A E I (Greek for "Always").
- (2) For ever and for aye.
- (3) In thee, my choice, I do rejoice.
- (4) Let love increase.
- (5) May God above Increase our love.
- (6) Not two but one, Till life is gone.
- (7) My heart and I, Until I die.
- (8) When this you see, Then think of me.
- (9) Love is heaven, and heaven is love.
- (10) Wedlock, 'tis said, In heaven is made.

Right to wear a gold ring. Amongst the Romans, only senators, chief magistrates, and in later times knights, enjoyed the "jus annuli aurei." The emperors conferred the right upon whom they pleased, and Justinian extended the privilege to all Roman citizens.

Ring. The doge of Venice, on Ascension day, used to throw a ring into the sea from the ship Bucentaur, to denote that the Adriatic was subject to the republic of Venice as a wife is subject to her husband.

Polyc'ratēs' ring was flung into the sea to propitiate Nem'esis, and was found again by the owner inside a fish. (See GLASGOW ARMS).

Pope Innocent's Rings. On May 29th, 1205, pope Innocent III. sent John, king of England, four gold rings set with precious stones, and in his letter says the gift is emblematical. He thus explains the matter:—"The rotundity signifies eternity, remember we are passing through time into eternity. The number signifies the four virtues which make up constancy of mind—viz., "justice, fortitude, prudence, and temperance." The material signifies "wisdom from on high," which is as gold purified in the fire. The green emerald is emblem of "faith," the blue sapphire of "hope," the red garnet of "charity," and the bright topaz of "good works."—Rymer, "Fœdera," vol. i. 139.

The Enchanted Ring (in "Orlando Furioso") was given by king Agramant to the dwarf Brunello, from whom it was stolen by Brad'amant and given to Melissa. It passed successively into the hands of Rog'ro and Angelica (who carried it in her mouth).—Bk. v.

Solomon's ring, among other wonderful things, sealed up the refractory Jins in jars, and cast them into the Red Sea.

Reynard's wonderful ring. This ring, which existed only in the brain of Reynard, had a stone of three colours—red, white, and green. The red made the night as clear as the day; the white cured all manner of diseases; and the green rendered the wearer of the ring invincible.—"Reynard the Fox," ch. xii.

Ring of Invisibility which belonged to Otnit, king of Lombardy, given to him by the queen-mother when he went to gain in marriage the soldan's daughter. The stone of the ring had the virtue of directing the wearer the right road to take in travelling.—The Heldenbuch.

Gyges' ring (q.v.) rendered the wearer invisible when its stone was turned inwards.

It has the true ring—has intrinsic merit; bears the mark of real talent. A metaphor taken from the custom of judging genuine money by its "ring" or sound.

The ring. The space set apart for prize-fighters, horse-racing, &c.; so called because the spectators stand round in a ring.

Ring Down. Conclude, end at once. A theatrical phrase, alluding to the custom of ringing a bell to give notice for the fall of the curtain. Charles Dickens says, "It is time to ring down on these remarks."—Speech at the Dramatic Fête.

Ring Finger. Priests used to wear their ring on the fore-finger (which represents the Holy Ghost) in token of their spiritual office. (See WEDDING FINGER.)

The ring finger represents the humanity of Christ, and is used in matrimony, which has only to do with humanity. (See FINGER BENEDICTION.)

Ring Finger. Aulus Gellius tells us that Appianus asserts in his Egyptian books that a very delicate nerve runs from the fourth finger of the left hand to the heart, on which account this finger is used for the marriage ring.—"Noctes," x. 10.

The fact has nothing to do with the question: that the ancients believed it is all we require to know. In the Roman Catholic church, the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity: thus the bridegroom says, "in the name of the Father," and touches the thumb; "in the name of the Son," and touches the first finger; and "in the name of the Holy Ghost" he touches the long or second finger. The next finger is the husband's, to whom the woman owes allegiance next to God. The left hand is chosen to show that the woman is to be subject to the man. In the Hereford, York, and Salisbury missals, the ring is directed to be put first on the thumb, then on the first finger, then on the long finger, and lastly on the ring-finger, quia in illo digito est quedam vena procedens usque ad cor.

Ringling Changes. Bantering each other; turning the tables on a jester. The allusion is to bells. (See PEAL.)

Ring'ing Island. The church of Rome. It is an island because it is isolated or cut off from the world. It is a ring'ing island because bells are incessantly ringing: at matin and vespers, at mass and at sermon-time, at noon, vigils, eves, and so on. It is entered only after four days' fasting, without which none in the Romish church enter holy orders.

Ringleader is the speech-maker, the man that harangues the mob; the word ring being the Saxon hringan, to speak; hring, a speech.

Ringleader. The person who opens a ball or leads off a dance (see HOLLYBAND'S DICTIONARY, 1593). The dance referred to was commenced by the party taking hands round in a ring, instead of in two lines as in the country dance. The leader in both cases has to set the figures.

Riot. To run riot. To act in a very disorderly way. Riot means debauchery or wild merriment.

See, Riot her luxurious howl prepares.
"Tableau of Cebes."

Rip. To rip up old grievances or sores To bring them again to recollection, to recall them. The allusion is to breaking up a place in search of something hidden and out of sight. (Saxon.)

They ripped up all that had been done from the beginning of the rebellion.—Clarendon.

Rip van Winkle. Another name for Peter Klaus. (See KLAUS.)

Ripaille. I am living at Ripaille—in idleness and pleasure. (French, faire Ripaille.) Amédée VII., duke of Savoy, retired to Ripaille, near Geneva, where he threw off all the cares of state, and lived among boon companions in the indulgence of unrestrained pleasure. (See SYBARITE.)

Riph'ean or Rhiphæ'an Rocks. Any cold mountains in a north country. The fabled Rhiphæan mountains were in Scythia.

Cold Rhipæan rocks, which the wild Russ
Believes the stony girdle of the world.
Thomson, "Autumn."

The poet here speaks of the Weliki Camenypoy (great stone girdle) supposed by the early Russians to have girded the whole earth.

Rip'on. True as Ripon steel. Ripon used to be famous for its steel spurs, which were the best in the world. The spikes of a Ripon spur would strike through a shilling-piece without turning the point.

Riquet with a Tuft, from the French "Riquet à la Houppie," by Charles Perault; borrowed from "The Nights of Straparola," and imitated by Madame Villeneuve in her "Beauty and the Beast." Riquet is the beau-ideal of ugliness, but had the power of endowing the person he loved best with wit and intelligence. He falls in love with a beautiful woman as stupid as Riquet is ugly, but possessing the power of endowing the person she loves best with beauty. The two marry and exchange gifts.

Rise. To take a rise out of one. Hotten says this is a metaphor from fly-fishing; the fish rise to the fly, and are caught.

Rising in the Air. In the middle ages, persons believed that saints were sometimes elevated from the ground by religious ecstasy. St. Philip of Neri was sometimes raised to the height of several yards, occasionally to the ceiling of the room. Ignatius Loyola was sometimes raised up two or three feet, and his body became luminous. St. Robert de Palentin was elevated in his ecstasies eighteen or twenty inches. St. Dunstan, a little before his death, was observed to rise from the ground. And Girolamo Savonarola, just prior to execution, knelt in prayer, and was lifted from the floor of his cell into mid-air, where he remained suspended for a considerable time.—“Acta Sanctorum.”

Rivals (“Persons dwelling on opposite sides of a river”). Forsyth derives these words from the Latin rivalis, a riverman. Cælius says there was no more fruitful source of contention than river-right, both with beasts and men, not only for the benefit of its waters, but also because rivers are natural boundaries. Hence Ariosto compares Orlando and Agrican to “two hinds quarrelling for the river right” (xxiii. 83).

River of Paradise. St. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, “the Last of the Fathers,” was so called. (1091-1153.)

River Demon or River Horse was the Kelpie of the Lowlands of Scotland. It was a malicious spirit, which delighted in foreboding calamity, and frequented the fords of rivers.

Road or Roadstead, as “Yarmouth Roads,” a place where ships can ride at anchor. (French, rader, to anchor in a rade; Saxon, rude, a road or place for riding.)

King of Roads [Rhodes]. John London Macadam, the improver of roads. (1756-1836.)

The law of the road—

The law of the road's an anomaly quite,
If you go to the right you are sure to go wrong, if you go to the left you go right.

Road-agent. A highwayman in the mountain districts of North America.

Road-agent is the name applied in the mountains to a ruffian who has given up honest work in the store, in the mine, in the ranch, for the perils and profits of the highway.—W. Hepworth Dixon, “New America,” 1. 14.

Roan. A reddish-brown. This is the Greek eruthron or eruthraon; whence the Latin rufum. (The Welsh have rhuz; German, roth; Saxon, rude; our ruddy.)

Roan Barbary. The famous charger of Richard II., that ate from his royal hand. (See RICHARD II.)

Roarer. A broken-winded horse is so called from the noise it makes in breathing.

Roaring. He drives a roaring trade. He does a great business; his employées are driven till all their wind is gone; hence fast, quick. (See above.)

Roaring-boys or Roarers. The riotous blades of Ben Jonson's time, whose delight it was to annoy quiet folk. At one time their pranks in London were carried to an alarming extent.

And bid them think on Jones amidst this glee,
In hope to get such roaring boys as he.
“Legend of Captain Jones” (1670).

Roast. To rule the roast. To have the chief direction; to be paramount. It is a corruption of roadst, meaning “the council.”

Jhon, duke of Burgoyn, ruled the roast, and governed both kynge Charles.... and his whole realme.—Hall, “Union” (1548).

To roast one or give him a roasting. To banter him, to expose him to the purgatory of sharp words. Shakespeare, in “Hamlet,” speaks of roasting “in wrath and fire.” The allusion is to fire of purgatory, not to the culinary art.

Rob. A sort of jam. It is a Spanish word, taken from the Arabic roob (the juice of fruit).

Faire un rob (in whist). To win the rubber; that is, either two successive games, or two out of three. Borrowed from the game of bowls.

Rob Roy (Robert the Red). A nickname given to Robert McGregor, who assumed the name of Campbell when the clan McGregor was outlawed by the Scotch parliament in 1662. He may be termed the Robin Hood of Scotland.

Rather beneath the middle size than above it, his limbs were formed upon the very strongest model that is consistent with agility. Two points in his person interfered with the rules of symmetry: his shoulders were so broad as to give him the air of being too square in respect to his stature; and his arms, though round, snowy, and strong, were so very long as to be rather a deformity. —Sir Walter Scott, “Rob Roy McGregor,” xxiii.

Robber. The robber who told Alexander that he was the greater robber of the two was named Dion'idēs. The tale is given in "Evenings at Home," under the title of "Alexander and the Robber."

Robber. Edward IV. of England was called by the Scotch Edward the Robber.

Robbing Peter to pay Paul. On the 17th of December, 1540, the abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, was advanced to the dignity of a cathedral by letters patent; but ten years later it was joined to the diocese of London again, and many of its estates appropriated to the repairs of St. Paul's cathedral.—Winkle, "Cathedrals."

Robert (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), duke of Normandy, sold his dominions to king Rufus for 10,000 marks. He commanded 1,000 heavy-armed horse and 1,000 light-armed Normans in the allied Christian army.

Robert of Brunne—that is, of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. His name was Robert Manning, author of an old English "Chronicle," written in the reign of Edward III. It consists of two parts, the first of which is in octo-syllabic rhymes, and is a translation of Wace's "Brut;" the second part is in Alexandrine verse, and is a translation of the French chronicle of Piers de Langtoft of Yorkshire.

Of Brunne I am, if any me blame,
Robert Mannyng is my name.....
In the thrid Edwardes tyme was I
When I wrote alle this story.

Preface to "Chronicle."

King Robert of Sicily. A metrical romance of the Trouveur, taken from the "Story of the Emperor Jovinian" in the "Gesta Romano'rum," and borrowed from the Talmud. It finds a place in the "Arabian Nights," the Turkish "Tutinameh," the Sanskrit "Pantschantantra," and has been recently réchauffé by Longfellow under the same name.

Robert, Robin. A highwayman. Probably the word is simply robber. "Robberdes knaves," robber knaves; Robert's or Robberdes men, banditti; Robin Goodfellow, the fairy or elfin robber. The wild geranium is called herb Robert by a figure of speech, robbers being "wild wanderers," and not household plants. (Persian, robodan; Spanish, robar, connected with the Latin rapiō, and French ravir. Whence Robin Hood—i.e., the Robber of the Wood.)

Robert the Devil. Robert, first duke of Normandy; so called for his daring and cruelty. The Norman tradition is that his wandering ghost will not be allowed to rest till the Day of Judgment. He is also called Robert the Magnificent. (1028-1035.)

Robert François Damiens, who attempted to assassinate Louis XV. (1714-1757.)

Robert le Diable. The son of Bertha and Bertram. The former was daughter of Robert, duke of Normandy, and the latter was a fiend in the guise of a knight. The opera shows the struggle in Robert between the virtue inherited from his mother, and the vice imparted by his father. He is introduced as a libertine; but Alice, his foster-sister, places in his hand the will of his mother, "which he is not to read till he is worthy." Bertram induces him to gamble till he loses everything, and finally claims his soul; but Alice counterplots the fiend, and finally triumphs by reading to Robert the will of his mother.—Meyerbeer, "Roberto il Diavolo" (an opera).

Robert Macaire. He's a Robert Macaire—a bluff, free-living, unblushing libertine, who commits the most horrible crimes without stint or compunction. It is a character in M. Daurmier's drama of "L'Auberge des Adrets." His accomplice is Bertrand, a simpleton and villain. (See MACAIRE.)

Robert Street (Adelphi, London). So called from Robert Adams, the builder.

Robespierre's Weavers. The fishwomen and other female rowdies who joined the Parisian Guard, and helped to line the avenues to the National Assembly in 1793, and clamour "Down with the Girondists!"

Robin and Ma'kyne (2 syl.). An ancient Scottish pastoral. Robin is a shepherd for whom Makyne sighs. She goes to him and tells her love, but Robin turns a deaf ear, and the damsel goes home to weep. After a time the tables are turned, and Robin goes to Makyne to plead for her heart and hand; but the damsel replies—

The man that will not when he may
Shall have naucht when he wald.

Percy, "Reliques," &c. (series ii.)

Robin Goodfellow. A "drudging fiend," and merry domestic fairy, famous for mischievous pranks and practical jokes. At night-time he will sometimes do little services for the family over which he presides. The Scotch call this domestic spirit a brownie; the Germans, kobold or Knecht Ruprecht. The Scandinavians called it Nisse or God-dreng. Puck, the jester of Fairy-court, is the same.

Either I mistake your shape and making quite,
Or else you are that shrewd and knavish sprite
Called Robin Goodfellow:
Those that Hob-coblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their worst, and they shall have good luck.
Shakespeare, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," ii. 1.

Robin Gray (Auld). Words by lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the earl of Balcarrais, and afterwards lady Barnard, in 1772, written to an old Scotch tune called "The bridegroom grat when the sun gaed down." Auld Robin Gray was the herdsman of her father. When lady Anne had written a part, she called her younger sister for advice. She said, "I am writing a ballad of virtuous distress in humble life. I have oppressed my heroine with sundry troubles: for example, I have sent her Jamie to sea, broken her father's arm, made her mother sick, given her Auld Robin Gray for a lover, and want a fifth sorrow; can you help me to one?" "Steal the cow, sister Anne," said the little Elizabeth; so the cow was stolen awa', and the song completed.

Robin Hood is first mentioned by the Scottish historian Fordun, who died in 1356. According to Stow he was an outlaw in the reign of Richard I. (12th century). He entertained one hundred tall men, all good archers, with the spoil he took, but "he suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poore men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbeys and houses of rich carles." He was an immense favourite with the common people, who have dubbed him an earl. According to tradition he was treacherously bled to death by a nun.

Stukeley asserts that this bold outlaw was Robert Fitz-ooth, earl of Huntingdon; but the old ballads call him a yeoman. His name Hood is said to have been given him like that of Capet to the French king Hugues, from a hood or cape, his ordinary costume.

According to one tradition, Robin Hood and Little John were two heroes defeated with Simon de Montfort at the battle of Evesham, in 1265. Fuller, in his "Worthies," considers him an historical character, but Thierry says he simply represents a class, viz., the remnant of the old Saxon race, which lived in perpetual defiance of the Norman oppressors from the time of Hereward.

Robin Hood is introduced in two of Sir Walter Scott's novels—"Ivanhoe," and "The Talisman."

Other examples of similar combinations are the Cumberland bandits, headed by Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudesley. Mr. Knights considers that there were several persons who bore the name of Robin Hood.

Robin Hood. In the accounts of king Edward II.'s household is an item which states that "Robin Hood received his wages as king's valet, and a gratuity on leaving the service." One of the ballads relates how Robin Hood took service under this king.

Many talk of Robin Hood who never shot in his bow. Many brag of deeds in which they took no part. Many talk of Robin Hood, and wish their hearers to suppose they took part in his adventures, but they never put a shaft to one of his bows; nor could they have bent it even if they had tried.

To sell Robin Hood's pennyworth is to sell things at half their value. As Robin Hood stole his wares, he sold them under their intrinsic value, for just what he could get on the nonce.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne. Robin Hood and Little John, having had a little tiff, part company, when Little John falls into the hands of the sheriff of Nottingham, who binds him to a tree. Meanwhile Robin Hood meets with Guy of Gisborne, sworn to slay the "bold forrester." The two bowmen struggle together, but Guy is slain, and Robin Hood rides till he comes to the tree where Little John is bound. The sheriff mistakes him for Guy of Gisborne, and gives him charge of the prisoner. Robin cuts the cord, hands Guy's bow to Little John, and the two soon put to flight the sheriff and his men.—Percy, "Reliques," &c. (series i.).

Robin Redbreast. The tradition is that while our Lord was on his way to Calvary, a robin pecked a thorn out of his crown, and the blood which issued from the wound falling on the bird dyed its breast with red.

Robinson Crusoe. Alexander Selkirk was found in the desert island of Juan Fernandez, where he had been left by Woodes Rogers and Edward Cooke, who in 1712 published their voyages, and told the extraordinary particulars which Selkirk had communicated to them. The embryo of De Foe's novel may be seen in captain Burney's interesting narrative.

Roc. A fabulous white bird of enormous size, and such strength that it can "truss elephants in its talons," and carry them to its mountain nest, where it devours them.—"Arabian Nights" (The Third Calender, and Sinbad the Sailor).

* * The "Rukh of Madagascar" lays an egg equal to 148 hens' eggs.—"Comptes Rendus," &c., xxxii., p. 101. (1851.)

Roche (St.). Patron of those afflicted with the plague, because he devoted his life to their service, and is said to intercede for them in his exaltation. He is depicted in a pilgrim's habit, lifting his dress to display a plague-spot on his thigh, which an angel is touching that he may cure it. Sometimes he is accompanied by a dog bringing bread in his mouth, in allusion to the legend that a hound brought him bread daily while he was perishing in a forest of pestilence.

St. Roche's Day (August 16th), formerly celebrated in England as a general harvest-home, and styled "the great August festival." The Saxon name of it was harfest (herb-feast), the word herb meaning autumn (German herbst), and having no relation to what we call herbs.

Sir Boyle Roche's bird. Sir Boyle Roche was an Irish baronet famous for his "bulls and blunders." On one occasion he said in the House, "Mr. Speaker, it is impossible I could have been in two places at once, unless I were a bird."

Presuming that the duplicate card is the knave of hearts, you may make a remark on the ubiquitous nature of certain cards, which, like Sir Boyle Roche's bird, are in two places at once.—"Drawing-room Magic."

Men of la vieille roche. Old-fashioned men; men of fossilised ideas; non-progressive men. A geological expression.

Perhaps it may be justly attributed to a class of producers, men of la vieille roche, that they have been so slow to apprehend the changes which are daily presenting themselves in the requirements of trade.—The Times.

Rochelle Salt. So called because it was discovered by an apothecary of Rochelle, named Seignette, in 1672.

Roches (Catharine des) had a collection of poems written on her, termed "La Puce de Grands-jours de Poitiers."

Rochester, according to Bede, derives its name from "Hrof," a Saxon chieftain. (Hrofs-ceaster, Hrof's castle.)

Rock. A quack; so called from one Rock, who was the "Holloway" of queen Anne's reign.

Oh, when his nerves had once received a shock,
Sir Isaac Newton might have gone to Rock.
Crabbe, "Borough."

The Ladies' Rock. A crag in Scotland under the castle-rock of Stirling, where ladies used to witness tournaments.

In the castle-hill is a hollow called The Valley, about a square acre in extent, used for justings and tournaments. On the south side of the valley is a small rocky pyramidal mount called The Ladies' Hill or Rock, where the ladies sat to witness the spectacle.—Nimmo, "History of Stirlingshire," p. 282.

People of the Rock. The inhabitants of Hejaz or Arabia Petræa.

Captain Rock. A fictitious name assumed by the leader of the Irish insurgents in 1822.

Rock-cork. A variety of Asbestos, resembling cork. It is soft, easily cut, and very light.

Rock-crystal. The specimens which enclose hair-like substances are called Thetis's Hair-stone, Venus's Hair-stone, Venus's Pencils, Cupid's Net, Cupid's Arrows, &c.

Rock-leather. A variety of Asbestos.

Rock-wood. A variety of Asbestos.

Rococo. C'est du rococo. It is mere twaddle; Brummagen finery; make-believe. (Italian, roco, uncouth.)

Roco'co Architecture. A debased style, which succeeded the revival of Italian architecture, and very prevalent in Germany. The ornamentation is without principle or taste, and may be designated ornamental design run mad.

Roco'co Jewellery, strictly speaking, means showy jewellery made up of several different stones. Moorish decoration and Watteau's paintings are rococo. The term is now generally used depreciatingly for flashy, gaudy. Louis XIV. furniture, with gilding and ormolu, is sometimes termed rococo.

Rod. A rod in pickle. A scolding in store. The rod is laid in pickle to keep it ready for use.

Rod'erick, the thirty-fourth and last of the Visigothic kings, was the son of Theod'ofred, and grandson of king Chin'lasuin'tho. Witi'za, the usurper, put out the eyes of Theod'ofred, and murdered Favil'a, a younger brother of Roderick; but Roderick, having recovered his father's throne, put out the eyes of the usurper. The sons of Witi'za joining with count Julian, invited the aid of Muza ibn Nozeir, the Arab chief, who sent Tarik into Spain with a large army. Roderick was routed at the battle of Guadale'tú, near Xerés de la Fronte'ra (July 17th, 711). Southey has taken this story for an epic poem in twenty-five books—blank verse. (See RODRIGO.)

Rod'rick Random. A child of impulse, with an occasional dash of generosity and good-humour; but for the most part a selfish libertine, more prone to revenge than gratitude. His treatment of Strap is revolting for its heartlessness and injustice.—Smollett, "Roderick Random."

Roderigo. A Venetian gentleman in Shakespeare's "Othello." He was in love with Desdemona, and when the lady eloped with Othello, hated the "noble Moor." Iago took advantage of this temper for his own ends, told his dupe the Moor will change, therefore "put money in thy purse;" Desdemona will also change her present mood, therefore "put money in thy purse." The burden of his advice was always the same—"Put money in thy purse."

This word is sometimes pronounced Rod'ri-go; g.e. "It is as sure as you are Roderigo;" and sometimes Rode-ri'go; g.e. "On, good Roderigo; I'll deserve your pains."—Act i., s. 1.

Rodhaver. The lady-love of Zal, a Persian hero. Zal wanted to scale her bower, and Rodhaver let down her long tresses to assist him; but the lover managed to climb to his mistress by fixing his crook into a projecting beam.—Champion, "Ferdosi."

Rodilar'dus. A huge cat which scared Panurge, and which he declared to be a puny devil.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," iv. 67.

Rodol'pho (Count). The count, returning from his travels, puts up for the night at an inn near his castle. While in bed, a lady enters his chamber, and speaks to him of her devoted love. It is Ami'na, the somnambulist, who has wandered thither in her sleep. Rodolpho perceives the state of the case, and quits the apartment. The villagers, next morning, come to congratulate their lord on his return, and find his bed occupied by a lady. The tongue of scandal is loud against her, but the count explains to them the mystery, and his tale is confirmed by their own eyes, which see Ami'na at the moment getting out of the window of a mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of a roof under which the wheel of the mill is rolling with velocity. She crosses the crazy bridge securely, and every one is convinced of her innocence.—Bellini, "La Sonnambula" (his best opera).

Rod'omont (in "Orlando Inamorato" and "Orlando Furioso") king of Sarza or Algiers, Ulien's son, and called the "Mars of Africa." He was commander both of horse and foot in the Saracen army sent against Charlemagne, and may be termed the Achilles of the host. His lady-love was Dor'alis, princess of Grana'da, who ran off with Mandricardo, king of Tartary. At Roge'ro's wedding-feast Rodomont rode up to the king of France in full armour, and accused Roge'ro, who had turned Christian, of being a traitor to king Agramant, his master, and a renegade; whereupon Roge'ro met him in single combat, and slew him. (See ROGERO.)

Who more brave than Rodomont?—Cervantes, "Don Quixote."

Rod'omont. The surname of Luigi Gonzal'ga, son of Ludovico Gonzaga, and called Gazalo, from a castle which he held.

Rod'omonta'de (4 syl.). From Rodomont, a brave but braggart knight in Bojardo's "Orlando Inamorato." He is introduced into the continuation of the story by Ariosto ("Orlando Furioso"), but the braggart part of his character is greatly toned down. Neither Rodomont nor Hector deserves the opprobrium which has been attached to their names.

(See RODOMONT.)

Rodrigo (Rod-ree'-go) or Roderick, king of Spain, conquered by the Arabs. He saved his life by flight, and wandered to Guadalet'ë, where he saw a shepherd, and asked food. In return he gave the shepherd his royal chain and ring. He passed the night in the cell of a hermit, who told him that by way of penance he must pass certain days in a tomb full of snakes, toads, and lizards. After three days the hermit went to see him, and he was unhurt, "because the Lord kept his anger against him." The hermit went home, passed the night in prayer, and went again to the tomb, when Rodrigo said, "They eat me now, they eat me now, I feel the adders' bite." So his sin was atoned for, and he died.

Rogation Days. The Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Ascension-day. Rogation is the Latin equivalent of the Greek word "Litany," and on the three Rogation days "the Litany of the Saints" is appointed to be sung by the clergy and people in public procession. ("Litany," Greek litaneia, supplication. "Rogation," Latin rogatio, same meaning.)

Rogation Week used to be called Gang Week, from the custom of ganging round the country parishes to mark their bounds. Similarly, the weed Milk-wort is still called Rogation or Gang-flower, from the custom of decorating the pole (carried on such occasions by the charity children) with these flowers.

Rogel of Greece. A knight, whose exploits and adventures form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance entitled "Am'adis of Gaul." This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Roger. The cook in Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." "He cowde reste, sethe, broille, and frie. Make mortreux, and wel bake a pye;" but Herry Bailif, the host, said to him—

Now telle on, Roger, and loke it be good;
For many a Jakk of Dover hastow sold,
That hath be twyes hoot and twyes cold.

Verse 4313.

Roger Bontemps. (See BONTEMPS.)

The Jolly Roger. The black flag, the favourite ensign of pirates.

Set all sail, clear the deck, stand to quarters, up with the Jolly Roger!—Sir Walter Scott, "The Pirate," ch. xxxi.

Roger of Bruges. Roger van der Weyde, painter. (1455-1529.)

Roger de Coverley. A dance invented by the great-grandfather of Roger de Coverley, or Roger of Cowley, near Oxford.

Roger of Hoveden or Hewden, in Yorkshire, continued Bede's History from 732 to 1202. The reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. are very fully given. The most matter-of-fact of all our old chroniclers; he indulges in no epithets or reflections.

Rogero, Ruggiero, or Rizzieri of Risa (in "Orlando Furioso"), was brother of Marphi'sa, son of Rogero and Galacella. He married Brad'amant, Charlemagne's niece, but had no children. Galacella being slain by Ag'olant and his sons, Rogero was nursed by a lioness. Rogero deserted from the Moorish army to the Christian Charles, and was baptised. His marriage with Bradamant and election to the crown of Bulgaria conclude the poem.

Rogero was brought up by Atlantès, a magician, who gave him a shield of such dazzling splendour that every one quailed who set eyes on it. Rogero, thinking it unknighly to carry a charmed shield, threw it into a well.

Who more courteous than Rogero?—Cervantes, "Don Quixote."

Rogero (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), brother of Bœmond, and son of Roberto Guiscardo of the Norman race, was one of the band of adventurers in the crusading army. Slain by Tisaphernès.—Bk. xx.

Rokesmith (John). The hero of Dickens' novel entitled "Our Mutual Friend." He marries Bella Wilfer.

Roland, count of Mans and knight of Blaives, was son of duke Mile of Aiglant, his mother being Bertha, the sister of Charlemagne. His sword was called Durandal, and his horse Veillantif. He was eight feet high, and had an open countenance, which invited confidence, but inspired respect. In Italian romance he is called Orlando, his sword Duranda'na, and his horse Veglianti'no. (See Song of Roland.)

I know of no one to compare him to but the Archangel Michael.—"Croquemitaine," iii.

Roland or Rolando (Orlando in Italian). One of Charlemagne's paladins and nephews. He is represented as brave, loyal, and simple-minded. On the return of Charlemagne from Spain, Roland, who commanded the rear-guard, fell into an ambushade at Roncesvallès in the Pyrenees, and perished with all the flower of French chivalry (778). He is the hero of Theroulde's "Chanson de Roland;" the romance called "Chronique de Turpin;" Boiardo's epic, "Orlando in Love" (Italian); and Ariosto's epic of "Orlando Mad" (Italian).

Roland, after slaying Angoulaffre, the Saracen giant, in single combat at Fronsac, asked for his reward the hand of Aude, daughter of Sir Gerard and lady Guibourg; but the marriage never took place, as Roland fell at Roncesvalles, and Aude died of a broken heart.—"Croquemitaine," xi.

A Roland for an Oliver. A blow for a blow, tit for tat. Roland and Oliver were two of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose exploits are so similar that it is very difficult to keep them distinct. What Roland did Oliver did, and what Oliver did Roland did. At length the two met in single combat, and fought for five consecutive days on an island in the Rhine, but neither gained the least advantage. (See in "La Légende des Siècles," by Victor Hugo, the poem entitled "Le Mariage de Roland.")

The etymologies connecting the proverb with Charles II., General Monk, and Oliver Cromwell are wholly unworthy of credit, for even Shakespeare alludes to it: "England all Olivers and Rolands bred" ("1 Henry VI.," i. 2); and Edward Hall, the historian, almost a century before Shakespeare, writes—

But to have a Roland to resist an Oliver, he sent solempne ambassadors to the kyng of Englande, fleying hym hys daughter in mariage.—"Henry VI."

Roland. (See BRÈCHE.)

To die like Roland. To die of starvation or thirst. It is said that Roland the great paladin, set upon in the defile of Roncesvalles, escaped the general slaughter, and died of hunger and thirst in seeking to cross the Pyrenees.

Post ingentem Hispanorum cædem præ Pyrenæi saltus j. ca. . . . sibi miserum exitum. Inde nostri intolerabili siti et inimiti velu et significare se torquere. furore alium, Rolandi morte se perire.—
John de la Bruere Champie, "De Cibatua," xvi. 5.

Like the blast of Roland's horn. When Roland was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvallès, he sounded his horn to give Charlemagne notice of his danger. At the third blast it cracked in two, but so loud was the blast that birds fell dead and the whole Saracen army was panic-struck. Charlemagne heard the sound at St. Jean Pied de Port, and rushed to the rescue, but arrived too late.

Oh for one blast of that dread horn
On Fontarabian echoes borne,
That to king Charles did come.
So Walter Scott, "Marmion," vi. 33

Song of Roland. Part of the "Chansons de Geste," which treat of the achievements of Charlemagne and his paladins. William of Normandy had it sung at the head of his troops, when he came to invade England.

Song of Roland. When Charlemagne had been six years in Spain, by the advice of Roland, his nephew, he sent Ganelon on an embassy to Marsillus, the pagan king of Saragossa. Ganelon, out of jealousy, betrayed to Marsillus the route which the Christian army designed to take on its way home, and the pagan king arrived at Roncesvallès just as Roland was conducting through the pass a rear-guard of 20,000 men. Roland fought till 100,000 Saracens lay slain, and only fifty of his own men survived. At this juncture another army, consisting of 50,000 men, poured from the mountains. Roland now blew his enchanted horn, and blew so loudly that the veins of his neck started. Charlemagne heard the blast, but Ganelon persuaded him that it was only his nephew hunting the deer. Roland died of his wounds, but in dying threw his trusty sword Durandal into a poisoned stream, where it still remains.

Roland de Vaux (Sir). Baron of Triermain, who wakes Gyneth from her long sleep of 500 years and marries her.—Sir Walter Scott, "Bridal of Triermain."

Rolandseck Tower, opposite the Drachenfels. The legend is that when Roland went to the wars, a false report of his death was brought to his betrothed, who retired to a convent in the isle of Nonnewërth. When Roland returned home flushed with glory and found that his lady-love had taken the veil, he built the castle which bears his name, and overlooks the nunnery, that he might at least see his heart-treasure, lost to him for ever.

Rolls (Chancery Lane, London). So called from the records kept there in rolls of parchment. The house was originally built by Henry III. for converted Jews, and was called "Domus Conversorum." It was Edward III. who appropriated the place to the conservation of records.

Glover's Roll. A copy of the lost "Roll of Arms" made by Glover, Somerset herald. It is a roll of the arms borne by Henry III., his princes of the blood, barons, and knights, between 1216 and 1272.

The Roll of Cuelverrock. An heraldic poem in Norman-French, reciting the names and arms of the knights present at the siege of Caerlaverock, in 1300.

Rollrich or Rowldrich Stones, near Chipping Norton (Oxfordshire). A number of large stones in a circle, which tradition says are men turned to stone. The highest of them is called the King, who "would have been king of England, if he could have caught sight of Long Compton, which may be seen a few steps further on; five other large stones are called the knights, and the rest common soldiers.

Rolly-polly (pron. roul-y poul-y). A crust with jam rolled up into a pudding; a little fat child. Rolly is a thing rolled with the diminutive added. Polly is fine flour, or flour bolted, whence our pollen (Latin, pollis, dust). The whole word means "a little fine flour rolled into a little pudding." In some parts of Scotland the game of nine-pins is called rouly-pouly.

Roma'ic. Modern or Romanised Greek.

Roman (The).

Jean Dumont, the French painter, le Romain. (1700-1781.)

Stephen Picart, the French engraver, le Romain. (1631-1721.)

Giulio Pippi, Giulio Romano. (1492-1546.)

Adrian van Roomen, the mathematician, Adrianus Roma'nus. (1561-1615.)

Most learned of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro. (B.C. 116-28.)

Last of the Romans. Rienzi. (1310-1354.)

Last of the Romans. Charles James Fox. (1749-1806.) (See SIDNEY.)

Ultimus Romanorum. Horace Walpole. (1717-1797.) (See LAST.)

Roman Birds. Eagles; so called because the ensign of the Roman legion was an eagle.

Roma'nas avēs propria legio'num nu'mina.
Tucitus.

Roman Remains in England. The most remarkable are the following:—

The pharos, church, and trenches in Dover.

Chilham Castle, Richborough, and Reculver Forts.

Silchester (Berkshire), Dorchester, and Caerleon, amphitheatres.

Hadrian's wall, from Tyne to Boulness.

The wall, baths, and Newport Gate of Lincoln.

Verulam, near St. Albans.

York (Eboracum), where Severus and Constantius Chlorus died, and Constantine the Great was born.

Bath, &c.

Roman des Romans. A French version of "Amadis of Gaul," greatly extended, by Gilbert Sannier and Sieur de Duverdier.

Roman de Chevalier de Lyon, by Maître Wace, canon of Caen in Normandy, and author of "Le Brut." The romance referred to is the same as that entitled "Ywain and Gawain."

Roman de la Rose. (See ILIAD, the French.)

Romance. A tale in prose or verse the incidents of which are hung upon what is marvellous and fictitious.

These tales were originally written in the Romance language (q.v.), and the expression, "In Romance we read," came in time to refer to the tale, and not to the language in which it was told.

Romance of Chivalry may be divided into three groups:—(1) That relating to Arthur and his Round Table; (2) that relating to Charlemagne and his paladins; (3) that relating to Amadis and Palmerin. In the first are but few fairies; in the second they are shown in all their glory; in the third (which belongs to Spanish literature) we have no fairies, but the enchantress Urganda la Desconecida.

Romanesque (3 syl.).

In painting. Fanciful and romantic, rather than true to nature.

In architecture. Byzantine, Lombard, Saxon, and indeed all the debased Roman styles, between the time of Constantine (350) and Charlemagne (800).

In literature. The dialect of Langue-doc, which smacks of the Romance.

Romanic or Romance Languages. Those modern languages which are the immediate offspring of Latin, as the Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and French. Early French is emphatically so called; hence Bouillet says: "Le roman était universellement parlé en Gaule au dixième siècle."

Frank's speech is called Romance,
So says clerks and men of France.

Robert de Brunn.

Ro'manism. Popery, or what resembles popery, the religion of modern Rome.

Romantic means like Rome, in the Roman style, because European fiction was first written in the Romance languages, or the languages based on the Latin. (See ROMANCE.)

Romanic School. The name assumed, at the beginning of the present century, by a number of young poets and critics in Germany, who wished to redeem poetry and art from the trammels of French pedantry.

Romantic School of France. A similar movement made in France about thirty years later. Lamartine and Victor Hugo are its best exponents.

Roma'nus (St.), a Norman bishop of the seventh century, is depicted fighting with a dragon, in allusion to the tale that he miraculously conquered a dragon which infested Normandy.

Roma'ny. Gipsy language, the speech of the Roma or Zingali.

Rome. The etymology of this word from Roma, the mother of Romulus and Remus, or from Romulus the legendary founder, or from ruma (a dug) in allusion to the fable of the wolf suckling the out-cast infants, is wholly worthless. Niebuhr derives it from the Greek word rhoma (strength), a suggestion confirmed by its other name Valentia, from valens (strong). Michelet prefers Rumo, the ancient name of the river Tiber.

Rome was not built in a day. Achievements of great pith and moment are not accomplished without patient perseverance and a considerable interval of time. The French say Grand bien ne vient pas en peu d'heures, but the English proverb is to be found in the French also: Rome n'a pas été faite en un jour. (1615.)

Founder of Rome. (1) Romulus, the legendary founder, B.C. 752; (2) Camillus was termed the Second Romulus, for saving Rome from the Gauls, B.C. 365; (3) Caius Ma'nus was called the Third Romulus, for saving Rome from the Teutones and Cimbric, B.C. 101.

From Rome to May. A bantering expression equivalent to the following:—

"From April to the foot of Westminster bridge;" "Inter pascha remisque feror" ("Reinardus," ii. 630); "Inter Cluniacum et Sancti festa Johannis obit" ("Reinardus," iv. 972); "Cela s'est passé entre Maubeuge et la Pentecôte."

Oh that all Rome had but one head, that I might strike it off at a blow! Caligula, the Roman emperor, is said to have uttered this amiable sentiment.

When you go to Rome, do as Rome does— i.e., Conform to the manners and customs of those among whom you live, and don't wear a brown hat in Friesland. St. Monica and her son St. Augustine bishop of Hippo, being at Milan, asked St. Ambrose his advice on the following point: At Rome they fast on Saturday, but not so at Milan; which practice ought to be observed? To this the Milan saint replied, "When I am at Milan, I dine, as they do at Milan; but when I go to Rome, I do as Rome does."—Epistle xxxvi.

Rome's best wealth is patriotism. So said Metius Curtius, when he jumped into the chasm which the soothsayers gave out would never close till Rome threw therein "its best wealth."

Book of Rome. Books of romance. (See ROMANCE.)

Yt ys in the Boke of Rome,
Ther was no knyght of Kyrtendome
That jourey durst craue.

"Torrent of Portugal," p. 6.

Romeo and Juliet (Shakespeare). The story is taken from a poetical version by Arthur Brooke of Bolstead's novel called "Rhomio and Juliotta." Bolstead borrowed the main incidents from a story by Luigi da Porto, of Vicenza (1535), entitled "La Giulietta." In many respects it resembles the "Ephesiaca" (in ten books) of Ephesius Xenophon, whose novel recounts the loves of Habrocomas and Anthia.

Romeo. A devoted lover; a lady's man; from Romeo in Shakespeare's tragedy. (See ROMEO AND JULIET.)

James in an evil hour went forth to woo
Young Juliet Hart, and was her Romeo.
Crabbe, "Borough."

Rom'ulus. We need no Romulus to account for Rome. We require no hypothetical person to account for a plain fact. This is said of characters invented to make out an etymology, as Hurleigh Burleigh, to account for our word "Hurly-burly" (q.v.).

Ron. The name of prince Arthur's spear, made of ebony.

His spere he nom [took] an honde, tha Ron was thaten [called]. Layamon, "Brut" (12th cent.).

Ronald. Lord Ronald gave lady Clare a lily-white doe as a love-token, and the cousins were to be married on the following day. Lady Clare opened her heart to Alice the nurse, and was then informed that she was not lady Clare at all, but the nurse's child, and that lord Ronald was rightful heir to the estate. "Lady" Clare dressed herself as a peasant, and went to reveal the mystery to her lord. Ronald replied, "If you are not the heiress born, we will be married to-morrow, and you shall still be lady Clare."—Tennyson.

Roncesvalles (4 syl.). A defile in the Pyrenees, famous for the disaster which here befell the rear of Charlemagne's army, in the return march from Saragossa. Ganelon betrayed Roland, out of jealousy, to Marsilus, king of the Saracens, and an ambuscade attacking the Franks killed every man of them. Amongst the slain were Roland, Oliver, Turpin, and Mitaine the emperor's god-child. An account of this attack is given in the Epilogue of "Croquemitaine;" but the historical narrative is derived from Eginhard.

Rondibilis. The physician consulted by Panurge in "Gargantua and Pantagruel," by Rabelais.

Rondo. Father of the Rondo. Jean Baptiste Davaux; but Gluck was the first to introduce the musical rondo into France, in the opera of "Orpheus."

Ron'yon or Ronion. A term of contempt to a woman. It is the French rogneux, scabby, mangy.

You raz! you baggage! you pouclat! you ronyon! out! out!

Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iv. 3.

"Aroint thee, witch!" the rump-fed ronyon cries.

Shakespeare, "Macbeth," i. 3.

Rood Lane (London). So called from a rood or "Jesus on the cross" placed there, and in Roman Catholic times held in great veneration.

Rook's Hill, Lavant, Chichester, celebrated for the local tradition that the golden calf of Aaron is buried there.

Rook'ery (3 syl.). Any low neighbourhood frequented by thieves and vagabonds. A person fleeced or liable to be fleeced is a pigeon, but those who prey upon these "gulls" are called rooks.

Rooky Wood. Not the wood where rooks do congregate, but the misty or dark wood. The verb reek (to emit vapour) had the preterite roke, rook, or rook; hence Hamilton, in his "Wallace," speaks of the "rooky mist."

*Light thickens, and the crow
Makes wing to the rooky wood.*

Shakespeare, "Macbeth" lii. 2.

Roost. Gone to roost—gone to bed. At roost—in bed, asleep, in a state of rest. A roost is the perch on which fowls rest at night.

The chough and crow to roost are gone.

Glee (words by Joanna Baillie, music by Bishop).

Rope. You carry a rope in your pocket (French). Said of a person very lucky at cards, from the superstition that a bit of rope with which a man has been hanged, carried in the pocket, secures luck at cards.

"You have no occupation?" said the Bench, inquiringly, to a vagabond at the bar. "Beg your worship's pardon," was the rejoinder; "I deal in bits of halter for the use of gentlemen as plays."—The Times (French correspondent).

She is on her high ropes. In a distant and haughty temper. The allusion is to a rope-dancer, who looks down on the spectators. The French say, Être monté sur ses grands chevaux; and we have the analogous phrase, "To be on your high horse."

Rope-dance. Terence complains that the attention of the public was diverted from his play by the exhibitions of a rope-dancer.—Hecyra.

Rope-dancers. Jacob Hall, in the reign of Charles II., greatly admired by the Duchess of Cleveland.

Richer, the celebrated rope-dancer at Sadler's Wells (1658).

Signor Violantè, in the reign of queen Anne.

The Turk who astonished every one that saw him, in the reign of George II.

Froissart (vol. iv., ch. 38, fol. 47) tells us of "a mayster from Geane," who either slid or walked down a rope suspended to the highest house on St. Michael's Bridge and the tower of Our Lady's Church, when Isabel of Bavaria made her public entry into Paris. Some say he descended dancing, placed a crown on Isabel's head, and then re-ascended.

A similar performance was exhibited in London, February 19th, 1546, before Edward VI. The rope was slung from the battlements of St. Paul's steeple. The performer of this feat was a man from Aragon.

The same trick was repeated when Felipe of Spain came to marry queen Mary. (See Holinshed, "Chronicle," iii., p. 1121.)

A similar exploit was made at the close of the last century at Hertford, the rope being fixed to the tower of All Saints' church.

Roper. Margaret Roper was buried with the head of her father, Sir Thomas More, in her arms.

Her, who c'asped in her last trance
Her murdered father's head. — Tennyson.

Mistress Roper. A cant name given to the Marines by British sailors. The wit, of course, lies in the awkward way that marines handle the ship's ropes.

To marry Mistress Roper is to enlist in the Marines.

Roque (1 syl.). A blunt, feeling old man in the service of Donna Floranthe. — George Colman the Younger, "Octavian."

Saint Roque. Patron saint of those who suffer from plague or pestilence; this is because "he worked miracles on the plague-stricken, while he was himself smitten with the same judgment."

Roque Guinart. A famous robber, whose true name was Pédro Rocha Guinarda, leader of los Niceros, which, with the los Cadelles, levied heavy contributions on all the mountain districts of Catalonia in the seventeenth century. He was a Spanish Rob Roy, and was executed in 1616. — Pe licur.

Roquelaure. A cloak; so called from the duke de Roquelaure (George II.).

"Your honour's roquelaure," replied the corporal, "has not once been laid on since the night before your honour received your wound." — Sterne, "Tristram shandy" (Story of Le Fever).

Ros-crana. Daughter of Cormac king of Moi-lena, wife of Fingal. — Ossian, "Temora," iv.

Ro'sa (Salva'tor). An Italian painter, noted for his scenes of savage nature, gloomy grandeur and awe-creating magnificence. (1615-1673.)

Whate'er Lorian light touched with softened hue,
Or savage rocks dashed, or leasid Poussin drew.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto i.

Rosalia or St. Rosalie. A native of Palermo, who was carried by angels to an inaccessible mountain, where she lived for many years in the cleft of a rock, a part of which she wore away with her knees in her devotions. If any one doubts it, let him know that a rock with a hole in it may still be seen, and folks less sceptical have built a chapel there, with a marble statue, to commemorate the event.

That grot where olives nod,
Where, darling of each heart and eye,
From all the youths of Sicily
St. Rosalie retired to dwell.

Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion," i. 21.

St. Rosalia, in Christian art, is depicted in a cave with a cross and skull, or else in the act of receiving a rosary or chaplet of roses from the Virgin.

Ros'alind. Daughter of the banished duke, but brought up with Celia in the court of Frederick, the duke's brother, and usurper of his dominions. When Rosalind fell in love with Orlando, duke Frederick said she must leave his house and join her father in the forest of Arden. Celia resolved to go with her, and the two ladies started on their journey. For better security they changed their names and assumed disguises: Celia dressed herself as a peasant-girl, and took for the nonce the name of Aliena; Rosalind dressed as her brother, and called herself Ganymed. They took up their quarters in a peasant's cottage, where they soon encountered Orlando, and (to make a long tale short) Celia fell in love with Oliver, and Rosalind obtained her father's consent to marry Orlando. — Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Ros'alind, in the "Shepherds' Calendar," is the maiden vainly beloved by Colin Clout, as her choice was fixed on a shepherd named Menalcas. (See below.)

Ros'alinde (3 syl.). The anagram of "Rose Danil" or "Rose Daniel," with whom Spenser was in love, but the young lady married John Florio the Resolute. In the "Shepherds' Calendar" Rose is called "Rosalinde," and Spenser calls himself "Colin Clout." Shakespeare introduces John Florio in "Love's Labour's Lost" under the imperfect anagram of Holofernes (Hnes Florio).

Ros'aline (3 syl.). A negress of sparkling wit and great beauty, attending on the princess of France, and loved by Lord Biron', a nobleman in the suite of Ferdinand king of Navarre.—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost."

Ros'amond (Fair). Higden, monk of Chester, says—"She was the fayre daughter of Walter lord Clifford, concubine of Henry II., and poisoned by queen Elianor A.D. 1177. Henry made for her a house of wonderfull working, so that no man or woman might come to her. This house was named Labyrinthus, and was wrought like unto a knot in a garden called a maze. But the queen came to her by a clue of thredde, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after. She was buried at Godstow, in an house of nunnes, with these verses upon her tombe:—

"*Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa munda:
Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redole'rẽ solet.*"

Here Rose the graced, not Rose the chaste, reposes;
The smell that rises is no smell of roses.

* * Rosamond Clifford is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in two of his novels—"The Talisman" and "Woodstock."

Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver;
Fair Rosamond! was but her nom de guerre,
Dryden, Epilogue to "Henry II."

Rosa'na. Daughter of the queen of Armenia. She aided the three sons of St. George to quench the seven lamps of the Knight of the Black Castle.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," ii. 8-9. (See LAMPS.)

Ros'ary (the rose article). A name given to the bead-roll employed by Roman Catholics for keeping count of their repetitions of certain prayers. It consists of three parts, each of which contains five mysteries connected with Christ or his virgin mother. The entire roll consists of 150 Ave Marias, 15 Pater Nosters, and 15 doxologies. The word is said by some to be derived from the chaplet of beads, perfumed with roses, given by the Virgin to St. Dominic; Others say the first chaplet of the kind was made of rosewood; others, again, maintain that it takes its name from St. Ro'salie; and some think it is named from the "Mystical Rose," one of the titles of the Virgin. The set is sometimes called "fifteens," from its containing fifteen "doxologies," fifteen "Our Fathers," and 10 times 15 or 150 "Hail Maries."

Ros'ciad. A satire published by Charles Churchill in 1761; it canvasses the faults and merits of the metropolitan actors.

Ros'cius. A first-rate actor; so called from the Roman Roscius, unrivalled for his grace of action, melody of voice, conception of character, and delivery. He was paid thirty pounds a day for acting; Pliny says four thousand a year, and Cicero says five thousand.

What scene of death hath Roscius new to act?
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," v. 6.

Another Roscius. So Camden terms Richard Burbage. (*-1629.)

The British Roscius. Thomas Betterton, of whom Cibber says, "He alone was born to speak what only Shakespeare knew to write." (1635-1710.)

David Garrick. (1716-1779.)

The Roscius of France. Michel Boyron, generally called Baron. (1653-1729.)

The Young Roscius. William Henry West Betty, who made his début in 1803, and in fifty-six nights realised £34,000.

Rose. Sir John Maundeville says—A Jewish maid of Bethlehem (whom Southey names Zillah) was beloved by one Ham'el, a brutish sot. Zillah rejected his suit, and Hamuel vowed vengeance. He gave out that Zillah was a demoniac, and she was condemned to be burnt; but God averted the flames, the stake budded, and the maid stood unharmed under a rose-tree full of white and red roses, then "first seen on earth since Paradise was lost."

Rose. An emblem of England. It is also the cognizance of the Richmonds, hence the rose in the mouth of one of the foxes which support the shield in the public-house called the "Holland Arms," Kensington. The daughter of the duke of Richmond (lady Caroline Lennox) ran away with Mr. Henry Fox, afterwards baron Holland of Foxley. So the Fox stole the Rose and ran off with it.

Rose, for Rose-noble. A coin struck in 1344, under Edward III.; so called because it had a rose, the badge of the Lancastrians and Yorkists.

De la pistole.
De la guinée, et de l'ubole.
Du louis d'or, du ducaton,
De la rose, et du patagon.
Jacques Moreau, in "Virgile Travesti."

The Rose Alley ambushade. The attack on Dryden by hired ruffians in the employ of Rochester and the duchess of Portsmouth, December 18, 1679. This scandalous outrage was in revenge of a satire by Mulgrave, erroneously attributed to Dryden.

Attacks of this kind were not uncommon in "the age of chivalry;" witness the case of Sir John Coventry, who was waylaid and had his nose slit by some young men of rank for a reflection on the king's theatrical amours. This attack gave rise to the "Coventry Act" against maiming and wounding. Of a similar nature was the cowardly assassination of Mr. Mountford, in Norfolk Street, Strand, by lord Mohun and captain Hill, for the hypothetical offence of his admiration for Mrs. Bracegirdle.

The Rose Coffee-house, formerly called "The Red Cow," and subsequently "Will's," at the western corner of Bow Street, where John Dryden presided over the literature of the town. "Here," says Malcolm, "appeal was made to him upon every literary dispute."—Spence, "Anecdotes," p. 263.

This coffee-house is referred to as "Russell Street Coffee-house," and "The Wits' Coffee-house."

Will's continued to be the resort of the wits at least till 1710. Probably Addison established his servant [Button] in a new house about 1712—Spence, "Anecdotes," p. 263.

This Button had been a servant of the countess of Warwick, whom Addison married; and Button's became the headquarters of the Whig literati, as Will's had been of the Tory.

The Red Rose, says Sir John Mandeville, sprang from the extinguished brands heaped around a virgin martyr at Bethlehem.

The Red Rose, as a public-house sign. Camden says the red rose was the accepted badge of Edmund, first earl of Lancaster. It was also the cognizance of Edmund Crouchbacke, second son of Henry III.; and of John of Gaunt, fifth duke of Lancaster, in virtue of his wife, who was godchild of Edmund Crouchbacke, and his sole heir. (See above.)

The White Rose, says Sir John Mandeville, sprang from the unkindled brands heaped around the virgin martyr at Bethlehem. (See ROSE.)

The White Rose, as a public-house sign, was not first adopted by the Yorkists during the contest for the crown, as Shakespeare says; it was an hereditary cognizance of the House of York, and had been borne by them ever since the title was first created. It was adopted by the Jacobins as an emblem of the Pretender, because his adherents were obliged to abet him sub rosa (in secret).

Rose in Christian art. The attribute of St. Dorothea, who carries roses in a basket; of St. Casilda, St. Elizabeth of Portugal, and St. Rose of Viterbo, who carry roses either in their hands or caps. St. Rosalia, St. An'gelus, St. Rose of Lima, St. Ascyllus, St. Victoria, &c., wear crowns of roses.

St. Rose of Lima. A martyr of the seventeenth century, usually drawn with roses on her head, or contemplating the infant Jesus in the midst of roses.

The Wars of the Roses. A civil contest that lasted thirty years, in which eighty princes of the blood, a larger portion of the English nobility, and some 100,000 common soldiers were slain. It was a contest between the Lancastrians and Yorkists, whose supporters wore in their caps as badges a red or white rose; the cognizance of the House of Lancaster being The rose gule, and of the House of York The rose argent. (1455-1485.)

Under the rose ("sub rosa"). In strict confidence. Cupid gave Harpocrates (the god of silence) a rose, to bribe him not to betray the amours of Venus. Hence the flower became the emblem of silence. It was for this reason sculptured on the ceilings of banquet-rooms, to remind the guests that what was spoken sub vino was not to be uttered sub divo. In 1526 it was placed over confessionals.

Rose of Jericho. Also called Rosa Maria or Rose of the Virgin. It is of the natural order Crucifere.

Rose-noble. An ancient gold coin, worth 6s. 8d., struck in the reign of Edward III., and stamped with the figure of a rose (1334).

Rose-wood is so called because it yields a perfume like that of roses when it is cut or sawn.

Ro'semary is Ros-mari'nus (sea-dew), and is said to be "useful in love-making." The reason is this: Both Venus the love-goddess, and Rosemary or sea-dew, were offspring of the Sea; and as Love is Beauty's son, Rosemary is his nearest relative.

The sea his mother Venus came on :
And hence some reverend men approve
Of rosemary in making love.

Buller, "Hudibras," pt. ii. c. 1.

Rosemary, an emblem of remembrance. Thus Ophelia says, "There's rosemary, that's for remembrance." According to ancient tradition this herb strengthens the memory. As Hungary water it was once very extensively taken to quiet the nerves. It was much used in weddings, and to wear rosemary in ancient times was as significant of a wedding as to wear a white favour. When the Nurse in "Romeo and Juliet" asks, "Doth not rosemary and Romeo begin both with a [i.e., one] letter?" she refers to these emblematical characteristics of the herb. In the present language of flowers it means "Thy presence revives my hope."

Rosemary Lane (London), now called Royal Mint Street.

Ro'sencrantz & Guild'enstern. Time-serving courtiers, willing to betray any one, and do any "genteel" dirty work to please a king.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet."

Roset'ta (Africa). The orchards of Rosetta are filled with turtle-doves.

Now hangs listening to the doves
In warm Rosetta.

T. Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

The Rosetta Stone. A stone found in 1799 by M. Boussard, a French officer of Engineers, in an excavation made at Fort St. Julien, near Rosetta. It has an inscription in three different languages—the hieroglyphic, the demotic, and the Greek. It was erected B.C. 195, in honour of Ptolemy Epiph'anēs, because he remitted the dues of the sacerdotal body. The great value of this stone is that it furnished the key whereby the Egyptian hieroglyphics have been deciphered.

Rosieru'cians not rosa crux, rose cross; but ros crux, dew cross. Dew was considered by the ancient chemists as the most powerful solvent of gold; and cross in alchemy is the synonym of light, because any figure of a cross contains the three letters L V X (light). "Lux" is the menstruum of the red dragon (i.e., corporeal light), and this gross light properly digested produces gold, and dew is the digester. Hence the Rosierucians are those who use dew for digesting lux or light, for the purpose of coming at the philosophers' stone.

As for the Rosycross philosophers,
Whom you will have to be but sorcerers,
What they pretend to is no more
Than Trismegistus did before,
Pythagoras, old Zoroaster,
And Apollonius their master.

Buller, "Hudibras," pt. ii. 3.

Ross (Celtic). A headland; as Roslin, Culross, Rossberg, Montrose, Roxburgh, Ardrossan, &c.

Ross, from the Welsh rhos, "a moor;" found in Welsh and Cornish names, as Rossall, Rusholme, &c.

The Man of Ross. A name given to John Kyrle, a native of Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire. He resided the greater part of his life in the village of Ross, Herefordshire, and died 1724.

Who taught that heaven-directed spire to rise?

"The Man of Ross," each lisping babe repeats.
Pope, "Moral Essays."

Rosse (2 syl.). A famous sword which the dwarf Elberich gave to Otwit, king of Lombardy. It struck so fine a cut that it left no "gap." It shone like glass, and was adorned with gold. (See BALMUNG.)

This sword to thee I give: it is all bright of hue;
Whatever it may cleave, no gap will there ensue,
From Al'mari I brought it, and Rosse is its name;
Where'er swords are drawn, 'twill put them all to shame.
"The Heldenbuch."

Ross'el. One of Reynard's sons. The word means "reddish."—"Reynard the Fox."

Rossignol (French). Rossignol d'Arcadie. A donkey; so called because its bray is quite as remarkable as the nightingale's song, and Arcadia is called the land of asses and fools. (See FEN-NIGHTINGALE.)

Ros'trum. A pulpit; properly the beak of a ship. In Rome, the pulpit from which orators addressed the public was ornamented with the rostra or ship-prows taken from the Carthaginians.

Rot'a or Rota-men. A political club that met at the "Turk's Head," in New Palace Yard, Westminster, where they discussed and drew up a popular form of commonwealth, the elements of which will be found in Harrington's "Oceana." It was called Rota because a third part of the members were roted out by ballot every year, and were not eligible for re-election for three years.

Rota Aristotelica (Aristotle's Wheel). A problem in mechanics founded on the motion of a wheel about its axis. It was first noticed by Aristotle.

Rote. To learn by rote is to learn by turning words round and round in the memory as a wheel. To "learn by heart" is to learn thoroughly (French, apprendre par cœur). Shakespeare speaks of the "heart of loss," meaning entire loss, and to love with "all our heart" is to love thoroughly. (Latin, rota, a wheel.)

Rothschild (Red Shield). Mayer Anselm, in 1763, made his appearance in Hanover barefoot, with a sack on his shoulders and a bundle of rags on his back. Successful in trade, he returned to Frankfort and set up a small shop, over which hung the signboard of a red shield. As a dealer in old coins he made the acquaintance of the elector of Hesse-Cassel, who appointed him confidential agent. The serene elector being compelled to fly his country, Mayer Anselm took charge of his cash, amounting to several millions of florins. When Napoleon was banished to Elba, and the elector returned, Anselm restored the money—an act of noble honesty which the elector mentioned at the Congress of Vienna. Hence arose the greatness of the house, which assumed the name of the Red Shield. In 1863 Charles received six millions sterling as his personal share and retiring pension from the firm of the five brothers.

Rotten Row. Muster row. Camden derives the word from rotteran (to muster); hence rot, a file of six soldiers. Another derivation is the Norman Ruten Row (roundabout way), being the way corpses were carried to avoid the public thoroughfares. Some suppose that the name is derived from the soft material with which the road is covered.

Roué. The profligate duke of Orleans, regent of France, first used this word in its modern sense. It was his ambition to collect round him companions as worthless as himself, and he used facetiously to boast that there was not one of them who did not deserve to be broken on the wheel—that being the most ordinary punishment for malefactors at the time; hence these profligates went by the name of Orleans' roués or wheels. The most notorious roués were the dukes of Richelieu, Broglie, Biron, and Brancas, together with Canillac and Nocé. In England, the dukes of Rochester and Buckingham.

A notorious roué. A libertine. (See ROUÉ.)

Rouen. Aller à Rouen. To go to ruin. The French are full of these puns, and our merry forefathers indulged in them also.

(1) Il a fait son cours à Asnières. He knows nothing; he graduated at Dunso college.

(2) Aller à Cachan. To give leg-bail, or "se cacher" [des se créanciers]; to go to Hyde Park.

(3) Aller à Dourdan. To go to be whipped (douder, être battu); to be on the road to Flogny.

(4) Vous êtes de Lagny, vous n'avez pas hâte. I see you are a man of Lagny—don't hurry yourself.

(5) Il est de Lunel, Il a une chambre à Lunel, Il est des Luniers d'Orléans, or Il est Logé à la Lune. He is a lunatic.

(6) Envoyer à Mortaigne. To be slain, or sent to Deadham.

(7) Aller à Patras. To die; to be gathered to one's fathers (ad patres).

(8) Aller à Versailles. To be going to the bad. Here the pun is between Versailles and renverser. This wretched pun is about equal to such a phrase as Going to Downham.

The Bloody Feast of Rouen (1356). Charles the Dauphin gave a banquet to his private friends at Rouen, to which his brother-in-law Charles the Bad was invited. While the guests were at table king Jean entered the room with a numerous escort, exclaiming, "Traitor, thou art not worthy to sit at table with my son!" Then turning to his guards, he added, "Take him hence! By holy Paul I will neither eat nor drink till his head be brought me!" Then seizing an iron mace from one of the men-at-arms, he struck another of the guests between the shoulders, exclaiming, "Out, proud traitor! by the soul of my father thou shalt not live!" Four of the guests were beheaded on the spot.

Rouge Croix. One of the pursuivants of the heraldic establishment; so called from the red cross of St. George, the patron saint of England.

Rouge Dragon. The pursuivant founded by Henry VII.; it was the ensign of Cadwaladyr, the last king of the Britons, an ancestor of Henry Tudor.

Rouge et Noir (French, red and black). A game of chance; so called because of the red and black diamond marked on the board. The dealer deals out to noir first till the sum of the pips exceeds thirty, then to rouge in the same manner. That packet which comes nearest to thirty-one is the winner of the stakes.

Rough. To rough at cards is to trump a suit. Ruff means a trump or court card (Dutch, troef).

The Roughs. The coarse, ill-behaved rabble, without any of the polish of good-breeding.

Rough and Ready. So General Zachary Taylor, twelfth president of the United States, was called. (1786-1850.)

Rough-hewn. Shaped in the rough, not finished, unpolished, ill-mannered, raw; as a "rough-hewn seaman" (Bacon); a "rough-hewn discourse" (Howell).

There is a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will.

Shakespeare, "Hamlet," v. 2.

Rough-shod. Riding rough-shod over one. Treating one without the least consideration. The allusion is to riding a horse rough-shod.

Rou'mans (2 syl.). The people of Roumania.

Round. A watchman's beat. He starts from one point, and comes round again to the place from whence he started.

Round. To whisper. (Saxon, runian; German, runen or raunen, to whisper.) (See ROUNDED.)

That lesson which I will round you in the ear—which I will whisper in your ear.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

France...rounded in the ear with [by]....commodity [self-interest] hath resolved to [ou] a most base....peace.—Shakespeare, "King John," ii. 1.

And ner the feud he drough as nought ne were,
Ful privily, and round in his eere,

"Herke, my brother, herke, by thi faith"
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 7132.

Round men in the square holes, and square men in the round holes. The wrong men in the wrong place; especially applied to government officials. The expression was first used in 1855, by Mr. Layard, speaking of the "Administration Reform Association." The allusion is to such games as cribbage, German tactics, &c.

A good round sum. A large sum of money. Shakespeare says the Justice has a "big round belly, with good capon lined;" and the notion of puffed out or bloated is evidently the idea of Shylock when he says to Bassanio, "'Tis a good round sum."

In round numbers. In whole numbers, without regarding the fractions. Thus we say the population of the British Isles is thirty millions in round numbers, and that of London three millions. The idea is that what is round is whole or perfect, and of course fractions, being broken numbers, cannot belong thereto.

To walk the Round. The lawyers used frequently to give interviews to their clients in the Round Church; and "walking the Round" meant loitering about the Round Church, under the hope of being hired for a witness.

Round Dealing. Honest straightforward dealing, without branching off into underhand tricks, or deviating from the straight path into the bye-ways of finesse.

Round dealing is the honour of man's nature.—Bacon.

Round Robin. A petition or protest signed in such a way that no name heads the list. Of course, the signatures are placed in a circular form. The device is French and the term is a corruption of rond (round) ruban (a ribbon). It was first adopted by the officers of government as a means of making known their grievances.

Round Table. Made by Merlin for Uter Pendragon. Uter gave it to king Leodegrance, of Camelyard, and king Leodegrance gave it to Arthur when the latter married Guinever, his daughter. It was made at Carduel, and a place was left in it for the San Graal.

What is usually meant by Arthur's Round Table is a smaller one for the accommodation of twelve favourite knights. Henry VIII. showed François I. the table at Winchester, which he said was the one used by the British king.

The Round Table, says Dr. Percy, was not peculiar to the reign of king Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. Thus the king of Ireland, father of the fair Christabelle, says in the ballad—

Is there never a knight of my round table
This matter will undergo? "Sir Cautine."

Round Table. In the eighth year of Edward I., Roger de Mortimer established a Round Table at Kenilworth for "the encouragement of military pastimes." At this foundation 100 knights and as many ladies were entertained at the founder's expense. About seventy years later, Edward III. erected a splendid table at Windsor. It was 200 feet in diameter, and the expense of entertaining the knights thereof amounted to £100 a week.

A Round Table. A tournament. "So called by reason that the place wherein they practised those feats was environed with a strong wall made in a round form" (Dugdale). We still talk of table-land.

Holding a Round Table. Proclaiming or holding a grand tournament. Matthew of Paris frequently calls justs and tournaments Hastiludia Mensæ Rotundæ (lance-games of the Round Table).

Knights of the Round Table. There were 150 knights who had "sieges" at the table. King Leodegrance brought over 100 when, at the wedding of his daughter Guinever, he gave the table to king Arthur; Merlin filled up twenty-eight of the vacant seats, and the king elected Gawaine and Tor; the remaining twenty were left for those who might prove worthy.—"History of Prince Arthur," 45, 46.

Knights of the Round Table. The most celebrated are Sirs Acolon,* Ag'ravain, An'oral of Wales, Ball'amore,* Banier, Beaumans,* Beleo'bus,* Bevidere, Belvour,* Bersunt,* Bliom'beris, Borre or Bors* (Arthur's natural son), Brandiles, Brunor, Caradoc the Chaste (the only knight who could quaff the golden cup), Colgrevice, Din'adam, Driam, Dodynas the Savage, Eric, Flloll,* Galaabad or Galaad the Modest,* Gareth,* Gaheris,* Galehalt,* Gawain or Gauwin the Gentle* (Arthur's nephew), Grislet,* Hector of Mares (1 syl.) or Ector of Marys,* Iwein or Ewain* (also written Yvain), Kay,* Ladynas, Lamareck or Lamerock*, Lancelot or Lancelot du Lac* (the seducer of Arthur's wife), Lanval of the Fairy Lance, Lavain, Lionell,* Luean, Marhaus,* Melia'dus, Mordred the Traitor (Arthur's nephew), Morolt or Morbault of the Iron Mace, Pag'inet,* Palamede or Palame'dës,* Pharamond, Pell'eas,* Pell'inore, Persaunt of Inde (meaning of the indigo or blue armour), Per'eivall,* Peredur, Ryence, Sag'ramour le Desirus, Sa'gris,* Super'bilis,* Tor or Torres* (reputed son of Ariës the cowherd), Tristram or Tristran the Love-lorn,* Tur'quine,* Wig'alois, Wig'amor, Ywain (see Iwein).

* * The thirty marked with a star (*) are seated with prince Arthur at the Round Table, in the frontispiece of the "Famous History of the Renowned Prince Arthur."

There Galaad sat with manly grace,
Yet maiden meekness in his face;
There Morolt of the iron mace,
And love-lorn Tristram there;
And Dinadam with lively glance,
And Lauval with the fairy lance,
And Mordred with his looks askance,
Brunor and Bevidere
Why should I tell of numbers more?
Sir Cay, Sir Banier, and Sir Bore,
Sir Caradoc the keen.
The gentle Gawain's courteous lore,
Hector de Mares, and Pell'nore,
And Lancelot, that evermore
Looked stou' u-wise on the queen.

Sir Walter Scott, "Bridal of Trictrac," il. 13.

Knights of the Round Table. Their chief exploits occurred in quest of the San Graal or Holy Cup, brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathea's.

Rounded in the Ear. Whispered in the ear. The old word rown, rowned (to whisper, to talk in private). Polonius says to the King in "Hamlet"—"Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him to show his grief,—let her be rowned with him;" not blunt and loud, but in private converse. (See ROUND.)

Roundheads. Puritans; so called because they wore their hair short, while the Royalists wore long hair covering their shoulders.

And ere their butter 'gan to coddie,
A bullet churn'd i' th' Roundhead's noddle.
"Men Miracles," p. 43 (1656).

Roundle, in heraldry, is a charge of a round or circular form. They are of eight sorts, distinguished by their tinctures: (1) a Bezant, tincture "or;" (2) a Plate, tincture "argent;" (3) a Torteaux, tincture "gules;" (4) a Hurt, tincture "azure;" (5) an Ogress or Pellet, tincture "sable;" (6) a Golpe, tincture "purpure;" (7) a Guze, tincture "sanguine;" (8) an Orange, tincture "tenney."

Rounfl. So the Britons called ogres, and the servants or attendants of the ogres they called Gredens.

Rousing. A rousing good fire. Rousing means large, great; hence a rousing falsehood (mendacium magnificum); rous, boasting; to rouse, to drink deep. "The king's rouse the heaven shall bruit" ("Hamlet," i. 2). (Dutch, roes, a bumper; German, rausch, drunkenness.)

Rou'tiers. Adventurers who made war a trade, and let themselves out to any one who would pay them. So called because they were always on the route, or moving from place to place. (Twelfth century.)

Rove (1 syl.). To shoot with roving arrows—i.e., arrows shot out of the horizontal.

To shoot at rovers. To shoot at certain marks of the target so called; to shoot at random without any distinct aim.

Unbelievers are said by Clobery to "shoot at rovers."—"Divine Glimpses," p. 4 (1659).

Running at rovers. Running wild; being without restraint.

Row (rhyme with now). A tumult. It used to be written roue, and referred to the night encounters of the roués or profligate bon-vivants whose glory it was to attack the "Charleys" and disturb the peace. (See ROUÉ.)

Row (rhyme with low). The Row means "Paternoster Row," famous for publishing firms and wholesale booksellers.

Row'dy (rhyme with cloudy). A ruffian brawler, a "rough," a riotous or turbulent fellow, whose delight is to make a row or disturbance.—American.

Rowe'na. A Saxon princess, and bride of Ivanhoe.—Sir Walter Scott, "Ivanhoe."

Rowland. (See ROLAND.)

Childe Rowland. Youngest brother of the "fair burd Helen." Guided by Merlin he undertook to bring back his sister from Elf-land, whither the fairies had carried her, and succeeded in his perilous exploit.—An ancient Scotch ballad.

Childe Rowland to the dark tower came:
His word was still "Fie, foh, and fum,
I smell the blood of a Britishman."

Shakespeare, "King Lear," iii. 4.

Rowley (Thomas). The fictitious priest of Bristol, said by Chatterton to have been the author of certain poems which he (Chatterton) published.

Roxa'na, in the "Rival Queens," by Nathaniel Lee.

Roxburghe Club for printing rare works or MSS., the copies being rigidly confined to members of the club. It was called after John duke of Roxburghe, a celebrated collector of ancient literature, who died 1812. Since the establishment of this club others of a similar character have sprung up, as (1) the Camden, Cheetham, Percy, Shakespeare, Surtees, and Wharton, in England; (2) the Abbotsford, Bannatyne, Maitland, and Spalding, in Scotland; and (3) the Celtic Society of Ireland.

Royal Arms worn by a subject. (See LANE.)

Royal Merchant. In the thirteenth century the Venetians were masters of the sea, and some of their wealthy merchants—as the Sanu'des, the Justinia'ni, the Grimal'di, and others—erected principalities in divers places of the Archipelago, which their descendants enjoyed for many centuries. These self-created princes were called "royal merchants."—Warburton.

Glancing an eye of pity on his losses,
That have of late so huddled on his back,
Enough to press a royal merchant down.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iv. 1.

Royal Road to Learning. Euclid having opened a school of mathematics at Alexandria, was asked by king Ptolemy whether he could not explain his art to him in a more compendious manner. "Sire," said the geometrician, "there is no royal road to learning."

Royal Titles. (1) Of England.—Henry IV. was styled His Grace; Henry VI., His Excellent Grace; Edward IV., High and Mighty Prince; Henry VII., His Grace and His Majesty; Henry VIII., His Highness, then His Majesty. Subsequently kings were styled His Sacred Majesty. Our present style is Her Most Gracious Majesty.

(2) Royal titles, their meaning: Abimelech (Father King). Autocrat (self-potentate, i.e., absolute). Cæsar (in compliment to Julius Cæsar). Calif (successor). Cham (chieftain). Czar (autocrat, a contraction of "Samodersheta"). Darius (holder of the empire). Duke (leader). Emperor (commander). Hospodar (Slavonic, master of the house). Kaiser (Cæsar). Khan (provincial chief). King (father). Landgrave (land reeve). Margrave (border reeve). Nejus (lord protector). Nizam (ruler). Pharaoh (the king). Queen (mother). Shah or Padishah (shah, first; pad, sceptred one). Sheik (elder). Sultan (ruler).

Royston (Herts) means king's town; so called in honour of king Stephen, who erected a cross there. (French, roy.)

A Royston horse and Cambridge Master of Arts will give way to no one. A Cambridge proverb. Royston was a village famous for malt, which was sent to London on horseback. These heavy-laden beasts never moved out of the way. The Masters of Arts, being the great dons of Cambridge, had the wall conceded to them by the inhabitants out of courtesy.

Rozinante (4 syl.). A wretched jade of a riding-horse. Don Quixote's horse was so called. (Spanish, rocin-wañtë, a hack before.)

It is the only time he will sit behind the wretched Rozinante, and it would be Quixotic of him to expect speed.—London Review.

Ruach. The Isle of Winds, visited by Pantagruel and his fleet on their way to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, is the isle of windy hopes and unmeaning flattery. The people of this island live on nothing but wind, eat nothing but wind, and drink nothing but wind. They have no other houses but weathercocks, seeing every one is obliged to shift his way of life to the ever-changing caprice of court-fashion; and they sow no other seeds but the wind-flowers of promise and flattery. The common people get only a fan-puff of food very occasionally, but the richer sort banquet daily on huge mill-draughts of the same unsubstantial stuff.—Rabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 43.

Rub. An impediment. The expression is taken from bowls, where "rub" means that something hinders the free movement of your bowl.

Without rub or interruption.—Swift.

Like a bowle that runneth in a smooth alie, without aie rub.—Stanburst, p. 10.

Rub. Difficulty, cause of uneasiness. (See above.)

To sleep? perchance to dream. Ay, there's the rub. Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 1.

Rūbezahel (3 syl.). The German Puck. He aids the poor, guides the benighted, and succours the oppressed, but has no mercy on the proud and wicked.

Rūbi. One of the Cherubim or "Spirits of Knowledge," who was present when Eve walked in Paradise. He felt the most intense interest in her, and longed, as the race increased, to find one of her daughters whom he could love. He fixed upon Lir'is, young and proud, who thirsted for knowledge, and cared not what price she paid to obtain it. After some months had elapsed, Liris asked her angel-lover to let her see him in his full glory; so Rubi showed himself to her in all his splendour, and she embraced him. Instantly Liris was burnt to ashes by the radiant light, and the kiss she gave on the angel's forehead became a brand, which shot agony into his brain. That brand was "left for ever on his brow," and that agony knew no abatement.—Thomas Moore, "Loves of the Angels," story ii.

Rubicon. To pass the Rubicon. To adopt some measure from which it is not possible to recede. Thus, when the Austrians in 1859 passed the Ticino, the act was a declaration of war against Sardinia; and, in 1866, when the Italians passed the Adige, it was a declaration of war against Austria. The Rubicon was a small river separating ancient Italy from Cisalpine Gaul (the province allotted to Julius Cæsar). When Cæsar crossed this stream he passed beyond the limits of his own province, and became an invader of Italy.

Rubo'nax. Sir Philip Sidney says, "He was driven by a poet's verses to hang himself."—"Defence of Poesie."

Ru'bric (Latin, rubrica, red ochre). So called because the directions were originally printed in red ochre.

The same in sheep's milke with rubricke and soft pitch drunke every day, or eaten to your meate, helpeth the ptisicke.—Topsell, "Beasts," p. 162 (1657).

Ruby. The king of Ceylon has the finest ruby ever seen. "It is a span long, as thick as a man's arm, and without a flaw." Kublai-Khan offered the value of a city for it, but the king answered that he would not part with it if all the treasures of the world were laid at his feet.—Marco Polo.

Ruch'iel. God of the air. (Hebrew, ruch, air; el, god.)—Jewish mythology.

Rudder. Who won't be ruled by the rudder must be ruled by the rock. Who won't listen to reason must bear the consequences, like a ship that runs upon a rock if it will not answer to the helm.

Ruddock. The redbreast, "sacred to the household gods." The legend says if a redbreast finds a dead body in the woods it will "cover it with moss." Drayton alludes to this tradition—

Covering with moss the dead's unclosed eye,
The little redbreast teachest charity.

"The Owl."

Shakespeare makes Arvir'agus say over Imogen—

Thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose; nor
The azure hare-bell....the ruddock would
With charitable bill bring thee all these.

"Cymbelina."

So also in the tale of "The Babes in the Wood"—

The Robins so red
Fresh strawberry-leaves did over them spread.

Ruddy-mane (bloody-hand). The infant son of Sir Mordant; so called because his hand was red with his mother's blood. She had stabbed herself because her husband had been paralysed by a draught from an enchanted stream.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. xi.

Rudge (Barnaby). A half-witted lad, who had for his companion a raven.—Dickens, "Barnaby Rudge."

Ru'diger (3 syl.). Margrave of Bechelar'en, a wealthy Hun, liegeman of king Etzel. In the "Nibelungen-Lied" he is represented as a most noble character. He was sent to Burgundy by king Etzel, to conduct Kriemhild to Hungary if she would consent to marry the Hunnish king. When Gunther and his suite went to pay a visit to Kriemhild, he entertained them all most hospitably, and gave his daughter in marriage to Kriemhild's youngest brother, Gis'elher; and when the broil broke out in the dining-hall of king Etzel, and Rudiger was compelled to take part against the Burgundians, he fought with Kriemhild's second brother, Gernot. Rudiger struck Gernot "through his helmet," and the prince struck the margrave "through shield and morion," and "down dead dropped both together, each by the other slain."—" Nibelungen-Lied."

Rudolstadt (La Comtesse de), or "Consuelo," who marries the count of Rudolstadt.—Romances by George Sand (Madame Dudevant). (See CONSUELO.)

Rudra. Father of the tempest-gods. The word means "run about crying," and the legend says that the boy ran about weeping because he had no name, whereupon Brahma said, "Let thy name be Rud-dra." (Sanskrit, rud, weep; dru, run.)—Vedic mythology.

Rue, to grieve for something done, to repent, is the Saxon verb reowian; German, reuen.

Rue, called "herb of grace," because it was employed for sprinkling holy water. Without doubt it was so used symbolically, because to rue means to be sorry, and penitence brings the water of grace with it. (See DIFFERENCE.) Ophelia says—

There's rue for you, and here's some for me; we may call it "herb of grace" o' Sundays.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iv. 5.

Rue. A slip of land (free of all manorial charges and claims) encompassing or bounding manorial land. It certainly is not derived from the French rue, a street, nor is it a corruption of row. The Saxon hrycg, and the German rücken, are applied to swine-pastures and lands neither under cultivation nor even capable of cultivation; also to fenny ridges. It occurs in the German Hundsrück, and in numerous charters, as, "Andlang hryeges on Heortford"—along the swine-pastures of Hartford.

Ruff and Honours. A game at cards now called slamm.

Ruffian Hall. That part of West Smithfield which is now the horse-market, where "tryals of skill were plaid by ordinary ruffianly people with sword and buckler."—Blount, p. 562.

Rufus (The Red). William II. of England. (1056, 1087-1100.)

Otho II. of Germany; also called The Bloody. (955, 973-983.)

Gilbert de Clare, earl of Gloucester, son-in-law of Edward I. (Slain 1313.)

Ruggie'ro. (See ROGERO.)

Rukenaw (Dame). The ape's wife in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." The word means noisy insolence.

Rule (St.) or St. Regulus, a monk of Patræ in Achaia, is the real saint of Scotland. He was the first to colonise its metropolitan see, and to convert the inhabitants (370). The name Killrule (Colla Reguli) perpetuates this fact. St. Andrew superseded the Achæan.

But I have solemn vows to pay....
To far St. Andrew's bound,
Within the ocean-cave to pray
Where good St. Rule his holy lay
Sung to the billows' sound.

Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion," l. 28.

Rule, Britannia. Words by Thomson, author of "The Seasons," music by Dr. Arne. It first appeared in a masque entitled "Alfred," in which the name of David Mallett is associated with that of James Thomson, and some think he was the real author of this "political hymn." (August 1, 1740.)

Rule Nisi. The claimant requests the court to issue an order that the opponent of his suit shall do what is asked within three or six days (nisi)—i.e., unless good cause can be shown for further delay.

Rum. Queer, quaint, old-fashioned. This word was first applied to Roman Catholic priests, and subsequently to other clergymen. Thus Swift speaks of "a rubble of tenants and rusty dull runs" (country parsons). As these "rusty dull runs" were old-fashioned and quaint, a "rum fellow" came to signify one as odd as a "rusty dull rum."

Ru'minate (3 syl.). To think, to meditate upon some subject; properly, "to chew the cud" (Latin, ru'mino).

To chew the cud of sweet and bitter fancy.—Milton.
On a flowery bank he chews the cud.—Dryden.

Rumolt. Gunther's chief cook.

Sore toiled the chief cook, Rumolt; ah! how his orders ran
Among his understrappers! how many a pot and pan,
How many a mighty cauldron rattled and rang again!
They dressed a world of dishes for the expected train.
Lettsom's "Nibelungen-Lied," stanza 800.

Rump Parliament. Oliver Cromwell (1648) sent two regiments to the House of Commons to coerce the members to condemn Charles I. Forty-one were seized and imprisoned in a lower room of the House, 160 were ordered to go home, and the sixty favourable to Cromwell were allowed to remain. These sixty were merely the rag-end or rump of the whole House. (See PRIDE'S PURGE.)

The name was revived again in the protectorate of Richard Cromwell. Subsequently the former was called The Bloody Rump, and the latter The Rump of a Rump.

The few,
Because they're wasted to the stumps,
Are represented best by rumps.

Butler, "Hudibras," et. vii. 9.

Rumpelstilzchen (Rumple-stiltskin). A passionate little deformed dwarf. A miller's daughter was enjoined by a king to spin straw into gold, and the dwarf did it for her, on condition that she would give him her first child. The maiden married the king, and grieved so bitterly when her first child was born, that the dwarf promised to relent if within three days she could find out his name. Two days were spent in vain guesses, but the third day one of the queen's servants heard a strange voice singing—

Little dreams my dainty dame
Rumpelstilzchen is my name.

The queen being told thereof, saved her child, and the dwarf killed himself from rage.—German Popular Stories.

Rumping Dozen. A corruption of Rump and Dozen, meaning a rump of beef and a dozen of claret.

Rumtun'shid. A Corsican deity.

Run. The tub runs—leaks, or lets out water. In this and all similar phrases the verb run means to "be in a running state." Thus we have "the ulcer run," "the cup runs over," "the rivers run blood," "the field runs with blood"—the ulcer is in a running state, the cup is in a running-over state, the rivers are in a blood-running state, the field is in a running state with blood.

To run a man down. To abuse, depreciate. A hunting term.

To run thin. To start from a bargain. When liquor runs thin it indicates that the cask is nearly empty.

To run riot. To run wild. A hunting term, meaning to run at a whole herd.

In the long run. In the final result. This allusion is to race-running; one may get the start for a time, but in the long run, or entire race, the result may be different. The hare got the start, but in the long run the patient perseverance of the tortoise won the race.

Run Amuck. (See AMUCK.)

It was like a Malay running amuck, only with a more deadly weapon.—The Times.

Frontless and satire-proof he scours the streets,
And runs an Indian-muck at all he meets.
Dryden, "The Hind and the Panther."

Runes. The earliest alphabet in use among the Gothic tribes of Northern Europe. The characters were employed either for purposes of secrecy or for divination. Rûn is Teutonic for "mystery," and hehrûn for "divination."

Runic Rhymes. Rhymes in imitation of the Edda or book of Runic mythology; rude, old-fashioned poetry of a Runic stamp.

Runic Wands. Willow wands with mystic characters inscribed on them, used by the Scandinavians for magic ceremonies.

Running Footman. The last of these menials died out with the infamous duke of Queensberry. In the early part of the eighteenth century no great house was complete without some half-dozen of them. Their duty was to run before and alongside the fat Flemish mares of the period, and advise the innkeeper of the coming guests. The pole which they carried was to help the cumbrous coach of their master out of the numerous sloughs on the northern and western high-roads.

Running Leather. His shoes are made of running leather. He is given to roving. Probably the pun is between roan and run.

Running Thursday. In the beginning of the reign of William III. a rumour ran that the French and Irish Papists had landed; a terrible panic ensued, and the people betook themselves to the country, running for their lives. Joseph Perry says, "I was dismally affrighted the day called Running Thursday. It was that day the report reached our town, and I expected to be killed" (his "Life"). The day in question was Thursday, December 13, 1688.

Running Water. No enchantment can subsist in a living stream; if, therefore, a person can interpose a brook betwixt himself and the witches, sprites, or goblins chasing him, he is in perfect safety. Burns's tale of "Tam o' Shanter" turns upon this superstition.

Running the Hood. It is said that an old lady was passing over Haxey Hill, when the wind blew away her hood. Some boys began tossing it from one to the other, and the old lady so enjoyed the fun that she bequeathed thirteen acres of land, that thirteen candidates might be induced to renew the sport on the 6th of every January.

Rupal. Goddess of fruits.—Scandinavian mythology.

Rupée. An Indian coin of the value of 2s. English. A corruption of the Sanskrit rāpya, from rāpa, a shape, meaning the shape of a man—i.e., a coin with a human figure impressed on it.—Pāṇini.

Rupert of Debate. Edward Geoffrey, fourteenth earl of Derby. It was when he was Mr. Stanley, and the opponent of the great O (i.e., O'Connell), that lord Lytton so describes him. (1799-1869.)

The brilliant chieftain, regularly great,
Frank, haughty, bold—the Rupert of Debate.
"New Timon."

Rupert's Balls, or Prince Rupert's Drops. Glass bubbles first brought to England by prince Rupert. Each bubble has a tail, and if the smallest part of the tail is broken off, the bubble explodes. The French term is larne Bata-vique, because these toys were invented in Holland.

The first production of an author...is usually esteemed as a sort of prince Rupert's drop, which is destroyed entirely if a person make on it but a single scratch.—Houshold Words.

Rush. Not worth a rush. Worthless. The allusion is to the practice of strewing floors with rushes before carpets were invented. Distinguished guests had clean fresh rushes, but those of inferior grade had either the rushes which had been already used by their superiors, or none at all. The more modern expression is "Not worth a straw."

Strangers have green rushes, when daily guests are not worth a rush.—Lilly, "Sapho and Phao."

Friar Rush. Will-o'-the-Wisp; a strolling demon, who once on a time got admittance into a monastery as a scullion, and played the monks divers pranks. (See FRIAR'S LANTHERN.)

Rush Bearing. The day of a church's dedication; so called from the ancient custom of carrying rushes on the day to adorn the church.—Yorkshire.

Rushvan. The angel who opens and shuts the gates of Paradise or Al Janat.—The Koran.

Ruskin'se (3 syl.). Words and phrases introduced by Ruskin, or coined à la Ruskin. The word is used in the Times.—

Such writers as Ruskin and Carlyle have made for themselves technical terms, words, and phrases; some of which will be incorporated into the language...while others may remain emblems of Ruskinese and Carlyliam.—(June 11, 1869.)

Russ. The Russian language; a Russian.

Rus'sel. A common name given to a fox, from its russet colour.

Daun Russel, the fox, stert up at oones,
And by the garget hentē Chaunteclere,
And on his bak toward the wood him bere.
Chaucer, "The Nonne Prestes Tale."

Rus'sian. The nickname of a Russian is "A Bear," or the "Northern Bear."

Rus'tam. The Deev-bend and Persian Her'culēs, famous for his victory over the white dragon named Asdeev. He was the son of Zāl, prince of Sedjistan. The exploits attributed to him must have been the aggregate of exploits performed by numerous persons of the same name. His combat for two days with prince Isfendiar is a favourite subject with the Persian poets. The name of his horse was Reksh. Matthew Arnold's poem, "Sohrab and Rustam," gives an account of Rustam fighting with and killing his son Sohrab.

Rus'ty. He turns rusty. Like a rusty bolt, he sticks and will not move.

Rutland. Saxon, Rot-land (red-land). The Saxons used the word red as a synonym for beautiful or bright, much as the Romans used the word purple, as "purple youth," "purple spring," &c.

Ruyde'ra. The duenna of Belerma. She had seven daughters, who wept so bitterly at the death of Durandartē, that Merlin, out of pity, turned them into lakes or estuaries.—"Don Quixote," pt. ii. bk. ii. ch. 6.

Ry. A Stock-Exchange expression for any sharp or dishonest practice. It originated in an old stock-jobber, who had practised upon a young man, and being compelled to refund, wrote on the cheque, "Please to pay to R. Y.," &c., in order to avoid direct evidence of the transaction.

Rye-house Plot. A conspiracy to assassinate Charles II. and his brother James on their way from Newmarket. As the house in which the king was lodging accidentally caught fire, the royal party left eight days sooner than they had intended, and the plot miscarried. It was called the Rye-House Plot because the conspirators met at the Rye-House Farm, in Hertfordshire (1683).

Rykell (John). A celebrated tregelour in the reign of Henry V. (See TREGETOURL.)

Maister John Rykell sometime tregitour
Of noble Henry, kinge of Englande,
And of France the mighty conquerour.
John Lidgate, "Dance of Macabre."

Rykelot. A magpie (?); a little rook. The German roock, Anglo-Saxon hroc, seem to be cognate words. The ot is a diminutive.

Rymar (Mr. Robert). Poet at the Spa. —Sir Walter Scott, "St. Ronan's Well."

Rymer. A giant, the enemy of the celestials. At the end of the world this giant is to be the pilot of the ship "Nagle-farē."—Scandinavian mythology.

Ryot. A tenant in India who pays a usufruct for his occupation. The Scripture parable of the husbandmen refers to such a tenure; the lord sent for his rent, which was not money but fruits, and the husbandmen stoned those who were sent, refusing to pay their "lord." Ryots have an hereditary and perpetual right of occupancy so long as they pay the usufruct, but, if they refuse or neglect payment, may be turned away.

Ryparog'rapher (Greek). So Pliny calls Pyreicus the painter, because he confined himself to the drawing of ridiculous and grotesque pictures, in which he greatly excelled. Rabelais was the ryparographer of wits. The writers and illustrators of Punch and Fun are ryparographers.

Rython. A giant of Bretagne, slain by king Arthur.

Rython, the mighty giant, slain
By his good brand, relieved Bre'azne,
Sir Walter Scott, "Bridal of Triermain," ii. 11.

S

S. You have crossed your s (French). You have cheated me in your account; you have charged me pounds where you ought to have charged shillings, or shillings where you ought to have charged pence. In the old French accounts, f (= s) stood for sous or pence, and f for francs. To cross your f meant therefore to turn it fraudulently into f.

S.S. collar; worn by the lords chief justices, the lord chief baron of the exchequer, the lord mayor of London, the heralds, and the serjeants-at-arms. The collar consists of a series of the letter S in gold, either linked together or set in close order, on a blue and white ribbon. Sir Samuel Meyrick says it is the initial letter of Henry IV. when earl of Derby (Souveraigne); but as many other conjectures have been started as would fill a volume—e.g., the word seneschal has been suggested; the word swan, the badge of the De Bohuns (1402); the words St. Sulpicius, whose day is Jan. 29th, &c.

S.S.S. (Latin, stra'tum super stra'tum). Layer over layer.

S.T.P. stands for Sanctæ Theologie Professor. Professor is the Latin for Doctor. D.D.—i.e., Divinity Doctor or Doctor of Divinity—is the English equivalent of the Latin S.T.P.

Saädia (Al). A cuirass of silver which belonged to king Saul, and was lent to David when he was armed for the encounter with Goliath. This cuirass fell into the hands of Mahomet, being part of the property confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Medi'na.

Sabbath-Day's Journey (Exodus xvi. 29; Acts i. 12), with the Jews, was not to exceed the distance between the ark and the extreme end of the camp. This was 2,000 cubits or 3,648 feet beyond the city wall—in round numbers equal to an English mile.

Up to the hill by Hebron, seat of giants old,
No journey of a Sabbath-day, and loaded so.
Milton, "Samson Agonistæa."

Sabbath'ians. The disciples of Sabbathais Zwi, the most remarkable "Messiah" of modern times. At the age of fifteen he had mastered the Talmud, and at eighteen the Cabbala. (1641-1677.)

Sabbatical Year. One year in seven, when all lands with the ancient Jews was to lie fallow for twelve months. This law was founded on Exodus xxiii. 10, &c.; Leviticus xxv. 2-7; Deuteronomy xv. 1-11.

Sabe'ans. An ancient religious sect; so called from Sabi, son of Seth, who, with his father and brother Enoch, lies buried in the Pyramids. The Sabceans worshipped one God, but approached him indirectly through some created representative, such as the sun, moon, stars, &c. Their system is called Su- beanism, or the Sabean faith. The Arabs were chiefly Sabceans before their conversion.

Sabe'anism. The worship of the sun, moon, and host of heaven. (Chaldee, tzaba, a host.)

Sa'beism means baptism—that is, the "religion of many baptisms;" founded by Boudasp or Bodhisattva, a wise Chal-dean. This sect was the root of the party called "Christians of St. John," and by the Arabs El Mogtasila.

Sabellians. A religious sect; so called from Sabellius, a Libyan priest of the third century. They believed in the unity of God, and said that the Trinity merely expressed three relations or states of one and the same God.

Sa'biens is the Aramean equivalent of the word "Baptists." (See below.)

The sects of Hemero'baptists, Baptista, and Sabiens (the Mogtasila of the Arabian writers) in the second century filled Syria, Palestine, and Babylonia.—Renan, "Life of Jesus," ch. xii.

Sable denotes—of the ages of man, the last; of attributes, wisdom, prudence, integrity, singleness of mind; of birds, the raven or crow; of elements, the earth; of metals, iron or lead; of planets, Saturn; of precious stones, the diamond; of trees, the olive.

A suit of sables. A rich courtly dress. By the statute of apparel, 24 Henry VIII., c. 13, it is ordained that none under the degree of an earl shall use sables. Bishop tells us that a thousand ducats were sometimes given for a "face of sables" ("Blossoms," 1577). Ben Jonson says, "Would you not laugh to meet a great counsellor of state in a flat cap, with trunk-hose . . . and yond haberdasher in a velvet gown trimmed with sables?" ("Discoveries").

So long? Nay, then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables.—Shakespeare, "Hamlet," iii. 2.

Sablonnière (La). The sand-pits. So the Tuileries were called to the fourteenth century. Towards the end of that century tiles were made there, but the sand-pits were first called the Tile-works or Tuileries in 1416. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Nicolas de Neuville built a house in the vicinity, which he called the "Hôtel des Tuileries." This property was purchased in 1518 by François I. for his mother.

Sabra. Daughter of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, rescued by St. George from the fangs of the giant, and ultimately married to her deliverer. She is represented as pure in mind, saintly in character, a perfect citizen, daughter, and wife. Her three sons, born at a birth, were named Guy, Alexander, and David. She died from the "pricks of a thorny brake."

Sabreur. Le beau Sabreur (the handsome or famous swordsman). Joachim Murat (1767-1815).

Sabri'na (Latin). The Severn. In Milton's "Comus" we are told she is the daughter of Loecrine "that had the sceptre from his father Brute," and was living in concubinage with Estrildis. His queen, Guendolen, vowed vengeance against Estrildis and her daughter, gathered an army together, and overthrew Loecrine by the river Sture. Sabrina fled and jumped into the river. Nereus took pity on her, and made her "Goddess of the Severn," which is poetically called Sabri'na.

Saccharissa. (See SACHARISSA.)

Sacco Benedetto or SACO BENDITO (the blessed sack or cloak). A yellow garment with two crosses or it, and painted over with flames and devils. In this linen robe persons condemned by the Spanish inquisition were arrayed when they went to the stake. The word sack was used for any loose upper garment hanging down the back from the shoulders; hence "sac-friars" or fratres sacca'ti.

Sacharis'sa (Miss Sugar). A name bestowed by Waller on lady Dorothea Sidney, eldest daughter of the earl of Leicester, for whose hand he was an unsuccessful suitor, for she married the earl of Sunderland.

The earl of Leicester, father of Algernon Sydney the patriot, and of Waller's "Sacharissa," built for himself a stately house at the north corner of a square plot of "Lammas land" belonging to the parish of St. Martin's, which plot henceforth became known to Londoners as "Leicester Fields"—Cassell's Magazine, "London Legends," ii.

Sacharissa turns to Joan (Fenton, "The Platonic Spell"). The gloss of novelty being gone, that which was once thought unparalleled proves only ordinary. Fenton says before marriage many a woman seems a Sacharissa, faultless in make and wit, but scarcely is "half Ilymen's taper wasted" when the "spell is dissolved," and "Sacharissa turns to Joan."

Sachentege (3 syl.). An instrument of torture used in Stephen's reign, and thus described in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: "It was fastened to a beam, having a sharp iron to go round the throat and neck, so that the person tortured could in no wise sit, lie, nor sleep, but that he must at all times bear all the iron."

Sack. Any dry wine, as sherry sack, Madeira sack, Canary sack, and Palm sack. (A corruption of the French sec, dry.)

Sack. A bag. According to tradition it was the last word uttered before the tongues were confounded at Babel. (Saxon, sac; German, sack; Welsh, sac; Irish, sac; French, sac; Latin, saccus; Italian, sacco; Spanish, sáco; Greek, sakkos; Hebrew, sak; Swedish, säck; Danish, sæk, &c. &c.)

To get the sack, or give one the sack. To get discharged by one's employer. The allusion is not to the bag in which the person's chattels are to be packed, as when we say "pack off with you," but to the tradition mentioned above.

There are many cognate phrases, as to give one the bag, and get the bag, which is merely substitutional. To receive the canvas is a very old expression, referring to the substance of which the sack or bag was made. The French trousser vos quilles (pack up your ninepins or toys) is another idea, similar to "pack up your tatters and follow the drum." (See CASHIER.)

Sackbut. A corruption of sambuca. (Spanish, sacabuche; Portuguese, saquebaco; French, saquebute; Latin, sacra bu'cina, sacred trumpet.)

Sack'erson. The famous bear kept at "Paris Garden" in Shakespeare's time. (See PARIS GARDEN.)

Sacrament. Literally "a military oath" taken by the Roman soldiers not to desert their standard, turn their back on the enemy, or abandon their general. We also, in the sacrament of baptism, take a military oath "to fight manfully under the banner of Christ." The early Christians used the word to signify "a sacred mystery," and hence its application to the eucharist, and in the Roman Catholic Church to marriage, confirmation, &c.

Sacramentarians. Those who believe that no change takes place in the eucharistic elements after consecration, but that the bread and wine are simply emblems of the body and blood of Christ. They were a party among the Reformers who separated from Luther.

Sacred Anchors, in Greek vessels, were never let go till the ship was in the extremity of danger.

Sacred City. (See HOLY CITY.)

Sacred Heart. The "Feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus" owes its origin to a French nun, named Mary Margaret Alacoque, of Burgundy, who practised devotion to the Saviour's heart in consequence of a vision. The devotion was sanctioned by pope Clement XII. in 1732.

Sacred Isle, or Holy Island. Ireland was so called because of its many saints, and Guernsey for its many monks. The island referred to by Thomas Moore in his "Irish Melodies," No. II., is Scattery, to which St. Senatus retired, and vowed that no woman should set foot thereon.

Oh, haste and leave this sacred isle,
Unholy bark, ere morning smile,
"St. Senatus and the Lady."

Enghallow (from the Norse Eginkalga, Holy Isle) is the name of a small island in the Orkney group, where cells of the Irish anchorite fathers are said still to exist.

Sacred War.

(1) A war undertaken by the Amphictyonic league against the Cirræans, in defence of Delphi. (B.C. 594-587.)

(2) A war waged by the Athenians for the restoration of Delphi to the Phœcians, from whom it had been taken. (B.C. 448-447.)

(3) A war in which the Phocians, who had seized Delphi, were conquered by Philip of Macedon. (B.C. 346.)

Sacrifice. Never sacrifice a white cock, was one of the doctrines of Pythagoras, because it was sacred to the moon. The Greeks went further, and said, "Nourish a cock, but sacrifice it not," for all cocks were sacred either to the sun or moon, as they announced the hours. The cock was sacred also to the goddess of wisdom, and to Esculapius the god of health; it therefore represented time, wisdom, and health, none of which are ever to be sacrificed. (See Iamblichus, "Protreptics," Symbol xviii.)

Sacrifice to the Graces is to render oneself agreeable by courteous conduct, suavity of manners, and fastidiousness of dress. The allusion is to the three Graces of classic mythology.

Sa'cring Bell. The little bell rung to give notice that the "Host" is approaching. Now called sanctus-bell, from the words "Sanctus, sanctus, sanctus, Deus Sabaoth," pronounced by the priest. (French, sacrer, Old English verb sacre, to consecrate.)

He heard a little sacring bell ring to the elevation of a to-morrow mass.—Reginald Scott, "Discovery of Wüchcroft" (1584).

The sacring of the Kings of France.—Temple.

Sa'cripant. A braggart, a noisy hectorer. He is introduced by Alexander Passoni in a mock-heroic poem called "The Rape of the Bucket."

Sa'cripant (in "Orlando Furioso"). King of Circassia, and a Saracen.

Sad Bread (Latin, panis gravis). Heavy bread, ill-made bread. Shakespeare calls it "distressful bread"—not the bread of distress, but the "panis gravis" or ill-made bread eaten by the poor.

Saddle. The projection of the cross on which the criminal rested in some measure to release the strain on the hands and feet. The dying thief is thus alluded to in a well-known distich:—

Between the saddle and the ground
Mercy he sought, and mercy found.

Set the saddle on the right horse. Lay the blame on those who deserve it.

Saddletree (Mr. Bartoline). The learned saddler.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Sad'ducees. A Jewish party which denied the existence of spirits and angels, and, of course, disbelieved in the resurrection of the dead; so called from Sadoc (righteous man), thought to be the name of a priest or rabbi some three centuries before the birth of Christ.

Sadi or Saadi. A Persian poet styled the "nightingale of thousand songs," and "one of the four monarchs of eloquence." His poems are the "Gulistan" or Garden of Roses, the "Bostan" or Garden of Fruits, and the "Pend-Naméh," a moral poem. He is admired for his sententious march. (1184-1263.)

Sadler's Wells (London). There was a well at this place called Holy-Well, once noted for "its extraordinary cures." The priests of Clerkenwell priory used to boast of its virtues. At the Reformation it was stopped up, and was wholly forgotten till 1683, when a Mr. Sadler, in digging gravel for his garden, accidentally discovered it again. Hence the name. In 1765, Mr. Rosoman converted Sadler's garden into a theatre.

Sadlerian Lectures. Lectures on Algebra delivered in the University of Cambridge, and founded in 1710 by lady Sadler.

Sæhrimnir (Sæ-rim'-ner). The boar which is served to the gods of Valhalla daily, and every day the part eaten is miraculously restored. — Scandinavian mythology.

Safa, in Arabia, according to Arabian legend, is the hill on which Adam and Eve came together, after having been parted for two hundred years, during which time they wandered homeless over the face of the earth.

Sa'ga. Goddess of history. — Scandinavian mythology.

Sagas. The Northern mythological and historical traditions, chiefly compiled in the twelfth and three following centuries. The most remarkable are those of Lodbrok, Hervara, Vilkinsa, Volsunga, Blomsturvalla, Ynglinga, Olaf Tryggva-Sonar, with those of Jomsvingia and of Knyttlinga (which contain the legendary history of Norway and Denmark), those of Sturlinga and Eyrbiggia (which contain the legendary history of Iceland), the Heims-Kringla and New Edda, due to Snorri Sturluson.

All these legends are short, abrupt, concise, full of bold metaphor and graphic descriptions.

Sa'gan of Jerusalem, in Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," is designed for Dr. Compton, bishop of London; he was son of the earl of Northampton, who fell in the royal cause at the battle of Hopton Heath. The Jewish sagan was the vicar of the sovereign pontiff. According to tradition, Moses was Aaron's sagan.

Sagitta'rius, the archer, represents the Centaur Chiron, who at death was converted into the constellation so called. (See next article.)

Sag'ittary. A terrible archer, half beast and half man, whose eyes sparkled like fire, and struck dead like lightning. He is introduced into the Trojan armies by Guido da Colonna.

The dreadful Sagittary
Apprais our number.
Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," v. 5.

Sa'gramour le De'sirus. A knight of the Round Table, introduced in the "Morte d'Arthur," "Lancelot du Lac," &c.

Sahib (in Bengalee, Sahib). Equal to our Mr., or rather to such gentlemen as we term "Esquires." Sahiba is the lady. (Arabic for lord, master.)

Sail. You may hoist sail. Cut your stick, be off. Maria saucily says to Viola, dressed in man's apparel—

Will you hoist sail, sir? Here lies your way.
Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," i. 5.

Strike sail. (See STRIKE.)

Sailing under false colours. Pretending to be what you are not. The allusion is to pirate vessels, which hoist any colours to elude detection.

Sailing within the wind. Going to the very verge of propriety, or acting so as just to escape the letter of the law. The phrase, of course, is nautical.

Sailor King. William IV. of England, who entered the navy as midshipman in 1779, and was made Lord High Admiral in 1827. (1765, 1830-1837.)

Saint. Kings and princes so called—Edward the Martyr. (961, 975-978)
Edward the Confessor. (1004, 1042-1066.)

Eric IX. of Sweden. (*, 1155-1161.)
Ethelred I., king of Wessex. (*, 863-871.)

Engenius I., pope. (*, 654-657.)
Felix I., pope. (*, 269-274.)
Ferdinand III. of Castile and Leon. (1200, 1217-1252.)

Julius I., pope. (*, 337-352.)
Kang-he, second of the Manchoo dynasty of China, who assumed the name of Chin-tso-jin. (1661-1722.)

Lawrence Justinia'ni, patriarch of Venice. (1380, 1451-1465.)

Leo IX., pope. (1002, 1049-1054.)
Louis IX. of France. (1215, 1226-1270.)

Olaus II. of Norway, brother of Harald III., called "St. Olaf the Double Beard." (984, 1026-1030.)

Stephen I. of Hungary. (979, 997-1033.)

Dom Fernando, son of king John of Portugal, was, with his brother Henry, taken prisoner by the Moors at the siege of Tangier. The Portuguese general promised to give Ceuta for their ransom, and left Fernando in prison as their surty. The Portuguese government refused to ratify the condition, and Fernando was left in the hands of the Moors till he died. For this patriotic act he is regarded as a saint, and his day is June 5th. His brother Edward was king at the time. (1402-1443.)

St. Bees' College. So called because its site is in the village of Cumberland, situated on the bay formed by St. Bees' Head, founded by Dr. Law, bishop of Chester in 1816. St. Bees' was so called from a nunnery founded here in 650, and dedicated to the Irish saint named Bega.

St. Cecilia, born of noble Roman parents, and fostered from her cradle in the Christian faith, married Valirian. One day she told him that an angel, "whether she was awake or asleep, was ever beside her." Valirian requested to see this angel, and she said he must be baptised first. Valirian was baptised and suffered martyrdom. When Cecilia was brought before the prefect Almachius, and refused to worship the Roman deities, she was "shut fast in a bath kept hot both night and day with great fires," but "felt of it no woe." Almachius then sent an executioner to cut off her head, "but for no manner of chance could he smite her fair neck in two." Three days she lingered with her neck bleeding, preaching Christ and him crucified all the while; then she died, and pope Urban buried the body. "Her house, the church of St. Cecily is hight" unto this day. — Chaucer, "Secounde Nonnes Tale."

St. Cuthbert's Duck. The Eider duck.

St. Elmo, called by the French St. Elme. The electric light seen playing about the masts of ships in stormy weather. (See CASTOR AND POLLUX.)

And sudden breaking on their raptured sight
Appeared the splendour of St. Elmo's light.
Hoole's "Furioso," bk. ix.

St. John Long. An illiterate quack, who professed to have discovered a liniment which had the power of distinguishing between disease and health. The body was rubbed with it, and if irritation appeared it announced secret disease, which the quack undertook to cure. He was twice tried for manslaughter: once in 1830, when he was fined for his treatment of Miss Cashan, who died; and next in 1831, for the death of Mrs. Lloyd; being acquitted, he was driven in triumph from the Old Bailey in a nobleman's carriage, amid the congratulations of the aristocracy.

* * St. John is pronounced Sin'jin, as in that verse of Pope's—

Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things
To low ambition and the pride of kings.
"Essay on Man," l.

St. Leger Sweepstakes. The St. Leger race was instituted in 1776 by Colonel St. Leger, of Park Hill, near Doncaster, but was not called the "St. Leger" till two years afterwards, when the marquis of Rockingham's horse "Allabaculia" won the race.

St. Leon became possessed of the elixir of life, and the power of transmuting the baser metals into gold, but these acquisitions only brought him increased misery. — William Goodwin, "St. Leon."

St. Michael's Chair. The projecting stone lantern of a tower erected on St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall. It is said that the rock received its name from a religious house built to commemorate the apparition of St. Michael on one of its craggy heights.

St. Monday. A holiday observed by idle workmen and many merchants.

St. Si'monism. The social and political system of St. Simon. He proposed the institution of a European parliament, to arbitrate in all matters affecting Europe, and the establishment of a social hierarchy based on capacity and labour. He was led to his "social system" by the apparition of Charlemagne, which appeared to him one night in the Luxembourg, where he was suffering a temporary imprisonment. (1760-1825.)

* * For other saints, see the proper names.

Sa'ivas. Worshipers of Siva, one of the three great Indian sects; they are at present divided into—

(1) Dandins or staff-bearers, the Hindu mendicants; so called because they carry a danda or small staff, with a piece of red cloth fixed on it. In this piece of cloth the Brahmanical cord is enshrined.

(2) Yogins. Followers of Yoga, who practise the most difficult austerities.

(3) Lingavats, who wear the Linga emblem on some part of their dress.

(4) Paramahansas, ascetics who go naked, and never express any want or wish.

(5) Aghorins, who eat and drink whatever is given them, even ordure and carrion.

(6) Urdhabahus, who extend one or both arms over their head till they become rigidly fixed in this position.

(7) Akus'mukhins, who hold up their faces to the sky till the muscles of the neck become contracted.

Saker. A piece of light artillery. The word is borrowed from the saker hawk. (See FALCON.)

The cannon, blunderbuss, and saker,
He was the inventor of and maker.

Butler, "Hudibras," i. 2.

Sak'hrat. A sacred stone, one grain of which endows the possessor with miraculous powers. It is of an emerald colour, and its reflection gives the sky its blue tint.—Mahometan mythology.

Sak'tas. One of the great divisions of Hindu sects. It is divided into two branches, the Dakshin'acharins and the Vam'acharins (the followers of the right-hand and left-hand ritual). The latter practise the grossest impurities. (Sanskrit, sakti, power, energy.)

Sak'untala. Daughter of saint Vis'wamita, and Menakā a water-nymph. Abandoned by her parents, she was brought up by a hermit. One day king Dushyanta came to the hermitage during a hunt, and persuaded Sakuntala to marry him, and in due time a son was born. When the boy was six years old, she took it to its father, and the king recognised his wife by a ring which he had given her. She was now publicly proclaimed his queen, and Bhārata, his son and heir, became the founder of the glorious race of the Bhāratas. This story forms the plot of the celebrated drama of Kālidāsa, called "Sakuntala," made known to us by Sir W. Jones.

Sak'ya-Mu'ni. Sakya, the hermit, founder of Buddhism.

Salacacab'ia or Salacacaby of Apicius. An uncatable soup of great pretensions. King, in his "Art of Cookery," gives the recipe of this soup: "Bruise in a mortar parsley-seed, dried peneryal, dried mint, ginger, green coriander, stoned raisins, honey, vinegar, oil, and wine. Put them into a cacab'ulum, three crusts of Pycentine bread, the flesh of a pullet, vestine cheese, pine-kernels, cucumbers, dried onions, minced small; pour soup over the whole, garnish with snow, and serve up in the cacab'ulum."

At each end there are dishes of the salsacacab'ia of the Romans: one is made of parsley, pennyroyal, cheese, pinetops, honey, vinegar, brine, eggs, cucumbers, onions, and hen-livers; the other is much the same as soup maigre.—Smollett, "Peregrine Pickle."

Sal'ace (3 syl.). The sea, or rather the salt or briny deep; the wife of Neptune.

Triton, who boasts his high Neptunian race,
Sprung from the god by Salace's embrace.
Camden, "Lusitania," bk. vi.

Salad Days. Days of inexperience, when persons are very green.

My salad days.
When I was green in judgment.
Shakespeare, "Anthony and Cleopatra," i. 5.

A pen'orth of salad oil. A strapping; a castigation. It is a joke on All Fools' Day to send one to the saddler's for a "pen'orth of salad oil." The pun is between "salad oil," as above, and the French avoir de la salade, "to be flogged." The French salader and salade are derived from the salle or saddle on which schoolboys were at one time birched. A block for the purpose is still kept in some of our public schools. Oudin translates the phrase, Donner la salle à un escolier by "scopar un scolari innanzi à tutti gli altri."—"Recherches Italiennes et Françaises," pt. ii. 508.

Salamander, in Egyptian hieroglyphics, is a human form pinched to death with the cold. (See UNDINES.)

Salamander of Middle-Age superstition was a creature in the shape of a man which lived in fire. (Greek, salamē anēr, chimney man, meaning a man that lives in a chimney or fire.)

Salamander. A sort of lizard, which, according to a superstition once very prevalent, sought the hottest fire to breed in, but quenched it with the extreme frigidity of its body. Pliny tells us he tried the experiment once, but the creature was soon burnt to a powder.

Salamander. François I. of France adopted as his badge "a lizard in the midst of flames," with the legend Nutrisco et extinguo—"I nourish and extinguish." The Italian motto from which this legend was borrowed was, Nutrisco il buono e spengo il reo—"I nourish the good and extinguish the bad." Fire purifies good metal, but consumes rubbish. (See ante.)

Salamander. Anything of a fiery-red colour. Falstaff calls Bardolph's nose "a burning lamp," "a salamander," and the drink that made such "a fiery meteor" he calls "fire."

I have maintained that salamander of yours with fire any time this two-and-thirty years.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.", iv. 3.

Salamander's Wool. Asbestos, a fibrous mineral, affirmed by the Tartars to be made "of the root of a tree." It is sometimes called "mountain flax," and is not combustible.

Sal'ary. The salt rations. The Romans served out rations of salt and other necessities to their soldiers and civil servants. The rations altogether were called by the general name of salt, and when money was substituted for the rations the stipend went by the same name. (Latin, sala'drum, from sal, salt.)

Sale by the Candle. A species of auction. An inch of candle being lighted, he who made the bid as the candle gave its expiring wink was declared the buyer.

Sa'lem ("peace"), afterwards called Jerusalem, a corruption of Jireh-Salem. Abraham called it Jehovah-jî'reh (Gen. xxii. 14). The word is sometimes used for the church either militant or triumphant (Isa. lxii. 1; Rev. iii. 12).

Melchisedec, king of Salem....being by interpretation....King of peace.—Heb. vii. 1, 2.

Salic Law. The law so called is one chapter of the Salian code regarding succession to salic lands, which was limited to heirs male, to the exclusion of females, chiefly because certain military duties were connected with the holding of those lands. In the fourteenth century females were excluded from the throne of France by the application of the Salic law to the succession of the crown.

Which Salique, as I said, 'twixt Elbe and Sala, Is at this day in Germany called Meisen.
Shakespeare, "Henry V.", i. 2.

Salisbury Cathedral. Begun in 1220, and finished in 1258; noted for having the loftiest spire in the United Kingdom. It is 400 feet high, or thirty feet higher than the dome of St. Paul's.

Salisbury Court (London) originated in a palace of the bishop of Salisbury, which he parted with to the Sackvilles.

Salisbury Craigs. Rocks near Edinburgh; so called from the earl of Salisbury, who accompanied Edward III. on an expedition against the Scots.

Sallust of France. César Vichard, abbé de St. Réal; so called by Voltaire. (1639-1692.)

Sally. Saddle. (Latin, sella; French, selle.)

The horse....stopped his course by degrees, and went with his rider....into a pond to drink; and there sat his lordship upon the sally.—"Lives of the Norths."

Vaulting ambition... o'erleaps its sell,
And falls o' the other....
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," i. 7.

Sally Lunn. A tea-cake; so called from Sally Lunn, the pastrycook of Bath, who used to cry them about in a basket at the close of the eighteenth century. Dalmer, the baker, bought her receipt, and made a song about the buns.

Sally-port. The postern in fortifications. It is a small door or port whence troops may issue unseen to make sallies, &c. (Latin, salio, to leap.)

Sal'magun'di. A mixture of minced veal, chicken or turkey, anchovies or pickled herrings, and onions, all chopped together, and served with lemon-juice and oil; so called from Salmagondi, one of the ladies attached to the suite of Mary de Medicis, wife of Henri IV. of France. She either invented the dish or was so fond of it that it went by her name. More probably the word is a corruption of the Latin salgamum (meat and salad powdered together).

Salma'sius. A French scholar, called by Balzac "the Infallible;" specially noted for his controversy with Milton "on the lawfulness of executing king Charles I." (1538-1653).

Salmon is the Latin salmo (the leaping fish). Some of them will leap to a height of fifteen or even twenty feet.

Salmo'neus (4 syl.). A king of Elis, noted for his arrogance and impiety. He not only ordered sacrifice to be offered to himself, but he attempted to imitate the thunder and lightning of Jove, for which impiety the king of gods and men hurled a thunderbolt at him and sent him to the infernal regions.

Salsabil. A fountain in Paradise.—Mahometan mythology.

Mahomet was taking his afternoon nap in his Paradise. A houri had rolled a cloud under his head, and he was snoring serenely near the fountain of Salsabil.—M. L'Epine, "Croquemitaine," ii. 8.

Salt. Flavour; snack. The salt of youth is that vigour and strong passion which then predominates. Shakespeare uses the term on several occasions for strong amorous passion. Thus Iago refers to it as "hot as monkeys, salt as wolves in pride" ("Othello," iii. 3). The Duke calls Angelo's base passion his "salt imagination," because he supposed his victim to be Isabella, and not his betrothed wife whom he was forced by the Duke to marry.—"Measure for Measure," v. 1.

Though we are justicers, and doctors, and churchmen, Master Page, we have some salt of our youth in us.—"Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 3.

Salt in a coffin. It is still not uncommon to put salt into a coffin, and Moresin tells us the reason: Satan hates salt, because it is the symbol of incorruption and immortality.—"Paputus," p. 151.

Spilling salt was held to be an unlucky omen by the Romans, and the superstition has descended to ourselves. In Leonardo da Vinci's famous picture of the Lord's Supper, Judas Iscariot is known by the salt cellar knocked over accidentally by his arm. Salt was used in sacrifice by the Jews, as well as by the Greeks and Romans; and it is still used in baptism by the Roman Catholic clergy. It was an emblem of purity and the sanctifying influence of a holy life on others. Hence our Lord tells his disciples they are "the salt of the earth." Spilling the salt after it was placed on the head of the victim was a bad omen, and hence the superstition.

Cum grano salis. With great limitation. As salt is sparingly used for a condiment, so truth is sparingly scattered in an exaggerated report.

To sit above the salt—in a place of distinction. Formerly the family saler (salt-cellar) was of massive silver, and placed in the middle of the table. Persons of distinction sat above the "saler"—i.e., between it and the head of the table.

Dependents and other inferior guests sat below it.

He won't earn salt for his porridge. He will never earn a penny.

To salt an invoice is to put the extreme value upon each article, and even something more, to give it piquancy and raise its market value, according to the maxim, sal sapit omnia. The French have the same expression; as Vendre bien salé, "To sell very dear;" Il me l'a bien salé, "He charged me an exorbitant price;" and generally saler is to pigeon one.

Salt in Beer. In Scotland it was customary to throw a handful of salt on the top of the mash to keep the witches from it. Salt really has the effect of moderating the fermentation and fining the liquor.

Salt-hill (Eton). At the Eton Montem the captain of the school used to collect money from the visitors on Montem day. Standing on a mound at Slough, he waved a flag, and persons appointed for the purpose collected the donations. The mound is still called Salt-hill, and the money given was called salt. The word salt is similar to the Latin salt'rum (salary), the pay given to Roman soldiers and civil officers. (See SALARY.)

Salt Junk. Salt beef on board ship. Junk is the balrush of which ropes used to be made, and salt junk means beef that is hard, ropy, and salt.

Salt Lake. It has been stated that three buckets of this water will yield one of solid salt. This cannot be true, as water will not hold in solution more than twenty-five per cent. of saline matter. The Mormons engaged in procuring it state that they obtain one bucket of salt for every five buckets of water.—Quebec Morning Chronicle.

Salt Prunella. A mixture of refined nitre and soda for sore throats. Prunella is a corruption of Brunelle, in French sel de brunelle, from the German breune (a sore throat), bräune (the quinsy).

Prunella is the name of a genus of plants very astringent, and used in medicine for sore throats. This word also is a corruption of Brunelle. (See above.)

Prunello, a species of plum, is quite another word, being from the French prunelle (a little plum).

Prunello, the stuff of which clerical gowns are made, is a corruption of Brignoles, where it was originally manufactured.

Salt River. To row up Salt River. A defeated political party is said to be rowed up Salt River, and those who attempt to uphold the party have the task of rowing up this ungracious stream. J. Inman says the allusion is to a small stream in Kentucky, the passage of which is rendered both difficult and dangerous by shallows, bars, and an extremely tortuous channel.

Saltpetre is the salt formed in stones or walls. It is the sel de pierre of the French.

Salute (2 syl.). According to tradition, on the triumphant return of Maximilian to Germany, after his second campaign, the town of Augsburg ordered 100 rounds of cannon to be discharged. The officer on service, fearing to have fallen short of the number, caused an extra round to be added. The town of Nuremberg ordered a like salute, and the custom became established.

Salute in the British navy, between two ships of equal rank, is made by firing an equal number of guns. If the vessels are of unequal rank, the superior fires the fewer rounds.

Royal Salute in the British navy consists (1) in firing twenty-one great guns, (2) in the officers lowering their sword-points, and (3) in dipping the colours.

Salutations.

Shaking hands. A relic of the ancient custom of adversaries, in treating of a truce, taking hold of the weapon-hand to ensure against treachery.

Lady's curtsy. A relic of the ancient custom of women going on the knee to men of rank and power, originally to beg mercy, afterwards to acknowledge superiority.

Taking off the hat. A relic of the ancient custom of taking off the helmet when no danger is nigh. A man takes off his hat to show that he dares stand unarmed in your presence.

Discharging guns as a salute. To show that no fear exists, and therefore no guns will be required. This is like "burying the hatchet" (q.v.).

Presenting arms—i.e., offering to give them up, from a full persuasion of the peaceful and friendly disposition of the person so honoured.

Lowering swords. To express a willingness to put yourself unarmed in the power of the person saluted from a full persuasion of his friendly feeling.

Salve (1 syl.) is the Latin sal'via (sage), one of the most efficient of mediæval remedies.

To other woundes, and to broken armes,
Some haddē salve, and some haddē charmes.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," line 2,714.

Salve. To flatter, to wheedle. The allusion is to salving a wound.

Sam. Uncle Sam. The United States government. Mr. Frost tells us that the inspectors of Elbert Anderson's store on the Hudson were Ebenezer Wilson and his uncle Samuel Wilson, the latter of whom superintended in person the workmen, and went by the name of "Uncle Sam." The stores were marked E.A.—U.S. (Elbert Anderson, United States), and one of the employers being asked the meaning, said U.S. stood for "Uncle Sam." The joke took, and in the War of Independence the men carried it with them, and it became stereotyped.

To stand Sam. To be made to pay the reckoning. This is an Americanism, and arose from the letters U.S. on the knapsacks of the soldiers. The government of Uncle Sam has to pay or "stand Sam" for all. (See above.)

Sam Weller. Servant of Mr. Pickwick, famous for his metaphors. He is meant to impersonate the wit, shrewdness, quaint humour, and best qualities of London low life.—Charles Dickens, "Pickwick."

Sa'mael. The prince of demons, who, in the guise of a serpent, tempted Eve; also called the angel of death.—Jewish demonology.

Sam'anides (3 syl.). A dynasty of ten kings in Western Persia (902-1004), founded by Ismail al Sam'ani.

Sama'ria, according to 1 Kings xvi. 24, means the hill of Shemer. Omri "bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of [his] city . . . after the name of Shemer . . . Sama-ria." (B.C. 925.)

Samaritan. A good Samaritan. A philanthropist, one who attends upon the poor to aid them and give them relief. (Luke x. 30-37.)

Sambo. A pet name given to any one of the negro race. The term is properly applied to one born of a negro and a mulatto, called a zambo.

Sam'edi (2 syl.), French for Sunday, is a contraction of Sabbati-di (Sabbath-day), as Mardi is Marti-di, Vendredi is Veneri-di, &c. (the day dedicated to Mars, Venus, &c.).

Sam'ian. The Samian poet. Simonides the satirist, born at Samos.

The Samian sage. Pythagoras, born at Samos; sometimes called "the Samian." (6th century B.C.)

'Tis enough,
In this late age, adventurous to have touched
Light on the numbers of the Samian sage.

Thomson.

The Samian letter. The letter Y, used by Pythagoras as an emblem of the straight narrow path of virtue which is one, but if once deviated from, the further the lines are extended the wider becomes the breach.

When reason doubtful, like the Samian letter,
Points him two ways, the narrower the better.
"Dunciad," iv.

Samia'sa. A seraph, who fell in love with Aholibamah, a grand-daughter of Cain, and when the flood came, carried her under his wing to some other planet. — Byron, "Heaven and Earth."

Sam'iel, the Black Huntsman of the Wolf's Glen. A satanic spirit, who gave to a marksman who entered into compact with him seven balls, six of which were to hit infallibly whatever was aimed at, but the seventh was to deceive. The person who made this compact was termed Der Freischütz. — Weber, "Der Freischütz" (an opera).

Sam'iel-wind, or Simoom'. A hot suffocating wind, that blows occasionally in Africa and Arabia. (Arabic, samma, suffocatingly hot.)

Burning and headlong as the Samiel wind.
Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh," pt. i.

Samoor. The south wind of Persia, which softens the strings of lutes, that they can never be tuned while it lasts. — Stephen, "Persia."

Like the wind of the south o'er a summer lute blowing.

Hushed all its music, and withered its frame.

Thomas Moore, "The Fire Worshipers."

Samp'son. A dominie Sampson. A humble pedantic scholar, awkward, irascible, and very old-fashioned. The character occurs in Sir Walter Scott's "Guy Mannering."

Samosa'tian Philosopher. Lucian of Samos'ata.

Samson. Any man of unusual strength; so called from the judge of Israel.

The British Samson. Thomas Topham, son of a London carpenter. He lifted three hogsheads of water, weighing 1,836 pounds, in the presence of thousands of spectators assembled in Bath Street, Cold Bath Fields, May 28th, 1741. Being plagued by a faithless woman, he put an end to his life in the flower of his age. (1710-1753?)

Samson Carrasco. — "Don Quixote," pt. ii. bk. i. ch. 4.

San Chris'tobal. A mountain in Grana'da, seen by ships arriving from the African coast; so called because colossal images of St. Christopher were erected in places of danger, from the superstitious notion that whoever cast his eye on the gigantic saint would be free from peril for the whole day.

San Suen'a. Zaragoza.

Sance-bell. Same as "Sanctus-bell." (See SACRING-BELL.)

San'cha. Daughter of Garcias, king of Navarre, and wife of Fernan Gonsalez of Castile. She twice saved the life of the count her husband—once on his road to Navarre, being waylaid by personal enemies and cast into a dungeon, she liberated him by bribing the gaoler. The next time was when Fernan was waylaid and held prisoner at Leon. On this occasion she effected his escape by changing clothes with him. The tale resembles that of the countess of Nithsdale, who effected the escape of her husband from the Tower on the 23rd of February, 1715; and that of the countess de Lavalette, who, in 1815, liberated the count her husband from prison by changing clothes with him.

Sancho Panza, the squire of Don Quixote, was governor of Barata'ria, according to Cervantes. He is described as a short, pot-bellied rustic, full of common sense, but without a grain of "spirituality." He rode upon an ass, and was especially famous for his proverbs.

A Sancho Panza. A justice of the peace. In French a "juge de paix." In allusion to the wise judgments of the squire in the isle of Barataria.

Sancho Panza's ass. Dapple.

Sancho's Panza's wife. Teresa (g.v.).

Sancho. The model painting of this squire is Leslie's "Sancho and the Duchess."

Sanchonia'tho. A forgery of the nine books of this "author" was printed at Bremen in 1837. The "original" was said to have been discovered in the convent of St. Maria de Merinhão by colonel Pereira, a Portuguese; but it was soon discovered (1) that no such convent existed, (2) that there was no colonel in the Portuguese service of the name, and (3) that the paper of the MS. displayed the water-mark of an Osnabrück paper-mill. (See RICHARD OF CIRENCESTER.)

Sanctum Sancto'rum. A private room into which no one uninvited enters. The reference is to the Holy of Holies in the Jewish Temple, a small chamber into which none but the high priest might enter, and that only on the great day of atonement. A man's private house is his sanctuary; his own special private room in that house is the sanctuary of the sanctuary, or the sanctum sancto'rum.

Sancy' Diamond. So called from Nicholas de Harlay, sieur de Sancy, who bought it for 70,000 francs (£2,800) of don Antonio, prince of Crato and king of Portugal in partibus. It belonged at one time to Charles the Bold of Burgundy, who wore it with other diamonds at the battle of Granson, in 1476; and after his defeat it was picked up by a Swiss soldier, who sold it for a gulden to a clergyman. The clergyman sold it sixteen years afterwards (1492) to a merchant of Lucerne for 5,000 ducats (£1,125). It was next purchased (1495) by Emmanuel the Fortunate of Portugal, and remained in the house of Aviz till the kingdom was annexed to Spain (1580), when don Antonio sold it to sieur de Sancy, in whose family it remained more than a century. On one occasion the sieur, being desirous of aiding Henri IV. in his struggle for the crown, pledged the diamond to the Jews at Metz. The servant entrusted with it, being attacked by robbers, swallowed the diamond, and was murdered, but Nicholas de Harlay subsequently recovered the diamond out of the dead body of his unfortunate messenger. We next find it in the possession of James II., who purchased it for the crown of England. James carried it with him in his flight to France in 1688, when it was sold to Louis XIV. for £25,000. Louis XV. wore it at his coronation, but during the Revolution it was again sold. Napoleon in his high and palmy days bought it, but it was sold in 1835 to prince Paul Demidoff for £80,000. The prince sold it in 1830 to M. Levrat, administrator of the Mining Society, who was to pay for it in four instalments; but his failing to fulfil his engagement became, in 1832, the subject of a lawsuit, which was given in favour of the prince. We next hear of it in Bombay; and in 1867 it was transmitted to England by the firm of Forbes and Co.

Sand. My sand of life is almost run. The allusion is to the hour-glass.

Alas! dread lord, you see the case wherein I stand, and how little sand is left to run in my poor glass.—
"Reynard the Fox," iv.

To number sands. To undertake an endless or impossible task.

Alas! poor duke, the task he undertakes
Is numbering sands and drinking oceans dry.
Shakespeare, "Richard III.," ii. 2.

Footprints in the sands of Time (Longfellow, "Psalm of Life"). This beautiful expression was probably suggested by a letter of the First Napoleon to his Minister of the Interior respecting the poor laws:—"It is melancholy [he says] to see time passing away without being put to its full value. Surely in a matter of this kind we should endeavour to do something, that we may say that we have lived, that we have not lived in vain, that we may leave some impression of our lives on the sands of Time."

Sand (George). The nom-de-plume of Madame Dudevant, a French authoress. This name was assumed out of attachment to Jules Sand or Sandeau, a young student, in conjunction with whom she published her first novel under the name of "Jules Sand." (1804-*)

Sand-banks. Wynants, a Dutch artist, is famous for his homely pictures, where sand-banks form a most striking feature.

Sand-blind. Virtually blind, but not wholly so; what the French call ber-lu. (Anglo-Saxon, sôth; Gothic, sanths, Old High German, sand, meaning sooth, really, virtually.) It is only fit for a Launcelot Gobbo to derive it from sand, a sort of earth.

This is my true-begotten father, who, being more than sand-blind, high-gravel blind, knows me not.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," ii. 2.

San'dabar. An Arabian writer, celebrated for his "Parables." He lived about a century before the Christian era.

Sandal. A man without sandals. A prodigal; so called by the ancient Jews, because the seller gave his sandals to the buyer as a ratification of his bargain. (Ruth iv. 7.)

Sandal-wood. A corruption of Santal-wood, a plant of the genus Santalum and natural order Santalaceæ.

Sandal'phon. One of the three angels who receive the prayers of the Israelites, and weave crowns for them.—Longfellow.

Sand'en (sandy-den). The great palace of king Lion, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Sandford and Merton. Thomas Day's tale so called.

Sandjar. One of the Seljuke Sultans of Persia; so called from the place of his birth, and generally considered the Persian Alexander. (1117-1158.)

Sandschaki or Sandschaki-sherif (the standard of green silk). The sacred banner of the Mussulmans. It is now enveloped in four coverings of green taffeta, enclosed in a case of green cloth. The standard is twelve feet high, and the golden ornament (a closed hand) which surmounts it holds a copy of the Koran written by the calif Osman III. In times of peace this banner is guarded in the hall of the "noble vestment," as the dress worn by "the prophet" is styled. In the same hall are preserved the sacred teeth, the holy beard, the sacred stirrup, the sabre, and the bow of Mahomet.

Sandwich. A piece of meat between two slices of bread; so called from the earl of Sandwich, a man so fond of gambling that he passed whole days in the amusement, bidding the waiter bring him for refreshment a piece of meat between two pieces of bread, which he ate without stopping from play. This contrivance was not first hit upon by the earl in the reign of George III., as the Romans were very fond of "sandwiches," called by them offula.

A Sandwich. A perambulating advertisement displayer; so called because he has a placarded board before and behind, between which he is enclosed like meat in a sandwich.

The earl of Shaftesbury desired to say a word on behalf of a very respectable body of men, ordinarily called "sandwiches."—The Times, March 10th, 1867.

Sang Bleu. Of high aristocratic descent. The words are French, and mean blue blood, but the notion is Spanish. The old families of Spain who trace their pedigree beyond the time of the Moorish conquest say that their venous blood is blue, but that of common people is black.

Sangaree. A West Indian drink consisting of Madeira wine, syrup, water, and nutmeg.

San'glamore (3 syl.). Braggadochio's sword.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen."

San'glier (Sir). Meant for Shan O'Neil, leader of the Irish insurgents in 1567.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v.

Sanglier des Ardennes. Guillaume de la Marek, driven from Liège for the murder of the bishop of Liège, and beheaded by the archduke Maximilian. (1446-1485.)

Sangra'do (Dr.), in the romance of "Gil Blas," prescribes depletion and bleeding for every ailment. The character is a satire on Helvetius.

If the Sangra'dos were ignorant, there was at any rate more to spare in the veins then than there is now.—Daily Telegraph.

Sangreal. The vessel from which our Saviour drank at the Last Supper, and which (as it is said) was afterwards filled by Joseph of Arimathea with the blood that flowed from his wounds. This blood was reported to have the power of prolonging life and preserving chastity. The quest of this cup forms the most fertile source of adventures to the knights of the Round Table. The story of the Sangreal or Sangraal was first written in verse by Chrestien de Troyes (end of the tenth century), thence Latinised (thirteenth century), and finally turned into French prose by Gautier Map, by "order of lord Henry" (Henry III.) It commences with the genealogy of our Saviour, and details the whole Gospel history; but the prose romance begins with Joseph of Arimathea. Its quest is continued in "Percival," a romance of the fifteenth century, which gives the adventures of a young Welshman, raw and inexperienced, but admitted to knighthood. At his death the sangle, the sacred lance, and the silver trencher were carried up to heaven in the presence of attendants, and have never since been seen on earth.

Greal is either the old French grasal (a cup), or the Latin sanguis realis.

Sanjak-sherif. The flag of the prophet. (Turkish, sanjak, a standard.)

San'hedrim. The great council of seventy elders among the Jews, which heard appeals from the inferior courts. (Greek, sunedrion, a sitting together.)

Sanhedrim, in Dryden's satire of "Ab-salom and Achitophel," stands for the British Parliament. The Jewish Sanhedrim, before the captivity, was a sort of senate convened to assist Moses in the government; after the captivity it seems to have been a permanent consistory court. The president was called "Hannas'icon" or prince, and the vice-president "The Father." The seventy-one sat in a semi-circle, thirty-five on each side of the president; the "father" being on his right hand, and the "hacan" on his left.

The Sanhedrim long time as chief he ruled,
Their reason guided, and their passion cooled.

Sans Culottes (French, without trousers). A name given by the aristocratic section during the French Revolution to the popular party, the favourite leader of which was Henriot. (1793.)

Sans Culottides. The five complementary days added to the twelve months of the Revolutionary Calendar. Each month being made to consist of thirty days, the riff-raff days which would not conform to the law were named in honour of the sans culottes, and made idle days or holidays.

Sans Peur et Sans Reproche. Pierre du Terrail, chevalier de Bayard, who was slain in 1524, was called "Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche." (1476-1524.)

Sans Souci (French). Free and easy, void of care. There is a place so called near Potsdam, where the king of Prussia has a palace.

Enfans Sans Souci. The Tradesmen's company of actors, as opposed to the Lawyer's, called "Basochians" (q.v.). This company was organised in France in the reign of Charles VIII., for the performance of short comedies, in which public characters and the manners of the day were turned into ridicule. The manager of the "Care-for-nothings" (sans souci) was called "The Prince of Fools." One of their dramatic pieces, entitled "Master Pierre Pathelin," was an immense favourite with the Parisians.

Sansca'ra. The ten essential rites of Hindns of the first three castes: (1) At the conception of a child; (2) at the quickening; (3) at birth; (4) at naming; (5) carrying the child out to see the moon; (6) giving him food to eat; (7) the ceremony of tonsure; (8) investiture with the string; (9) the close of his studies; (10) the ceremony of "marriage," when he is qualified to perform the sacrifices ordained.

Sansfoy (Infidelity). A Saracen "who eared for neither God nor man," encountered by St. George and slain.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Sansjoy (Without the peace of God). Brother of Sansfoy (Infidelity) and Sansloy (Without the law of God). He is a paynim knight, who fights with St. George in the palace grounds of Pride, and would have been slain if Duessa had not rescued him. He is carried in the car of Night to the Infernal regions, where he is healed of his wounds by Esculapius.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Sansloy (Irreligion), brother of Sansfoy (q.v.). Having torn off the disguise of Archimago and wounded the lion, he carries off Una into the wilderness. Her shrieks arouse the fauns and satyrs, who come to her rescue, and Sansloy flees. Una is Truth, and being without Holiness (the Red-cross Knight), is deceived by Hypocrisy. As soon as Truth joins Hypocrisy, instead of Holiness, Irreligion breaks in and carries her away. The reference is to the reign of queen Mary, when the Reformation was carried captive, and the lion was wounded to the heart by the "False-law of God."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

In bk. ii., Sansloy appears again as the cavalier of Perissa or Prodigality.

Sansonetto (in "Orlando Furioso"). A Christian regent of Mecca, vicegerent of Charlemagne.

Santa Casa (Italian, the holy house). The reputed house in which the Virgin Mary lived at Nazareth, miraculously translated to Fiume, in Dalmatin, in 1291, and thence to Recana'ti in 1294, and finally to Macera'ta, in Italy, to a piece of land belonging to the lady Laureta.

Santa Klaus (1 syl.). The Dutch name of St. Nicholas. Just before Christmas the children of Flanders, Holland, and several parts of Germany, put out their shoe or stocking for Santa Klaus or Knecht Clobes to put a gift therein before morning, as a prize of good conduct.

Sappho of Toulouse. Clémence Isaure (2 syl.), a wealthy lady of Toulouse, who instituted in 1490 the "Jeux Floraux," and left funds to defray their annual expenses. She composed a beautiful "Ode to Spring." (1463-1513.)

Sar'acens. Ducange derives this word from Sarah (Abraham's wife); Hottinger from the Arabic saraca (to steal); Forster from sakra (a desert); but probably it is the Arabic sharakyoum or sharkeyn (the eastern people), as opposed to Magharibë (the western people—i.e., of Morocco).

Saracen-wheat (French, Dlé-Sarasin). Buck-wheat; so called because it was brought by the crusaders from the country of the Saracens. (See BUCK-WHEAT.)

Saragoza. The Maid of Saragoza. Augustina, who was only twenty-two years of age when, her lover being shot, she mounted the battery in his place. The French, after besieging the town for two months, were obliged to retreat, August 15th, 1808.

Sar'aswa'ti. Wife of Brahma, and goddess of the fine arts.—Hindu mythology.

Sar'casm. A flaying or plucking off of the skin; a cutting taunt. (Greek, sarkazo, to flay, &c.)

Sarce'net (2 syl.). A corruption of Saracennet, from its Saracenic or Oriental origin.

Sarcoph'agus. A stone, according to Pliny, which consumed the flesh, and was therefore chosen by the ancients for coffins. It is called sometimes lapis Assius, because it was found at Assos of Lycia.

Sardanapa'us. King of Nineveh and Assyria, noted for his luxury and voluptuousness. His effeminacy induced Arba'cès, the Mede, to conspire against him. Myrra, an Ionian slave and his favourite concubine, roused him from his lethargy, and induced him to appear at the head of his armies. He won three successive battles, but being then defeated, he was induced by Myrra to place himself on a funeral pile, which she herself set fire to, and then jumping into the flames, perished with her beloved master. (Died B.C. 817.)—Byron, "Sardanapalus."

A Sardanapalus. Any luxurious, extravagant, self-willed tyrant. (See above.)

Sardanapalus of China. Cheo-tsin, who shut himself and his queen in his palace, and set fire to the building, that he might not fall into the hands of Woon-wong, who founded the dynasty of Tchow (B.C. 1154-1122). It was Cheo-tsin who invented the chopsticks.

Sardin'ian Laugh. Laughing on the wrong side of one's mouth. The Edinburgh Review says: "The ancient Sardinians used to get rid of their old relations by throwing them into deep pits, and the sufferers were expected to feel delighted at this attention to their well-being."—July, 1849.

Sardon'ic Smile, Grin or Laugh-ter. A smile of contempt; so used by Homer.

The Herba Sardon'ia (so called from Sardis, in Asia Minor) is so acrid that it produces a convulsive movement of the nerves of the face, resembling a painful grin. Byron says of the Corsair, There was a laughing devil in his sneer.

'Tis Envy's safest, surest rule
To hide her rage in ridicule:
The vulgar eye the best beguiles
When all her snakes are decked with smiles,
Sardonic smiles by rancour raised.
Swift, "Pheasant and Lark."

Sar'donyx. An orange-brown cornelian. Pliny says it is called sard from Sardis, in Asia Minor, where it is found, and onyx, the nail, because its colour resembles that of the skin under the nail (xxxvii. 6).

Sarpe'don. A favourite of the gods, who assisted Priam when Troy was besieged by the allied Greeks. When Achilles refused to fight, Sarpe'don made great havoc in battle, but was slain by Patroclos.—Homer, "Iliad."

Sars'en Stones. The "Druidical" sandstones of Wiltshire and Berkshire are so called. The early Christian Saxons used the word Saresyn as a synonym of pagan or heathen, and as these stones were popularly associated with Druid worship, they were called Saresyn or heathen stones. Robert Ricart says of duke Rollo, "He was a Sarasyn come out of Denmark into France." Another derivation is the Phœnician sarsen (a rock), applied to any huge mass drawn from the quarry in its rude state.

* * These boulders are no more connected with the Druids than Stonehenge is (q.v.).

Sash is tied on the right side by the British cavalry, and on the left by the infantry.

Sash Window is sluice window; a window that moves up and down like a sluice. (Dutch, sas; Italian, sasse.)

Sassan'ides (4 syl.). The first Persian dynasty of the historic period, or seventh including the mythic period; so named because Ard'eshir, the founder, was son of Sassan, a lineal descendant of Xerxes.

Sa'tan in Hebrew means enemy.

To whom the Arch-enemy,
And hence in heaven called Satan.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. I.

Satan'ic. The Satanic School. So Southey called lord Byron and his imitators, who set at defiance the generally received notions of religion. Of English writers, Byron, Shelley, Moore, and Bulwer are the most prominent; of French writers, Rousseau, Victor Hugo, Paul de Kock, and George Sand.

Sat'ire (2 syl.). Scaliger's derivation of this word from satyr is untenable. It is from sat'ura (full of variety), sat'ura lanx, a hotchpotch or olla podrida. As max'imus, opt'imus, &c., became max'imus, opt'imus, so "satura" became sat'ira. (See Dryden's Dedication prefixed to his "Satires.")

Father of Satire. Archil'ochos of Paros.

Father of French Satire. Mathurin Regnier. (1573-1613.)

Father of Roman Satire. Lucilius. (B.C. 148-103.)

Lucilius was the man who, bravely bold,
To Roman vices did the mirror hold;
Protected humble goodness from reproach;
Showed worth on foot, and rascals in a coach.
Dryden, "Art of Poetry," c. ii.

Saturday. (See BLACK.)

Saturn or CHRONOS (Time) devoured all his children except Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto. Jupiter means air, Neptune water, and Pluto the grave. These Time cannot consume.

Saturn is a very evil planet to be born under. "The children of the sayd Saturne shall be great jangeleres and chydres . . . and they will never forgyve tyll they be revenged of theyr quarell."
—"Compost of Ptholomeus."

Saturna'lia. A time of licensed disorder and misrule. With the Romans it was the festival of Saturn, and was celebrated the 17th, 18th, and 19th of December. During its continuance no public business could be transacted, the law-courts were closed, the schools kept holiday, no war could be commenced, and no malefactor punished. Under the empire, the festival was extended to seven days.

Satur'nian Days. Days of dulness, when everything is venal. They are lead to indicate dulness, and gold to indicate venality.

Then rose the seed of Chaos and of Night
To blot out order and extinguish light,
Of dull and venal a new world to mould,
And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold,
"Dunciad," iv.

Satur'nian Verses. Old-fashioned. A rude composition employed in satire among the ancient Romans. Also a peculiar metre, consisting of three iambs and a syllable over, joined to three trochees, according to the following nursery metre:—

The que'n was in the pãr-lour,
Eating bread and hon-ey.

The Fescennine and Satornian were the same; for as they were called Satornian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy, they were called Fescennine from Fescennina [sic], where they were first practised.—Dryden, Dedication of "Juvenal."

Sat'urnine (3 syl.). A grave, phlegmatic disposition, dull and heavy. Astrologers affirm that such is the disposition of those who are born under the influence of the planet Saturn.

Sat'yr. The most famous representation of these goat-men is that of Praxitélès, a sculptor of Athens in the fourth century B.C.

Sat'yrane (3 syl.). A blunt but noble knight who delivered Una from the fauns and satyrs. The meaning is this: Truth being driven from the towns and cities took refuge in caves and dens, where for a time it lay concealed. At length Sir Satyrane (Luther) rescues Una from bondage, but no sooner is this the case than she falls in with Archimago, to show how very difficult it was at the Reformation to separate Truth from Error.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Sauce means "salted food," for giving a relish to meat, as pickled roots, herbs, and so on. (Latin, salsus.)

The sauce was better than the fish. The accessories were better than the main part. This may be said of a book in which the plates and getting up are better than the matter it contains.

To serve the same sauce. To retaliate; to give as good as you take; to serve in the same manner.

After him another came unto her, and served her with the same sauce; then a third....—The Man in the Moon, §c. (l. 9).

To sauce. To intermix.

Then she fell to sauce her desires with threatenings. Sidney.

Folly sauced with discretion.

Shakespeare, "Troilus and Cressida," i. 2.

What's sauce to the goose is sauce to the gander. (See GANDER.)

Saucy. Rakish; irresistible; or rather that care-for-nobody, jaunty, daring behaviour which has won for many of our regiments the term as a compliment. It is also applied metaphorically to some inanimate things, as "saucy waves" which dare attack the very moon; the "saucy world" which dares defy the very gods; the "saucy mountains," "winds," and so on.

Saul, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is meant for Oliver Cromwell. As Saul persecuted David and drove him from Jerusalem, so Cromwell persecuted Charles II. and drove him from England.

They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow Made foolish Ishbosheth [Richard Cromwell] the crown forego.

Saul among the prophets? The Jews said of our Lord—"How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?"

(John vii. 15.) Similarly at the conversion of Saul, afterwards called Paul, the Jews said in substance, "Is it possible that Saul can be a convert?" (Acts ix. 21.) The proverb applies to a person who unexpectedly shines in a department not his own. Thus it might be said of Richardson, the quiet bookseller, never known to be a man of genius till he was fifty, "Is he also among the prophets—has he also become noted as a man of letters and a novelist?"

Saunter. A corruption of the Latin words Sancta Terra (the Holy Land). When pilgrimages and crusades were in vogue, idle persons used to loiter about, and wander lazily from place to place, under pretence that they were going to take the cross or start for the Holy Land. Hence sancta-terra-ing or sancte-terre-ing.

Sav'age (2 syl.). One who lives in a wood (Greek, hulê, a forest; Latin, silva; French, sylvage; Spanish, salvage; Italian, selvaggio; French, savage).

Save the Mark. In archery, when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out "God save the mark!"—i.e., prevent any one coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere.

God save the mark! ("1 Henry IV.," i. 3). Hotspur, apologising to the king for not sending the prisoners according to command, says the messenger was a "popinjay," who made him mad with his unmanly ways, and who talked "like a waiting gentlewoman of guns, drums, and wounds (God save the mark!)"—meaning that he himself had been in the brunt of battle, and it would be sad indeed if "his mark" was displaced by this court butterfly. The whole scope of the speech is lost sight of by the ordinary interpretation—"May the scars of my wounds never be effaced" (God save my scars).

Savoy (The). A precinct of the Strand, London, noted for the palace of Savoy, originally the seat of Peter, earl of Savoy, who came to England to visit his niece Eleanor, wife of Henry III. At the death of the earl, the house became the property of the queen, who gave it to her second son, Edmund (earl of Lancaster), and from this period it was attached to the duchy of Lancaster. When the Black Prince brought Jean le Bon, king of France, captive to London (1356), he lodged him in the Savoy Palace, where he remained till 1359, when he was removed to Somerton Castle, in Lincolnshire. In 1360 he was lodged in the Tower; but, two months afterwards, was allowed to return to France on certain conditions. These conditions being violated by the royal hostages, Jean voluntarily returned to London, and had his old quarters again assigned to him, and died in 1364. The rebels under Wat Tyler burnt down the old palace in 1381; but it was rebuilt in 1505 by Henry VII., and converted into a hospital for the poor, under the name of St. John's Hospital. Charles II. used it for wounded soldiers and sailors. St. Mary le Savoy or the Chapel of St. John still stands in the precinct, and has recently been restored.

N.B.—Here, in 1552, was established the first flint-glass manufactory.

Saw. In Christian art an attribute of St. Simon and St. James the Less, in allusion to the tradition of their being sawn to death in martyrdom.

Sawny or Sandy. A Scotchman; a contraction of "Alexander," a very favourite Scotch name. Brother Jonathan, John Bull, Taffy or David, Pat, &c., are similar examples of national nicknames.

Saxon Castles.

Alnwick castle, given to Ivo de Vesey by the Conqueror.

Bamborough castle (Northumberland), the palace of the kings of Northumberland, and built by king Ida, who began to reign 559; now converted into charity-schools and signal-stations.

Carisbrook castle, enlarged by Fitz-Osborne, five centuries later.

Conisborough castle (York).

Goodrich castle (Herefordshire).

Kenilworth castle, built by Kenelm, king of Mercia. Kenil-worth means Kenhelm's dwelling.

Richmond castle (York), belonging to the Saxon earl Edwin, given by the Conqueror to his nephew Alan, earl of Bretagne; a ruin for three centuries. The keep remains.

Rochester castle, given to Odo, natural brother of the Conqueror.

Saxon Characteristics (architectural).

(1) The quoining consists of a long stone set at the corner, and a short one lying on it and bounding into the wall.

(2) The use of large heavy blocks of stone in some parts, while the rest is built of Roman bricks.

(3) An arch with straight sides to the upper part instead of curves.

(4) The absence of buttresses.

(5) The use in windows of rude balusters.

(6) A rude round staircase west of the tower, for the purpose of access to the upper floors.

(7) Rude carvings in imitation of Roman work.—Rickman.

Saxon Duke (in "Hudibras"). John Frederick, duke of Saxony, a very corpulent man. When taken prisoner, Charles V. said, "I have gone hunting many a time, but never saw I such a swine before."

Saxon Relics.

The church of Earl's Barton (Northamptonshire). The tower and west doorway.

The church of St. Michael's (St. Albans), erected by the abbot of St. Albans in 948.

The tower of Bosham church (Sussex).

The east side of the dark and principal cloisters of Westminster Abbey, from the college dormitory on the south to the chapter-house on the north. Edward the confessor's chapel in Westminster Abbey, now used as the Pix office.

The church of Darent (Kent) contains some windows of manifest Saxon architecture.

With many others, some of which are rather doubtful.

Saxon Shore. The coast of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, where were castles and garrisons, under the charge of a count or military officer, called Comēs Littoris Saxonici per Britanniam.

On the Norfolk coast was fort Eboracaster.

" Suffolk " Gariannonum (Burgh).

" Essex " Othona (Ithanchester).

" Kent " Regulbium (Reculver), Ritupæ (Richborough), Dubra (Dover),

" Sussex " Lemanæ (Lynne) Anderida (Hastings or Pevensey).

" Hampshire " Portus Adurnus (Portsmouth).

Say. To take the say. To taste meat or wine before it is presented, in order to prove that it is not poisoned. The phrase was common in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Nor deem it meet that you to him convey
The proffered bowl, unless you taste the say.
Rosce, "Orlando Furioso," xxi. 61.

Sbirri (Italian). A police-force which existed in the Pope's dominions. They were domiciled in private houses.

He points them out to his sbirri and armed ruffians.—The Daily Telegraph.

Scævola (left-handed). So Caius Mucius was called, because, when he entered the camp of Porsenna as a spy, and was taken before the king, he deliberately held his hand over a lamp till it was burnt off, to show the Etruscan that he would not shrink from torture.

Scagliola. Imitation marble, like the pillars of the Pantheon, London. The word is from the Italian scaglia, the dust and chips of marble: it is so called because the substance (which is gypsum and Flanders glue) is studded with chips and dust of marble.

Scales. The Koran says, at the judgment day every one will be weighed in the scales of the archangel Gabriel. His good deeds will be put in the scale called "Light," and his evil ones in the scale called "Darkness;" after which they will have to cross the bridge Al Serât, not wider than the edge of a scimeter. The faithful will pass over in safety, but the rest will fall into the dreary realms of Jehennam.

Scallop Shell. Emblem of St. James of Compostella, adopted, says Erasmus, because the shore of the adjacent sea abounds in them. Pilgrims used them for cup, spoon, and dish, hence the punning crest of the Disington family is a scallop shell. On returning home, the pilgrim placed his scallop shell in his hat to command admiration, and adopted it in his coat-armour.

I will give thee a palmer's staff of ivory and a scallop shell of beaten gold.—The Old Wives Tale. (1292.)

Scalloped (scollopt). Having an edge like that of a scallop shell.

Scammozzi's Rule. The jointed two-foot rule used by builders, and invented by Vincent Scammozzi, the famous Italian architect. (1549-1609.)

Scamp (qui exit ex campo). A deserter from the field; one who decamps without paying his debts. S privative and camp. (See SNOB.)

Scandal means properly a pitfall or snare laid for an enemy; hence a stumbling-block, and morally an aspersion. (Greek, skan'dalon.)

We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a [scandal].—1 Cor. i. 23.

The Hill of Scandal. So Milton calls the Mount of Olives, because Solomon built thereon "an high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab; and for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings xi. 7).

Scandalum Magnatum (scandal of the magnates). Words in derogation of peers, judges, and other great officers of the realm. What St. Paul calls "talking evil of dignities."

Scanderbag's Sword must have Scanderbag's Arm—i.e., None but Ulysses can draw Ulysses' bow. Scanderbag is a corruption of Iskander-beg (Alexander the Great), not the Macedonian, but George Castriot, prince of Albania, so called by the Turks. Mahomet wanted to see his scimitar, but when presented no one could draw it; whereupon the Turkish emperor sent it back as an imposition; but Iskander-beg replied, he had only sent his majesty the sword, without sending the arm that drew it. (See ROBIN HOOD.)

Scanderbeg. A name given by the Turks to George Castriot, the patriot chief of Epi'rus. The word is a corruption of Iskander beg, prince Alexander. (1414-1467.) (See above)

Scandinavia. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Pliny speaks of Scandia as an island.

Scantling, a small quantity, is the French échantillon, a specimen or pattern.

A scantling of wit.—Dryden.

Scape-Goat. The Biajûs or aborigines of Borneo observe a custom bearing a considerable resemblance to that of the Scape-goat. They annually launch a small bark, laden with all the sins and misfortunes of the nation, which, says Dr. Leyden, "they imagine will fall on the unhappy crew that first meets with it."

The scape-goat of the family. One made to bear the blame of the rest of the family; one always chided and found fault with, let who may be in fault. The allusion is to a Jewish custom: Two goats being brought to the altar of the tabernacle on the day of atonement, the high priest cast lots; one was for the Lord, and the other for Azazel. The goat on which the first lot fell was sacrificed, the other was the scape-goat; and the high priest having, by confession, transferred his own sins and the sins of the people to it, the goat was taken to the wilderness and suffered to escape.

Scaph'ism. Locking up a criminal in the trunk of a tree, bored through so as just to admit the body. Five holes were made—one for the head, and the others for the hands and legs. These parts were anointed with honey to invite the wasps. In this situation the criminal would linger in the burning sun for several days.

Scapin. A "barber of Seville;" a cunning, knavish rogue; a valet who makes his master his tool. In the Italian stage he is the servant of Grati'no, a pedantic prig of a doctor; but Molière has introduced him in "Les Fourberies de Scapin."

Scar'amouch. A braggart and fool, very valiant in words, but a poltroon. According to Dyche, the word is the name of an Italian posture-master, who came to England in 1673, and astonished John Bull with feats of agility. (? Italian, scaramuccio, a skirmish.)

Scarborough Warning. No warning at all. In Scarborough robbers used to be dealt with in a very summary manner, by a sort of Halifax gibbet-law, Lynch-law, or an à la lanterne. Another origin is given of this phrase: It is said that Thomas Stafford, in the reign of queen Mary, seized the castle of Scarborough, not only without warning, but even before the townsfolk knew he was afoot (1557). (See GONE UP.)

This term Scarborough warning grew, some say,

By hasty hanging for rank robbery there.

Who that was met, but sus'pect in that way,

Straight he was trust up, whatever he were.

J. Heywood.

Scarlet (Will). One of the companions of Robin Hood.

Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow (Isa. i. 18). The allusion is to the scarlet fillet tied round the head of the scape-goat. Though your sins be as scarlet as the fillet on the head of the goat to which the high priest has transferred the sins of the whole nation, yet shall they be forgiven and wiped out.

Scarlet Woman. Some Protestants apply the words to the Church of Rome, and some Romanists, with equal "good taste," apply them to London. The Book of Revelation says, "It is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth," and terms the city "Babylon" (ch. xvii.).

Scavenger's Daughter. An instrument of torture invented by Sir William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. As Skevington was the father of the instrument, the instrument was his daughter.

Sceatta. Anglo-Saxon for "money," or a little silver coin.

Scene-Painters. The most celebrated are—

Inigo Jones, who introduced the first appropriate decorations for masques.

D'Avenant, who produced perspective scenes in 1656, for "The Siege of Rhodes."

Betterton was the first to improve the scenic effects in "Dorset Gardens;" his artist was Streater.

John Rich may be called the great reformer of stage scenery in "Covent Garden."

Richards, secretary of the Royal Academy; especially successful in "The Maid of the Mill." His son was one of the most celebrated of our scene-painters.

Philip James de Louthembourg was the greatest scene-artist up to Garrick's time. He produced the scenes for "The Winter's Tale," at the request of that great actor.

John Kemble engaged William Capon, a pupil of Novosielski, to furnish him with scenery for Shakespeare's historic plays.

Patrick Nasmyth, in the North, produced several unrivalled scenes.

Stanfield is well known for his scenes of "Acis and Galatea."

William Beverley is the greatest scene-painter of modern times.

Frank Hayman, Thomas Dall, John

Laguerre, William Hogarth, Robert Dighton, Charles Dibdin, David Roberts, Grieve, and Phillips have all aided in improving scene-painting.

Scent. We are not yet on the right scent. We have not yet got the right clue. The allusion is to dogs following game by their scent.

Sceptic (Greek) means one who thinks for himself, and does not receive on another's testimony. Pyrrho founded the philosophic sect called "Sceptics," and Epictetus combated their dogmas. In theology we apply the word to those who will not accept Revelation.

Scheherazade (She-he'-ra-zay'-de). Daughter of the grand vizier of the Indies. The sultan Schahriah, having discovered the infidelity of his sultana, resolved to marry a fresh wife every night and have her strangled at daybreak. Scheherazade entreated to become his wife, and so amused him with tales for a thousand and one nights, that he revoked his cruel decree, bestowed his affection on his amiable and talented wife, and called her "the liberator of the sex."—"Arabian Nights."

Schel'trum. An army drawn up in a circle instead of in a square.

Scheme is something entertained. Scheme is a Greek word meaning what is had or held (sche'o), and entertain is the Latin teneo, to have or hold, also.

Schi'tes (2^d syl.). Those Mahometans who do not consider the Sunna or oral law of any authority, but look upon it as apocryphal. They wear red turbans, and are called "Red Heads." (See SUNNITES.)

Schlem'ihl (Peter). The name of a man who sold his shadow to the devil, in Chamisso's tale so called. It is a synonym for any person who makes a desperate and silly bargain.

Scholastic. Anselm of Laon, Doctor Scholasticus. (1050-1117.)

Epiphanius the Scholastic. An Italian scholar. (6th century.)

Scholastic Divinity. Divinity subjected to the test of reason and argument, or at least "darkened by the counsel of words." The Athanasian creed is a favourable specimen of this attempt to reduce the mysteries of religion to "right reason;" and the attempts to reconcile the Mosaic cosmogony with modern geology smack of the same school.

Schoolmaster Abroad (The). Lord Brougham said, "Let the soldier be abroad, if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage abroad . . . the schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full array."

Schoolmen. Certain theologians of the middle ages; so called because they lectured in the cloisters or cathedral schools founded by Charlemagne and his immediate successors. They followed the fathers, from whom they differed in reducing every subject to a system, and may be grouped under three periods—

I. Period.—PLATONISTS (from ninth to twelfth century).

- (1) Pierre Abélard. (1079-1142.)
- (2) Flacius Albinus Alcuin. (735-804.)
- (3) Anselm. Doctor Scholasticus. (1050-1117.)
- (4) Berengarius of Tours. (1000-1088.)
- (5) Gerbert of Aurillac, afterwards pope Sylvester II. (930-1003.)
- (6) John of Salisbury. (1110-1180.)
- (7) Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury. (1005-1089.)
- (8) Pierre Lombard. Master of the Sentences, sometimes called the founder of school divinity. (1100-1164.)
- (9) John Roscelinus. (Eleventh century.)
- (10) John Scotus. Erigena. (1265-1308.)

II. Period. or Golden Age of Scholasticism.—ARISTOTELIANS (thirteenth and fourteenth centuries).

- (1) Alain de Lille. Universal Doctor. (1114-1203.)
- (2) Albertus Magnus, of Padua. (1193-1280.)
- (3) Thomas Aquinas. The Angelic Doctor. (1224-1274.)
- (4) Augustin Triumphans, archbishop of Aix. The Eloquent Doctor.
- (5) John Fidanza Bonaventure. The Seraphic Doctor. (1221-1274.)
- (6) Alexander of Hales. Infrangible Doctor. (Died 1245.)
- (7) John Duns Scotus. The Subtle Doctor. (1265-1308.)

III. Period. — NOMINALISM REVIVED. (To the seventeenth century.)

(1) Thomas de Bradwardine. The Profound Doctor. (1290-1348.)

(2) John Buridan. (1295-1360.)

(3) William Durandus de Pourçain. The Most Resolving or Resolute Doctor. (Died 1332.)

(4) Giles, archbishop of Bourges. The Doctor with Good Foundation.

(5) Gregory of Rimini. The Authentic Doctor. (Died 1357.)

(6) Robert Holkot. An English divine.

(7) Raymond Lully. The Illuminated Doctor. (1234-1315.)

(8) Francis Mairon, of Digne, in Provence.

(9) William Ocham. The Singular or Invincible Doctor. (Died 1347.)

(10) François Suarez, the last of the schoolmen. (1548-1617.)

Schoolmistress (The), by Shennstone, is designed for a "portrait of Sarah Lloyd," the dame who first taught the poet himself. She lived in a thatched house before which grew a birch-tree.

Scian. (See CEAN.)

Science. The Gay Science or "Gay Saber." The poetry of the Troubadours, and in its extended meaning poetry generally.

Science Persecuted.

(1) Anaxagoras of Clazomēnē held opinions in natural science so far in advance of his age that he was accused of impiety, thrown into prison, and condemned to death. Pericles, with great difficulty, got his sentence commuted to fine and banishment.

(2) Virgilius, bishop of Salzburg, denounced as a heretic by St. Boniface, for asserting the existence of antipodūs. (Died 784.)

(3) Galileo was imprisoned by the Inquisition for maintaining that the earth moved. In order to get his liberty he "abjured the heresy," but as he went his way whispered half audibly, E pur si muove (but nevertheless it does move). (1564-1642.)

(4) Gerbert, who introduced algebra into Christendom, was accused of dealing in the black arts, and shunned as a magician.

(5) Friar Bacon was excommunicated and imprisoned for diabolical knowledge, chiefly on account of his chemical researches. (1214-1294.)

(6) Dr. Faust, the German philosopher, suffered in a similar way in the sixteenth century; and according to tradition John Faust was imprisoned in Paris for magic, on account of his knowledge of the art of printing.

(7) John Dee. (See DEE.)

(8) Robert Grosseteste. (See GROSTED.)

(9) Averrois, the Arabian philosopher, who flourished in the twelfth century, was denounced as a heretic and degraded solely on account of his great eminence in natural philosophy and medicine. (He died 1226.)

(10) Andrew Crosse, electrician, who asserted that he had seen certain animals of the genus Acarus, which had been developed by him out of inorganic elements. Crosse was accused of impiety, and was shunned as a "profane man," who wanted to arrogate to himself the creative power of God. (1734-1855.)

(11) The sciences of geology and theological exegesis are to the present hour under a cloud, and it is only public opinion which holds back the hand of persecution.

Scien'ter Nes'ciens et sapienter indoctus, was how Gregory the Great described St. Benedict.

Scio's Blind Old Bard. Homer. Scio is the modern name of Chios, in the Ægean Sea.

Smyrna, Chios, Colophon', Salamis', Rhodūs, Argos, Athēnæ,
Your just right to call Homer your son you must settle between-ye.

Scipio "dismissed the Iberian maid" ("Paradise Regained," ii.). Referring to the tale that the conqueror of Spain not only refused to see a beautiful princess who had fallen into his power after the capture of New Carthage, but that he restored her to her parents, and actually gave her great presents that she might marry the man to whom she had been betrothed.

The Lusian Scipio. Nunio.

The Lusian Scipio well may speak his fame,
But nobler Nunio shins a greater name.
On earth's green bosom, or on ocean grey.
A greater never shall the sun survey.

Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. viii.

Sclavon'ic. The language spoken by the Russians, Hungarians, Poles, Bohemians, &c.; anything belonging to the Slavi.

Scobellum. A very fruitful land, but the inhabitants "exceeded the cannibals for cruelty, the Persians for pride, the Egyptians for luxury, the Cretans for lying, the Germans for drunkenness, and all nations together for a generality of vices." In vengeance the gods changed all the people into beasts: drunkards into swine, the lecherous into goats, the proud into peacocks, scolds into magpies, gamblers into asses, musicians into song-birds, the envious into dogs, idle women into milch-cows, jesters into monkeys, dancers into squirrels, and misers into moles. Four of the Champions of Christendom restored them to their normal forms by quenching the fire of the Golden Cave.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," iii. 10.

Scogan (John). A favourite fool in the court of Edward IV.

Scone (pron. Scoon). Edward III. removed to London, and placed in Westminster Abbey, the great stone upon which the kings of Scotland were wont to be crowned. This stone is still preserved, and forms the support of Edward the Confessor's chair, which the British monarchs occupy at their coronation. It is said to have been brought from Ireland by Fergus, son of Eric, who led the Dalriads to the shores of Argyshire.

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum Invenit lapidem, regare tenentur ibidem.
Lardner, i., p. 67.

Unless the fates are faithless found
And prophets' voice be vain,
Where'er this monument is found
The Scottish race shall reign.

Score. A reckoning; to make a reckoning; so called from the custom of marking off "runs" or "lengths," in games by the score feet. (See NURK AND SPELL.)

Scorn is to "dishorn," through the Italian scorna'rè. In the east the horn was worn as an ornament on the forehead; and to lower the horn was emblematical of sorrow, but to take it away was a disgrace and dishonour.

Scor'pion. It is said that scorpions have an oil which is a remedy against their stings. The toad also is said to have an antidote to its venom.

'Tis true, a scorpion's oil is said
To cure the wounds the venom made,
And weapons dressed with salves restore,
And heal the hurts they gave before.
Butler, "Hudibras," iii. 2.

Scot. The same as Scythian in etymology; the root of both is Set. The Greeks had no c, and would change t into th, making the root skth, and by adding a phonetic vowel we get Skuth-ai (Scythians), and Skoth-ai (Scoths). The Welsh disliked s at the beginning of a word, and would change it to ys; they would also change c or k to g, and th to d; whence the Welsh root would be Ysgd, and Skuth or Skoth would become ysgod. Once more, the Saxons would cut off the Welsh y, and change the g back again to c, and the d to t, converting Ysgod to Scot.

N.B.—Before the third century Scotland was called Caledonia or Alban.

Scot and Lot. A contribution upon all subjects according to their ability. Scot means tribute or tax, and lot means allotment or portion allotted. To pay scot and lot, therefore, is to pay the ordinary tributes and also the personal tax allotted to you.

Scot-free. Tax-free, without payment. (See above.)

Scots Greys or Scotch Greys. The 2nd Dragoons, the colour of whose horses is grey.

Scots wha hae, words by Robert Burns, to the music of an old Scotch tune called "Hey tuttie taittie." "The Land o' the Leal" is to the same tune.

Scotch-Mist. A thick fog with drizzling rain, common in Scotland.

A Scotch-fog will wet an Englishman through.
Common saying.

Scot'tia. Now applied poetically to Scotland, but at one time Ireland was so called. Hence Claudian says—

When Scots came thundering from the Irish shores,
And ocean trembled, struck with hostile cars.

Scotists. Followers of Duns Scotus, who maintained the doctrine of the immaculate conception in opposition to Thomas Aquinas.

Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain.
Pope, "Essay on Criticism."

Scotland. St. Andrew is the patron saint of this country, and tradition says that the remains of the apostle were brought by Regulus, a Greek monk, to the eastern coast of Fife, in 368. (See RULE, St.)

Scotland a pief of England. Edward I. founded his claim to the lordship of Scotland on these four grounds:—(1) The ancient chroniclers, who state that Scotch kings had occasionally paid homage to the English sovereigns from time immemorial. Extracts are given from St. Alban, Marianus Scotus, Ralph of Dizeto, Roger of Hoveden, and William of Malmesbury. (2) From charters of Scotch kings: as those of Edgar son of Malcolm, William, and his son Alexander II. (3) From papal rescripts: as those of Honorius III., Gregory IX., and Clement IV. (4) By an extract from "The Life and Miracles of St. John of Beverley." The tenor of this extract is quite suited to this "Dictionary of Fable."—In the reign of Adelstan, the Scots invaded England and committed great devastation. Adelstan went to drive them back, and, on reaching the Tyne, found that the Scotch had retreated. At midnight St. John of Beverley appeared to him, and bade him cross the river at daybreak, for he "should discomfit the foe." Adelstan obeyed the vision, and reduced the whole kingdom to subjection. On reaching Dunbar on his return march, he prayed that some sign might be vouchsafed to him to satisfy all ages that "God, by the intercession of St. John, had given him the kingdom of Scotland." Then struck he with his sword the basaltic rocks near the coast, and the blade sank into the solid flint "as if it had been butter," cleaving it asunder for "an ell or more;" and the cleft remains even to the present hour. Without doubt there is a fissure in the basalt, and how could it have come there except in the way recorded above? And how could a sword cut three feet deep into a hard rock without miraculous aid? And what could such a miracle have been vouchsafed for except to show that Adelstan was rightful lord of Scotland? And if Adelstan was lord, of course Edward should be so likewise—Q. E. D.—Rymer, "Fœdera," vol. i., part 2, p. 771.

Scotland Yard (London). So called from a palace built there for the reception of the kings of Scotland when they visited England. Pennant tells us it was originally given by king Edgar to Kenneth of Scotland, when he came to London to pay homage.

Scotland Yard. The head-quarters of the police, whence all public orders to the force proceed.

Mr. Walpole has only to speak the word in Scotland Yard, and the parks will be cleared.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Scott. The Walter Scott of Belgium. Hendrick Conscience. (Born 1812.)

The Southern Scott. Lord Byron calls Ariosto the Sir Walter Scott of Italy.—"Childe Harold," iv. 40.

Scourge of Christians. Nouredin-Mahmūd of Damascus. (1116-1174.)

Scourge of God. (1) Attila, king of the Huns. A. P. Stanley says the term was first applied to Attila in the Hungarian Chronicles. In Isidore's Chronicle the Huns are called Virga Dei. (Died 453.)

(2) Gen'seric, king of the Vandals, who went about like a destroying angel "against all those who had (in his opinion) incurred the wrath of God." Probably the word Godegesal (Goth-gesal, God-given) has been purposely twisted into God-gesil (God's-scourge), by those who hated him, because he was an Arian. God-gesal (or Deoda'tus) was the common title of the contemporary kings, like our Dei gratia.

Scourge of Princes. Pietro Aretino was so called for his satires. (1492-1556.)

Scouring. I 'scaped a scouring—a disease. Scouring is a sort of flux in horses and cattle. (Latin, Maleam præter vehi; French, L'échapper belle.)

Scowerers. A set of rakes in the eighteenth century, who, with the Nic'kers and Mohocks, committed great annoyances in London and other large towns.

Who has not heard the Scowerers' midnight fame?
Who has not trembled at the Mohocks' name?
Was there a watchman took his hourly rounds
Safe from their blows and new-invented wounds?
Gay, "Trivia," iii.

Scrag End (of mutton). A corruption of crag, the neck. (Saxon, hracca, the neck; Scotch, craig; Greek, rachis; Icelandic, racca, hinges, joints; Old English, rack, the neck.)

Scrape. I've got into a sad scrape—a great difficulty. We use rub, squeeze, pinch, and scrape to express the same idea. Thus Shakespeare says, "Ay, there's the rub" (difficulty); "I have got into tribulation" (a squeeze, from the Latin tribulo, to squeeze); "I am come to a pinch" (a difficulty). Some think the word a corrupt contraction of escapade, but Robert Chambers thinks it is borrowed from a term in golf. A rabbit's burrow in Scotland, he says, is called a "scrape," and if the ball gets into such a hole it can hardly be played. The rules of the game allow something to the player who "gets into a scrape."—"Book of Days."

He scraped an acquaintance with me. We became acquainted by returning civilities. The reference is to scraping the feet behind in bowing. This was always done in the formal days of Louis XIV.

The Gentleman's Magazine says that Hadrian went one day to the public baths, and saw an old soldier, well known to him, scraping himself with a potsherd for want of a flesh-brush. The emperor sent him a sum of money. Next day Hadrian found the bath crowded with soldiers scraping themselves with potsherds, and said—"Scrape on, gentlemen, but you'll not scrape acquaintance with me."—N. S. xxxix. 230.

Scrape-all. A hypocritical, psalm-singing rascal, who joins Cheatly (q.v.), and helps to supply young heirs with money. He is a type of the "godly knave."—Shadwell, "Squire of Alsatia."

Scratch. Old Scratch. Scrat, the house-demon of the North. A correspondent in Notes and Queries thinks the word relates to the uncleanness of the goat, and that Pan, the satyr—half goat, half man—is the origin of the term. (See DEUCE, NICK, &c.)

Coming up to the scratch—up to the mark; about to do what we want him to do. In prize-fighting a line is scratched on the ground, and the toe of the fighter must come up to the scratch.

Scratched. A horse is said to be scratched when its name is scratched out of the list of runners. "Tomboy was scratched for the Derby at ten a.m. on Wednesday;" and no bet on that horse made subsequently would be valid.

Scratch Cradle. A game played with a piece of string stretched across the two hands. The art is so to cross the thread as to produce a resemblance to something, and for another so to transfer it to his own hands as to change the former figure into some other resemblance. A corruption of "cratch cradle" (the manger cradle), because the first

Screw. An old screw. One who keeps his money tight, and doles it out in screws or small quantities. (See below.)

A screw of anything is a small quantity, such as may be put into a screw of paper.

A screw loose. Something amiss. The allusion is to joinery kept together by screws.

To put on the screw. To press for payment, as a screw presses by gradually-increasing pressure.

Screwed. Intoxicated. A playful synonym of tight, which again is a playful synonym of blown out.

Scribere in Aqua. To forget.—Catullus, 70, 4.

Men's evil manners live in brass,
Their virtues we write in water.

Shakespeare, "Henry VIII.," iv. 2.

Scriblerus (Mart'rus). A merciless satire on the false taste in literature current in the time of Pope. Cornelius Scriblerus, the father of Martin, was a pedant, who entertained all sorts of absurdities about the education of his son. Martin grew up a man of capacity; but though he had read everything, his judgment was vile and taste atrocious.

Scrimmage. A tussle; a slight battle. From the obsolete scrimmer, a fencer: French, escrimeur; same root as escarmouch, our skirmish.

Prince Ouffur at this skrymage, for all his pryde,
Fled full fast, and sought no gyde.

MS. Lansdowne 200, f. 10

Scriptorēs Decem. A collection of ten ancient chronicles on English history, edited by Roger Twysden and John Selden. The ten chroniclers are Simeon of Durham, John of Hexham, Richard of Hexham, Ailred of Rievall, Ralph de Diceto (archdeacon of London), John Brompton of Jorval, Gervase of Canterbury, Thomas Stubbs, William Thorn of Canterbury, and Henry Knighton of Leicester.

Scriptorēs Quinque. A collection of five chronicles on the early history of England, edited by Thomas Gale.

Scriptorēs Tres (the three writers). Meaning Ricardus Coriuenensis, Gildas Badou'icus, and Nennius Banchoren'sis. Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen, professed to have discovered the first of these treatises in 1747, in the royal library of that city. Its subject is "De Situ Britanniae," and in 1757 he published it along with the two other treatises, calling the whole "The Three Writers on the Ancient History of the British Nations." Bertram's forgery has been completely exposed by J. E. Mayor, in his preface to "Ricardi de Cirencestria Speculum Historiale." (See SANCHONIATHO.).

Scriptorium. An apartment in every abbey where writers transcribed service-books for the choir and books for the library.—Warton.

Scripture. "Mrs. Adams answered Mr. Adams, that it was blasphemous to talk Scripture out of church."—Fielding, "Joseph Andrews."

Scrupulous means literally having a stone in one's shoe. Those who have a stone in their shoe halt, and those who doubt "halt between two opinions." (Latin, scrupulus, gravel, a small stone.)

Scudamore (Sir). The lover of Amoret, whom he finally marries.—Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. iii.

Scullery-maid is one who washes up skolls or sculls—i.e., plates, cups, and dishes. (See SKULL.)

Jean Goujon. (1510-1572.)

Germain Pilon. (1515-1590.)

Scutch. The scrapings of hides. (English, scotch, to cut; Saxon, sceadan.) We have the word in the expression, "You have scotched the snake, not killed it."

About half a mile from the southern outfall are two manufactories, where the refuse from the London tanneries known as scutch is operated upon.—The Times.

Scuttle. To scuttle a ship is to bore a hole in it in order to make it sink. Rather strangely this word is from the same root as our word skut or bolt (Saxon, scyttan, scyttel, a bolt or bar). It was first applied to a hole in a roof with a door or lid, then to a hatchway in the deck of a ship with a lid, then to a hole in the bottom of a ship plugged up; then comes the verb to pull out the plug, and leave the hole for the admission of water.

Scylla. Glaucus, a fisherman, was in love with Scylla; but Circe, out of jealousy, changed her into a hideous monster, and set dogs and wolves to bark round her incessantly. On this Scylla threw herself into the sea and became a rock. It is said that the rock Scylla somewhat resembles a woman at a distance, and the noise of the waves dashing against it is not unlike the barking of dogs and wolves.

Glaucus, lost to joy,
Curst in his love by ven'eful Circe's hate,
Attending wept his Scylla's hapless fate.
Camoens, "Lusiad" bk. vi.

Scylla, daughter of Nisus, promised to deliver Megara into the hands of Minos. To redeem this promise she had to cut off a golden hair on her father's head, which she effected while he was asleep. Minos, her lover, despised her for this treachery, and Scylla threw herself from a rock into the sea. At death she was changed into a lark, and Nisus into a hawk. Scylla turned into a rock by Circe, "had no connection" with the daughter of Nisus.

Think of Scylla's fate.
Changed to a bird, and sent to fly in air,
She dearly pays for Nisus' injured hair.
Pope, "Rape of the Lock," iii.

Avoiding Scylla he fell into Charybdis. Trying to avoid one error he fell into another; or, trying to avoid one danger, he fell into another equally fatal. Scylla and Charybdis are two rocks between Italy and Sicily. In one was a cave where "Scylla dwelt," and on the other Charybdis dwelt under a fig-tree. Ships which tried to avoid one were often wrecked on the other rock. It was Circe who changed Scylla into a frightful sea-monster, and Jupiter who changed Charybdis into a whirlpool.

When I shun Scylla your father, I fall into Charybdis your mother.—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," iii. 5.

Between Scylla and Charybdis. Between two difficulties. To fall from Scylla into Charybdis—out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Sea means simply a basin; hence the expression, "molten sea," meaning the great brazen vessel which stood in Solomon's temple (2 Chron. iv. 5, and 1 Kings vii. 26). The world of water is properly called the ocean. (Saxon, sae, a basin.)

"The Sea, the Sea." Words by Procto (Barry Cornwall), music by Neukomm.

The Old Man of the Sea ("Arabian Nights"). A creature encountered by Sindbad the Sailor in his fifth voyage. This terrible Old Man contrived to get on the back of Sindbad, and would neither dismount again, nor could he be shaken off. At last Sindbad gave him some wine to drink, which so intoxicated him that he relaxed his grip, and Sindbad made his escape.

Out at sea. Wide of the mark; quite wrong; like a person in the open ocean without compass or chart.

Sea-board. That part of a country which borders on the sea; the coast-line. It should be sea-bord. (French, bord, the edge.)

Sea-girt Isle. England; so called because it is girded round by the ocean, or, as Shakespeare has it, "hedged in with the main, that water-walled bulwark" ("King John," ii. 1).

This precious stone set in the silver sea,
Which serves it in the office of a wall,
Or as a moat defensive to a house,
Against the envy of less happier lands.
Shakespeare, "King Richard II," ii. 1.

Sea-nettles. Gelatinous animal sea-plants, some of which sting like nettles.

Sea-serpent. Pontoppidan, in his "Natural History of Norway," speaks of sea-serpents 600 feet long. The great sea-serpent was said to have been seen off the coast of Norway in 1819, 1822, 1837. Hans Egede affirms that it was seen on the coast of Greenland in 1734. In 1815, 1817, 1819, 1833, it was said to have made its appearance near Boston. In 1848 it was "seen" by the crew of her Majesty's frigate Dædalus, in the South Atlantic Ocean. Its stated length varies from 60 to 750 feet.

Sealed Fountain. An exclusive privilege. Solomon says—"My spouse is a fountain sealed" (Cant. iv. 12). In the vicinity of Bethlehem travellers are shown the springs which Solomon shut up and sealed with his signet, to keep them for his own private use.—Maundrell, "Travels."

Seba'raim (4 syl.). Rabbis who lived after the Talmud was finished, and gave their judgments on traditional difficulties (Al derek sebaroth, "by way of opinion").—Buxtorf.

Sebastian (St.). Patron saint of archers, because he was bound to a tree and shot at with arrows. As the arrows stuck in his body as thick as pins in a pin-cushion, he was also made patron saint of pin-makers. And as he was a centurion, he is patron saint of soldiers.

Sebastianis'tas. Persons who believe that dom Sebastian, who fell in the battle of Alcazarquebir in 1578, will return to earth, when Brazil will become the chief kingdom of the earth.

Sebile (2 syl.). La Dame du Lac, in the romance entitled "Perceforest." Her castle was surrounded by a river, on which rested so thick a fog that no one could see across it. Alexander the Great abode with her a fortnight to be cured of his wounds, and king Arthur was the result of their amour (vol. i. 42).

Second. (See Two.)

Second Sight. The power of seeing things invisible to others; the power of foreseeing future events by means of shadows thrown before them. Many Highlanders claim this power, which the ancient Gaels called shadow-sight (taishchitirangh).

Nor less availed his optic sleight,
And Scottish gift of second sight.
Trumbull.

Second thoughts are best because they arise after due reflection.

"Hold, sir, for second thoughts are best,"
The husband cried; "tis my request
With pleasure to prolong my life."
Fenton, "A la Mode."

Sec'ular Games. Those held by the Romans only once in a century. While the kings reigned they were held in the Campus Martius, in honour of Pluto and Proserpine, and were instituted in obedience to the Sibylline verses, with the promise that "the empire should remain in safety so long as this admonition was observed."

Datē, quæ precamur
Temp'orē sacro
Quo Sibyllini moue're versus.
Horace, "Carmen Seculare," A.V. 731.

Sedan-Chairs. Invented at Sedan, in the north of France; their introduction into England is attributed to the duke of Buckingham, who gave great offence by employing men as beasts of burden. The duke may probably have offended the London roughs by using a Sedan-chair, but he certainly was not the first to introduce it into England, as we find it spoken of as far back as 1581. It was introduced into France (in 1617) by M. de Montbrun, and called chaise à porteurs.

Sedgwick. (See DOOMSDAY SEDGWICK.)

Sedley (Amelia). An impersonation of virtue without intellect in Thackeray's "Vanity Fair." (See SHARP.)

Sedrat. The lotus-tree which stands on the right-hand side of the invisible throne of Allah. Its branches extend wider than the distance between heaven and earth. Its leaves resemble the ears of the elephant. Each seed of its fruit encloses a houri; and two rivers issue from its roots. Numberless birds sing among its branches, and numberless angels rest beneath its shade.

Seedy. A flower when seedy has lost its nattiness and beauty: so a hat or coat is termed seedy when it has become shabby. A man is seedy after a debauch, when he looks and feels out of sorts.

Seel. To close the eyelids of a hawk by running a thread through them; to hoodwink. (French, sceller.)

*She that so young could give out such a seeming,
To seel her father's eyes up, close as oak.*

Shakespeare, "Othello," iii. 3.

See'murgh. The wonderful bird that could speak all the languages of the world, and whose knowledge embraced past, present, and future events.—Persian mythology.

Segonti'ari. Inhabitants of parts of Hampshire and Berkshire, referred to by Cæsar in his "Commentaries."

Seiks (pron. Seeks). A religious sect in Hindustan, founded in 1500. They profess the purest Deism, and are distinguished from the Hindus by worshipping one invisible god. The word means lion, and was applied to them on account of their heroic resistance to the Moslems. Ultimately they subdued Lahore, and established themselves in the Punjab, &c.

Sela'ma or Sel'meh. The headland of the Persian Gulf commonly called Cape Musseldom. The Indians throw cocoa-nuts, fruits, and flowers into the sea when they pass this cape, to secure a propitious voyage.—Morier.

*Breezes from the Indian sea
Blow round Sela'ma's sainted cape.
Moore, "Fire-shippers."*

Sele'në. The moon-goddess; sometimes but improperly called Diana, as Diana is always called the chaste huntress; but Selenë had fifty daughters by Endymion, and several by Zeus, one of whom was called "The Dew" (Erse). Diana is represented with bow and arrow running after the stag; but Selene is represented in a chariot drawn by two white horses; she has wings on her shoulders and a sceptre in her hands.

Selen'cidæ. The dynasty of Selenus. Selenus succeeded to a part of Alexander's vast empire. The monarchy consisted of Syria, a part of Asia Minor, and all the eastern provinces.

Selim. Son of Abdallah and cousin of Zuleika (3 syl.). When Giaffir (2 syl.) murdered Abdallah, he took Selim and brought him up as his own son. The young man fell in love with Zuleika, who thought he was her brother; but when she discovered he was Abdallah's son, she promised to be his bride, and eloped with him. As soon as Giaffir discovered this he went after the fugitives, and shot Selim. Zuleika killed herself, and the old pacha was left childless. The character of Selim is bold, enterprising, and truthful.—Byron, "Bride of Abydos."

Selim (son of Abar). The name of Jehanguire, before his accession to the throne. He married Nourmahal' (the Light of the Haram). A coolness arose between the young married couple, but Nourmahal contrived to enter the sultan's banquet-room as a lute-player, and so charmed young Selim that he exclaimed "If Nourmahal had so sung, I could have forgiven her everything;" whereupon Nourmahal threw off her disguise, and became reconciled to her husband.—T. Moore, "The Light of the Haram."

Seljuks. A Perso-Turkish dynasty which gave eleven kings and lasted 138 years (1056-1194). It was founded by Togrul Beg, a descendant of Seljuk, chief of a small tribe which gained possession of Boka'ra.

Sell. A saddle. "Vaulting ambition . . . o'erleaps its sell" ("Macbeth," i. 7). Latin, sella; French, selle; our window-sell.

*He left his lofty steed with golden sell.
Spenser, "Faery Queen," ii. 2.*

A window-sell. The stone or wooden basement of a window, generally called the sill.

A sell. A "do," a deception, a "take-in." Street vendors who take in the unwary with catch-pennies, chuckle like hens when they have laid an egg, "Sold again, and got the money!"

Selt'zer Water. A corruption of Selters Water; so called from the Lower Selters, near Limburg (Nassau).

Selvag'gio. Father of Sir Industry, and hero of Thomson's "Castle of Indolence."

In fairy-land there lived a knight of old,
Of feature stern, Selvaggio well y-clept.
A rough, unpolished man, robust and bold,
But wondrous poor. He neither sowed nor reaped,
No stores in summer for cold winter heaped.
In hunt'ng all his days away he wore:
Now scorched by June, now in November steeped,
Now pinched by biting January sore,
He still in woods pursued the libbard and the boar.
Canto ii. 5.

Semir'amis. Semiramis of the North. Margaret of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. (1353-1412.)

Catherine II. of Russia. (1729-1796.)

Sena'nus (St.) fled to the island of Scattery, and resolved that no female form should ever step upon it. An angel led St. Can'ara to the island, but the recluse refused to admit her. Tom Moore has a poem on this legend, "St. Senanus and the Lady."—"Irish Melodies," No. 1. (See KEVIN.)

Sen'dal. A thin silk. (Italian, zendado; Spanish, ceñdal.)

Sen'eca. The Christian Sen'eca. Bishop Hall of Norwich. (1574-1656.)

Senior Op'timë. A Cambridge University expression, meaning a second-class man in mathematical honours. The first class consists of Wranglers.

Senior Soph. A man of the third year's standing is so called in our universities.

Sennac'herib, whose army was destroyed by the Angel of Death, is by the Orientals called King Moussal.—D'Herbelot (notes to the Koran).

Se'nnight. A week; seven nights. Fort'night, fourteen nights. These words are relics of the ancient Celtic custom of beginning the day at sunset, a custom observed by the ancient Greeks, Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and Jews, and by the modern representatives of these people. In Gen. i. we always find the evening precedes the morning; as, "The evening and the morning were the first day," &c.

Sen'tences (3 syl.). The four books of Sentences, by Pierre Lombard, the foundation of scholastic theology of the middle period. (See SCHOOLMEN.)

Master of the Sentences. Pierre Lombard, schoolman. (Died 1164.)

Sen'tinel. One placed to watch the hold of a ship, to see that the water does not get in. (Latin, sentina.)—Arch-deacon Smith.

Sentinelle perdue. One placed at a post where he is almost certain to be killed by the enemy.

Sepoy. The Indian soldier is so called, says bishop Heber, from sip, a bow, their principal weapon in olden times.

Sept. A clan (Latin, septum, a fold); all the cattle, or all the voters, in a given enclosure.

September Massacres. An indiscriminate slaughter of Loyalists confined at the time in the Abbaye and other French prisons. Dautin gave order for this onslaught after the capture of Verdun by the allied Prussian army. It lasted the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of September, 1792. As many as 8,000 persons fell in this massacre, among whom was the princess de Lamballe.

Septembri'zers or Septembriseurs (the September men). The men who planned and executed the September Massacres (q. v.).

Septuages'ima Sunday. In round numbers, seventy days before Easter. The third Sunday before Lent.

Sep'tuagint. A Greek version of the Old Testament, so called because it was made (in round numbers) by seventy Jews; more correctly speaking, by seventy-two. Dr. Campbell disapproves of this derivation, and says it was so called because it was sanctioned and authorised by the Jewish San'hedrim or great council, which consisted of seventy members besides the High priest. This derivation falls in better with the modern notion that the version was made at different times by different translators. (Latin, septuaginta, seventy.)

Serag'lio. The palace of the Turkish sultan, situated in the Golden Horn, and enclosed by walls seven miles and a half in circuit. The chief entrance is the Sublime Gate; and the chief of the large edifices is the Harem, or "sacred spot," which contains numerous houses, one for each of the sultan's wives, and others for his concubines. The black eunuchs form the inner guard, and the white eunuchs the second guard. The Seraglio may be visited by strangers; not so the Harem.

Seraphic Doctor (Doctor Seraphicus). St. Bonaventura, a schoolman, was so called for his seraphic fervour and eloquence. (1221-1274.)

Seraphic Saint. St. Francis d'Assisi, founder of the Franciscan order. (1182-1226.)

Ser'aphim. An order of angels distinguished for fervent zeal and religious ardour. The word means "to burn." (See Isaiah vi. 2.)

Thousand celestial ardours (seraphs) where he stood
Veiled with his gorgeous wings, up springing light,
Flew through the midst of heaven.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," v.

Sera'pis. The Ptolemaic form of the Egyptian Osi'ris. The word is a corruption of osor-apis (dead apis, or rather "osirified-apis"), a deity which had so many things in common with Osi'ris that it is not at all easy to distinguish them.

Ser'apis. Symbol of the Nile and of fertility.

Serat (Al). The ordeal bridge over which every one will have to pass at the resurrection. It is not wider than the edge of a scimeter, and is thrown across the gulf of Hell. The faithful, says the Koran, will pass over in safety, but sinners will fall headlong into the dreary realm beneath.

Serbo'nian Bog or Serbo'nis. A mess from which there is no way of extricating oneself. The Serbonian bog was between Egypt and Palestine. Strabo calls it a lake, and says it was 200 stadia long and 50 broad; Pliny makes it 150 miles in length. Hume says that whole armies have been lost therein. Typhon lay at the bottom of this bog, which was therefore called Typhon's Breathing Hole. It received its name from Sebaket-Bardoil, a king of Jerusalem, who died there on his return from an expedition into Egypt.

Now, sir, I must say I know of no Serbonian bog deeper than a £5 rating would prove to be.—B. Disraeli (Chanc. of the Exch.), Times, March 19, 1857.

A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog
Betwixt Damietta and Mount Cassius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," ii.

Sereme'nes (4 syl.). Brother-in-law of king Sardanapalus, to whom he entrusts his signet ring to put down a rebellion headed by Arba'e'ss the Mede and Bele's'es the Chaldean soothsayer. He is slain in a battle with the insurgents.—Byron, "Sardanapalus."

Serena'de (3 syl.). Music performed in the serene—i.e., in the open air at even-tide (Latin, serenum). Ade is the Greek aïdo, I sing, which appears in such words as Aeneid, Lusiad, Dunciad, Franciad, Phippide, Henriade, &c.

Or serenade which the starved lover sings
To his proud fair. Milton, "Paradise Lost."

Sere'ne (2 syl.). A title given to certain German princes. These princes who used to hold under the empire were entitled Serene or Most Serene Highnesses.

It's all serene. All right (Spanish, seré no, "all right"—the sentinel's countersign).

Serif and SANSERIF. The former is a letter in typography with the "wings" or finishing strokes (as T); the latter is a letter without the finishing strokes (as T). French, serre-file (the last man of a file, that which completes a file; the finishing stroke).

Serjeant. A servant.

In the embraces of a serjeant poor,
"Orlando Furioso," xxviii. 42.

Sermon Lane, Doctors Commons, London. A corruption of Shere-moniers Lane (the lane of the money shearers or clippers, whose office it was to cut and round the metal to be stamped into money). The Mint was in the street now called Old Change.—Maitland, "London," ii. 880.

Serpent. An attribute of St. Cecilia, St. Euphe'mia, and many other saints, either because they trampled on Satan or because they miraculously cleared some country of such reptiles. (See DAGON.)

Serpent, in Christian art, figures in Paradise as the tempter.

The brazen serpent gave newness of life to those who were bitten by the fiery dragons, and raised their eyes to this symbol (Numb. xxi. 8).

It is not unfrequently affixed to the cross.

It is generally placed under the feet of the Virgin, in allusion to the promise made to Eve after the Fall (Gen. iii. 15).

Satan is called the great serpent, because under the form of a serpent he tempted Eve (Rev. xii. 9).

Serpent metamorphoses. Cadmos and his wife Harmonia were by Zeus converted into serpents, and removed to Elysium. Esculapion, god of Epidaurus, assumed the form of a serpent when he appeared at Rome during a pestilence. Therefore is it that the goddess of Health bears in her hand a serpent.

O ware, Hygeia, o'er Britannia's throne
Thy serpent-wand, and mark it for thine own.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," iv.

Jupiter Ammon appeared to Olympias in the form of a serpent, and became the father of Alexander the Great.

When glides a silver serpent, treacherous guest!
And fair Olympias folds him to her breast.
Darwin, "Economy of Vegetation," i. 2.

Jupiter Capitolinus in a similar form became the father of Scipio Africanus.

The Serpent is emblematical—

(1) Of wisdom.—"Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matt. x. 16).

(2) Of subtilty.—"Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field" (Gen. iii. 1).

It is said that the ceras'tes bides in sand that it may bite the horse's foot, and get the rider thrown. In allusion to this belief, Jacob says, "Dan shall be . . . an adder in the path, that biteth the horse heels, so that his rider shall fall backward" (Gen. xlix. 17).

When attacked its chief care is to protect its head, because its heart is situated near its head; and the readiest way of killing a serpent is by squeezing or cutting off its head. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head" (Gen. iii. 15).

When a serpent drinks it is said that it first vomits up all its venom, for fear of poisoning itself by swallowing it.

The Bible also tells us that it stops up its ears that it may not be charmed by the charmer (Ps. lviii. 4).

The serpent is symbolical—

(1) Of deity, because, says Plutarch, "it feeds upon its own body; even so all things spring from God, and will be resolved into deity again.—"De Iside et Osiride," i. 2., p. 5; and "Philo Byblius."

(2) Of eternity, as a corollary of the former. It is represented as forming a circle and holding its tail in its mouth.

(3) Of renovation. It is said that the serpent, when it is old, has the power of growing young again "like the eagle," by casting its slough, which is done by squeezing itself between two rocks.

(4) Of guardian spirits. It was thus employed by the ancient Greeks and Romans, and not unfrequently the figure of a serpent was depicted on their altars.

In the temple of Athene, at Athens, a serpent was kept in a cage, and called "The Guardian Spirit of the Temple." This serpent was supposed to be animated by the soul of Erichonius.

To cherish a serpent in your bosom. To show kindness to one who proves ungrateful. The Greeks say that a husbandman found a serpent's egg, which he put into his bosom. The egg was hatched by the warmth, and the young serpent stung its benefactor.

Their ears have been serpent-licked. They have the gift of foreseeing events, the power of seeing into futurity. This is a Greek superstition. It is said that Cassandra and Helenus were gifted with the power of prophecy, because serpents licked their ears while sleeping in the temple of Apollo.

The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head. And to the serpent God said, the seed of the woman "shall bruise thy head." The heart of the serpent being close to the head, renders a severe "bruise" there fatal. The serpent bruised the heel of man—i.e., being a cause of stumbling it hurt the foot which tripped against it.

Serpent's Food. Fennel is said to be the favourite food of serpents, with the juice of which it restores its sight when dim.

Serpents. Brazilian wood is a panacea against the bites of serpents. The countess of Salisbury, in the reign of James I., had a bedstead made of this wood, and on it is the legend of Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Serpentine Verses. Such as end with the same word as they begin with. The following are examples:—

Crescit amor nummi, quantum ipsa pecunia crescit.
Greater grows the love of pelf, as pelf itself grows greater.

Ambo florescentes etatibus, Arcades ambo.
Both in the spring of life, Arcadians both.

Serpenti'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of the leaders of the allied Moorish army.

Serrapur'da. High screens of rep cloth, stiffened with cane, used to enclose a considerable space round the royal tent of the Persian army.

Servant (Faithful). (See ADAM.)

Serve. I'll serve him out—give him a quid pro quo. This is the French des-server, to do an ill turn to one.

To serve a rope. To roll something upon it to prevent it from being fretted. The "service" or material employed is spun yard, small lines, sennit, ropes, old leather, or canvas.

Servus Servorum (Latin). The slave of slaves, the drudge of a servant. The style adopted by the Roman pontiffs ever since the time of Gregory the Great is Servus Servorum Dei.

Alexander episcopus, servus servorum Dei, Karissimo filio Willielmo salutem.—Rymer, "Fœdera," i. p. 1.

Ses'ame (3 syl.). Oily grain of the natural order Pedalia'ceæ, originally from India. In Egypt they eat sesame cakes, and the Jews frequently add the seed to their cakes. The cakes made of sesame oil, mixed with honey and preserved citron, are considered an Oriental luxury; sesame is excellent also for puddings. (See OPEN SESAME.)

Among the numerous objects.... was a black horse On one side of its manner there was clean barley and sesame, and the other was filled with rose-water.—"Arabian Nights" (Third Calender).

Ses'sha. King of the serpent race, on which Vishnu reclines on the primeval waters. It has a thousand heads, on one of which the world rests. The coiled-up sesha is the emblem of eternity.—Hindu mythology.

Sesos'tris (in Fénelon's "Télémaque"). The lay figure of this character was Louis XIV.

Set Off. A commercial expression. The credits are set off the debits, and the balance struck.

Set off to advantage. A term used by jewellers, who set off precious stones by appropriate "settings."

Set-to. A boxing match, a pugilistic fight, a scolding. In pugilism the combatants are by their seconds "set to the scratch" or line marked on the ground, and this "set-to" is in fact the commencement of the encounter.

Set'ebos. A deity of the Patagonians, introduced by Shakespeare into his "Tempest."

His art is of such power
It would control my dam's god, Setebos,
And make a vassal of him. "Tempest," i. 2.

Seth'ites (2 syl.). A sect of the second century, who maintained that the Messiah was Seth, son of Adam.

Setting the Thames on Fire. A pun on the word temse (a sieve for cleansing meal). An active workman would often set the rim of the temse on fire by friction, as he moved it rapidly over the mouth of the barrel into which the meal was sifted; hence it became in Yorkshire a common proverb to say of a weak, lazy, or listless fellow, "He'll never set the temse on fire."

Seven (Greek, hepta; Latin, septem; German, sieben; Saxon, seofun; our seven, &c.). A holy number. There are seven days in creation, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven days in the week, seven graces, seven divisions in the Lord's Prayer, seven ages in the life of man, and the just fall "seven times a day." There are seven phases of the moon, every seventh year was sabbatical, and seven times seventy years was the jubilee. The three great Jewish feasts lasted seven days, and between the first and second of these feasts were seven weeks. Levitical purifications lasted seven days. We have seven churches of Asia, seven candlesticks, seven stars, seven trumpets, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven horns, the Lamb has seven eyes, ten times seven Israelites go to Egypt, the exile lasts the same number of years, and there were ten times seven elders. Pharaoh in his dream saw seven kine and seven ears of corn, &c.

It is frequently used indefinitely to signify a long time, or a great many: thus in the "Interlude of the Four Elements," the dance of Apetyte is called the best "that I have seen this seven yere." Shakespeare talks of a man being "a vile thief this seven year."

Seven Bodies in Alchemy. Sun is gold, moon silver, Mars iron, Mercury quicksilver, Saturn lead, Jupiter tin, and Venus copper.

The bodies seven, eek, lo hem heer anon:
Sol gold is, and Luna silver we threpe;
Mars yren, Mercurie quyksilver we clepe;
Saturus leed, and Jubitur is tyn,
And Venus copur, by my fader kyn.

Chaucer, Prologue of the "Chanounes Yemanes Tale."

Seven Champions of Christendom is by Richard Johnson, who lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

(1) St. George of England was seven years imprisoned by the Almi'dor, the black king of Morocco.

(2) St. Dennis of France lived seven years in the form of a hart.

(3) St. James of Spain was seven years dumb out of love to a fair Jewess.

(4) St. Anthony of Italy, with the other champions, was enchanted into a deep sleep in the Black Castle, and was released by St. George's three sons, who quenched the seven lamps by water from the enchanted fountain.

(5) St. Andrew of Scotland, who was guided through the Vale of Walking Spirits by the Walking Fire, and delivered six ladies who had lived seven years under the form of milk-white swans.

(6) St. Patrick of Ireland was immured in a cell where he scratched his grave with his own nails.

(7) St. David of Wales slept seven years in the enchanted garden of Ormandine, but was redeemed by St. George.

Seven Churches of Asia.

(1) Ephesos, founded by St. Paul, 57, in a ruineous state in the time of Justinian (527).

(2) Smyrna, still an important seaport. Polycarp was its first bishop, and died 175.

(3) Per'gamos, renowned for its library.

(4) Thyat'ira, now called Ak-hissar (the White Castle).

(5) Sardis, now a small village called Sart.

(6) Philadelph'ia, now called Allah Shehr (City of God), a miserable town.

(7) Laodice'a, now a deserted place called Eske-hissar (the Old Castle).

Seven Days' War. The great conflict for German supremacy between Prussia and Italy on one side and Austria on the other, in the spring of 1866. Austria, having confessed herself beaten, gave up the Quadrilateral to France, and Franco gave it to Italy, by which means all Italy, except a small part secured to the pope, became one kingdom; and at the same time the kingdom of Prussia was extended by the addition of Hanover, and the German Confederation was broken up.

Seven Dials (London). A column, railed in, formerly stood at the ancient limits of St. Giles, and seven dials were affixed to it, facing the seven streets which radiated from that centre.

Where famed St. Giles's ancient limits spread
An in-railed column rears its lofty head
Here to seven streets seven dials count the day,
And from each other catch the circling ray,
Gay, "Trivia," ii.

Seven Joys of the Virgin. (See MARY.)

Seven Sages or Wise Men of Greece.

(1) Solon of Athens, whose motto was, "Know thyself."

(2) Chilo of Sparta—"Consider the end."

(3) Thal'es of Mile'tos—"Who hateth suretyship is sure."

(4) Bias of Pri'e'n'e—"Most men are bad."

(5) Cleobu'los of Lindos—"The golden mean," or "Avoid extremes."

(6) Pittacos of Mityl'e'n'e—"Seize Time by the forelock."

(7) Periander of Corinth—"Nothing is impossible to industry."

First Solon, who made the Athenian laws;
While Chilo, in Sparta, was famed for his saws;
In Mile'tos did Thal'es astronomy teach;
Bias used in Pri'e'n'e his morals to preach;
Cleobu'los, of Lindos, was handsome and wise;
Mityl'e'n'e 'gainst thraldom saw Pittacos rise;
Periander is said to have gained through his court
The title that Myson, the Chienian, ought.

Seven Senses. Scared out of my seven senses. According to very ancient teaching, the soul of man, or his "inward holy body," is compounded of the seven properties which are under the influence of the seven planets. Fire animates earth gives the sense of feeling, water gives speech, air gives taste, mist gives sight, flowers give hearing, the south wind gives smelling. Hence the seven senses are animation, feeling, speech, taste, sight, hearing, and smelling. (See COMMON SENSE.)

Seven Sisters. Seven culverins so called, cast by one Borthwick.

And these were Borthwick's "Sisters Seven,"
And culverins which France had given;
Ill-omened gut! The guns remain
The conqueror's spoil on Flodden plain.
Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion," iv.

Seven Sleepers. Seven noble youths of Ephesos, who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave, and were walled in. They fell asleep for two centuries, when their bodies were found and taken to Marseilles in a large stone coffin, still shown in Victor's Church. Their names are Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Malchus, Martinian, and Serapion. This fable took its rise from a misapprehension of the words, "They fell asleep in the Lord"—i.e., died.—Gregory of Tours, "De Gloria Martyrum," c. 95.

Seven Sorrows of the Virgin. (See MARY.)

Seven Spirits stand before the Throne of God:—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Zachariel, Anael, and Oriphiel.—Gustavini.

Seven Wise Masters. A Roman prince was placed under the charge of seven wise instructors; when he grew to man's estate his step-mother made improper advances to him, and, being repelled, accused him to the king of offering her violence. By consulting the stars the prince found out that his life was in danger, but that the crisis would be passed without injury if he remained silent for seven days. The wise masters now take up the matter; each one in turn tells the king a tale to illustrate the evils of inconsiderate punishments, and as the tale ends the king resolves to relent; but the queen at night prevails on him to carry out his sentence. The seven days being passed, the prince also tells a tale which embodies the whole truth, whereupon the king sentences the queen to lose her life. This collection of tales, called "Sandabar's Parables," is very ancient, and has been translated from the Arabic into almost all the languages of the civilised world. John Rolland, of Dalkeith, turned it into Scotch metre.

Seven Wonders (I.) of Antiquity.

(1) The Pyramids of Egypt; (2) the Hanging Gardens of Babylon; (3) the Tomb of Mausolos; (4) the Temple of Diana at Ephesus; (5) the Colossus of Rhodes; (6) the Statue of Zeus (Jupiter) by Phidias; (7) the Pharos of Egypt, or else the Palace of Cyrus cemented with gold.

The pyramids first, which in Egypt were laid;
Next Babylon's garden, for Amytis made;
Then Mausolos's tomb of affection and guilt;
Fourth, the Temple of Dian, in Ephesus built;
The Colossus of Rhodes, cast in brass, to the sun;
Sixth, Jupiter's statue, by Phidias done;
The Pharos of Egypt comes last, we are told,
Or the palace of Cyrus, cemented with gold.

(II.) Of the Middle Ages.

(1) The Coliseum of Rome; (2) the Catacombs of Alexandria; (3) the Great Wall of China; (4) Stonehenge; (5) the Leaning Tower of Pisa; (6) the Porcelain Tower of Nankin; (7) the Mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople.

Seven Years' Lease. Leases run by seven years and its multiples, from the ancient notion of what was termed "climacteric years," in which life was supposed to be in special peril.—Levinus Lemnius. (See CLIMACTERIC YEARS.)

Seven Years' War. The conflict maintained by Frederick II. of Prussia against Austria, Russia, and France. (1756-1763.)

Severn. (See SABRINA.)

Seve'rus (St.). Patron saint of fullers, being himself of the same craft.

The Wall of Severus. A stone rampart, built in 208 by the emperor Seve'rus, between the Tyne and the Solway. It is to the north of Hadrian's wall, which was constructed in 120.

Sewed-up. Intoxicated; done up. (Dutch, seeuw, sick.)

Sexagesima Sunday. The second Sunday before Lent; so called because in round numbers it is sixty days before Easter.

Sex'tile (2 syl.). The aspect of two planets when distant from each other sixty degrees or two signs. This position is marked thus ✕. As there are twelve signs, two degrees is a sixth.

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite
Of noxious efficacy.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," x. 659.

N.B. The signs opposite or distant one-half the circle are noxious, because their action and influence are in the contrary direction.

Sex'ton. A corruption of Sa'cristan, an official who has charge of the sacra or things attached to a specific church, such as vestments, cushions, books, boxes, tools, vessels, and so on.

Seyd (Seed). Pacha of the More'a, assassinated by Gulnare, his favourite concubine.—Byron, "The Corsair."

Sforza, the founder of the illustrious house which was so conspicuous in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was the son of a day-labourer. His name was Giacomuzzo Attendolo, and was changed to Sforza from the following incident:—Being desirous of going to the wars, he consulted his hatchet thus: he flung it against a tree, saying "If it sticks fast, I will go." It did stick fast, and he enlisted. It was because he threw it with such amazing force that he was called Sforza, the Italian for force.

Sforza (in "Jerusalem Delivered") of Lombardy. He, with his two brothers Achilles and Palamedüs, were in the squadron of adventurers in the allied Christian army.

Shack. A scamp. To shack or shackle is to tie a log to a horse, and send it out to feed on the stubble after harvest. A shack is either a beast so shackled, the right of sending a beast to the stubble, or the stubble itself. Applied to men, a shack is a jade, a stubble-feeder, one bearing the same ratio to a well-to-do man as a jade sent to graze on a common bears to a well-stalled horse. (Saxon, sceacul; Arabic, shakal, to tie the feet of a beast.)

Shad-u-Kam (Pleasure and Delight). The luxuriant province of the Perirealms, the capital of which is Juderabad (Jewel city).

Shaddock. A large kind of orange, so called from Captain Shaddock, who first transplanted one in the West Indies. It is a native of China and Japan.

Shades. Wine vaults. The Brighton Old Bank, in 1819, was turned by Mr. Savage into a smoking-room and gin-shop. There was an entrance to it by the Pavilion Shades, and Savage took down the word bank, and inserted instead the word shades. This term was not inappropriate, as the room was in reality shaded by the opposite house, occupied by Mrs. Fitzherbert.

Shadoff. A contrivance in Egypt for watering lands for the summer crops. It consists chiefly of long rods so suspended as to act as levers.

Shadow. A ghost. Macbeth says to the ghost of Banquo—

Hence, horrible shadow! unreal mockery, hence!
Shakespeare, "Macbeth," III. 4.

He would quarrel with his own shadow. He is so irritable that he would lose his temper on the merest trifle.

Gone to the bad for the shadow of an ass. Demosthenes says a young Athenian once hired an ass to Megara. The heat was so great and the road so exposed, that he alighted at midday to take shelter from the sun under the shadow of the poor beast. Scarcely was he seated when the owner passed by, and laid claim to the shadow, saying he let the ass to the traveller, but not the ass's shadow. After fighting for a time, they agreed to settle the matter in the law courts, and the suit lasted so long that both were ruined. "If you must quarrel, let it be for something better than the shadow of an ass."

May your shadow never be less. When students have made certain progress in the black arts, they are compelled to run through a subterranean hall, with the devil after them. If they run so fast that the devil can only catch their shadow or part of it, they become first-rate magicians, but lose either all or part of their shadow. Therefore the expression referred to above means, May you escape wholly and entirely from the clutches of the foul fiend.

A servant earnestly desireth the shadow (Job vii. 2)—the time of leaving off work. The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow, and if you ask a man what o'clock it is, he will go into the sun, stand erect, and fixing his eye where his shadow terminates, will measure its length with his feet; having done so he will tell you the hour correctly. A workman earnestly desires his shadow, which indicates the time of leaving off work. A person wanting to leave the field-work says, "How long my shadow is coming!" A wife will say to her husband, "Why did you not come sooner," and the man will answer, "I was obliged to wait for my shadow."

Shady. On the shady side of forty—the wrong side, meaning more than forty. As evening approaches the shadows lengthen, and as man advances towards the evening of life he approaches the shady side thereof. As the beauty of the day is gone when the sun declines, the word shady means inferior, bad, &c.; as, a shady character, one that will not bear the light; a shady transaction, &c.

Shafalus. So Bottom the Weaver, and Francis Flute the Bellows-mender, call Ceph'alus, the husband of Procris. Ceph'alus was very fond of hunting, and being greatly heated used to throw himself on the ground and call for Aura (wind). Procris, being informed of this, thought Aura was some rival mistress, and out of jealousy stole through the woods to catch her "faithless spouse" in the very act of infidelity. Cephalus heard a rustling, and thinking it to be occasioned by some wild boar about to spring on him, discharged a dart, and killed his jealous wife.

PYRAMUS. Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.

THISBE. As Shafalus to Procrus, I to you.

Shakespeare, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," v. 1.

Sha'fites (2 syl.). One of the four sects of the Sunnites or orthodox Moslems; so called from Al-Shafei, a descendant of Mahomet.

Shaft. I will make either a shaft or bolt of it. I will apply it to one use or another. The bolt was the cross-bow arrow, the shaft was the arrow of the long-bow.

Shafton (Sir Piercie). In this character Sir Walter Scott has made familiar to us the euphuisms of queen Elizabeth's age. The fashionable cavalier or pedantic fop, who assumes the high-flown style rendered fashionable by Lyly, was grandson of old Overstitch the tailor.—Sir Walter Scott, "Monastery."

Shag. Wet as a shag. A shag is a cormorant or sea-raven (Corvus marinus).

Shah-pour, the Great (Sapor II.). Surnamed Zu-lecaf (shoulder-breaker), because he dislocated the shoulders of all the Arabs taken in war. The Romans called him Posthumus, because he was born after the death of his father Hormuz II. He was crowned in the womb by the Magi placing the royal insignia on the body of his mother.

Shakes. No great shakes. Nothing extraordinary; no such mighty privilege, or bargain. The shake is the common or stubble, which poor men were by law empowered to use for their hogs, sheep, or cattle, between harvest and seed time; hence a privilege. It is quite a mistake to derive the word from the French chaque, or Persian shuck (a thing).

I'll do it in a brace of shakes—instantly, as soon as you can shake twice the dice-box.

Shake-down. Come and take a shake-down at my house—a bed. The allusion is to the time when men slept upon litter or clean straw.

Shakers. Certain aganists founded in North America by Ann Lee, called "Mother Ann," daughter of a poor blacksmith, born in Toad Lane (Todd Street), Manchester. She married a smith named Stanley, and had four children who died in infancy, after which she joined the sect of Jane Wardlaw, a tailoress, but was thrown into prison as a brawler. While there she said that Jesus Christ stood before her, and became one with her in form and spirit; and when she came out and told her story, six or seven persons joined her, and called her "the Lamb's bride." Soon after this she went to America and settled at Water Vliet, in New York. Other settlements were established in Hancock and Mount Lebanon.

The shakers never marry, form no earthly ties, believe in no future resurrection.—W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," vii. 12.

Shakespeare, usually called "Gentle Will."

His wife was Anne Hathaway, of Shottery, about eight years older than himself.

He had one son named Hamnet, who died in his twelfth year.

Ben Jonson said of him—"And though thou hadst small Latin and less Greek . . ."

Milton calls him "Sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child," and says he will go to the well-trod stage to hear him "warble his native wood-notes wild."—"L'Allegro," 133.

Akenside says he is "Alike the master of our smiles and tears."—Ode i.

Dryden says of him—"He was a man who of all modern, and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul."

Young says—"He wrote the play the Almighty made."—Epistle to Lord Lansdowne.

Mallett says—"Great above rule. . . . Nature was his own."—"Verbal Criticism."

Collins says he "joined Tuscan fancy to Athenian force."—Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer.

Pope says—

Shakespeare (whom you and every play-house bill Style "the divine," "the matchless," what you will)
For gain, not glory, winged his roving flight,
And grew immortal in his own despatch.

"Imitations of Horace," Ep. i.

The dedication of Shakespeare's Sonnets has provoked much controversy. It is as follows:—

TO THE ONLIE BEGETTER OF THESE INSUING SONNETS
MR. W. H. ALL HAPPINESSE
AND THAT ETERNITIE PROMISED

BY OUR EVER-LIVING POET
WISHETH

—that is, Mr. William Herbert [afterwards lord Pembroke] wisheth to [the earl of Southampton] the only begetter or instigator of these sonnets, that happiness and eternal life which [Shakespeare] the ever-living poet speaks of. The rider is—

THE WELL-WISHING ADVENTURER IN SETTING
FORTH T. T.

That is, Thomas Thorpe is the adventurer who speculates in their publication. (See Athenæum, Jan. 25, 1862.)

Shakespeare. There are six accredited signatures of this poet, five of which are attached to business documents, and one is entered in a book called "Floreo," a translation of Montaigne, published in 1603. A passage in act ii., s. 2, of "The Tempest" is traced directly to this translation, proving that the "Floreo" was possessed by Shakespeare before he wrote that play.

The Shakespeare of Divines. Jeremy Taylor. (1613-1667.)

The Shakespeare of Eloquence. So Barnave happily characterised the comte de Mirabeau. (1749-1791.)

Shaky. Not steady; not in good health; not strictly upright; not well prepared for examination. The allusion is to a table or chair out of order, and shaky.

Shalloon is the French ras de Chalons (the short-napped cloth manufactured at Chalons).

Shallow. A weak-minded country justice, intended as a caricature of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote. He is described as one who has been a mad-cap in his youth, and still dotes on his wild tricks; he is withal a liar, a block-head, and a rogue.—Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," and "2 Henry IV."

Shallum, the lover of Hilpa, is described by Addison to be "of a gentle disposition, beloved both by God and man." He was lord of a manor consisting of a long chain of rocks and mountains called Tirzah. (See HILPA.)

Shalott (Lady of). A poem by Tennyson, the tale of which is similar to that of Elaine the "fair maid of Astolat" (q.v.). Part I. describes the island of Shalott, and tells us that the lady passed her life so secluded there that only the farm-labourers knew her. Part II. tells us that the lady passed her time in weaving a magic web, and that a curse would light on her if she looked down the river towards Camelot. Part III. describes how Sir Lancelot, in all his bravery, rode to Camelot, and the lady looked at him as he rode along. Part IV. says that the lady entered a boat, having first written her name on the prow, and floated down the river to Camelot, but died on the way. When the boat reached Camelot, Sir Lancelot, with all the inmates of the palace, came to look at it. They read the name on the prow, and Sir Lancelot exclaimed, "She has a lovely face, and may God have mercy on the lady of Shalott!"

Shambles means benches (Saxon, scamel; Latin, scamnum); the benches on which meat is exposed for sale. Bank means precisely the same thing as shambles. (See BANK.)

Whatsoever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question.—1 Cor. x. 25.

Sham'rock, the symbol of Ireland, because it was selected by St. Patrick to prove to the Irish the doctrine of the Trinity. (Irish and Gaelic, seam-rag.)

Shamrock. According to the elder Pliny, no serpent will touch this plant.

Shan-dra-dan. A Scotch car; a corruption of the French char-en-dedans (an inside car—i.e., a car where the travellers sit vis-à-vis).

Shande'an Exactness. Sir Walter Scott says, "The author proceeds with the most unfeeling prolixity to give a minute detail of civil and common law, of the feudal institutions, of the architecture of churches and castles, of sculpture and painting, of minstrels, players, and parish clerks. . . Tristram can hardly be said to be fairly born, though his lip has already attained the size of half a volume." (See next page.)

With a Shandean exactness. . . . Lady Anne begins her memoirs of herself nine months before her nativity, for the sake of introducing a beautiful quotation from the Psalms.—"Biog. Borealis," p. 289.

Shandy. Captain Shandy is called Uncle Toby. He was wounded at the siege of Namur, and had retired from the service. He is benevolent and generous, simple as a child, brave as a lion, and gallant as a courtier. His modesty with Widow Wadman and his military tastes are admirable. He is said to be drawn from Sterne's father.—"Tristram Shandy,"

Mrs. Elizabeth Shandy, mother of Tristram. The beau-ideal of nonentity. Sir Walter Scott describes her as a "good lady of the poco-curante school."—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy."

Tristram Shandy. The hero of Sterne's novel so called.

Walter Shandy, Tristram's father. He is a metaphysical Don Quixote in his way, full of superstitious and idle conceits. He believes in long noses and propitious names, but his son's nose is crushed, and his name is Tristram instead of Trismegistus.—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy."

Shanks' Nag. To ride Shanks' nag is to go on foot, the shanks being the legs. A similar phrase is "Going by the marrow-bone stage."

Shanty. A log-hut; from the French chantier, a yard where logs of wood are piled for sale.

Shark. A swindler, a pilferer; one who snaps up things like a shark, which eats almost anything, and seems to care little whether its food is alive or dead, fish, flesh, or human bodies.

These thieves doe rob us with our owne good will,
And have dame Nature's warrant for it still;
Sometimes these sharks doe worke each other's wrack,
The ravening belly often robs the backe.

Taylor's "Workes," ii. 117.

The shark flies the feather. This is a sailor's proverb founded on observation. Though a shark is so voracious that it will swallow without distinction everything that drops from a ship into the sea, such as cordage, cloth, pitch, wood, and even knives, yet it will never touch a pilot-fish (q.v.) or a fowl, either alive or dead. It avoids sea-gulls, sea-mews, petrels, and every feathered thing.—St. Pierre, "Studies," i.

Sharp (Becky). The impersonation of intellect without virtue in Thackeray's "Vanity Fair." (See SEDLEY.)

Becky Sharp, with a baronet for a brother-in-law and an earl's daughter for a friend, felt the hollowness of human grandeur, and thought she was happier with the Bohemian artists in Soho.—The Express.

Sharp's the word. Look out, keep your eyes open and your wits about you. When a shopman suspects a customer, he will ask aloud of a brother shopman if "Mr. Sharp is come in;" and if his suspicion is confirmed will receive for answer, "No, but he is expected back immediately."—Hotten.

Sharp-beak. The Crow's wife in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Sharp-set. Hungry.

If anie were so sharpe-set as to eat fried flies, but-terd hees, stued snailles, either on Fridaie or Sundaie, he could not be therefore indicted of haulte treason.—Stanhurst, "Ireland," p. 19. (1589.)

Shaugeda'ya (North-American Indian). A coward.

Shave. To shave a customer. Hotten says, when a master-draper sees any one capable of being imposed upon enter his shop, he strokes his chin, to signify to his assistant that the customer may be shaved.

I shaved through; He was within a shave of a pluck. I just got through [my examination]; He was nearly rejected as not up to the mark. The allusion is to carpentry.

Shaveling. A lad, a young man. In the year 1343, the clergy died so fast of the Black Death, that youths were admitted to holy orders by being shaven. "William Bateman, bishop of Norwich, dispensed with sixty shavelings to hold rectories and other livings, that divine service might not cease in the parishes over which they were appointed."—Blomfield, "History of Norfolk," vol. iii.

Shaveling. A friar, a priest; so called because priests were "all shaven and shorn," and are still in the Roman Catholic Church.

Becket proclaimed to his shavelings immunity of condigne punishment even in a case of most wicked murdering.—Lambarde's Perambulation, p. 438. (1508.)

Shaving. Bondmen were commanded by the ancient Gauls to shave in token of servitude.

In the Turkish seraglio, the slaves are obliged to shave their chins in token of their servitude.

Shawonda'see (North-American Indian). Son of Mudjeekeewis, and king of the South-wind. He sends the wood-birds and robin, the swallow and wild-geese, the melon and tobacco, the grape and the maize. He is described as fat and lazy, listless and easy. He loved a prairie maiden, but was too lazy to woo her. The maiden proved to be the dandelion, and when winter came her head was covered with snow, and she was lost to the lazy Shawonda'see.—Longfellow, "Hiawatha."

She Stoops to Conquer. This comedy owes its existence to an incident which actually occurred to the author. When Goldsmith was sixteen years of age, a wag residing at Ardagh directed him, when passing through that village, to squire Fetherstone's house as the village inn. The mistake was not discovered for some time, and then no one enjoyed it more heartily than Oliver himself.

Shear Steel is steel fit for clothiers' shears. Scythes, penknives, razors, and other sharp cutting instruments are made of this steel.

Sheb-sezë. The great fire festival of the Persians, when they used to set fire to large bunches of dry combustibles, fastened round wild beasts and birds, which being then let loose, the air and earth appeared one great illumination. The terrified creatures naturally fled to the woods for shelter, and it is easy to conceive the conflagration they produced.—Richardson, "Dissertation."

She'ba (Queen of). Her name, according to the Koran, was Balkis.

Sheb'diz. The Persian Bucephalus (q.v.), the favourite charger of Khosru Parviz, generally called Chosroes II. of Persia. (590-628.)

Shechi'nah (shackan, to reside). The glory of the Divine presence in the shape of a cloud of fire, which rested on the mercy-seat (Lev. xvi. 2).

Shedad made the delicious gardens of Irim, in imitation of Paradise, and was destroyed by lightning the first time he attempted to enter them.

Sheep. Ram or tup, the sire; ewe, the dam; lamb, the new-born sheep till it is weaned, when it is called a hogget; the tup-lamb being a "tup-hogget," and the ewe-lamb a "ewe-hogget;" if the tup is castrated it is called a wether-hogget.

After the removal of the first fleece, the tup-hogget becomes a shearling, the ewe-hogget a grimmer, and the wether-hogget a dinmont (hence the name "Dandy Dinmont").

After the removal of the second fleece, the shearling becomes a two-shear tup, the grimmer a ewe, and the dinmont a wether.

After the removal of the third fleece, the ewe is called a twinter-ewe; and when it ceases to breed, a draft-ewe.

Sheep. Don Quixote saw the dust of two flocks of sheep coming in opposite directions towards him, and told Sancho they were two armies—one commanded by the emperor Alifanfaron, sovereign of the island of Trapoban; and the other by the king of the Garamanteans, named "Pentapolin with the naked arm." Alifanfaron was in love with Pentapolin's daughter, but the royal father refused to sanction the alliance unless the emperor renounced his faith in Mahomet, and this caused a deadly feud between them. The mad knight rushed on the flock "led by Alifanfaron," killing seven of the sheep, but was stunned by stones thrown at him by the shepherds. When Sancho told his master that the two armies were two flocks of sheep, the knight replied that the enchanter Freston had metamorphosed "the two grand armies" in order to show his malice.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. iii., ch. 5.

The Black Sheep (Kârâ-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia, that lasted 108 years (1360-1468); so called from the device of their standard.

The White Sheep (Ak-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia, &c., on the ruin of the Black Sheep (1468-1503); so called from the device of their standard.

To cast a sheep's eye at one is to look askance like a sheep at a person to whom you feel lovingly inclined (transversus tuentibus hircis.—Virgil).

But he, the beast, was casting sheep's eyes at her.
Colman, "Broad Grins."

Sheets, Shoots or Shots. A Kentish word for pigs between the age of six and ten months.

Sheet Anchor. That is my sheet anchor—my chief stay, my chief dependence. The sheet anchor is the largest and heaviest of all. The word is a corruption of Shote-anchor, the anchor shot or thrown out in stress of weather.

The surgeon no longer bleeds. If you ask him "why this neglect of what was once considered the sheet anchor of practice in certain diseases," he will . . . — The Times.

Sheik (Arabic, elder). A title of respect equal to the Italian signore, the French sieur, Spanish señor, &c.

Sheldo'nian Theatre. The "Senate House" of Oxford; so called from Gilbert Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury, who built it. (1598-1699.)

Shelf. Laid on the shelf or shelved. A government officer no longer actively employed; an actor no longer assigned a part; a young lady past the ordinary age of marriage; a pawn at the broker's; a question started and set aside. All mean laid up and put away.

Shell out. Out with your shells or money; in allusion to the Cypræa moneta or cowries (univalve shells), used in Southern Asia and on the coast of Guinea in Africa. In the Philippine Islands other shells are also used for coins.

Shemitic. Pertaining to Shem, descendant of Shem, derived from Shem.

The Shemitic Languages are Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Hebrew, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and old Phœnician.

Shemitic Nations or Shemites (2 syl.). The Assyrians, Chaldeans or Babylo-nians, Syrians, Phœnicians, Hebrews, Arabs, and Ethiopians.

Shepherd (Jack). Son of a carpenter in Smithfield, noted for his two escapes from Newgate in 1724. He was hanged at Tyburn the same year. (1701-1724.)

The Shepherd. Moses who fed the flocks of Jethro, his father-in-law.

Sing, heavenly muse, that on the secret top
Of Oreb or of Sinai didst inspire
That shepherd, who first taught the chosen seed
In the beginning how the heavens and earth
Rose out of chaos.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

N.B.—Oreb or Horeb and Sinai are two heights of one mountain.

The Shepherd Kings or Hyksos. Some 2,000 years B.C., a tribe of Arabian shepherds established themselves in Lower Egypt, and were governed by their own chiefs. Manetho says "They reigned 511 years;" Eratosthenes says 470 years;

Africanus, 284 years; Eusebius, 103 years. Some say they extended over five dynasties, some over three, some limit their sway to one; some give the name of only one monarch, some of four, and others of six. Bunsen places them B.C. 1639; Lepsius, B.C. 1842; others, 1900 or 2000. If there ever were such kings, they were driven into Syria by the rulers of Upper Egypt. (Hyk, ruler; shos, shepherd.)

The Shepherd Lord. Henry, the tenth lord Clifford, sent by his mother to be brought up by a shepherd, in order to save him from the fury of the Yorkists. At the accession of Henry VII. he was restored to all his rights and seigniories. (Died 1523.)

The Shepherd's Sun-dial. The scarlet pimpernel, which opens at a little past seven in the morning, and closes at a little past two. When rain is at hand, or the weather is unfavourable, it does not open at all.

The Shepherd of Banbury. The ostensible author of a Weather Guide. He styles himself John Claridge, Shepherd, but the real author is said to be Dr. John Campbell. (First published in 1744.)

The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain. Said to be David Saunders, noted for his homely wisdom and practical piety. Mrs. Hannah More wrote the religious tract so entitled, and makes the hero a Christian Arcadian.

Shepherd of the Ocean. So Sir Walter Raleigh is called by Spenser, in his poem entitled "Colin Clout's come Home again." (1552-1618.)

She'va, in the satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir Roger Lestranger.

Sheva. The benevolent Jew in Cumberland's comedy of "The Jew." This drama was written to disabuse the public mind of unjust prejudices against a people who have been so long "scattered and peeled," and a very handsome purse was collected by the Jews of England, and presented to the dramatist as an acknowledgment of his championship. Sheva, however, can never hold its own against the Shylock of Will Shakespeare.

Shewri-while. A spirit-woman that haunts Mynydd Llanhilleth mountain in Monmouthshire, to mislead those who attempt to cross it.

Shib'boleth. The pass-word of a secret society; the secret by which those of a party know each other. The Ephraimites quarrelled with Jephthah, and Jephthah gathered together the men of Gilead and fought with Ephraim. There were many fugitives, and when they tried to pass the Jordan the guard told them to say Shibboleth, which the Ephraimites pronounced Sibboleth, and by this test it was ascertained whether the person wishing to cross the river was a friend or foe (Judges xii. 1-6).

Their foes a deadly Shibboleth devise.
Dryden, "Hind and Panther," pt. iii.

Shield. "Cairbar rises in his arms, The clang of shields is heard." When a chief doomed a man to death, he struck his shield with the blunt end of his spear, by way of notice to the royal bard to begin the death-song.—Ossian, "Temora," i. (See E'GIS.)

Shield-of-Arms. Same as Coat of Arms; so called because persons in the middle ages bore their heraldic devices on their shields.

Shi'ites (Arabic, shiah, a sect). A Persian sect formed in opposition to the Sunnites, or orthodox Moslems (A.D. 644).

Shilling. Said to be derived from St. Kildan, whose image was stamped on the "shillings" of Würzburg. Of course this etymology is of no philological value.

Shilly Shally. A corruption of "Will I, shall I," or "Shall I, shall I."

There's no delay, they ne're stand shall I, shall I,
Hermog'eneüs with Dal'hia doth dally.
Taylor's "Workes," iii. 3. (1630.)

Shim'ei (2 syl.), in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," is designed for Bethel, the lord mayor.

Shimei, whose youth did early promise bring,
Of zeal to God and hatred to his king;
Did wisely from expensive sins refrain,
And never broke the Sabbath but for gain.

Shi'nar. The land of the Chaldees, Baby'lonia.

Shine or Shindy. A row, a disturbance. Probably from the game of shindy or shinney, much the same as bandy, hockey, or knurspell, all of which are played with a knobbed stick, and a knur or wooden ball.

Shin'gebis, in North-American Indian mythology, is a diver who dared the North-Wind to single combat. The Indian Boreas rated him for staying in his dominions after he had routed away the flowers, and driven off the sea-gulls and herons. Shin'gebis laughed at him, and the North-Wind went at night and tried to blow down his hut and put out his fire. As he could not do this, he defied the diver to come forth and wrestle with him. Shin'gebis obeyed the summons, and sent the blusterer howling to his home.—Longfellow, "Hiawatha." (See KABIBONOKKA.)

Ship, as the device of Paris. Sauval says, "L'île de la cité est faite comme un grand navire enfoncé dans la vase, et échoué au fil de l'eau vers le milieu de la Seine." This form of a ship struck the heraldic scribes, who, in the latter half of the middle ages, emblazoned it in the shield of the city.

Ship. According to French tradition, on June 1st, 1794, the French fleet, under admiral Villaret Joyeuse, engaged the English Channel fleet, commanded by lord Howe. The Vengeur commanded by Cambronne, in action with the Brunswick commanded by captain Harvey, went down, and while so doing Cambronne and the crew shouted, Vive la République! This is a mere myth, first given in the French convention. The ship, no doubt, was sunk, but the crew went down crying for help, which was readily given by their British enemies.

Ship of the Desert. The camel. A desert is a sea of sand, and a camel is peculiarly qualified to encounter a journey through it.

Ships of the Line. Men-of-war large enough to have a place in a line of battle. They must not have less than two decks, or two complete tiers of guns.

Ship-shape. As methodically arranged as things in a ship, in good order. We use the word shape for order in many phrases: thus, when a house is in great disorder we say, We must put it into shape. When we move into a new house we say, We must get it a little bit into shape before we can receive our friends. As everything on board ship is in "apple-pie" order, we use the word ship-shape to signify "to rights."

Shipton. (See MOTHER.)

Shire and County. When the Saxon kings created an earl, they gave him a shire or division of land to govern. At the Norman conquest the word count superseded the title of earl, and the earldom was called a county. Even to the present hour we call the wife of an earl a countess. (Saxon, scire, from sciran, to divide.)

He comes from the shires; has a seat in the shires; &c.—in those English counties which terminate in “shire:” a belt running from Devonshire and Hampshire in a north-east direction. In a general way it means the midland counties.

* * Anglesey in Wales, and twelve counties of England, do not terminate in “shire.”

Shirt. (See NESSUS.)

Shirt for ensign. When Sultan Saladin died, he commanded that no ceremony should be used but this: A priest was to carry his shirt on a lance, and say “Saladin, the conqueror of the East, carries nothing with him of all his wealth and greatness, save a shirt for his shroud and ensign.—Knolles, “Turkish History.”

Close sits my shirt, but closer my skin—i.e., My property is dear to me, but dearer my life; my belongings sit close to my heart, but “ego proximus mihi.”

Shivering Mountain. Mam Tor, a hill on the peak of Derbyshire; so called from the waste of its mass by “shivering”—that is, breaking away in “shivers” or small pieces. This shivering has been going on for ages, as the hill consists of alternate layers of shale and gritstone. The former, being soft, is easily reduced to powder, and as it crumbles away small “shivers” of the gritstone break away from want of support.

Shoddy properly means the flue and fluff thrown off from cloth in the process of weaving. This flue being mixed with new wool is woven into a cloth called shoddy—i.e., cloth made of the flue “shod” or thrown off. Shoddy is also made of old garments torn up and re-spun. The term is used for any loose sieazy cloth, and metaphorically for literature of an inferior character compiled from other works. (Shed, provincial pret. “shod;” shoot, obsolete pret. shotten.)

Shoddy characters. Persons of tarnished reputation, like cloth made of shoddy or refuse wool.

Shoe. (See CHOPINE.)

Shoe. It is thought unlucky to put on the left shoe before the right, or to put either shoe on the wrong foot. It is said that Augustus Cæsar was nearly assassinated by a mutiny one day when he put on his left shoe first.

Auguste, cet empereur qui gouverna avec tant de sagesse, et dont le règne fut si florissant, restoit immobile et consterné lorsqu'il lui arrivoit par mégarde de mettre le soulier droit au pied gauche, et le soulier gauche au pied droit.—St. Foix.

Put on the right shoe first. One of the auditions of Pythagoras was this: “When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot; but when about to step into a bath, let your left foot enter first.” Jamblichus says the hidden meaning is that worthy actions should be done heartily, but base ones should be avoided!—“Protrepics” (symbol xii.).

A man without shoes. An unnatural kinsman, a selfish prodigal (Hebrew). If a man refused to marry his brother's widow, the woman pulled off his shoe in the presence of the elders, spat in his face, and called him “shoe-loosed” (Deut. xxv. 9).

Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy (Josh. v. 15). Loosing the shoe is a mark of respect in the East, among Moslems and Hindus, to the present hour. The Mussulman leaves his slippers at the door of the mosque. The Mahometan moonshee comes bare-footed into the presence of his superiors. The governor of a town, in making a visit of ceremony to a European visitor, leaves his slippers at the tent-entrance, as a mark of respect. There are two reasons for this custom: (1) It is a mark of humility, the shoe being a sign of dignity and the shoeless foot a mark of servitude. (2) Leather, being held to be an unclean thing, would contaminate the sacred floor and offend the insulted idol. (See SANDAL.)

Plucking off the shoe among the Jews, smoking a pipe together among the Indians, thumb-licking among the Scotch, breaking a straw together among the Teutons, and shaking hands among the English, are all ceremonies to confirm a bargain, now done by “earnest money.”

No one knows where the shoe pinches like the wearer. This was said by a Roman sage who was blamed for divorcing his wife, with whom he seemed to live happily.

For, God it wot, he sat ful still and song,
When that his scho ful bitterly him wrong.
Chaucer, “Canterbury Tales,” 6, 671.

Over shoes, over boots. In for a penny, in for a pound.

Where true courage roots,
The proverb says, "once over shoes, o'er boots."
Taylor's "Works," ii. 145 (1630).

To shoe the cobbler. To give a quick peculiar movement with the front foot in sliding.

To shoe the horse (French, ferrer la mule) means to cheat one's employer out of a small sum of money. The expression is derived from the ancient practice of grooms, who charged their masters for "shoeing," but pocketed the money themselves.

To stand in another man's shoes. To occupy the place or lay claim to the honours of another. Among the ancient Northmen, when a man adopted a son, the person adopted put on the shoes of the adopter.—Brayley, "Graphic Illustrator," (1834.)

In the tale of "Reynard the Fox" (14th century), Master Reynard having turned the tables on Sir Bruin the Bear, asked the queen to let him have the shoes of the disgraced minister; so Bruin's shoes were torn off and put upon Reynard, the new favourite.

Looking for dead men's shoes. Counting on some advantage to which you will succeed when the present possessor is dead.

Waiting for my shoes. Hoping for my death. Amongst the ancient Jews the transfer of an inheritance was made by the new party pulling off the shoe of the possessor. (See Ruth iv. 7.)

Throwing the wedding-shoe. It has long been a custom in England, Scotland, and elsewhere, to throw an old shoe, or several shoes, at the bride and bridegroom when they quit the bride's home, after the wedding breakfast, or when they go to church to get married. Some think this represents an assault, and refers to the ancient notion that the bridegroom carried off the bride with force and violence. Others look upon it as a relic of the ancient law of exchange, implying that the parents of the bride give up henceforth all right of dominion to their daughter. This was a Jewish custom; thus in Deut. xxv. 5-10, we read that the widow refused by the surviving brother asserted her independence by "loosing his shoe;" and in the story of Ruth we are told "that it was the custom" in exchange to deliver a shoe in token of renunciation. When Boaz, therefore, became possessed of his brother's slot, the family of Ruth indicated their assent by giving him a shoe. When the emperor Wladimir proposed marriage to the daughter of Ragnald, she rejected him saying, "I will not take off my shoe to the son of a slave." Luther being at a wedding, told the bridegroom that he had placed the husband's shoe on the head of the bed, "afin qu'il prit ainsi la domination et le gouvernement."—Michel, "Life of Luther."

Throwing an old shoe. When the Princess Helena was married in 1866, several old shoes were thrown at the bridal party as they drove off.

In Germany it was formerly usual for the bride to take off her shoe and throw it amongst the bridal party, and whoever caught it was the next to be married. (See above.)

Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear (Matt. iii. 11). This means "I am not worthy to be his humblest slave." It was the business of a slave recently purchased to loose and carry his master's sandals.—Jahn, "Archæologica Biblica."

Shoeing the wild colt. Exacting a fine called "footing" from a new-comer, who is called the "colt." Of course, the play is between the words "shoeing" and "footing" (q.v.). Colt is a common synonym for a green-horn, or a youth not broken in. Thus Shakespeare says—"Ay, that's a colt indeed, for he doth nothing but talk of his horse."—"Merchant of Venice," i. 2.

Shoemakers. The patron saints of shoemakers are St. Crispin and his brother Crispian, who supported themselves by making shoes while they preached to the people of Gaul and Britain. In compliment to these saints the trade of shoemaking is called "the gentle craft."

Shoo-king. The history of the Chinese monarchs, by Confucius. It begins with Yoo, B.C. 2205.

Shooting Stars, called in ancient legends the "fiery tears of St. Lawrence," because one of the periodic swarms of these meteors is between the 9th and 14th of August, about the time of St. Lawrence's festival, which is on the 10th.

Shooting Stars are said by the Arabs to be firebrands hurled by the angels against the inquisitive Ginnns or Genii, who are for ever clambering up on the constellations to peep into heaven.

Shop. To talk shop. To talk about one's affairs or business, to illustrate by one's business, as when Ollipod the apothecary talks of a uniform with rhu-barb-coloured facings.

Shop-lifting is stealing from shops. Dekker speaks of the lifting-law—i.e., the law against theft. (Gothic, hlifan, to steal; hliftus, a thief; Spanish, levar, to carry off.)

Shore (Jane). Sir Thomas More says, "She was well-born, honestly brought up, and married somewhat too soon to a wealthy yeoman." The tragedy of "Jane Shore" is by Nicholas Rowe.

Shoreditch, according to tradition, is so called from Jane Shore, who, it is said, died there in a ditch. This tale comes from a ballad in Pepys' collection; but the truth is, it receives its name from Sir John de Soerdich, lord of the manor in the reign of Edward III.

I could not get one bit of bread
Whereby my hunger might be fed....
So weary of my life, at length
I yielded up my vital strength
Within a ditch....which since that day
Is Shoreditch called, as writers say.

Duke of Shoreditch. The most successful of the London archers received this playful title.

Good king, make not good lord of Lincoln duke of Shoreditch!—"The Poore Man's Petition to the King." (1603.)

Shorne (Sir John) or Master John Shorne, well known for his feat of conjuring the devil into a boot. He was one of the uncanonised saints, and was prayed to in cases of ague. It seems that he was a devout man, and rector of North Marston, in Buckinghamshire, at the close of the thirteenth century. He blessed a well which became the resort of multitudes, and brought in a yearly revenue of some £500.

To Maister John Shorne, that blessed man borne,
For the ague to him we apply. [rote
Which jureleth with a bote; I beschrewe his lierte
That will trust him, and it be I.

"Fantassie of Idolatrie."

Shot. Hand out your shot or Down with your shot—your reckoning or quota, your money. (Saxon, scetal; Danish, schot.) See SCOT AND LOT.

As the fund of our pleasure, let us each pay his shot.
Ben Jonson.

He shot wide of the mark. He was all together in error. The allusion is to shooting at the mark or bull's-eye in archery, but will now apply to our modern rifle practice.

Shot-over (Oxfordshire). A corruption of château vert (the verdant country-house).

Shotten-herring. A lean spiritless creature, a Jack-o'-Lent, like a herring that has shot or ejected its spawn. Herrings gutted and dried are so called also.

Though they like shotten-herrings are to see,
Yet such tall souldiers of their teeth they be
That two of them, like greedy cormorants,
Devour more then sixe honest protestants.

"Taylor's Workes," iii. 5.

Should he Upbraid. A song, words adapted from Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," act ii., sc. 1 (Petruchio), music by Bishop.

Shoulder. Showing the cold shoulder. Receiving without cordiality some one who was once on better terms with you. (See COLD.)

The government shall be upon his shoulders (Isaiah ix. 6). The allusion is to the key slung on the shoulder of Jewish stewards on public occasions, and as a key is emblematic of government and power, the metaphor is very striking.

Show-Bread. Food for show only, and not intended to be eaten except by certain privileged persons. The term is Jewish, and refers to the twelve loaves which the priest "showed" or exhibited to Jehovah, by placing them week by week on the sanctuary table. At the end of the week, the priest who had been in office was allowed to take them home for his own eating; but no one else was allowed to partake of them.

Shrew-Mouse. The field mouse. It was supposed to have the power of bewitching; and to provide a remedy our forefathers used to plunge the creature into a hole made in an ash-tree, any branch of which would cure the mischief done by the mouse. (Teutonic, beschreyen, to bewitch.)

Shrimp. A child, a puny little fellow, in the same ratio to a man as a shrimp to any ordinary fish. Fry is also used for children. (Danish skrumper, to shrink; Dutch, krimpen; German, schrumpfer.)

It cannot be this weak and writhled shrimp
Would strike such terror to his enemies.

Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI.," ii. 3.

Shropshire. A contraction of Shrewesbury-shire, the Saxon Scrobbesbyrig (shrub-borough), corrupted by the Normans into Sloppes-burie, whence our Salop.

Shufflebottom (Abel). A nom de plume of Robert Southey. (1774-1843.)

Shuh-shuh-gah (North-American Indian). The blue heron.

Shunamites' House (The). An inn kept for the entertainment of the preachers at Paul's Cross. These preachers were invited by the bishop, and were entertained by the corporation of London from Thursday before the day of preaching, to the following Thursday morning.—Maitland, "London," ii., p. 949.

Shunt. A contraction of shun it; a railway term.

Shy. To have a shy at anything. To fling at it, to try and shoot it. (Saxon, scy, a contraction of scytan, to shoot; German, schieszen, &c.)

Shylock. The grasping Jew, who "would kill the thing he hates."—Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice."

"Paul Secchi, a merchant of Venice, heard, by a private letter, that Drake had taken and plundered St. Domingo, and sent to inform Sampson Ceneda, a Jew usurer. The Jew discredited the rumour, and bet a pound of flesh it was false. Secchi wagered 1,000 crowns it was true. The news was confirmed, and the Pope told Secchi he was at liberty to claim his bet, but that he must take neither more nor less than a pound on pain of being hanged."—Gregory Leti, "Life of Sextus V."

 Shakespeare reverses the order, and makes the Jew usurer demand the pound of flesh from the merchant.

Si Quis. A notice to all whom it may concern, given in the parish church before ordination, that a resident means to offer himself as a candidate for holy orders; and SI QUIS—i.e., if any one knows any just cause or impediment thereto, he is to declare the same to the bishop.

Siamese Twins. Yoke-fellows, inseparables; so called from two youths (Eng and Chang), born of Chinese parents in Siam, in 1811. Their bodies are united by a band of flesh, stretching from breast-bone to breast-bone. They married two sisters and have offspring. They are still alive (1870).

Siamese Twins. The Biddenham Maids, born 1100, had distinct bodies, but were joined by the hips and shoulders. They lived to be thirty-four years of age.

Sib'beridge (3 syl.). Banns of marriage. (Saxon sibbe, alliance; whence the old English word sibrede, relationship, kindred.) See GOSSIP.

For every man it schuldē drede
And namēliche in his sibrede.
Gower, "Confessio Amantis."

Sibyls. Martian Capella says there were but two, the Erythræan and the Phrygian; the former being the famous "Cumæan Sibyl." Jackson in his "Chronologic Antiquities," maintains, on the authority of Ælian, that there were four—the Erythræan, the Samian, the Egyptian, and the Sardian. The usual number given is ten, and their places of abode—Libya, Samos, Cumæ in Italy, Cumæ in Asia Minor, Erythræa, Persia, Tiburtis, Delphi, Ancy'ra in Phrygia, and Marpessa.

How know we but that she may be an eleventh Sibyl or a second Cassandra?—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," iii. 16.

Sibyls. The Mediæval monks reckoned twelve Sibyls, and gave to each a separate prophecy and distinct emblem:—

(1) The Lib'yan Sibyl: "The day shall come when men shall see the King of all living things."—Emblem, a lighted taper.

(2) The Sa'mian Sibyl: "The Rich One shall be born of a pure virgin."—Emblem, a rose.

(3) Sibylla Cumæ'na: "Jesus Christ shall come from heaven, and live and reign in poverty on earth."—Emblem, a crown.

(4) Sibylla Cu'mæ: "God shall be born of a pure virgin, and hold converse with sinners."—Emblem, a cradle.

(5) Sibylla Erythræa: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour."—Emblem, a horn.

(6) The Persian Sibyl: "Satan shall be overcome by a true Prophet."—Emblem, a dragon under the Sibyl's feet, and a lantern.

(7) The Tiburtine Sibyl: "The Highest shall descend from heaven, and a virgin be shown in the valleys of the deserts."—Emblem, a dove.

(8) The Delphic Sibyl: "The Prophet born of the virgin shall be crowned with thorns."—Emblem, a crown of thorns.

(9) The Phrygian Sibyl: "Our Lord shall rise again."—Emblem, a banner and a cross.

(10) The European Sibyl: "A virgin and her Son shall flee into Egypt."—Emblem, a sword.

(11) Sibylla Agrippina: "Jesus Christ shall be outraged and scourged."—Emblem, a whip.

(12) The Hellespontic Sibyl: "Jesus Christ shall suffer shame upon the cross."—Emblem, a T cross.

This list of prophecies is of the sixteenth century, and is manifestly a clumsy forgery or mere monkish legend. (See below, SIBYLLINE VERSES.)

The most famous of the ten Sibyls was Amalthæa, of Cumæ in Æolia, who offered her nine books to Tarquin the Proud. The offer being rejected, she burnt three of them; and after the lapse of twelve months, offered the remaining six at the same price. Again being refused she burnt three more, and after a similar interval asked the same price for the remaining three. The sum demanded was now given, and Amalthæa never made her appearance again.—Livy.

Sibyl. The Cumæan sibyl was the conductor of Virgil to the infernal regions—"Æneid," vi.

Sibyl. A fortune-teller.

How they will fare it needs a sibyl to say.—The Times.

Sibylline Books. The three surviving books of the Sibyl Amalthæa were preserved in a stone chest underground in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and committed to the charge of custodians chosen in the same manner as the high priests. The number of custodians was at first two, then ten, and ultimately fifteen. The books were destroyed by fire when the Capitol was burnt (A.D. 670).

Sibylline Books. A collection of poetical utterances in Greek, made of Jewish, Pagan, and Christian sibyllists, and compiled in the second century (138-167). It is in eight books, relates to Jesus Christ, and is entitled "Oracula Sibyllina."

Sibylline Verses. When the Sibylline books were destroyed (see above), all the floating verses of the several Sibyls were carefully collected and deposited in the new temple of Jupiter. Augustus had some 2,000 of these verses destroyed as spurious, and placed the rest in two gilt cases, under the base of the statue of Apollo, in the temple on the Palatine hill; but the whole perished when the city was burnt in the reign of Nero. See Sibyls (of the Mediæval monks).

Sibylline leaves. The Sibylline prophecies were written in Greek, upon palm-leaves.—Varro.

Sice (1 syl.). A sizing, an allowance of bread and butter. "He'll print for a sice." In the university of Cambridge, the men call the pound loaf, two inches of butter, and pot of milk allowed for breakfast, their "sizings;" and when one student breakfasts with another in the same college, the bed-maker carries his sizings to the rooms of the entertainer. (See SIZINGS.)

Sich. A gutter, a small runnel (old Latin, sichetum).

Sicilian Vespers. The massacre of the French in Sicily, which began at the hour of vespers, on Easter Monday, in 1282.

Sick Man (The). So Nicholas of Russia called the Ottoman empire, which has been declining ever since 1586.

I repeat to you that the sick man is dying; and we must never allow such an event to take us by surprise.—Annual Register, 1853.

Siddons (Mrs.). Sydney Smith says it was never without awe that he saw this tragedy queen stab the potatoes; and Sir Walter Scott tells us, while she was staying at Abbotsford he heard her declaim to the footman, "I asked for water, boy! you've brought me beer."

Sidney (Algernon), called by Thomson "the British Cassius." Caius Cassius, called by Brutus "the last of the Romans," was both brave and learned. Of both it may be said with equal propriety—

Of high determined spirit, roughly brave,
By ancient learning to the enlightened love
Of ancient freedom warmed.

Thomson, "Summer."

Sidney (Sir Philip). The academy figure of prince Arthur, in Spenser's "Faery Queen," and the poet's type of magnanimity.

Sir Philip Sidney, called by Sir Walter Raleigh The English Petrarch, was the author of "Arca'dia." Queen Elizabeth called him The jewel of her dominions; and Thomson, in his "Summer," The plume of war. The poet refers to the battle of Zutphen, where Sir Philip received his death-wound. Being thirsty, a soldier brought him some water; but as he was about to drink, he observed a wounded man eye the bottle with longing looks. Sir Philip gave the water to the wounded man, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine." Spenser laments his loss in the poem called "Astrophel" (q.v.).

Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother. Mary Herbert (née Sidney), countess of Pembroke, poetess, &c. (Died 1621.) The line is by Dryden.

Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge, founded by lady Frances Sidney, countess of Sussex, in 1598.

Sidrophel meant for Sir Paul Neal, member of the Royal Society, who proved to his own satisfaction that Samuel Butler was not the author of "Hudibras." Butler satirises him in his "Heroical Epistle of Hudibras to Sidrophel."

N.B. In the poem "Hudibras," William Lilly, "the cunning man that dealt in destiny's dark counsel," is called Sidrophel. (See pt. ii. 3.)

Siegfried (2 syl.). Hero of the first part of the "Nibelungen-Lied." He was the youngest son of Siegmund and Sieglind, king and queen of the Netherlands, and was born in Rhinecastle called Xanton. He married Kriemhild, princess of Burgundy, and sister of Günther. Günther craved his assistance in carrying off Brunhild from Issland, and Siegfried succeeding by taking away her talisman by main force. This excited the jealousy of Günther, who induced Hagan, the Dane, to murder Siegfried. Hagan struck him with a sword in the only vulnerable part (between the shoulder-blades), while he stooped to quench his thirst at a fountain.—"Nibelungen-Lied."

Horny Siegfried. So called because when he slew the dragon he bathed in its blood, and became covered all over with a horny hide which was invulnerable, except in one spot between the shoulders, where a linden-leaf stuck.—"Nibelungen-Lied," st. 100.

Siegfried's cloak of invisibility, called "tarukappe" (tarnen, to conceal; kappē, a cloak). It not only made the wearer invisible, but also gave him the strength of twelve men. (Tarukappe, 2 syl.)

The mighty dwarf successful strove with the mightier man;
Like to wild mountain lions to the hollow hill they ran;
He ravished there the tarnkappe from struggling Albric's hold,
And then became the master of the hoarded gems and gold.
Letsom's "Fall of the Nibelungers," Lied iii.

Sieglind (2 syl.). Mother of Siegfried, and queen of the Netherlands.—"The Nibelungen-Lied."

Sien'na (3 syl.). The paint so called is made of terra di Sienna.

Sier'ra (3 syl., Spanish, a saw). A mountain whose top is indented like a saw, a range of mountains whose tops form a saw-like appearance, a line of craggy rocks; as Sierra More'na (where many of the incidents in "Don Quixote" are laid), Sierra Neva'da (the snowy range), Sierra Leo'nē (in West Africa, where lions abound), &c.

Siesta (3 syl.) means "the sixth hour,"—i.e., noon. (Latin, sexta hora.) It is applied to the short sleep taken in Spain during the mid-day heat.

Sif. Wife of Thor, famous for the beauty of her hair. Loki, having cut it off while she was asleep, obtained from the dwarfs a new fell of golden hair equal to that which he had taken.

Sig'ero (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), called the Good. Argantès hurled a spear at Godfrey; it missed its aim, but killed Sig'ero, who "rejoiced to suffer for his sovereign."—Bk. xi.

Sight for "multitude" is not an Americanism, but good old English. Thus in "Morte d'Arthur" the word is not unfrequently so employed; and the high-born dame Juliana Berners, lady prioress in the fifteenth century of Sopwell nunnery, speaks of a bomynable syght of monkes (a large number of friars). A corruption of the Anglo-Saxon swið or swiðh, a large quantity; adverb, swiðe, very much.

Where is so huge a syght of mony?—Palsgrave, "Acolastus" (1540).

Sigismun'da. Daughter of Tancred, prince of Salerno, who falls in love with Guiscardo, a page. Tancred put the page to death, and sent his heart in a golden cup to his daughter.—Boccaccio, "Decamerone" (Dryden's version).

Signs instead of words. John, a monk, gives in his Life of St. Odo a number of signs for bread, tart, beans, eggs, fish, cheese, honey, milk, cherries, onions, and so on. (See "Sussex Archaeological Collection," vol. iii., p. 190.)

Significavit. A writ of Chancery given by the ordinary to keep an excommunicate in prison till he submitted to the authority of the Church. The writ, which is now obsolete, used to begin with "Significavit nobis venerabilis pater," &c. Chaucer says of his Sompnour—

And also ware him of a "significavit."

"Canterbury Tales" (Prologue), 661.

Sign your Name. It is not correct to say that the expression "signing one's name" points to the time when persons could not write. No doubt persons who could not write made their mark in olden times as they do now, but we find over and over again in ancient documents these words: "This [grant] is signed with the sign of the cross for its greater assurance (or) greater inviolability," and after the sign follows the name of the donor. (See Rymer's "Foedera," vol. i., pt. 1.)

Signu'a. Wife of Loki. She nurses him in his cavern, but sometimes, as she carries off the poison which the serpents gorge, a portion drops on the god, and his writhings cause earthquakes.—Scandinavian mythology.

Sigurd. The Norse Siegfried (q.v.). He falls in love with Brynhild, but under the influence of a love-potion marries Gudrun, a union which brings about a volume of mischief.

Sigurd the Horny. A German romance based on a legend in the Sagas. An analysis of this legend is published by Weber in his "Illustrations of Northern Antiquities." See SIEGFRIED (horny).

Siian'kos. The sea-horn, common in India, Africa, and the Mediterranean, for giving alarm.—Pennant.

High in view

A ponderous sea-horn hung.

T. Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

Sikes (Bill). A ruffian housebreaker of the lowest grade, in "Oliver Twist," by Charles Dickens.

Sikh. A corruption of the Sanskrit sis'ya (disciple). The Sikhs were originally a religious body like the Mahomutans, but in 1764 they formally assumed national independence. Since 1846 the Sikhs have been ruled by the English.

Silbury, near Marlborough. An artificial mound, 130 feet high, and covering seven acres of ground. Some say it is where "King Sel" was buried; others that it is a corruption of Solis-bury (mound of the sun); others that it is Sel-barrow (great tumulus), in honour of some ancient prince of Britain. The Rev. A. C. Smith is of opinion that it was erected by the Celts about B.C. 1600. There is a natural hill in the same vicinity, called St. Martin's Sell or Sill, in which case sill or sell means seat or throne. These etymologies of Silbury must rest on the authority of those who have suggested them.

Sil'chester (Berks) is Silicis castrum (flint camp), a Saxon-Latin form of the Roman Calleva or Gallewa. Gallewa is the Roman form of the British Gwal Vaur (great wall), so called from its wall, the ruins of which are still striking. Leland says, "On that wall grow some oaks of ten cart-load the piece." According to tradition, king Arthur was crowned here; and Ninnius asserts that the city was built by Constantius, father of Constantine the Great.

Silence gives Consent. Latin, Qui tacet consenti'rē videtur; Greek, Auto de to sigan omologountos esti sou (Euripides); French, Assez consent qui ne dit mot; Italian, Chi ta ce confessa.

But that you shall not say I yield, being silent,
I would not speak.

Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," ii. 3.

Silent (The). William I., prince of Orange. (1533-1584.)

Silent Woman (The). A comedy by Ben Jonson. The chief character is Morose, a miserly old fellow who hates to hear any voice but his own. His young nephew, Sir Dauphine, wants to wring from his hard hands one-third of his income, with the promise of the rest at death. The way he gains his end is this: A lad pretends to be a silent lady, with whom Morose falls in love, and marries in "a stage fashion." When married the boy-lady turns out to be a virago of the first water, and Morose signs away the third of his income to his nephew to get rid of his bride. The plot is revealed, and Morose retires to privacy, leaving Sir Dauphine master of the situation.

Sile'nus. The foster-father of Bacchus, fond of music, and a prophet ; but indomitably lazy, wanton, and given to debauch. He is described as a jovial old man, with bald head, pug nose, and face like Bardolph's.

Sil'houet'te (3 syl.). A black profile, so called from Etienne de Silhouette, Contrôleur des Finances, 1757, who made great savings in the public expenditure of France. Some say the black portraits were called Silhouettes in ridicule ; others assert that Silhouette devised this way of taking likenesses to save expense.

Silk. Received silk, applied to a barrister, means that he has obtained licence to wear a silk gown in the law courts, having obtained the degree or title of serjeant.

Silk Gown. A queen's counsel ; so called because his canonical robe is a black silk gown. That of an ordinary barrister is made of stuff or prunello.

Silken Thread. In the kingdom of Lilliput the three great prizes of honour are "fine silk threads six inches long, one blue, another red, and a third green." The emperor holds a stick in his hands, and the candidates "jump over it or creep under it, backwards or forwards, as the stick indicates," and he who does so with the greatest agility is rewarded with the blue ribbon, the second best with the red cordon, and the third with the green. The thread is girt about their loins, and no ribbon of the Legion of Honour, or Knight of the Garter, is won more worthily or worn more proudly. — "Gulliver's Travels."

Silken Words. The mother of Artaxerxes said, "Those that address kings must use silken words."

Silly is the German selig (blessed), whence the infant Jesus is termed "the harmless silly babe," and sheep are called "silly," meaning harmless or innocent. As the "holy" are easily taken in by worldly cunning, the word came to signify "gullable," "foolish." (See SIMPLICITY.)

Silly Cheat. A pickpocket. Silly means "silver," or money called siller. — "Winter's Tale," iv. 2.

Silly Sheep means "blessed sheep," not foolish sheep. (See above.)

Sil'tim (Persian mythology). A demon in human form supposed to haunt forests and woods. — Richardson.

To keep him from the Siltim's harm.
Moore, "Light of the Harem."

Silu'ria—that is, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecon, and Glamorgan. The "sparkling wines of the Silurian vats" are cider and perry.

From Silurian vats, high-sparkling wines
Foam in transparent floods.
Thomson, "Autumn."

Silurian Rocks. A name given by Sir R. Murchison to what miners call gray-wacke, and Werner termed transition rocks. Sir Roderick called them Silurian because it was in the region of the ancient Silurês that he investigated them.

Silva (Don Ruy Gomez de). An old Spanish grandee to whom Elvira is betrothed ; but she detests him, and loves Ernani the bandit-captain. Charles V. tries to seduce Elvira from the old lord, and when Silva discovers this he joins the league of Ernani against the king. The conspirators meet in the catacombs of Aquisgra'na, where Charles overhears their plans, and at a given signal the royal guards arrest them. At the intercession of Elvira, the king grants them a free pardon, and the wedding of Elvira and Ernani is arranged. On the day of solemnisation, Silva sounds a horn given him by Ernani when he joined the league, with a promise "When the horn sounded he would die." Silva insists on the fulfilment of this promise, and Ernani stabs himself. — Verdi, "Ernani" (an opera).

Silva'na. A maga or fata in Tasso's "Amadi'gi, where she is made the guardian spirit of Alido'ro.

Silvanella. A beautiful maga or fata in Bojardo, who raised a tomb over Narcissus, and then dissolved into a fountain. — Lib. ii., xvii. 56, &c.

Silver. The Frenchman employs the word silver to designate money, the wealthy Englishman uses the word gold, and the poorer old Roman brass (res).

Silver and gold articles are marked with five marks : the maker's private mark, the standard or assay mark, the hall mark, the duty mark, and the dato mark. The standard mark states the proportion of silver, to which figure is added, a lion passant for England, a harp crowned for Ireland, a thistle for Edinburgh, and a lion rampant for Glasgow. (For the other marks, see MARK.)

The Silver Star of Love. When Gama was tempest-tossed through the machinations of Bacchus, the "Silver Star of Love" appeared to him, calmed the sea, and restored the elements to harmony again.

The sky and ocean blending, each on fire,
Seemed as all Nature struggled to expire;
When now the Silver Star of Love appeared,
Bright in the east her radiant front she reared.
Camoëns, "Lusiad," bk. vi.

Silver Fork School. Those novelists who are sticklers for etiquette and the graces of society, such as Theodore Hook, lady Blessington, Mrs. Trollope, and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton [now lord Lytton].

Silver Lining. The prospect of better days, the promise of happier times. The allusion is to Milton's "Comus," where the lady lost in the wood resolves to hope on, and sees a "sable cloud turn forth its silver lining to the night."

In time she caught a glimpse of the silver lining, and learned to smile again.—Lady Duffus Hardy,
"A Casual Acquaintance."

Silver Pen. The nom de plume of Eliza Meteyard, who was so called by Douglas Jerrold.

Silver-Tongued. William Bates, the Puritan divine. (1625-1699.)

Anthony Hammond, the poet, called Silver-tongue. (1668-1738.)

Henry Smith, preacher. (1550-1600.)

Joshua Sylvester, translator of Du Bartas. (1563-1618.)

Silver Weapon. With silver weapons you may conquer the world, is what the Delphic oracle said to Philip of Macedon when he went to consult it. Philip, acting on this advice, sat down before a fortress which his staff pronounced to be impregnable. "You shall see," said the king, "how an ass laden with gold will find an entrance."

Silver of Guthrum or of Guthram's Lane. Fine silver; so called because in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the principal gold and silver smiths resided there.

Sil'vès de la Selva. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance entitled Amadis of Gaul. This part was added by Felicia'no de Silva.

Sim'eon (St.) is usually depicted as bearing in his arms the infant Jesus, or receiving him in the temple.

Simmel Cakes. Rich cakes eaten in Lancashire in Mid-Lent. Simmel is the German semmel, a manchet or roll; Danish and Norwegian, simle; Swedish, simla. In Somersetshire a tea-cake is called a simlin. A simmel cake is a cake manchet, or rich semmel. The eating of these cakes in Mid-Lent is in commemoration of the banquet given by Joseph to his brethren, which forms the first lesson of Mid-Lent Sunday, and the feeding of five thousand, which forms the gospel of the day. (See MID-LENT.)

Simon (St.) is represented with a saw in his hand, in allusion to the instrument of his martyrdom. He sometimes bears fish in the other hand, in allusion to his occupation as a fishmonger.

Simon Pure. The real man. In Mrs. Centlivre's "Bold Stroke for a Wife," a colonel Feignwell passes himself off for Simon Pure, and wins the heart of Miss Lovely. No sooner does he get the assent of her father, than the veritable Quaker shows himself, and proves, beyond a doubt, he is the real Simon Pure. Every play or novel reader can guess how such a matter will conclude.

Simony. Buying and selling church livings; any unlawful traffic in holy things. So called from Simon Magus, who wanted to purchase the "gift of the Holy Ghost," that he might have the power of working miracles. (Acts viii. 9-23.)

Simony. The friar in the tale of "Reynard the Fox;" so called from Simon Magus.

Simoorgh'. A sort of griffin or hippogriff, which took some of its breast feathers for Tahmuras' helmet. This creature forms a very striking figure in the epic poems of Saadi and Ferdusi, the Persian poets. (See TAHMURAS.)

Simple (The). Charles III. of France. (879, 893-922.)

Simple Simon. A simpleton. The character is introduced in the well-known nursery tale, the author of which is unknown.

Simplicity is sine plica, without a fold; as duplicity is duplex plica, a double fold. Conduct "without a fold" is straight-forward, but thought without a fold is mere childishness. It is "tortuosity of thought" that constitutes philosophic wisdom, and "simplicity of thought" that prepares the mind for faith.

The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable.—Vanbrugh and Cibber, "The Provoked Husband," i.

Simplon Road. Commenced in 1800 by Napoleon, and finished in 1806. It leads over a shoulder of what is called the Pass of the Simplon (Switzerland).

Sin, according to Milton, is twin-keeper with Death of the gates of Hell. She sprang full-grown from the head of Satan.

Woman to the waist, and fair,
But ending foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed With mortal sting. "Paradise Lost," ii.

Original sin. (See ADAM.)

Sin-eaters. Persons hired at funerals in ancient times, to take upon themselves the sins of the deceased, that the soul might be delivered from purgatory.

Notice was given to an old sire before the door of the house, when some of the family came out and furnished him with a cricket [low stool], on which he sat down facing the door; then they gave him a groat which he put in his pocket, a crust of bread which he eat, and a bowl of ale which he drank off at a draught. After this he got up from the cricket and pronounced the ease and rest of the soul departed, for which he would pray his own soul.—Bagford's letter on "Leland's Collectanea," i. 76.

Sin'adone. The lady of Sinadone. This was a lady who had been metamorphosed by enchantment into a serpent. Sir Lybius, one of Arthur's knights, undertook to rescue her; and having slain the enchantress, the lady, in the guise of a horrible serpent, coils round his neck and kisses him. The spell is now broken, and the serpent becomes a lovely young princess, who marries her deliverer.—"Libeaux" (a romance).

Since're (2 syl.) properly means without wax (sine cera). The allusion is to the Roman practice of concealing flaws in pottery with wax. A sound and perfect one was sine cera (sincere).

Sin'dhu'. The ancient name of the river Indus. (Sanskrit, syand, to flow.)

Sin'don. A thin manufacture of the middle ages used for dresses and hangings; also a little round piece of linen or lint, for dressing the wound left by trepanning. (Du Cange gives its etymology Cyssus tenuis; but the Greek sindon means "fine Indian cloth." India is Sind. and China Sina.)

Sinē diē (Latin). No time being fixed; indefinitely in regard to time. When a proposal is deferred sinē diē, it is deferred without fixing a day for its reconsideration, which is virtually "for ever."

Sinē quā non. An indispensable condition. Latin, Sine quā non potest esse or fieri (that without which [the thing] cannot be, or be done).

Si'neure (si'-ne-kure). An enjoyment of the money attached to a benefice, without having the trouble of the "cure"; also applied to any office to which a salary is attached without any duties to perform (Latin sinē cura, without cure).

Sinews of War. Money, which buys the sinews, and makes them act vigorously. Men will not fight without wages, and the materials of war must be paid for.

Sing. Sing old rose and burn the bellows. Probably this is a perversion of "Singe old rose and burn libellos," old rose being a school-boy's nick-name for the master's "full-bottomed wig" or cabbage-rose; and libellos, our books.

Sing my music and not yours, said Guglielmi to those who introduced their own ornaments into his operas, so eminently distinguished for their simplicity and purity. (1727-1804.) Shakespeare gave the same instruction to the players:

Let those that play your clowns speak no more than is set down for them, &c.—"Hamlet," iii. 2.

Sing-su-hay. A lake of Thibet, famous for its gold sands.

Bright are the waters of Sing-su-hay
And the golden floods that thitherward stray.
Thomas Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

Singing-Apple was a ruby apple on a stem of amber; it had the power of persuading any one to any thing merely by its odour, and enabled the possessor to write verses, make people laugh or cry, and itself sang so as to ravish the ear. The apple was in the desert of Libya, and was guarded by a dragon with three heads and twelve feet. Prince Chery put on an armour of glass, and the dragon, when it saw its thousand reflections in the armour and thought a thousand dragons were about to attack it, became so alarmed that it ran into its cave, and the prince closed up the mouth of the cave.—Countess D'Anois, "Chery and Fairstar." (See SINGING-TREE.)

Singing-Bread, consecrated by the priest singing. (French, pain à chanter.) The reformers directed that the sacramental bread should be similar in fineness and fashion, as the round bread-and-water singing-cakes used in private masses.

Singing-Tree. A tree whose leaves were so musical that every leaf sang in concert.—“Arabian Nights” (Story of the Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister). (See SINGING-APPLE.)

Singing in Tribulation. Confessing when put to the torture. Such a person is termed in gaol slang a “canary-bird.”

“This man, sir, is condemned to the galleys for being a canary-bird.” “A canary-bird!” exclaimed the knight. “Yes, sir,” added the arch thief; “I mean that he is very famous for his singing.” “What!” said don Quixote: “are people to be sent to the galleys for singing?” “Marry, that they are,” answered the slave; “for there is nothing more dangerous than singing in tribulation.”—Cervantes, “Don Quixote,” iii. 8.

Single-Speech Hamilton. The Right Hon. W. G. Hamilton, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, spoke one speech, but that was a masterly torrent of eloquence which astounded every one. (November 13, 1755.)

No one likes a reputation analogous to that of “single-speech Hamilton.”—The Times.

Or is it he, the wordy youth,
So early trained for statesman's part,
Who talks of honour, faith, and truth,
As themes that he has got by heart,
Whose ethics Chesterfield can teach,
Whose logic from Single-speech?
Sir Walter Scott, “Bridal of Triermain,” ii. 4.

Singular Doctor. William Occam, a schoolman. (*-1347.)

Sin'ister (Latin, on the left hand). According to augury, birds, &c., appearing on the left-hand side forebode ill-luck; but on the right-hand side, good luck. Thus corva sinistra (a crow on the left hand) is a sign of ill-luck which belongs to English superstitions as much as to the ancient Roman or Etruscan. —Virgil, “Eclogues,” i. 18.

That raven on yon left-hand oak
(Curse on his ill-betiding croak)
Bodes me no good. Gay, Fable xxxvii.

Sinning my Mercies. Being ungrateful for the gifts of Providence.

I know your good father would term this “sinning my mercies.”—Sir W. Scott, “Redgauntlet,” Sinon. A crafty Greek who induced the Trojans to drag the Wooden Horse within the city (Virgil, “Æneid,” ii.).

Any one who deceives to betray is called “a Sinon.”

And now securely trusting to destroy,
As erst false Sinon snared the sons of Troy.
Camœns, “Lusiad,” bk. i.

Sintram. The Greek hero of the German romance, “Sintram and his Companions,” by baron Lamotte Fouqué. Sintram's famous sword was called “Welsung.” The same name was given to Dietlieb's sword.

Sir. Greek, anax (a king); Latin, senex (a patriarch); Spanish, señor; Italian, signor; French, sieur; Norman, sire; English, sir; Chaldee, zar (a prince). Clergymen used to have this title instead of Reverend; thus in the “Merry Wives of Windsor” we have Sir Hugh Evans, and Sir John is a common name for a priest. (See QUEEN.)

Sir Oracle. (See ORACLE.)

Sir Roger de Coverley. An imaginary character by Addison; type of a benevolent country gentleman of the last century. Probably the model was William Boovey, lord of the manor of Flaxley.

Siren. A woman of dangerous blandishments. The allusion is to the fabulous sirens said by the Greek and Latin poets to entice seamen by the sweetness of their song to such a degree, that the listeners forgot everything and died of hunger (Greek, sirēnēs, entanglers). In Homeric mythology there were but two sirens; later writers name three, viz.—Parthen'opē, Lig'ea, and Leucos'ia; but the number was still further augmented by those who loved “lords many and gods many.”

There were several sirens up and down the coast: one at Panormus, another at Naples, others at Surrentum, but the greatest number lived in the delightful Capree, whence they passed over to the rocks [Sirena'æ] which bear their name.—“Inquiry into the Life of Homer.”

Sirens. Plato says there are three kinds of Sirens—the celestial, the generative and the cathartic. The first are under the government of Jupiter, the second under the government of Neptune, and the third under the government of Pluto. When the soul is in heaven the Sirens seek, by harmonic motion, to unite it to the divine life of the celestial host; and when in Hades, to conform them to the infernal regimen; but on earth they produce generation of which the sea is emblematic.—Proclus, “On the Theology of Plato,” bk. vi.

Sirius. The Dog-star, so called by the Greeks from the adjective seirios, hot and scorching. The Romans called it canic'ula (a little dog); and the Egyptians, sothis.

Sirname. (See SURNAME.)

Siroc'co, called the harmattan on the coast of Guinea, the simoom in Western Asia, and the khamzin or fifty days' wind in Egypt.

Sis'yphus (Latin; Sisuphos, Greek). A fraudulent avaricious king of Corinth, whose task in the world of shades is to roll a huge stone to the top of a hill and fix it there. It so falls out that the stone no sooner reaches the hill-top than it bounds down again. It is said that this punishment was allotted him for his wholesale murder of travellers by casting stones at them.

Sitâ. Wife of Râma or Vishnu incarnate, carried off by the giant Ravana. She was not born, but arose from a furrow when her father Jan'aka, king of Mith'ila, was ploughing. The word means "furrow."

Sitting in Banco. The judges of the courts of law at Westminster are said to be "sitting in banco" so long as they sit together on the benches of their respective courts—that is, all term time. Banco is the Italian for "bench."

Si'va (Indian). The destroyer, who, with Brahma and Vishnu, forms the divine head of the Brahmins. He has five heads, and is the emblem of fire. His wife is Parbutta (Sanskrit, auspicious).

Six (pron. cease). Six thrice or three dice. Everything or nothing. "Cæsar aut nullus." The Greeks and Romans used to play with three dice. The highest throw was three sixes, and the lowest three aces. The aces were left blank, and three aces were called "three dice." (See CÆSAR.)

Six Articles or the Bloody Statute, 33 Henry VIII., enjoins the belief in (1) the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist; (2) the sufficiency of communion in one kind; (3) the celibacy of the priests; (4) the obligation of vows of chastity; (5) the expediency of private masses; and (6) the necessity of auricular confession.

Six Chronicles. A compilation published by H. G. Bohn, of London, containing six chronicles pertaining to the history of this country before the Conquest. They are Ethelwerd's "Chronicle," Asser's "Life of Alfred," "The History of the Britons," by Nennius, Geoffrey of Monmouth's "British History," the Works of Gildas the Wise, and Richard of Cirencester on the "Ancient State of Britain." This last is a forgery by Bertram of Copenhagen.

Six Members. The six members that Charles I. went into the House of Commons to arrest were lord Kimbolton, Pym, Hollis, Hampden, Sir Arthur Haselrig, and Stroud. Being warned in time, they made good their escape.

Six Months. I suggest that it be read again this day six months. A polite way of saying, "I suggest that the question be burked." As the House would not be sitting so long, of course the bill could not be read to it then.

Sixteen-string Jack. John Rann, a highwayman, noted for his foppery. He wore sixteen tags, eight at each knee. (Hanged in 1774.)

Dr. Johnson said that Gray's poetry towered above the ordinary run of verse as Sixteen-string Jack above the ordinary foot pad.—Boswell, "Life of Johnson."

Si'zer. A poor scholar whose assize of food is given him. Siziers have what is left at the Fellows' table, because it was their duty at one time to wait on the fellows at dinner. Each fellow had his sizer.—Cambridge University.

Sizings. The quota of food allowed at breakfast, and also food "sized for" at dinner. At Cambridge, the students are allowed meat for dinner, but tart, jelly, ale, &c., are obtained only by paying extra. These articles are called sizings, and those who demand them size for them. The word is a contraction of assize, a statute to regulate the size or weight of articles sold; hence the weight or measure, and hence articles of statutable weight or measure, as the assize of bread. (See SICE.)

A size is a portion of bread or drinke: it is a farthing which schollers in Cambriggs have at the buttry. It is noted with the letter S.—Minshen. (See also Ellis, "Literary Letters," p. 178.)

Skains-mate or Skeins-mate. A dagger-comrade; a fencing-school companion; a fellow cut-throat. Skain is an Irish knife, similar to the American bowie-knife. Swift, describing an Irish feast, says—"A cubit at least the length of their skains." Green, in his "Quip for an Upstart Courtier," speaks of "an ill-favoured knave, who wore by his side a skane, like a brewer's bung-knife."

Scurvy knave!...I am none of his skains-mates.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 4.

Skald. An old Norse poet, whose aim was to celebrate living warriors or their ancestors, hence were they attached to courts. Few complete Skaldic poems have survived, but a multitude of fragments exist.

Skedad'dle. To run away, to be scattered in rout. The Scotch apply the word to the milk spilt over the pail in carrying it. During the late American war, the New York papers said the Southern forces were "skedaddled" by the Federals. (Saxon, scedan, to pour out; Chaldee, scheda; Greek, skeda'o, to scatter.)

Skeggs. Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs. A pretender to gentility who boasts of her aristocratic connections, but is atrociously vulgar, and complains of being "all of a muck of a sweat." — Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Skel'eton. There is a skeleton in every house. Something to annoy and to be kept out of sight.

That is my skeleton—my trouble, the "crook of my lot."

A woman had an only son who obtained an appointment in India, but his health failed, and his mother longed for his return. One day he wrote a letter to his mother with this strange request: "Pray, mother, get some one who has no cares and troubles to make me six shirts." The widow hunted in vain for such a person, and at length called upon a lady who told her to go with her to her bed-room. Being there she opened a closet which contained a human skeleton. "Madam," said the lady, "I try to keep my sorrows to myself, but every night my husband compels me to kiss that skeleton." She then explained that the skeleton was once her husband's rival, killed in a duel. "Think you I am happy?" The mother wrote to her son, and the son wrote home: "I knew when I gave the commission that every one had his cares, and you, mother, must have yours. Know then that I am condemned to death, and can never return to England. Mother, mother! there is a skeleton in every house."

Skevington's Daughter, corrupted into Scavenger's Daughter, was an instrument of torture invented by Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower under Henry VIII. It consisted of a broad hoop of iron in two parts, fastened together by a hinge. The victim was made to kneel while the hoop was passed under his legs; he was then squeezed gradually till the hoop could be got over his back, where it was fastened, and the prisoner was left in this painful condition for about an hour and a half.

Skidblad'ni. A ship made by the dwarfs, large enough to hold all the gods, but which could be folded together like a sheet of paper, and put into a purse when not required for use. This ship always commanded a prosperous gale.—Scandinavian mythology. (See CARPET, BAYARD, &c.)

Skiddaw. Whenever Skiddaw hath a cap, Scruffell wots full well of that. When my neighbour's house is on fire mine is threatened; When you are in misfortune I also am a sufferer; When you mourn I have cause also to lament. Skiddaw and Scruffell are two neighbouring hills, one in Cumberland, and the other in Annandale, in Scotland. When Skiddaw is capped with clouds, it will be sure to rain ere long at Scruffell.—Fuller, "Worthies."

Skillogolee. Slip-slop, wish-wash, twaddle, talk about gruel. "Skilly" is prison-gruel, or more strictly speaking, the water in which meat has been boiled thickened with oatmeal. Broth served on board the hulks to convicts is called skilly. Golee is jaw, talk.

It is the policy of Curstior Street and Skillogolees.
—The Daily Telegraph.

Skimble-skamble. Rambling, worthless. "Skamble" is merely a variety of scramble, hence "scambling days," those days in Lent when no regular meals are provided, but each "scrambles" or shifts for himself. "Skimble" is added to give force. (See REDUPLICATED WORDS.)

And such a deal of skimble-skamble stuff
As puts me from my faith.

Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," iii. 1.

With such scamble-scamble, spitter-spatter.

As puts me cleane besides the money-matter.
Taylor's "Workes," ii. 39. (1630.)

Skim'mington. To ride the skim- mington, or Riding the stang. To be hen-pecked. Grose tells us that the man rode behind the woman, with his face to the horse's tail. The man held a distaff, and the woman beat him about the jowls with a ladle. As the procession passed a house where the woman was paramount, each gave the threshold a sweep. The "stang" was a pole supported by two stout lads, across which the rider was made to stride. Mr. Douce derives "skimmington" from the skimming-ladle with which the rider was buffeted.

This custom was not peculiar to Scotland and England; it prevailed in Scandinavia; and Hoefnagel, in his "Views in Seville" (1591), shows that it existed in Spain also. The procession is described at length in "Hudibras," pt. ii., c. 2.

"Hark ye, dame Ursley Suddelchop," said Jenkin, starting up, his eyes flashing with anger: "remember, I am none of your husband, and if I were you would do well not to forget whose threshold was swept when they last rode the skimmington upon such another scolding jade as yourself."—Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Skimpole (Harold). A soft sponger on his friends.—Dickens, "Black House."

Skin. To sell the skin before you have caught the bear. To count of your chickens before they are hatched; to calculate or anticipate profits. The allusion is to a practice of stock-jobbers common during the South-Sea mania (1720): Dealing in bear-skins was a great item of the supposed trade, and thousands of skins were sold the very existence of which was hypothetical. It was a mere time bargain, and the Utopian skins were employed simply as a something to buy and sell as the market varied.

To skin a flint. To be very exacting in making a bargain. The French say, "Tondre sur un œuf." The Latin lana caprina (goat's wool) means something as worthless as the skin of a flint, or fleece of an eggshell.

Skin of his Teeth. "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth" (Job xix. 20). Just escaped, and that is all—having lost everything.

Skinflint. A pinch-farthing; a nig-gard. In the French "pince-maille." Maille is an old copper coin.

Skirt. To sit upon one's skirt. To insult, or seek occasion of quarrel. Tarleton, the clown, told his audience the reason why he wore a jacket was that "no one might sit upon his skirt." Sitting on one's skirt is like stamping on one's coat in Ireland, a fruitful source of quarrels, often provoked. In Paris, this very year [1869], a gentleman was challenged to a duel for stamping accidentally on a lady's train as he was coming out of the opera. To sit or stamp on a skirt is to offer a meditated insult.

Crosse me not, Liza, nether be so pette,
For if thou dost I'll sit upon thy skirte.
"The Abortive of an Idle Hour" (1620).
(Quoted by Halliwell, "Archaic Words.")

Skogan (Henry). A poet in the reign of Henry IV. Justice Shallow says he saw Sir John Falstaff, when he was a boy, "break Skogan's head at the court gate, when he [Sir John] was a crack [child] not thus high."—"2 Henry IV.," iii. 2.

Skogan? What was he?
O, a fine gentleman and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth's times, that made disguises
For the king's sons, and writ in ballad royal Daintily well.

Ben Jonson, "The Fortunate Isles" (1626).

John Skogan, who took his degree at Oxford, "being," as Mr. Warton says, "an excellent mimick, and of great pleasantry in conversation, became the favourite buffoon of the court of king Edward IV." "Scogin's Jests" were published by Andrew Borde, a physician, in the reign of Henry VIII.

Skulda (the future). A maiden who dwells with her two sisters, Urda and Verdandi, near the well Norna.—Scandinavian mythology.

Skull. You shall quaff beer out of the skulls of your enemies. This promise of our Scandinavian forefathers is not unfrequently misunderstood. Skull means a cup or dish; hence a person who washes up cups and dishes is called a scullery-maid. (Scotch, skoll, a bowl; French, écuelle; Danish, skaal, a drinking-vessel; German, schale; our shell.)

Sky. To elevate, ennoble, raise. It is a term in ballooning; when the ropes are cut, the balloon mounts upward to the clouds.

We found the same distinguished personage doing his best to sky some dozen of his best friends [referring to the peers made by Gladstone].—The Times, Nov. 16, 1869.

If the sky falls we shall catch larks. A bantering reply to those who suggest some very improbable or wild scheme.

Sky-blue. Milk and water, the colour of the skies.

Its name derision and reproach pursue,
And strangers tell of three times skimmed sky-blue.
Bloomfield, "Farmer's Boy."

Skye (Isle of) means the isle of gaps or indentations (Celtic, skyb, a gap). Hence also the Skibbereen of Cork, which is Skyb-bokreen, the byway gap, a pass in a mountain to the sea.

Skyresh Bol'golam. Galbet or high admiral of the realm of Lilliput.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels," ch. iii.

Slander, Offence. Slander is a stumbling-block or something which trips a person up (Greek, skan'dalon, through the French esclandre). Offence is the striking of our foot against a stone (Latin, ob-fendo, as scopulum offendit navis, the ship struck against a rock).

Slang. Slangs are the greaves with which the legs of convicts are fettered; hence convicts themselves; and slang is the language of convicts. (See ARGOT.)

Slap. Meaning completely; in a direct manner; as, "Slap in the wind's eye,"—i.e., full in the direction of the wind. "To go slap at a thing" is to give a dash at it.

Slap-bang, in sport, means that the gun was discharged incessantly; it went slap here and bang there. As a term of laudation it means "very dashing," both words being playful synonyms of "dashing," the repetition being employed to give intensity. Slap-bang, here we are again, means, we have "popped" in again without ceremony. Pop, slap, bang, and dash are interchangeable.

Slap-dash. In an off-hand manner. The allusion is to the method of colouring rooms by slapping and dashing the walls, so as to imitate paper. At one time slap-dash walls were very common.

Slap-up. Prime slap-up or slap-bang-up. Very exquisite or dashing. Here slap is a playful synonym of dashing, and "up" is the Latin super as in "superfine." The dress of a dandy or the equipage of an exquisite is "slap-up," "prime slap-up," or "slap-bang-up."

Slate. He has a slate or tile loose. He is a little cracked; his head or roof is not quite sound.

Slave (1 syl.). This is an example of the strango changes which come over some words. The Slavi were a tribe which once dwelt on the banks of the Dnieper, and were so called from slav (noble, illustrious); but as, in the lower ages of the Roman empire, vast multitudes of them were spread over Europe in the condition of captive servants, the word came to signify a slave.

Similarly, Goths means the good or godlike men, but since the invasion of the Goths the word has become synonymous with barbarous, bad, ungodlike.

Distraction is simply "dis-traho," as diversion is "di-verto." The French still employ the word for recreation or amusement, but when we talk of being distracted we mean anything but amused or entertained.

Slawkenber'gius (Hafen). An hypothetical author on the subject of noses, famous himself for a nose of orthodox dimensions.—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy." (See NOSE, p. 623.)

Slay-good. A giant in the "King's" highway, master of a gang of thieves. Mr. Greatheart slew him and rescued Feeble-mind from his grasp.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Sleave. The ravelled sleeve of care (Shakespeare, "Macbeth"). The sleeve is the knotted or entangled part of thread or silk, the raw edge of woven articles. Chaucer has "sleeveless words" (words like ravellings, not knit together to any wise purpose); bishop Hall has "sleeveless rhymes" (random rhymes); Milton speaks of "sleeveless reason" (reasoning which proves nothing); Taylor the water-poet has "sleeveless message" (a simple message; it now means a profitless one). The weaver's slae is still used. (Saxon, slæ, a weaver's reed; slægan, to strike, hence sley-hammer; Icelandic, slefa.)

If all these fail, a beggar-woman may
A sweet love-letter to her hands convey.
Or a neat laundress or a hearb-wife can Carry a sleeveless message now and than.
Taylor's Works, ii., 111 (1630).

Sleek-stone. The ebony stone used by goldsmiths to sloeken (polish) their gold with. Curriers use a similar stone for smoothing out creases of leather; the sleeker is made also of glass, steel, &c. (Our word sleek.)

Sledge-Hammer. A sledge-hammer argument. A clincher; an argument which annihilates opposition at a blow. The sledge-hammer is the largest sort of hammer used by smiths, and is wielded by both hands. The word sledge is Saxon, and means "striking."

Sleep like a Top. When peg-tops and humming-tops are at the acme of their gyration, they become so steady and quiet that they do not seem to move. In this state they are said to sleep. Soon they begin to totter, and the tipsy movement increases till they fall. The French say Dormir comme un sabot, and Mon sabot dort.

Another derivation, less likely, is that top is the French taupe (dormouse); Italian, topo; and that our expression is the translation and perversion of Ei dorme come un topo.

Sleep. Crabbe's etymology of doze under this word is exquisite:—

Doze, a variation from the French dors and the Latin dormio (to sleep), which was anciently dermoio, and comes from the Greek derma (a skin), because people lay on skins when they slept!—Synonyms.

Sleeper (The). Epiménides, the Greek poet, is said to have fallen asleep in a cave when a boy, and not to have waked for fifty-seven years, when he found himself possessed of all wisdom. Rip van Winkle, in Washington Irving's tale, is supposed to sleep for twenty years, and wake up an old man, unknown and unknown. (See KLAUS.)

Sleepers. Timbers laid asleep or resting on something, as the sleepers of a railway.

The Seven Sleepers. (See SEVEN.)

Sleeping Beauty. From the French "La Belle au Bois Dormant," by Charles Perrault ("Contes du Temps"). She is shut up by enchantment in a castle, where she sleeps a hundred years, during which time an impenetrable wood springs up around. Ultimately she is disenchanted by a young prince, who marries her. Epiménides, the Cretan poet, went to fetch a sheep, and after sleeping fifty-seven years continued his search, and was surprised to find when he got home that his younger brother was grown grey. (See RIP VAN WINKLE.)

Sleeve of Care. (See SLEAVE.)

To have in one's sleeve is to offer a person's name for a vacant situation. Dean Swift, when he waited on Harley, had always some name in his sleeve. The phrase arose from the custom of placing pockets in sleeves. These sleeve-pockets were chiefly used for memoranda, and other small articles.

To laugh in one's sleeve. To ridicule a person not openly but in secret; to conceal a laugh by hiding your face in the large sleeves at one time worn by men.

Sleeveless Errand. A fruitless errand. It should be written sleeveless, as it comes from sleeve, ravelled thread, or the raw-edge of silk. In "Troilus and Cressida," Thersites the railer calls Patroclus an "idle immaterial skein of sleive silk" (v. 1).

Sleight of Hand is artifice by the hand (German, schlich, cunning or trick).

And still the less they understand.

The more they admire his sleight of hand.
Glee, "Surely the Pleasure is as Great."

Sleip'nir (2 syl.). Odin's grey horse, which had eight legs, and could carry his master over sea as well as land. —Scandinavian mythology.

Slender. A country lout, a booby in love with Anne Page, but of too faint a heart to win so fair a lady. —Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor."

Sleuth-Hound. A blood-hound which follows the sleuth or track of an animal. (Slot, the track of a deer, is the Saxon slatinge; Icelandic, slodr; Dutch, sleet.)

There is a law also among the Borderers in time of peace, that whoso denieth entrance or suite of a sleuth-hound in pursuit made after fellows and stolen goods, shall be holden as accessarie unto the theft. —Holinshed, "Description of Scotland," p. 14.

Slewed. Intoxicated. When a vessel changes her tack, she staggers and gradually heels over. A drunken man moves like a ship changing its angle of sailing.

Slick (Sam). A Yankee clock-maker and pedlar, wonderfully 'cute, a keen observer, and with plenty of "soft sawder." Judge Haliburton wrote the two series called "Sam Slick, or the Clock-maker."

Sliding Scale. A scale of government duty which slides up and down as the article to which it refers becomes dearer or cheaper.

Slip. Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. Everything is uncertain till you possess it. Anæos, a king of the Lelegés in Samos, planted a vineyard, and was warned by one of his slaves that he would never live to taste the wine thereof. Wine was made from its grapes, and the king sent for his slave, asking him what he thought of his prophecy now. The slave made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," and the words were yet scarce spoken when news was brought that a bear had burst into the vineyard and was laying waste the vines. Up started the king in a fury, seized his spear, and went forth to attack the bear, but was killed in the encounter.

To give one the slip. To steal off unperceived; to elude pursuit. A seaphrase. In fastening a cable to a buoy, the home end is slipped through the hawse-pipe. To give the slip is to cut away the cable, so as to avoid the noise of weighing anchor.

Slip-slop, applied to composition, means twaddle, without any solid worth; like water-gruel and weak tea.

Slippers. The Turks wear yellow slippers; the Armenians, red; and the Jews, blue.

Slipshod, applied to literature, means a loose, careless style of composition; no more fit for the public eye than a man with his shoes down at heels.

Sloane MSS. 3,560 MSS. collected by Sir Hans Sloane, now in the British Museum. The museum of Sir Hans formed the basis of the British Museum. (1660-1753.)

Slop (Dr.). A choleric physician in Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." He breaks Tristram's nose and crushes Uncle Toby's fingers in demonstrating the use of a pair of forceps. The academy figure of this character was Dr. Burton, accoucheur.

Dr. Slop. Sir John Stoddart, M.D., a choleric physician who assailed Napoleon most virulently in The Times, of which he was editor. (1773-1856.)

Slo'pard (Dame). The wife of Grimbard, the brock (or badger), in the tale of "Reynard the Fox."

Slope (1 syl.). To decamp; a corruption of lope, as Let's lope (Let us run away). Dutch, loopen; Danish, løber, to run; our "leap," pret. loop or lope.

Slough of Despond. A deep bog which Christian has to cross in order to get to the Wicket Gate. Help comes to his aid. Neighbour Pliable went with Christian as far as the Slough, and then turned back.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. i.

Slow. Stupid; dull. A "quick boy" is one who is sharp and active. Awfully slow, slang for very stupid and dull.

Slow Coach. A dawdle. As a slow coach in the old coaching days "got on" slowly, so one that "gets on" slowly is a slow coach.

Slubber-Degullion. A nasty, paltry fellow. A slub is a roll of wool drawn out and only slightly twisted; hence to slubber, to twist loosely, to do things by halves, to perform a work carelessly. Degullion is compounded of the word "gull," or the Cornish "gullian," a simpleton.

Quoth she, "Although thou hast deserved
Base slubber-degullion, to be served
As thou didst vow to deal with me...."
Butler, "Hudibras," l. 3.

Sludge. (Dickie). Grandson of Gammer Sludge, the schoolmaster's landlady. He is a dwarf, who goes by the name of "Flibbertigibbet." — Sir Walter Scott, "Kenilworth."

Slum (Mr.). A patter-poet in the "Old Curiosity Shop," by Charles Dickens. When Mrs. Jarley, of the wax-works, depreciated his art, the irate vendor of verse replied—

Ask the perfumers, ask the blacking-makers, ask the hatters, ask the old lottery-office keepers, ask any man among 'em what poetry has done for him, and mark my words, he blesses the name of Slum.

Slums. Places for sleeping in. Our slumber; Saxon, slumerian; Danish, slummer. "The back slums"—i.e., the purlicious of Westminster Abbey, &c., where vagrants go to get a night's lodging.

Sly (Christopher). A keeper of bears and a tinker, son of a pedlar, and a sad drunken sot. In the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy called "Taming of the Shrew," he is found dead drunk by a lord, who commands his servants to put him to bed, and on his waking to attend upon him like a lord, to see if they can bamboozle him into the belief that he is a great man, and not Christopher Sly at all. The "commonly" of "Taming of the Shrew" is performed for his delectation. The trick was played by the caliph Haroun Alraschid on Abon

Hassan, the rich merchant, in the tale called "The Sleeper Awakened" ("Arabian Nights"); and by Philippe the Good duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor, as given in Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," part ii., sec. 2, numb. 4.

Sly-Boots. One who appears to be a dolt, but who is really wide awake; a cunning dolt. Boots is a corruption and contraction of the French butor, a block-head or dolt, our butt.

The frog called the lazy one several times, but in vain; there was no such thing as stirring him, though the sly-boots heard well enough all the while.—"Adventures of Abdalla," p. 32. (1729.)

Slyme (Chevy). In "Martin Chuzzlewit," by Charles Dickens.

Small-back. Death; so called because he is usually drawn as a skeleton.

Small-back must lead down the dance with us all in our time.—Sir Walter Scott.

Small-beer. "To suckle fools and chronicle small-beer."—Iago in the play of "Othello," ii. 1.

Small-endians. The Big-endians of Lilliput made it a point of orthodoxy to crack their eggs at the big end; but were considered heretics for so doing by the Small-endians, who insisted that eggs ought to be broken at the small end.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels."

Smalls. In for his smalls; Passed his smalls—his "Little-go," or previous examination; the examination for degree being the "Great-go" or "Greats."

Smart Money. Money paid by a person to obtain exemption from some disagreeable office or duty. It used to be paid for exemption from military service. Money which makes the payer smart or suffer without procuring for him money's worth.

Smash. Come to smash—to ruin. Smashed to pieces, broken to atoms. Smash is a corruption of mash; Latin, mastico, to bite to pieces. (See SLOPE.)

Smec (in "Hudibras"). A contraction of Smectymneus, a word made from the initial letters of five rebels—

Stephen Marshal.

Edward Calamy.

Thomas Newcomb.

Matthew Youngman.

William Spurstow, who wrote a book against Episcopacy and the Common Prayer. (See NOTARICA.)

The handkerchief about the neck,
Caonical cravat of Sineck.

Butler, "Hudibras," pt. i. 3.

Smectym'nuans. Anti-Episcopalians.

Smectym'nus. (See NOTARICA.)

Smelfun'gus. So Sterne calls Smollett, from a volume of Travels published in 1766.

The lamented Smelfungus travelled from Boulogne to Paris, from Paris to Rome, and so on; but he set out with the spleen, and every object he passed by was discoloured or distorted. He wrote an account of them, but 'twas nothing but the account of his own miserable feelings.

Smell a Rat. A phrase which expresses a suspicion that there is mischief brewing. The allusion is to a cat or dog smelling out vermin.

Smells of the Lamp. Said of a literary production manifestly laboured. Plutarch attributes the phrase to Pytheas the orator, who said "The orations of Demos then's smelt of the lamp," alluding to the current tale that the great orator lived in an underground cave lighted by a lamp, that he might have no distraction to his severe study.

Smike. A broken-spirited lad, rescued by Nicholas Nickleby from the clutches of Mr. Squeers, of Do-the-boys Hall.—Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Smith. A proper name. (See BREWER.) Henry Smith, alias Henry Gow or "Gow of Chrom," or "Hal of Wynd," the armourer. He sues Catharine Glover (the Fair Maid of Perth), but is rejected. A follower of Ramorny is employed to murder him, but kills Oliver by mistake. Smith declines the honour of knighthood offered him by the earl of Douglas, but being accepted by the Fair Maid of Perth, marries her.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth."

Smith's Prize-man. After the degree examination, those who have passed in the "honour lists" have the liberty of competing for a fellowship in Trinity College, to be given to the best man. He who obtains it is called Smith's Prize-man, from the founder.

Smithfield. The smooth field (Saxon, smeth, smooth), called in Latin Campus Planus, and described by Fitz-Stephen in the twelfth century as a "plain field where every Friday there is a celebrated rendezvous of fine horses brought thither to be sold."

Smoke. To detect, or rather to get a scent of, some plot or scheme. The allusion is to the detection of robbers by the smoke seen to issue from their place of concealment.

Smoke Farthings. An offering given to the priest at Whitsuntide, according to the number of chimneys in his parish.

The bishop of Elie hath out of everie parish in Cambridgeshire a certain tribute called smoke-farthings, which the churchwardens do levie according to the number of chimneys that be in a parish.—MSS. Baker, xxxix. 326.

Smoke Silver. A modus of 6d. in lieu of tithe fire-wood.

Smyr'nean Poet. Mimner'mos, born at Smyrna.

Smyr'niote (3 syl.). An inhabitant of Smyrna.

Snacks. I will go snacks with you (Pope, Prologue to "Satires"). Snag or snack is a tooth, generally applied to the stumpy branches of trees; hence the word snag-pruning. A snaggy person is one full of snags, like a snaggy tree. The snack of a door is the stump or stick which keeps it to. To take a snack is to take a bite or mouthful. W. Wadd, in his "Mems., Maxims, and Memoirs," gives another derivation: he says that Snacks was a noted body-snatcher during the plague of London (1665), and finding his business too great for his own personal superintendence, offered half profits to any one who would join him. Those who accepted the offer were said to "go snacks." The invention of a proper name to supply an etymology ranks now with literary forgeries.

Snake in the Grass. A secret enemy; an enemy concealed from sight, like a snake lurking amidst long grass.

Latet anguis in herba.—Virgil.

Snake-Stones. Small rounded stones or matters compounded by art, and supposed to cure snake-bites. Mr. Quekett discovered that two given to him for analysis were composed of vegetable matters. Little perforated stones are sometimes hung on cattle to charm away adders.

Snap-Dragon. (See FLAP-DRAGON.)

Snarling Letter (Latin, littera canina). The letter r. (See R.)

Sneak (Jerry). A hen-pecked pen-maker in "The Mayor of Garratt," by S. Foote.

Sneer. A carping critic in Sheridan's "Critic."

Sneerwell (Lady). The widow of a city knight, who could do more with a look to ruin a person's character than most others could effect with the nicest detail of scandal.—Sheridan, "School for Scandal."

Sneezed. It is not to be sneezed at—not to be despised. A playful corruption of the French méprise (held in contempt).

Sneezing. Some Catholics attribute to St. Gregory the use of the benediction "God bless you" after sneezing, and say that he enjoined its use during a pestilence in which sneezing was a mortal symptom, and was therefore called the death-sneeze. Aristotle mentions a similar custom among the Greeks; and Thucyd'idés tells us that sneezing was a crisis symptom of the great Athenian plague. The Romans followed the same custom, and we also find it prevalent in the New World among the native Indian tribes, in Sennaar, Monomatapa, &c. &c.

Snob. Not a gentleman; one who arrogates to himself merits which he does not deserve. Thackeray calls George IV. a snob, because he assumed to be "the greatest gentleman in Europe," but had not the genuine stamp of a gentleman's mind. The word is s (privative) and nob (noble). Similarly scape is s (not), capere (to take); and sober is s (not), ebrius (tipsy). In the Latin we have se (privative) in numerous words, as se-grego, se-paro, se-cerno, se-jungo, &c.

In Italian, calzare (to put on your shoes), scalzare (to take them off); fornito (furnished), sforzito (unfurnished); flotta (a fleet), sforzare (to withdraw a ship from a fleet); briglia (a bridle), sbrigliare (to unbridle).

Wittily snob is derived from sine obolo (s'n'ob), but unhappily for the truth of this pun, snobs have generally golden thumbs, and it is the oboles that make them snobs.

If we had not the privative s, the next best etymology would be pseudo-nobs (false or Brummagem nobles)—a suggestion due to Thackeray.

Snodgrass (Augustus). A poetical young gentleman, under the "guardian" care of Mr. Pickwick.—Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

Snood. The lassie lost her silken snood. The snood was a riband with which a Scotch lass braided her hair, and was the emblem of her maiden character. When she married she changed the snood for the curch or coif; but if she lost the name of virgin before she obtained that of wife, she "lost her silken snood" and was not privileged to assume the curch.

Snooks is in reality Sevenoaks, in Kent, contracted into S'n-oaks, Snooks.

Snooks. An exclamation of incredulity; a Mrs. Harris. A person tells an incredible story, and the listener cries Snooks—gammon; or he replies It was Snooks—the host of the Château d'Espagne. This word "snooks" is a corruption of Noakes or Nokes, the mythical party at one time employed by lawyers to help them in actions of ejectment. (See STYLES.)

Snore. You snore like an owl. It is very generally believed that owls snore, and it is quite certain that a noise like snoring proceeds from their nests; but this is most likely the "purring" of the young birds, nestling in comfort and warmth under the parent wing.

Snow (Greek, chion). A nick-name given to Theognis, a Greek tragic poet, whose compositions were faultless but cold and without passion.—Aristophanes, "Acharnians," 140.

Snowdonia. The district which contains the mountain range of Snowdon. The King of Snowdonia. Moel-y-Wyddfa (the conspicuous peak), the highest in South Britain. (3,571 feet above the sea-level.)

Snuff. Up to snuff. Wide awake; alive to scent (Dutch, snuffen, to scent, snuf).

Took it in snuff—in anger, in huff

(Spanish, chufa; German, schnauben; meaning to swagger, to snub).

You'll mar the light by taking it in snuff.
Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Who...when it next came there took it in snuff.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," i. 3.

Snuff out. He was snuffed out—put down, eclipsed. The allusion is to a candle.

Soane Museum, formed by Sir John Soane, and preserved in its original locality, No. 13, Lincoln's-inn-fields, the private residence of the founder.

Soap. An English form of savon, the French for soap, so called from the little seaport town of Savona, near Genoa, in Italy, noted for its early and excellent manufacture of this detestive article.

How are you off for soap? (for money or any other necessity). At Quereta'ro, near Mexico, soap is the currency of the place, and a legal tender for the payment of debts. The cakes are about the size of common brown Windsor, and worth a cent and a half apiece. Each cake is stamped with the name of the town where it is current, and of the person authorised to manufacture and utter it. Celaya soap will not pass current at Quereta'ro. It is by no means uncommon to use these cakes for washing the hands and face, and they never lose their current value so long as the stamp is preserved. The expression "How are you off for soap?" succeeded, about twenty years ago, the synonymous query "How are you off for tin?"

Another conjecture is worth adventuring. The insurgent women of Paris, in February, 1793, went about crying "Du pain et du savon!" (Bread and soap).

A deputation of washwomen petitioned the convention for soap, and their plaintive cry was heard round the Salle de Manège. "Du pain et du savon!"—Caryle, "French Revolution," pt. III, bk. iii. 1.

Sober or Sobrius is s, privative, and ebrius, drunk. Ebrius is the abstruse Latin word bria (a cup), connected with *bri*sa (pressed grapes), and is equivalent to our expression "in his cups." (See SNOB.)

Sobri'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of the most valiant of the Saracen army. He is called the Sage. He was aged, and counselled Ag'amant to give up the war and return home, or if he rejected that advice to entrust the fight to single combat, on condition that the nation of the champion overthrown should pay tribute to the other. Roge'ro was chosen for the pagan champion, and Rinaldo for the Christian, but Agramant broke the league. Sobri'no soon after this received the rite of baptism.

Don Quixote asks—

Who more prudent than Sobrino?

So'briquet (French). A nickname. Ménage thinks the etymology is the Latin subridiculum (somewhat ridiculous); Court de Gebelin suggests the Romance words sopra-quest (a name acquired over and above your proper names); while Leglay is in favour of soubriquet, a word common in the fourteenth century to express a sound of contempt, half whistle and half jeer, made by raising quickly the chin.

Soc'ialism (3 syl.). The political and social scheme of Robert Owen, of Montgomeryshire, who in 1816 published a work to show that society was in a wretched condition, and all its institutions and religious systems were based on wrong principles. The prevailing system is competition, but Owen maintained that the proper principle is co-operation; he therefore advocated a community of property, and the abolition of degrees of rank. (1771-1858.)

The socialists are called also Owenites (3 syl.). In France, the Fourierists and St. Simonians are similar sorts of communists, who receive their designations from Fourier and St. Simon (q.v.).

Société de Momus. One of the minor clubs of Paris for the reunion of song-writers and singers. The most noted of these clubs was the Caveau, or in full Les Dîners du Caveau, founded in 1733 by Piron, Crébillon jun., and Collet. This club lasted till the Revolution. In the consulate was formed Les Dîners du Vaudeville, for the habitués of the drama; these diners were held in the house of Julliet, an actor. In 1806 the old Caveau was revived under the name of the Caveau Moderne, and the muster was once a month at a restaurant entitled "Le Rocher de Cancale," famous for fish dinners, and Laujon (the French Anacreon) was president. Bérauger belonged to this club, which lasted ten years. In 1824 was founded the Gymnase Lyrique, which like the Caveau published an annual volume of songs; this society was dissolved in 1841. In 1834 was founded La Lice Chansonnrière, for those who could not afford to join the Caveau or the Gymnase, to which we owe some of the best French songs.

Sock (comedy). The Greek comic actors used to wear a sandal and sock. The difference between the sock and the tragic buskin was this—the sock went only to the ankle, but the buskin extended to the knee. (See BUSKIN.)

Then to the well-trod stage anon,
If Jonson's learned sock be on,
Milton, "L'Allegro."

Socrátēs. The greatest of the ancient philosophers, whose chief aim was to amend the morals of his countrymen, the Athenians. Cicero said of him that "he brought down philosophy from the heavens to earth;" and he was certainly the first to teach that "the proper study of mankind is man." Socrates resisted the unjust sentence of the senate, which condemned to death the Athenian generals for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusæ.

Socrátēs—
Who, firmly good in a corrupted state,
Against the rage of tyrants single stood Invincible.
Thomson, "Winter."

Socrates used to call himself "the midwife of men's thoughts." Out of his intellectual school sprang that of Plato and the dialectic system; Euclid and the Megaric; Aristippos and the Cyrenaic; Antisthenēs and the Cynic.

Socratic. Modelled on the principles taught by Socrátēs.

Sodom. Apples of Sodom or Mad Apples. Strabo, Tacitus, and Josephus describe them as beautiful externally and filled with ashes. These "apples" are in reality gall-nuts produced by the insect called Cynips insana.

Soffarides (3 syl.). A dynasty of four kings, which lasted thirty-four years and had dominion over Khorassan, Seistan, Fars, &c. (873-907); founded by Yacoub ebn Laith, surnamed al Soffar (the brazier), because his father followed that trade in Seistan.

Soft. He's a soft—half a fool. The word originally meant effeminate, unmanly; hence soft in brains, silly, &c., "soft in courage."—"3 Henry VI.," ii. 2.

Soft Sawder. Flattery, adulation. A play is intended between solder, pronounced sawder, and sawder, a compound of saw (a saying); Saxon, saga or sagu. Soft solder, a composition of tin and lead, is used for soldering zinc, lead, and tin; hard solder for brass, &c.

Softly. To walk softly. To be out of spirits. In Greece, mourners for the dead used to cut off their hair, go about muffled, and walk softly to express want of spirit and strength. When Elijah denounced the judgments of Heaven against Ahab, that wicked king "fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly" to show that his strength was exhausted with sorrow (1 Kings xxi. 27). Isaiah says, "I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul" (xxxviii. 15). The Psalmist says, "I put on sackcloth, and went and walked as for a friend or brother." The French Je vais doucement means precisely the same thing: "I go softly," because I am indisposed, out of sorts, or in bad spirits.

Soi-disant (French). Self-styled, would-be.

Sojourn (2 syl.) is the Italian soggiorno—i.e., sub-giorno; Latin, sub-diurnus (for a day, or during a day). To sojourn is to stay in a place for a day, to rest on your journey.

Sol (Latin). The sun.

And when Dan Sol to slope his wheels began.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto i.

Sol. The term given by the ancient alchemists to gold. Silver they called luna.

Sol in the Edda was the daughter of Mundilfori, and sister of Ma'ni. She was so beautiful, that at death she was placed in heaven to drive the sun-chariot. Two horses were yoked to it, named Arvakur and Alsvith (watchful and rapid).—Scandinavian mythology. (See MANI.)

Sol-fa. (See Do, Re, &c.)

Sola'no. Ask no favour during the Solano (Spanish). Ask no favour during a time of trouble, panic, or adversity. The Solano of Spain is a south-east wind, extremely hot, and loaded with fine dust. It produces giddiness and great irritation.

Soldan or Sowdan. A corruption of sultan, meaning in mediæval romance the Sarazen king; but, with the usual inaccuracy of these writers, we have the soldan of Egypt, the soudan of Persia, the sowdan of Babylon, &c., all represented as accompanied by grim Sarazens to torment Christians.

The Soldan, meant for Felipe of Spain, who used all his power to bribe and seduce the subjects of Elizabeth. Queen Mercilla sent to negotiate a peace, but the ambassador sent was treated like a dog, referring to Felipe's detention of the deputies sent by the States of Holland. Sir Artegal demands of the soldan the release of the damsel "held as wrongful prisoner," and the soldan, "swearing and banning most blasphemously," mounts his "high chariot" and prepares to maintain his cause. Prince Arthur encounters him "on the green," and after a severe combat uncovers his shield, at sight of which the soldan and all his followers take to flight. The "swearing and banning" refer to the excommunications thundered out against Elizabeth; the "high chariot" is the Spanish Arma'da; the "green" is the sea; the "uncovering of the shield" indicates that the Arma'da was put to flight, not by man's might, but by the power of God. Flavit Jehovah et dissipati sunt (God blew, and they were scattered).—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," v. 8.

Soldats (Des). Money. Shakespeare, in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," ii. 2, has "Money is a good soldier, sir, and will on." Doubtless the French use of the word is derived from the proverbial truth that "Money is the sinews of war," combined with a pun on the word solidus (the pay of a soldier). The Norman soud (i.e., sould) means "wages;" Swedish, besolda, to pay; Danish, besolder, to pay wages; the French soldat, our soldier, a hiring or mercenary, and the French sol or sou.

Soldier originally meant a hiring or mercenary, one paid a solidus for military service; but hiring and soldier convey now very different ideas. (See above.)

Solécism (3 syl.). Misapplication of words; an expression opposed to the laws of syntax; so called from the city of Soli, in Cilicia, where an Athenian colony settled, and forgot the purity of their native language.—Suidas.

Solemn. Habitual, customary (Latin, sollemnis).

Silent night with this her solemn bird [i.e. the nightingale, the bird familiar to night].—Milton, "Paradise Lost," v.

The Solemn Doctor. Henry Goethals was so called by the Sorbonne. (1227-1293.)

Soler. An upper room, a loft, a garret (Latin, solarium).

Hastily than went thai all,
And socht him in the maydens hall,
In chambers high, es nocht at hide,
And in solers on ilka side.
"Iwains and Gawin," 87.

Solfeg'gio. Guido's system of sol-fa is taken from the opening syllables of the following hymn:—

Ut quant laxis	Ut -tered tho' faintly
Mi -ra gestorum,	My feeble stave
Sol -ve polluti,	Sol -ace thy humble,
Re -sonarē fibris,	Re -creant slave!
Fa -muli tuo'rum,	Fa -vour thy servant,
La -bii rea'tum, &c.	La -dy, and save!

The English is not intended as a translation of the Latin canticle, but simply as an imitation of the opening syllables.)

Solid Doctor. Richard Middleton, a cordelier, also called the Profound Doctor. (*-1304.)

Solingen. The Sheffield of Germany, famous for swords and fencing-foils.

Solomon. The English Solomon. James I., called by Sully "the wisest fool in Christendom." (1566, 1603-1625.)

Henry VII. was so called for his wise policy in uniting the York and Lancaster factions. (1457, 1485-1509.)

Solomon of France. Charles V., le Sage. (1337, 1364-1380.)

St. Louis or Louis IX. (1215, 1226-1270.)

Solomon's Ring. The rabbins say that Solomon wore a ring in which was set a chased stone that told the king everything he desired to know.

Solon of Parnassus. So Voltaire called Boileau, in allusion to his "Art of Poetry." (1636-1711.)

Sol'stice (2 syl.). The summer solstice is the 21st June; the winter solstice is the 22nd December. So called because on arriving at the corresponding points of the celiptic the sun is stopped and made to approach the equator again. (Latin, sol sistit or stat, the sun stops.)

Solymæ'an Rout, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means the London rebels.

The Solymæ'an rout, well versed of old
In godly faction, and in treason bold....
Saw with disdain an Ethnic plot (Papish plot) begun,
And scorned by Jebusites (Papists) to be outdone.

Solyman, king of the Turks (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), whose capital was Nice. Being driven from his kingdom he fled to Egypt, and was there appointed leader of the Arabs (bk. ix.). He and Argantēs were by far the most doughty of pagan knights. Solyman was slain by Rinaldo (bk. xx.), and Argantes by Tancred.

Soma. The moon, born from the eyes of Atri, son of Brahma; made the sovereign of plants and planets. Soma ran away with Tara (Star), wife of Vrihaspata, preceptor of the gods, and Buddha was their offspring.—Hindu mythology.

To drink the Soma. To become immortal. In the Vedic hymns the Soma is the moon-plant, the juice of which confers immortality, and exhilarates even the gods. It is said to be brought down from heaven by a falcon.—Scandinavian mythology.

Somag'ia (sing., somagium). Horse-loads. Italian, soma, a burden; soma'ro, a beast of burden, an ass. (See SUMP-TER.)

Sombre'ro. A Spanish hat.

Somerset. Anciently Sumorsæte or Sumorsæta—i.e., Suth-mor-sæte (south moor settlement).

Somerset or Somersault. Anciently sobersault, sombersalt, sobresault, soubresault, &c. The somer is a corruption of the Latin super; Italian, sopra; Spanish, sobre; old French, soubre; the sault is the Latin salto; French, salir; and the meaning is to leap from an elevated spot, but in the leap the person is to roll round and alight on his feet.

First that could make love faces, or could do
The valter's sombersalts.
Donne, "Poems," p. 300.

Somerset House occupies the site of a princely mansion built by Somerset the Protector, brother of lady Jane Seymour, and uncle of Edward VI. At the death of Somerset on the scaffold it became the property of the crown, and in the reign of James I. was called Denmark House, in honour of Anne of Denmark his queen. Old Somerset House was pulled down towards the close of the last century, and the present structure was erected by Sir William Chambers in 1776.

Somoreen. (See ZAMORIN.)

Son of Belial. One of a wicked disposition; a companion of wickedness; a wicked person. (See Judges xix. 22.)

Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial, they knew not the Lord (1 Sam. ii. 12).

Sons of God. Angels, genuine Christians, or believers who are the sons of God by adoption.

As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God (Rom. viii. 14).

Sons of God. When Judæa was a theocracy the representative of God on earth was by the Jews called god; hence angels, rulers, prophets, and priests were called gods. Moses as the messenger of Jehovah was "a god to Pharaoh" (Exod. vii. 1); magistrates generally were called gods; thus it is said, "Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people" (Exod. xxii. 28). By a still further extension, any one who gave a message to another was his god, because he "inspired him," as Moses was a god to Aaron his spokesman (Exod. iv. 16). Our Lord refers to this use of the word in John x. 34. (See also Gen. vi. 2, 4; Job i. 6; ii. 1; Psa. lxxxii. 6; Exod. iv. 22, 23; Hos. xi. 1.)

Son of One Year. A child one year old; similarly a "son of sixty years," &c. (Exodus xii. 5.)

Son of Perdition. Judas Iscariot. (John xvii. 12.)

Son of perdition. Antichrist, who not only draws others to perdition, but is himself devoted to destruction. (2 Thess. ii. 3.)

Sons of the Band. Soldiers rank and file. (2 Chron. xxv. 13.)

Sons of the Mighty. Heroes. (Psalm xxix. 1.)

Son of the Morning. A traveller. An Oriental phrase, alluding to the custom of rising early in the morning to avoid the mid-day heat, when on one's travels.

Sons of the Prophets. Disciples or scholars belonging to the "college of the prophets," or under instruction for the ministry. In this sense we call the University where we were educated our "Alma ma'ter." (See 1 Kings xx. 35.)

Sons of the Sorceress. Those who study and practise magic. (Isaiah lvii. 3.)

Son of the Star (Bar-cochba). A name assumed by Simon the Jew, in the reign of Hadrian, who gave himself out to be the "Star out of Jacob" mentioned in Numbers xxiv. 17.

Song. Father of modern French song. Panard; also called the "La Fontaine of the Vaudeville." (1691-1765.)

Song of Degrees. The fifteen Psalms, cxx. to cxxiv.; so called because they are prophetic of the return or "going up" from captivity. Some think there is a connection between these Psalms and the fifteen steps of the Temple porch. (Ezekiel xl. 22-26.)

Song of Roland, the renowned nephew of Charlemagne, slain in the pass of Roncesvallès. At the battle of Hastings, Taillefer advanced on horseback before the invading army, and gave the signal for onset by singing this famous song.

Taillefer, who sung well and loud,
Came mounted on a charger proud;
Before the duke the minstrel sprang,
And the Song of Roland sang.
Brut of Wace (translated).

Sonna or Sunna. The Mishna or Oral Law of the Mahometans. Reland ("De Relig. Mahom.," p. 54) says these traditions were orally delivered by Mahomet, and subsequently committed to writing. Abulpharagius asserts that Ali, the son-in-law and cousin of Mahomet, was set aside because he refused to regard the oral traditions of the prophet of the same authority as the Koran ("Hist. Dynast.," 182). Golius says that Sonna means "rule of conduct."

Sonnambula, the most idyllic of Italian operas, represents a young girl on the night before her marriage entering the bed-room of a gentleman just as he is retiring to rest. She is in her night-dress and carries a flat candlestick: she gets into bed, and in this situation is found by her betrothed husband. The melodrame is by Romani, the music by Bellini.

Sonnet. Prince of the Sonnet. Joachim du Bellay, a French sonneteer (1524-1560); but Petrarch better deserves the title (1304-1374).

Sonnites or Sunnites (2 syl.). The orthodox Mahometans of Persia. The heterodox Moslem were called Shyites. (See SONNA.)

Sop. A sop in the pan. A bonne-bouche, tit-bit, dainty morsel; a piece of bread soaked in the dripping of meat caught in a dripping-pan; also a bribe. (See below.)

To give a sop to Cerberus. To give a bribe, to quiet a troublesome customer. Cerberus is Pluto's three-headed dog, stationed at the gates of the infernal regions. When any one died the Greeks and Romans used to put a cake in their hands as a sop to Cerberus, so that it might let them pass without molestation.

Soph. A student at the University is a Freshman for the first year, a Junior Soph for the second year, and a Senior Soph for the third year. The word Soph is a contraction of "sophister," which is the Greek and Latin sophistēs (a sophist). At one time these students had to maintain a given question in the schools by opposing the orthodox view of it. These opponencies are now limited to Law and Divinity degrees.

Sophi or SAFI (mystic), applied in Persia to ascetics generally, was given to Sheik Juneyd u Dien, grandfather of Shah Ismail, a Mahometan sectary or Shyite, who claimed descent, through Ali, from the twelve saints.

Sophis. The twelfth dynasty of Persia, founded by Shah Ismail I., grandson of Sheik Juneyd (1509). (See above.)

Soph'ia (St.), at Constantinople, is not dedicated to a saint named Soph'ia, but to the "Logos," or Second Person of the Trinity, called Hagia Sophia (Sacred Wisdom).

Sophist, Sophistry, Sophism, Sophisticator, &c. These words have quite run from their legitimate meaning. Before the time of Pythagoras (B.C. 586-506), the sages of Greece were called sophists (wise men). Pythagoras out of modesty called himself a philosopher (a wisdom-lover). A century later Protagoras of Ab'dera resumed the title, and a set of quibblers appeared in Athens who professed to answer any question on any subject, and took up the title discarded by the Wise Samian. From this moment sophos and all its family of words were applied to "wisdom falsely so called," and philo-sophos to the "modest search after truth."

Sophro'nia. A Christian virgin beloved by Olindo. When Aladine vowed in vengeance to put to the sword all his Christian subjects, because the "sacred image" of the Virgin had been stolen from the mosque, she accused herself of the theft to save the Christian population, and was condemned to be burnt alive. Olindo, hearing of the sentence, declared Sophronia innocent and himself the only guilty person, whereupon both were bound to the stake; but by the intercession of Clorinda they were released. Olindo and Sophronia became man and wife, but were exiled from the land of Judaea.—Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. ii.

Sophros'ynē (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her purity. She is sent with Andron'ica to conduct Astolpho safely from India to Arabia.

Sorbon'ica. The public disputations sustained by candidates for membership of the Sorbonne. They began at 5 a.m. and lasted till 7 p.m.

Sorbonne. The academic body at Paris is so called, from Robert de Sorbon, canon of Cambrai, its founder. (13th century.)

Sorbonne Acts. The disputations held by candidates for membership of the Sorbonne. (See SORBONICA.)

Sorceress. (See CANIDIA, CIRCE, &c. &c.)

Sordello. A type-man of liberty and human progress, who exemplifies the beau-ideal of human perfectibility.—R. Browning.

Sori'tēs (Greek). A heaped-up or cumulative syllogism. The following will serve as an example:—

All men who believe shall be saved.

All who are saved must be free from sin.

All who are free from sin are innocent in the sight of God. [T. O.]

All who are innocent in the sight of God are meet for heaven.

All who are meet for heaven will be admitted into heaven.

Therefore all who believe will be admitted into heaven.

The famous Soritēs of Themistoclēs was: That his infant son commanded the whole world, proved thus:—

My infant son rules his mother.

His mother rules me.

I rule the Athenians.

The Athenians rule the Greeks.

The Greeks rule Europe.

And Europe rules the world.

Sorrows of Werther. A novel by Goethe. The heroine is Charlotte.

Sortēs Biblicæ. Same as the Sortēs Virgiliæ (q.v.), only the Bible was substituted for the works of the Roman poet.

Sortēs Virgiliæ. Telling one's fortune by consulting the Æneid of Virgil. You take up the book, open it at random, and the passage you touch at random with your finger is the oracular response. Severus consulted the book and read these words: "Forget not thou, O Roman, to rule the people with royal sway." Gordianus, who reigned only a few days, hit upon this verse: "Fate only showed him on the earth, but suffered him not to tarry." But, certainly, the most curious instance is that given by Dr. Wellwood respecting king Charles I. and Lord Falkland while they were both at Oxford. Falkland, to amuse the king, proposed to try this kind of augury, and the king hit upon bk. iv., ver. 881-893, the gist of which passage is that "evil wars would break out, and the king lose his life." Falkland, to laugh the matter off, said he would show his majesty how ridiculously the "lot" would foretell the next fate, and he lighted on bk. xi., ver. 230-237, the lament of Evander for the untimely death of his son Pallas. King Charles, in 1643, mourned over his noble friend who was shot through the body in the battle of Newbury.

Sorts. Out of sorts. A printer's expression—being out of type of a particular letter.

Sos'ia. The living double of another, as the brothers Antiph'olus and brothers

Dromio in the "Comedy of Errors," and the Corsican Brothers in the drama so called. Sosia is a servant of Amphitruo, in Plautus's comedy so called. It is Mercury who assumes the double of Sosia, till Sosia doubts his own identity. Both Dryden and Molière have adapted this play to the modern stage, but the "Comedy of Errors" is based on another drama of the same author, called the "Menæchmi." (See AMPHITRYON.)

Sotad'ics or Sotad'ic Verse. One that reads backwards and forwards the same, as "llewd did I live, and evil I did dwell." So called from Sotadēs, the inventor. These verses are also called palindromic. (See PALINDROME.)

N.B.—It is the old way of making a capital L.

Sot'enville (Mons.). A pompous provincial French nobleman, with all the pride and finesse of a courtier in the reign of Louis XIV., but stolid and old-fashioned. He is the father-in-law of George Dandin, and takes care to make the wealthy merchant bend pretty low under the mighty honour of marrying a sprig of nobility.—Molière, "George Dandin."

Sothic Year. The Persian year consists of 365 days, so that a day is lost in four years, and the lost bits in the course of 1,460 years amount to a year. This period of 1,460 years is called a sothic period, and the reclaimed year made up of the bits is called a sothic year, from sothis (the dog-star), at whose rising it commences.

Soul. The Moslem fancy that it is necessary, when a man is bow-strung, to relax the rope a little before death occurs to let the soul escape. The Greeks and Romans seemed to think that the soul made its escape with life out of the death-wound.

Soul. The Moslem say that the souls of the faithful assume the forms of snow-white birds, and nestle under the throne of Allah, between death and the resurrection.

Soul. Heraclitus held the soul to be a spark of the stellar essence: "scintilla stellaris essentia."—Macrobius, "Sonn. Scip." lib. i., cap. 14.

Vital spark of heavenly flame,
Quit, oh! quit this mortal frame.
Pope, "The Dying Christian to his Soul."

Soul, in Egyptian hieroglyphics, is represented by several emblems, as a basket of fire, a heron, a hawk with a human face, and a ram.

Soulis (Lord William). A man of prodigious strength, cruelty, avarice, and treachery. The foul fiend, under the name of Old Redcap, gave him a charmed life, which nothing should affect "till threefold ropes of sand were twisted round his body." Lord Soulis waylaid the young heir of Branhholm and his lady-love, whose name was May, and kept them in durance vile in Hermitage Castle "till May would consent to become his bride." Walter, the brother of young Branhholm, raised his father's liegemen, who got lord Soulis into their hands. They "wrapped him in lead, and then flung him into a cauldron, till lead, bones, and all were melted." The cauldron is still shown in the Skelfhill at Ninestane Rig, part of the range of hills which separates Liddesdale and Tiviotdale.—John Leyden.

Sound, a narrow sea, is the Anglo-Saxon sund; hence such words as Bomarsund, &c.

Sound as a bell. Quite sound. A cracked bell is useless as a bell.

Blind Fortune did so happily contrive,
That we, as sound as bells, did safe arrive
At Dover. Taylor's "Workes," ii. 22 (1630).

Sound as a roach. Quite sound (a very common expression in some counties). It should be "Sound as a roche," meaning a rock. (French, roche, rock.)

Sound Dues. A toll or tribute which used to be levied by the king of Denmark on all merchant vessels passing through the Sound. (Abolished 1857.)

Sour Grapes. Things despised because they are beyond our reach. Many men of low degree call titles and dignities "sour grapes;" and men of no parts turn up their noses at literary honours. The phrase is from Æsop's fable called "The Fox and the Grapes."

South. Squire South. The name given to Austria in Arbuthnot's "History of John Bull."

South-Sea Scheme or Bubble. A stock-jobbing scheme devised by Sir John Blunt, a lawyer. The object of the company was to buy up the National Debt, and to be allowed the sole privilege of trading in the South Seas. The £100 shares soon realised ten times that sum, but the whole bubble burst in 1720 and ruined thousands. (1710-1720.) The term is applied to any hollow scheme which has a splendid promise, but whose collapse will be sudden and ruinous. (See MISSISSIPPI BUBBLE.)

Southampton Street (London). So called in compliment to the noble family of that title, allied to the Bedford family, the proprietors.

Southampton's Wise Sons. In the early part of the present century, the people of Southampton cut a ditch for barges between Southampton and Redbridge; but as barges could go without paying dues through the "Southampton Water," the ditch or canal was never used. This wise scheme was compared to that of the man who cut two holes through the wall, one for the great cat and the other for its kitten.

Southern Gate of the Sun. The sign Capricornus or winter solstice; so called because it is the most southern limit of the sun's course in the ecliptic.

Soutras. The discourses of Buddha. (See TRIPITAKA.)

Sovereign. A strangely misspelled word, the last syllable being mistaken for the word reign. It is the Latin supern (supreme, over all), with the p changed to v. The French souverain is nearer the Latin word; Italian, sov-rano; Spanish, soberano. Our word has fairly given rise to the punning etymology "so-ever-reign."

Sovereign, a gold coin of the value of twenty shillings, was first issued by Henry VIII., and so called because his majesty in royal robes was represented on it.

Sow (to rhyme with "now"). You have got the wrong sow by the ear. Sow is a large tub with two ears or handles; it is used for pickling or sousing. The expression means, therefore, You have got hold of the wrong vessel, or as the Latin phrase has it, Pro amphorâ urceus (You have brought me the little jug instead of the great gotch). French, seau (a bucket).

You have got the right sow by the ear. You have hit upon the very thing.

Sow. (See PIG IRON.)

Spa or Spa Water. A general name for medical springs; so called from Spa, in Belgium, in the seventeenth century the most fashionable watering-place in Europe. (Teutonic, spewen, to spout forth.)

Spade. Why not call a spade a spade? Do not palliate sins by euphemisms. Parallel phrases:

Ficus ficus, ligonem ligonem, vocat.—Erasmus.

Appelons les figues figues, les prunes prunes, et les poires poires.—Pantagruel.
J'appelle un chat un chat.—Boileau.

We call a nettle but a nettle, and the faults of fools but folly.—Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," ii. 1.

I have learned to call wickedness by its own terms: a fig a fig, and a spade a spade.—John Knox.

Spades in cards. A corruption of the Spanish spados, pikes or swords, called by the French piques (pikes).

Spa'fields (London). So called from "The London Spa," the name of certain tea-gardens once celebrated for their "spa-water."

Spag'iric Art. Alchemy.

Spag'iric Food. Cagliostro's "elixir of immortal youth" was so called from the Latin word spag'iricus (chemical). Hence chemistry is termed the "spag'iric art," and a chemist is a spag'irist.

Spag'iric Sages. Alchemists, or rather "adepts" in the mysteries of alchemy.

Spagnoletto (the little Spaniard). José Ribera, the painter. Salva'tor Rosa and Guerci'no were two of his pupils. (1588-1659.)

Spaie. A red deer of the third year.

The young male is called in the first year a calfe, in the second a broket, the third a spaie, the fourth a stagon or stag, the fifth a great stag, the sixth an hart, and so forth unto his death.—Harrison.

Spain. Château d'Espagne. (See CASTLE.)

Patron saint of Spain. St. James the Greater, who is said to have preached the Gospel in Spain, where what are called his "relics" are preserved.

Span New. (See SPICK.)

Spaniel. The dog from Hispaniola (Hayti).

Spanish Blades. A sword is called a tole'do, from the great excellence of the Toletan steel.

Spanish Main. The circular bank of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbe'an Sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the isthmus, and including Jamaica, St. Domingo, the Leeward Islands, and the Windward Islands, to the coast of Venezuela in South America. It is not the sea, but the bank of islands (Spanish, man'e'a, shackles).

We turned conquerors, and invaded the main of Spain.—Bacon.

Spanish Money. Fair words and compliments. The Spanish government is a model of dishonest dealings, the by-word of the commercial world, yet no man is more irate than a Spaniard if any imputation is laid to his charge as inconsistent with the character of a man of honour.

Spanish Worm. A nail concealed in a piece of wood, against which a carpenter jars his saw or chisel. So called from Spanish woods used in cabinet-work.

Sparkling Heat. Heat greater than white heat.

There be several degrees of heat in a smith's forge, according to the purpose of their work: (1) a blood-red heat; (2) a white flame heat; (3) a sparkling or welding heat; used to weld bars or pieces of iron.—Kennett, "MS. Lansd.," 1033, f. 353.

Spartan Dog. A blood-hound; a blood-thirsty man.

O Spartan dog,
More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea.
Shakespeare, "Othello," v. 2.

Spasmodic School. A name applied by Professor Aytoun to certain authors of the present age, whose writings are distinguished by spasmodic or forced conceits. Of this school the most noted are Carlyle, Bailey (author of "Festus"), Alexander Smith, Sydney Dobell, &c.

Speaking. They are on speaking terms. They just know each other.

They are not on speaking terms. Though they know each other, they do not even salute each other in the street, or say "How d'ye do?"

Speaking Heads and Soundin Stones.

(1) Jabel Nakous (mountain of the bell), in Arabia Petrea, gives out sounds of varying strength whenever the sand slides down its sloping flanks.

(2) The white dry sand of the beach in the isle of Eigg, of the Hebrides, produces, according to Hugh Miller, a musical sound when walked upon.

(3) The statue of Memnon, in Egypt, utters musical sounds when the morning sun darts on it.

(4) The speaking head of Orpheus, at Lesbos, is said to have predicted the bloody death which terminated the expedition of Cyrus the Great into Scythia.

(5) The head of Minos, brought by Odin to Scandinavia, is said to have uttered responses.

(6) Gerbert, afterwards pope Sylvester II., constructed a speaking head of brass (10th century).

(7) Albertus Magnus constructed an earthen head in the thirteenth century, which both spoke and moved. Thomas Aquinas broke it, whereupon the mechanist exclaimed, "There goes the labour of thirty years!"

(8) Alexander made a statue of Esculapio which spoke, but Lucian says the sounds were uttered by a man concealed, and conveyed by tubes to the statue.

(9) The "ear of Dionysius" communicated to Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, whatever was uttered by suspected subjects shut up in a state prison. This "ear" was a large black opening in a rock, about fifty feet high, and the sound was communicated by a series of channels not unlike those of the human ear.

Spear. Cairbar asks if Fingal comes in peace, to which Mor-annal replies, "In peace he comes not, king of Erin, I have seen his forward spear." If a stranger kept the point of his spear forward when he entered a strange land, it was a declaration of war; if he carried the spear on his shoulder, with the point behind him, it was a token of friendship.—Ossian, "Temora," i.

Achilles' Spear. Te'lephus, king of Mysia, in attempting to hinder the Greeks from marching through his country against Troy, was wounded by Achilles' spear, and was told by an oracle that the wound could be cured only by the weapon that gave it; at the same time the Greeks were told that they would never reach Troy except by the aid of Te'lephus. So when the Mysian king repaired to Achilles' tent, some of the rust of the spear was willingly applied to the wound, and in return for the cure which followed, Te'lephus directed the Greeks on their way to Troy.

Te'lephus æterna consumptus tubi perisset
Si non quæ nocuit dextra tulisset opem.—Ovid.

The spear of Te'lephus could both kill and cure.—Plutarch. (See Achilles' Spear.)

The heavy spear of Valence was of great repute in the days of chivalry.

Arthur's Spear. Rone or Ron.

To break a spear. To fight in a tournament.

Spear-half. The male line. The female line was called by the Saxons the Spindle-half (q.v.).

Special Pleading. Quibbling; making your own argument good by forcing certain words or phrases from their obvious and ordinary meaning. A pleading in law means a written statement of a cause pro and con., and "special pleaders" are persons who have been called to the bar, but do not speak as advocates. They advise on evidence, draw up affidavits, state the merits and demerits of a cause, and so on. After a time most special pleaders go to the bar, and many get advanced to the bench.

Specie, Species, means simply what is visible. As things are distinguished by their visible forms, it has come to mean kind or class. As drugs and condiments at one time formed the most important articles of merchandise, they were called species—still retained in the French épices, and English spices. Again, as bank-notes represent money, money itself is called specie, the thing represented.

Spectrum, Spectra, Spectre are all from the Latin specto (to behold). In optics a spectrum is the image of a sunbeam beheld on a screen. Spectra are the images of objects left on the eye after the objects themselves are removed from sight. A spectre is the apparition of a person no longer living or not bodily present.

Spectre of the Brocken. The Brocken is the highest summit of the Harz mountains in Hanover. This summit is at times enveloped in a thick mist, which reflects in a greatly magnified degree any form opposite at sunset. In one of De Quincey's opium-dreams, there is a powerful description of the Brochen spectre.

Speculate means to look out of the window, to spy about (Latin). Metaphorically, to look at a subject with the mind's eye, to spy into it; in commerce, to purchase articles which your mind has speculated on, and has led you to expect will prove profitable. (Specula'ris lapis is what we should now call window-glass.)

Speed. A great punster, the serving-man of Valentine, one of the Two Gentlemen of Verona. Launce is the serving-man of Protheus, the other gentleman.—Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Spell. A pretty good spell. A long bout or pull, as a "spell at the pumps" on board ship, a "spell at the capstan," &c. This is the German spiel, a game, applied to a theatrical representation, a game of cards, bowls, racket, &c.

Spencer. An outer coat without skirts; so named from the late earl Spencer, who wore this kind of dress (George III.).

Spendthrift. The Saxon thrift is the noun of the word thrive (to increase or prosper). Shakespeare says, "I have a mind presages me such thrift" (increase, profit). As our frugal ancestors found saving the best way to grow rich, they applied the word to frugality and careful management. A spendthrift is one who spends the thrift or savings of his father, or, as Old Adam says, the "thrifty hire I saved."—"As You Like It."

Spenser (Edmund), called by Milton "the sage and serious Spenser." Ben Jonson, in a letter to Drummond, states that the poet "died for lake of bread." (1553-1599.)

Spent. Weary. A hunting term. A deer is said to be spent when it stretches out its neck, and is at the point of death. In sea language, a broken mast is said to be "spent."

Spheres. The music or harmony of the spheres. Pythagoras, having ascertained that the pitch of notes depends on the rapidity of vibrations, and also that the planets move at different rates of motion, concluded that the sounds made by their motion must vary according to their different rates of motion. As all things in nature are harmoniously made, these different sounds must harmonise, and the combination he called the "harmony of the spheres." Kepler has a treatise on the subject.

Sphinx (The Egyptian). Half a woman and half a lion, said to symbolise the "rising of the Nile while the sun is in Leo and Virgo." This "saying" must be taken for what it is worth.

Sphinx. Lord Bacon's ingenious resolution of this fable is a fair specimen of what some persons call "spiritualising" the incidents and parables of Scripture. He says that the whole represents "science," which is regarded by the ignorant as "a monster." As the figure of the sphinx is heterogeneous, so the subjects of science "are very various." The female face "denotes volubility of speech;" her wings show that "knowledge like light is rapidly diffused;" her hooked talons remind us of "the arguments of science which enter the mind and lay hold of it." She is placed on a crag overlooking the city, for "all science is placed on an eminence which is hard to climb." If the riddles of the sphinx brought disaster, so the riddles of science "perplex and harass the mind."

You are a perfect sphinx—You speak in riddles. You are nothing better than a sphinx—You speak so obscurely that I cannot understand you. The sphinx was a sea-monster that proposed a riddle to the Thebans, and murdered all who could not guess it. Ædipos solved it, and the sphinx put herself to death. The riddle was this—

What goes on four feet, on two feet, and three,
But the more feet it goes on the weaker it be?

Spice. A small admixture, a flavouring; as, "He is all very well, but there's a spice of conceit about him." Probably the French espèce.

God's bountie is all pure, without any espee of eyyll.—Caxton, "Mirror of the World," l.

Spick and Span New. First applied to cloth just taken off the spannans (stretchers) and spikes (hooks).—Johnson. Another derivation is spick from the Italian spicco (brightness), and spannew is newly span or spun, meaning glossy and newly spun. A third is the Dutch spyker (a warehouse), sponge (glossy or shining), shining or glossy as fresh from the warehouse. Shakespeare uses the expression fire-new (q. v.).

Then, while the honour thou hast got
Is spick and span new, piping hot,
Strike her up bravely thou hadst best,
And trust to fortune all the rest.

Butler, "Hudibras," l. 3.

Spider. It is said that Robert Bruce noticed a spider near his bed try six times unsuccessfully to attach its thread to a balk, and said, "Now shall this spider teach me what I am to do, for I also have failed six times." The spider made a seventh effort and succeeded. Bruce also succeeded, and never afterwards sustained a defeat of any moment. In remembrance of this incident, it has always been deemed a foul crime for any of the name of Bruce to injure a spider. — "Tales of a Grandfather," p. 26, col. 2.

I will grant you, my father, that this valiant burges of Perth is one of the best-hearted men that draws breath....he would be as loth, in wantonness, to kill a spider, as if he were a kinsman to king Robert of happy memory.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fair Maid of Perth," ch. ii.

Spider. When Mahomet fled from Mecca he hid in a certain cave, and the Koreishites were close upon him. Suddenly an acacia in full leaf sprang up at the mouth of the cave, a woodpigeon had its nest in the branches, and a spider had woven its net between the tree and the cave. When the Koreishites saw this they felt persuaded that no one could have recently passed that way, and went on.

Spider, anciently supposed to envenom everything it touched. In the examination into the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, one of the witnesses deposed "that the countess wished him to get the strongest poison that he could . . ." Accordingly he brought seven great spiders.

There may be in the cup
A spider steeped, and one may drink, depart.
And yet partake no venom.

Shakespeare, "Winter's Tale," ii. 1.

Spider. According to old wives' fable, fever may be cured by wearing a spider in a nutshell round the neck.

Cured by wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell.—Longfellow, "Evangeline."

Spiders will never set their webs on a cedar roof.—Caughy, "Letters," (1845.)

Spiders spin only on dark days.

The subtle spider never spins
But on dark days his slimy gins.
S. Butler, "On a Nonconformist," iv.

Spider. The shoal called the Sham-bles at the entrance of Portland Roads was very dangerous before the break-water was constructed. According to legend, at the bottom of the gigantic shaft are the wrecks of ships seized and sunk by the huge spider Kraken, called also the fish-mountain.

Spid'reen or Spid'reen. The Mrs. Harris of ships. If a sailor is asked what ship he belongs to, and does not choose to tell, he will say "The spid'reen frigate with nine decks." Officers who will not tell their quarters, give B.K.S. as their address. (See B.K.S.)

Spigot. Spare at the spiggot and spill at the bung. To be parsimonious in trifles and wasteful in great matters, like a man who stops his beer-tub at the vent-hole and leaves it running at the bung-hole.

Spindle-half. The female line. A Saxon term. The spindle was the pin on which the thread was wound from the spinning-wheel. (See SPEAR-HALF.)

Spinning Jenny. Jennie is a diminutive and corruption of engine ('ginie). A little engine invented by James Hargreaves, a Lancashire weaver, in 1767. It is usually said that he so called it after his wife and daughter; but the name of his wife was Elizabeth, and he never had a daughter.

Spino'za. The "system of Spino'za" is that matter is eternal, and that the universe is God.

Spinster. An unmarried woman.

The fleece which was brought home by the Anglo-Saxons in summer, was spun into clothing by the female part of each family during the winter. King Edward the Elder commanded his daughters to be instructed in the use of the distaff. Alfred the Great, in his will, calls the female part of his family the spindle side; and it was a regularly received axiom with our frugal forefathers, that no young woman was fit to be a wife till she had spun for herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. Hence the maiden was termed a spinner or spinster, and the married woman a wife or "one who has been a spinner." (Saxon, wifre, a weaver; wyfan or wefian, to weave.)

Spirits. Inflammable liquors obtained by distillation. This is connected with the ancient notion of bottle-imps (q.v.), whence these liquors were largely used in the black arts.

Spirits. There are four spirits and seven bodies in alchemy. The spirits are quicksilver, orpiment, sal-ammoniac, and brimstone. (See SEVEN BODIES.)

The first spirit quiksilver call'd is;
The second orpiment; the third I wis
Sal armoni'ac; and the feth bremstoon.
Chaucer, Prolog. of the "Chaucounes Yemanys Tale."

Spirits. There are three in animal bodies:—

(1) The animal spirits, seated in the brain; they perform through the nerves all the actions of sense and motion.

(2) The vital spirits, seated in the heart, on which depend the motion of the blood and animal heat.

(3) The natural spirits, seated in the liver, on which depend the temper and "spirit of mind."

To give up the spirit. To die. At death the "spirit is given back to Him who gave it."

Spiritual Mother. So Johanna Southcott is addressed by her disciples. (1750-1814.)

Spiritualism or Spiritism. A system which started up in America in 1848. It professes that certain living persons have the power of holding communion with the "spirits of the dead." The system, without doubt, owes its origin to Andrew Jackson Davis, "the Seer of Ploughkeepsie."

Spirit or Spurt. A sudden convulsive effort (Swedish, spruta; Danish, spruder; our spout, to throw up water in a jet).

Spit. Spawn, the eggs of insects; as Cuckoo-spit, the spawn of insects common on lavender, rosemary, catch-fly, and apple-trees. Spit and spawn are both from the same root, another shoot of which is spew.

Spitting for Luck. Boys often spit on a piece of money given to them for luck. Boxers spit upon their hands for luck. Fishwomen not unfrequently spit upon their hansel (i.e., the first money they take) for luck. Spitting was a charm against fascination among the ancient Greeks and Romans. Pliny says it averted witchcraft, and availed in giving to an enemy a shrewder blow.

Thrice on my breast I spit, to guard me safe
From fascinating charms. Theocritus.

Spitalfields (London). A spital is a charitable foundation for the care of the poor, and these were the fields of the almshouse founded in 1197 by Walter Brune and his wife Rosia.

Spitfire. An irascible person, whose angry words are like fire spit from the mouth of a fire-eater.

Spittle or Spital. An hospital.

A spittle or hospital for poore folkes diseased; a spittle, hospitall, or lazarhouse for lepers.—Baret, "Alwearie." (1580.)

Spittle Sermons. Sermons preached formerly at the Spittle, in a pulpit erected expressly for the purpose. Subsequently they were preached at Christchurch, City, on Easter Monday and Tuesday. Ben Jonson alludes to them in his "Underwoods," ap. Gifford, viii. 414.

Splay is a contraction of display (to unfold; Latin, dis-plico). A splay-window is one in a V shape, the external opening being very wide, to admit as much light as possible, but the inner opening being very small. A splay-foot is a foot displayed or turned outward. A splay-mouth is a wide mouth, like that of a clown.

Spleen was at one time believed to be the seat of ill-humour and melancholy. The herb spleen-wort was supposed to remove these splenic disorders.

Splendid Shilling. A mock heroic by John Philips.

Splice. To marry. Very strangely "splice" means to split or divide. The way it came to signify unite is this: Ropes' ends are first untwisted before the strands are interwoven. Joining two ropes together by interweaving their strands is "splicing" them. Splicing wood is joining two boards together, the term being borrowed from the sailor. (Dutch, spissen; German, spleissen.)

Spoke. When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out Spoke, they mean that the person who gets up to address the assembly has spoken already, and cannot speak again except in explanation of something imperfectly understood.

I have put my spoke into his wheel. I have shut him up. The allusion is to the pin or spoke used to lock wheels in machinery.

Don't put your spoke into my wheel. Don't interfere with my business; Let my wheel turn, and don't you put a pin in to stop it or interrupt its movement. The Dutch have "Een spaak in t'wiel steeken," to thwart a purpose.

When solid wheels were used, the driver was provided with a pin or spoke, which he thrust into one of the three holes made to receive it, to skid the cart when it went down-hill. The carts used by railway navvies, and tram-waggons used in collieries, still have a wheel "spoked" in order to skid it.

Spoon. (See APOSTLE-SPOONS.)

He hath need of a long spoon that eateth with the devil. Shakespeare alludes to this proverb in the "Comedy of Errors," iv. 3; and again in the "Tempest," ii. 2, where Stephano says "Mercy! mercy! this is a devil. . . I will leave him, I have no long spoon."

Therfor behoveth him a ful long spoon
That schal ete with a fend.

Chaucer, "The Squires Tale," 10,916.

A tea-spoon, dessert-spoon, table-spoon, and gravy-spoon. £5,000, £10,000, £15,000, and £20,000. When Stratfield and Laurence, in 1860, were on the point of failure, an offer was made to accommodate them with £5,000, whereupon Laurence replied, "Come, come, that will never do; you are feeding me with a tea-spoon." The four terms were subsequently introduced into the financial world.

Spooning, in rowing, is dipping the oars so little into the water as merely to skim the surface. The resistance being very small, much water is thrown up, and more disturbed.

Spoony. Lovingly soft. A sea-phrase. When a ship under sail in a sea-storm cannot bear it, but is obliged to put right before the wind, she is said to "spoon;" so a young man under sail in the sea of courtship "spoons" when he cannot bear it, but is obliged to put right before the gale of his lady's "eye-brow."

Sport a Door or Oak. To keep an outer door shut. In the Universities the College rooms have two doors, an outer and an inner one. The outer door is called the sporting door, and is opened with a key. When shut it is to give notice to visitors that the person who occupies the rooms is not at home, or is not to be disturbed. The word sport means to exhibit to the public, as, "to sport a new equipage," "to sport a new tile [hat]," &c.; whence to have a new thing as "to sport an ægro-tat [sick-leave]," or merely to show to the public, as "sport a door or oak." The word is a contraction of support. (French, supporter, to sustain, carry; Latin, supporto.)

Sporting Seasons in England.

Those marked thus (*) are fixed by Act of Parliament.

Black Game,* from Aug. 20 to Dec. 10; but in Somerset, Devon, and New Forest, from Sept. 1 to Dec. 10.

Blackcock, Aug. 20 to Dec. 10.

Buck hunting, Aug. 20 to Sept. 17.

Bustard,* Sept. 1 to March 1.

Red Deer hunted, Aug. 20 to Sept. 31.

Male Deer (Ireland),* Oct. 20 to June 10.

Fallow Deer (Ireland), June 20 to Michaelmas.

Eels, (about) April 20 to Oct. 25.

Fox hunting, (about) Oct. to Lady Day.

Fox Cubs, Aug. to the first Monday in Nov.

*Grouse shooting, Aug. 12 to Dec. 10.

Hare hunting, Oct. 29 to Feb. 27.

Hare coursing, between Sept. and March.

Hind, hunted in October, and again between April 10 and May 20.

Moor Game (Ireland),* Aug. 20 to Dec. 10.

Oyster season, Aug. 5 to May.

Partridge shooting,* Sept. 1 to Feb. 1.

Pheasant shooting,* Oct. 1 to Feb. 1.

Ptarmigan, Aug. 12 to Dec. 10.

Quail, Aug. 12 to Jan. 10.

Rabbits, between Oct. and March.

Salmon,* Feb. 1 to Sept. 1.

Salmon, rod fishing,* Nov. 1 to Sept. 1.

Trout fishing, May 1 to Sept. 10.

Trout, in the Thames, April 1 to Sept. 10.

Woodcocks, about Nov. to Jan.

For Ireland and Scotland there are special game-laws. (See TIME OF GRACE.)

N.B.—Game in England: hare, pheasant, partridge, grouse, and moor-towl; in Scotland, same as England, with the addition of ptarmigan; in Ireland, same as England, with the addition of deer, black-game, landrail, quail, and bustard.

Spouse (Spouse, 1 syl.) means one whom sponsors have answered for. In Rome, before marriage, the friends of the parties about to be married met at the house of the woman's father to settle the marriage contract. This contract was called spousalia (espousals); the man and woman were spouses. The contracting parties were each asked An spondes (Do you agree)? and replied Spondeo (I agree).

Spouse of Jesus. "Our seraphic mother the holy Tere'sa," born at Avila in 1515, is so called in the Roman Catholic church.

Spout. Up the spout. At the pawnbroker's. In allusion to the "spout" up which brokers send the articles ticketed. When redeemed they return down the spout—i.e., from the store-room to the shop.

As for spoons, forks, and jewelry, they are not taken so readily to the smelting-pot, but to well-known places where there is a pipe [spout] which your lordships may have seen in a pawnbroker's shop. The thief taps, the pipe is lifted up, and in the course of a minute a hand comes out, covered with a glove, takes up the article, and gives out the money for it.—Shaffesbury, "The Times," March 1st, 1839.

Sprat. To bait with a sprat to catch a mackerel. To give a small thing under the hope of getting something much more valuable. The French say "A pea for a bean." (See GARVIES.)

Spring Gardens (London). So called from a playfully contrived water-work, which, on being unguardedly pressed by the foot, sprinkled the bystanders with water. (James I., &c.)

Spring Tide. The tide that springs or leaps or swells up. These full tides occur at the new and full moon, when the attraction of both sun and moon act in a direct line, as thus—

* ○ ⊕ or * ⊕ ●

Springer. Ludwig the Springer. The margrave of Thuringia, in the eleventh century; so called because he escaped from Giebichenstein castle by leaping over the river Saale.

Sprout-kele. The Saxon name for February. Kele is cole-wort, the great pot-wort of the ancient Saxons; the broth made thereof was also called kele. This important potage herb begins to sprout in February.—Verstegan.

Shakespeare speaks of winter as the time when "greasy Joan doth kele the pot"—that is, put kele into the pot.

Spuma'dor. Prince Arthur's horse of "heavenly seed;" so called from the foam of its mouth, which showed its fiery temper.—Spenser, "Fairy Queen," bk. ii.

Spunging House. A victualling house where persons arrested for debt are kept for twenty-four hours, before lodging them in prison. The houses so used are generally kept by a bailiff, and the person lodged is spunged of all his money before he leaves.

Spurs. Ripon spurs. The best spurs were made at Ripon, in Yorkshire.

If my spurs be not right Rippon.
Ben Jonson, "Staple of News."

The Battle of Spurs. The battle of Guinegate, fought in 1513, between Henry VIII. and the duc de Longueville; so called because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight.

The Battle of the Spurs. The battle of Courtrai, in 1302; so called because the victorious Flemings gathered from the field more than 700 gilt spurs, worn by French nobles slain in the fight.

To dish up the spurs. In Scotland, during the times of the Border feuds, when any of the great families had come to the end of their provisions the lady of the house sent up a pair of spurs for the last course, to intimate that it was time to put spurs to the horses and make a raid upon England for more cattle.

He dishes up the spurs in his helpless address, like one of the old Border chiefs with an empty larder.—The Daily Telegraph.

To win his spurs. To gain the rank of knighthood. When a man was knighted, the person who dubbed him presented him with a pair of gilt spurs.

Spur Money. Money given to redeem a pair of spurs. Gifford says, in the time of Ben Jonson, in consequence of the interruptions to divine service occasioned by the ringing of the spurs worn, a small fine was imposed on those who entered church in spurs. The enforcement of this fine was committed to the beadles and chorister-boys.

Spy. Vidoeq, the spy in the French revolution, was a short man, vivacious, vain, and talkative. He spoke of his feats with real enthusiasm and gusto.

Spy Wednesday. The Wednesday before Good Friday, when Judas bargained to become the spy of the Jewish Sanhedrim. (Matt. xxvi. 3-5, 14-16.)

Squab. Poet Squab. John Dryden was so called by lord Rochester, because of his squab corpulent figure.

Squab-Pie. Pie made of squabs—i.e., young pigeons.

Squabbled. Letters or "formes" are said to be squabbled when the lines are twisted or awry. To squabble is to scuffle, to create a disorder.

Squad. The awkward squad consists of recruits not yet fitted to take their places in the regimental line. Squad is a mere contraction of squadron.

Square. To put oneself in the attitude of boxing, to quarrel (Welsh cwar, the contraction of gwarel, to quarrel).

Are you such fools
To square for this?

Shakespeare, "Titus Andronicus," ii. 1.

Square the Circle. To attempt an impossibility. The allusion is to the mathematical question whether a circle can be made which contains precisely the same area as a square. The difficulty is to find the precise ratio between the diameter and the circumference. Popularly it is 3.14159 the next decimals would be 26537, but the numbers would go on ad infinitum.

Squeers. Mr. Wackford Squeers. An overbearing, ignorant schoolmaster, in "Nicholas Nickleby," by Charles Dickens.

Mrs. Squeers. The help-meet of the worthy pedagogue mentioned above.

Miss Fanny Squeers "was not tall like her mother, but short like her father; from the former she inherited a voice of hoarse quality, and from the latter a remarkable expression of the right eye." She was twenty-three when Nicholas Nickleby was introduced to "Do-the-boys Hall."

Master Wackford Squeers. A spoiled boy, who was dressed in the best clothes of the scholars, and was a true "chip of the old block."

Squint-eyed (Guercino). Gian-Francesco Barbicri, the great painter. (1590-1666.)

Squintife'go. Squinting.

The squintife'go maid
Of Isis awe thee, lest the gods for squint
Should with a swelling dropsy stuff thy skin.
Dryden, "Fifth Satire."

Squire of Dames. Any cavalier who is devoted to ladies. Spenser, in his "Faëry Queen," bk iii., ch. 7, introduces the term and records his adventure.

Srama'nas or Bikshus. Mendicants, a sort of Buddhist begging friars.

Stabat Ma'ter. The celebrated Latin hymn on the Crucifixion, which forms a part of the service during Passion week, in the Roman Catholic church. It was composed by Jacopone, a Franciscan of the thirteenth century, and has been set to music by Pergolesi, also by Rossi'ni. It begins—

Stabat mater dolorosa
Juxta crucem lacrimosa
Dum pendebat Filius.

Near the cross, with anguish quailing,
Stood the sacred mother wailing
While her Son hung crucified.

Stable Keys, as those of cow-houses, have frequently a perforated flint or horn appended to them. This is a charm to guard the creatures from nightmare. The flint is to propitiate the gnomes, and the horn to obtain the good graces of Pan, the protector of cattle.

Staff. I keep the staff in my own hand. I keep possession; I retain the right. The staff was the ancient sceptre, and therefore figuratively it means power, authority, dignity, &c.

To part with the staff. To lose or give up office or possession. (See above.)

Give up your staff, sir, and the king his realm.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry VI.," ii. 3.

To put down one's staff in a place. To take up one's residence. The allusion is to the tent-staff: where the staff is placed, there the tent is stretched, and the nomad resides.

Stafford. The part of the river Sow which is forded by staffs.

He has had a treat in Stafford Court. He has been thoroughly cudgelled. Of course the pun is on the word staff, a stick. The French have a similar phrase, Il a esté au festin de Martin Baston (He has been to Jack Drum's entertainment).

Stafford Law. A beating. (Italian, Braccésca licenza.)—Florio, p. 66. (See above.)

Stag, strictly speaking, is a hart in its fifth year ("Maistre of the Game," MS. Bodl., 546). According to the same authority it is called in its fourth year a stagart. Harrison says a red-deer of the fourth year is a stagon (p. 226).

Stag in Christian art. The attribute of St. Julian Hospitaller, St. Felix of Valois, and St. Aidan. When it has a crucifix between its horns it alludes to the legendary tale of St. Hubert. When luminous it belongs to St. Eustachius.

Stags, in Stock-exchange phraseology, are persons who apply for the allotment of shares in a joint-stock company, not because they wish to hold the shares, but because they hope to sell the allotment at a premium. If they fail in this they forbear to pay the deposit, and the allotment is forfeited. (See BEAR, BULL.)

Stagi'rite or Stagyrite (3 syl.). Aristotle, who was born at Stagira, in Macedonia. Generally called Stagi'rite in English verse.

In one rich soul
Plato, the Stagyrite, and Tully joined.
Thomson, "Summer."

And rules as strict his laboured work confine
As if the Stagyrite o'erlooked each line.
Pope, "Essay on Criticism."

Plato's love sublime
And all the wisdom of the Stagyrite
Enriched and beautified his studious mind.
Wordsworth.

Stain. A contraction of distain; or s privative, and tain, to dye, something that destroys the dye. (French, déteindre; Latin, dis-tingere, to "dis-colour.")

Stalking-Horse. A mask to conceal some design; a person put forward to mislead; a sham. Fowlers used to conceal themselves behind a canvas, on which was represented a horse grazing, and went on stalking step by step till they got within shot of the game.

N.B.—To stalk is to walk with strides, from the Saxon stælcan.

He uses his folly like a stalking-horse, and under the presentation of that he shoots his wit.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It," v. 4.

Stalwart. A stalwart yeoman means one worth stealing or taking (Saxon, stæl-weorth). Of course the reference is to war, and means a fine fellow worth making captive.

Stammerer (The).

Louis II. of France, le Bègue. (846, 877-879.)

Michael II. emperor of the East, le Bègue. (*, 820-829.)

Notker or Notger of St. Gall. (830-912.)

Stamp. 'Tis of the right stamp—has the stamp of genuine merit. A metaphor taken from current coin, which is stamped with a recognised stamp and superscription.

Stampede. A sudden panic in a herd of buffaloes, causing them to rush away pell-mell. The panic-flight of the Federals at Bull Run, near the Potomac, U.S., in 1861, was a stampede.

Stand. To stand for a child. To be sponsor for it; to stand in its place and answer for it.

To stand to a bargain, to abide by it, is simply the Latin starè conventis, conditionibus starè, pactis starè, &c.

I'll stand it out—persist in what I say. A mere translation of "persist" (Latin, per-sisto or per-sto).

Standard.

Standard of Augustus. A globe, to indicate his conquest of the whole world.

Standard of Edward I. The arms of England, St. George, St. Edmond, and St. Edward.

Standard of Mahomet. (See SANDSCHAKI.)

Standard of the Anglo-Saxons. A white horse.

Royal Standard of Great Britain. A banner with the national arms covering the entire field.

The Celestial Standard. So the Turks call their great green banner, which they say was given to Mahomet by the angel Gabriel. (See SANDSCHAKI.)

Standard of the Empire of Constantinople, called Lab'arum. It consisted of a silver-plated spear with a cross-beam, from which hung a small silk banner, bearing the portrait of the reigning family and the famous monogram. (Celtic, lop-heer; Welsh, lab-hair, cloth of the host.)—Gibbon, xx.

The Danish Standard. A raven.

Standard of ancient Egypt. An eagle stripped of its feathers. This was the emblem of the Nile.

Standard of the ancient Franks. A tiger or wolf; but subsequently the Roman eagle.

Standard of the ancient Gauls. A lion, bull, or bear.

Greco-Egyptian Standard. A round-headed table-knife or a semi-circular fan.

Standards of ancient Greece. The Greek standard was a purple coat on the top of a spear.

(1) Athens, an olive or owl.

(2) Corinth, a pegasus or flying horse.

(3) Lacedæmon, the initial letter L, in Greek (Λ).

(4) Messenia, the initial letter M.

(5) Thebes, a sphinx.

Standard of Heliopolis. On the top of a staff, the head of a white eagle, with the breast stripped of feathers and without wings. This was the symbol of Jupiter and of the Lagidæ.

Standards of the ancient Jews ("degel") belonged to the four tribes of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan. The Rabbinus say the standard of Judah bore a lion, that of Reuben a man, that of Ephraim a bull, and that of Dan the cherubim (Gen. xlix. 3-22). They were ornamented with white, purple, crimson, and blue, and were embroidered.

Standard of ancient Persia. The one adopted by Cyrus, and perpetuated, was a golden eagle with outstretched wings; the colour white.

Persian Standard. A blacksmith's apron. Kaivah, sometimes called Gao, a blacksmith, headed a rebellion against Biver, surnamed Deh-ak (ten vices), a merciless tyrant, and displayed his apron as a banner. The apron was adopted by the next king, and continued for centuries to be the national standard. (B.C. 800.)

Roman Standards. In the rude ages a wisp of straw. This was succeeded by bronze or silver devices attached to a staff. Pliny enumerates five—viz., the eagle, wolf, minotaur, horse, and boar. In later ages the image of the emperor, a hand outstretched, a dragon with a silver head and body of taffety. Marius confined all promiscuous devices to the cohorts, and reserved the eagle for the exclusive use of the legion. This eagle, made of gold and silver, was borne on the top of a spear, and was represented with its wings displayed, and bearing in one of its talons a thunderbolt.

Turkish Standards.

(1) Sanjak Cherif (Standard of the Prophet), green silk. This is preserved with great care in the Seraglio, and is never brought forth except in time of war.

(2) The Sanjak, red.

(3) The Tug, consisting of one, two, or three horse-tails, according to the rank of the person who bears it. Pachas with three tails are of the highest dignity, and are entitled beglerbey (prince of princes). Beys have only one horse-tail. The tails are fastened to the end of a gilt lance, and carried before the pacha or bey.

(4) The Alem, a broad standard which, instead of a spear-head, has in the middle a silver plate of a crescent shape.

Size of Standards varied according to the rank of the person who bore them. The standard of an emperor was eleven yards in length; of a king, nine yards; of a prince, seven yards; of a marquis, six and a half yards; of an earl, six yards; of a viscount or baron, five yards; of a knight-banneret, four and a half yards; of a baronet, four yards. They generally contained the arms of the bearer, his cognizance and crest, his motto or war-cry, and were fringed with his livery.

The Battle of the Standard, between the English and the Scotch, at Cuton Moor, near Northallerton, in 1138. Here David I., fighting on behalf of Matilda, was defeated by king Stephen's general Robert de Moubray. It received its name from a ship's mast erected on a waggon, and placed in the centre of the English army; the mast displayed the standards of St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon. On the top of the mast was a little casket containing a consecrated host.—Hailes, "Annals of Scotland," i., p. 85.

Standing Orders. Those bye-laws of the Houses of Parliament for the conduct of their proceedings which stand in force till they are either rescinded or suspended. Their suspension is generally caused by a desire to hurry through a bill with unusual expedition.

Standing Stones. (See STONES.)

Stang. To ride the stang. To be under petticoat government. At one time a man who ill-treated his wife was made to sit on a "stang" or pole hoisted on men's shoulders. On this uneasy conveyance the "stanger" was carried in procession amidst the hootings and jeerings of his neighbours. (Saxon, stung, a pole.) (See SKIMMINGTON.)

Stanley, memorialised by Thomson in his "Summer," was the daughter of George Stanley, Esq., of Paultens, in Hampshire.

Stannary Courts. Courts of record in Cornwall and Devon for the administration of justice among the tanners (Latin, stannum, tin).

Star (in Christian art). St. Bruno bears one on his breast; St. Dominic, St. Humbert, St. Peter of Alcan'tara, one over their head, or on their forehead, &c.

Star. The ensign of knightly rank. A star of some form constitutes part of the insignia of every order of knighthood.

His star is in the ascendant. He is in luck's way; said of a person to whom some good fortune has befallen and who is very prosperous. According to astrology, those leading stars which are above the horizon at a person's birth influence his life and fortune: when those stars are in the ascendant, he is strong, healthy, and lucky; but when they are depressed below the horizon, his stars do not shine on him, and he is in the shade and subject to ill-fortune.

The star of Richelieu was still in the ascendant.
—St. Simon.

Star of the South. A splendid diamond found in Brazil in 1853.

Star Chamber. A court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster, abolished in the reign of Charles I. So called because the ceiling or roof was decorated with gilt stars. Its jurisdiction was to punish such offences as the law had made no provision for.

Star-fish or Sea-star, found in the Persian Gulf, looks at night like the full moon surrounded by rays.—Mirza Abu Taleb.

Nought but the sea-star to light up her tomb.
Thomas Moore, "Fire Worshipers."

Star Inn. In compliment to the lords of Oxford, whose cognizance it is, and who decided the fate of the battle of Barnet.

Starboard means rudder-side (German, steuer-bord), the rudder being in the right hand of the helmsman.

Starch. Mrs. Anne Turner, half-milliner, half-procuress, introduced into England the French custom of using yellow starch in getting up bands and cuffs. She trafficked in poison, and being concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, appeared on the scaffold with a huge ruff. This was done by lord Coke's order, and was the means of putting an end to this absurd fashion.

I shall never forget poor Mistress Turner, my honoured patroness, peace be with her! She had the ill-luck to meddle in the matter of Somerset and Overbury, and so the great earl and his lady slept their necks out of the collar, and left her and some half-dozen others to suffer in their stead.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel," ch. viii.

Starka'der, the Eight-handed. Grandfather of Berserker, in Scandinavian mythology.

Staro'vers means "Old Believers," a term given to the Russian nonconformists, who separated from the Greek church when the "new doctrine" was introduced that the czar is God's vicegerent on earth.

Starry Bowls. In the Mahometan Paradise the blest drink from the crystal sea in goblets made of stars.—Chateaubriand, "Beauties of Christianity."

Starry Sphere. The eighth heaven of the Peripatetic system; also called the "Firmament."

The Crystal Heaven is this, whose rigour guides
And binds the starry sphere.

Camœns, "Lusiad," bk. x.

Starvation Dundas. Henry Dundas, first lord Melville, who was the first to introduce the word starvation into the language, on an American debate in 1775 (Saxon, stearfian, to perish of hunger; German, sterben; Dutch, sterven).

Starve. (See CLAM.)

Starved with Cold. Half dead with cold (Anglo-Saxon, starf, dead or died).

States. Mother of States. Virginia, the first colonised of the thirteen states which united in the declaration of independence.

Statira. A stock name of those historical romances which represented the fate of empires as turning on the effects produced on a cracked-brained lover by some charming Manda'na or Statira. In La Calprenède's "Cassandra," Statira is represented as the perfection of female beauty, and is ultimately married to Oroondates.

Statira. In the "Rival Queens," by Nathaniel Lee.

Sta'tor (the stopper or arrestor). When the Romans fled from the Sabines, they stopped at a certain place and made terms with the victors. On this spot they afterwards built a temple to Jupiter, and called it the temple of Jupiter Stator or Jupiter who caused them to stop in their flight.

Here, Stator Jove and Phœbus god of verse,
The votive tablet I susceid.

Prior.

Statue. The largest ever made was the Colossos of Rhodes; the next largest is the statue of Bavaria, erected by Louis I. king of Bavaria.

Statue. It was Pygmalion who fell in love with his own statue.

Statue. Of all the projects of Alexander, none was more hare-brained than his proposal to have Mount Athos hewed into a statue of himself. It is said he even arranged with a sculptor to undertake the job.

Statute Fairs. (See MOP.)

Steak, as beef-steak, is not from the German stuk (a lump), but from the Norse steak (to fry). Beef-steak is beef fried or broiled. In the north of Scotland a slice of salmon fried is called a "salmon-steak," but a slice of salmon boiled is never so called.

Steal. A handle. Stealing—putting handles on (Yorkshire). This is the Anglo-Saxon stela, a stalk or handle.

Steale or handell of a staffe, manche, hantel.—Palegrave.

Steelyard (London, adjoining Dowgate); so called from being the place where the king's steelyard or beam was set up, for weighing goods imported into London.

Steenie (2 syl.). A nickname given by James I. to George Villiers, duke of Buckingham. The half profane allusion is to Acts vi. 15, where those who looked on Stephen the martyr "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel."

Steeplechase. A horse-race across fields, hedges, ditches, and obstacles of every sort that happen to lie in the way. The term arose from a party of fox-hunters on their return from an unsuccessful chase, who agreed to race to the village church, the steeple of which was in sight; he who first touched the church with his whip was to be the winner. The entire distance was two miles.

Stella, of Sir Philip Sidney, was lady Penelope Devereux, daughter of the earl of Essex. She subsequently became, by marriage, lady Rich. (See ASTRO-PHEL.)

Stella. Dean Swift so called his pupil and (?) wife, Esther Johnson—Esther being converted to Aster, the Greek for "star."

Stel'vio. The pass of the Stelvio. The highest carriage-road in Europe (9,176 feet above the sea-level). It leads from Bor'mio to Glurns.

Sten'tor. The voice of a Stentor. A very loud voice. Stentor was a Greek herald in the Trojan war. According to Homer, his voice was as loud as that of fifty men combined.

Stento'rian lungs. Lungs like those of Stentor.

Sten'toropho'nic Voice. A voice proceeding from a speaking-trumpet or stentorophonic tube, such as Sir Samuel Moreland invented to be used at sea.

I heard a formidable noise
Loud as the stentrophonic voice,
That roared far off "Dispatch! and strip!"
Butler, "Hudibras," iii. l.

Steph'ano (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Earl of Carnüti, afterwards of Chartres and Blois, led 400 men in the allied Christian army. He was noted for martial prowess and sage counsel (bk. i.).

Stephano. A drunken butler in Shakespeare's "Tempest."

Stephen of Amboise (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Leader of 5,000 foot-soldiers from Blois and Tours. Impetuous in attack, but soon repulsed. Shot by Clorinda with an arrow (bk. xi.).

Stephens (Joanna) professed to have made a wonderful discovery. Drummond, the banker, set on foot a subscription to purchase her secret. The sum she asked was £5,000. When £1,500 had been raised by private subscription, government voted £3,500. The secret was a decoction of soap, swine's cresses, honey, egg-shells, and snails, made into pills, and a powder to match. Joanna Stephens got the money and forthwith disappeared.

Stepney Papers. A voluminous collection of political letters between Mr. Stepney, the British minister, and our ambassadors at various European courts, the duke of Marlborough, and other public characters of the time. Part of the correspondence is in the British Museum, and part in the Public Record Office. It is very valuable, as this was the period called the Seven Years' War. The original letters are preserved in bound volumes, but the whole correspondence is in print also. (Between 1692 and 1706.)

Sterling Money. Spelman derives the word from esterlings, merchants of the Hans Towns, who came over and reformed our coin in the reign of John. Others say it is starling (little star), in allusion to a star impressed on the coin. Others refer it to Stirling Castle in Scotland, where money was coined in the reign of Edward I.—Sir Matthew Hale.

In the time of king Richard I., monie coined in the east parts of Germany began to be of especial request in England for the puritie thereof, and was called Easterling monie, as all the inhabitants of those parts were called Easterlings; and shortly after some of that countrie, skillfull in mint matters and alliaies, were sent for into this realm to bring the coine to perfection, which since that time was called of them sterling for Easterling.—Camden.

Stern. To sit at the stern; At the stern of public affairs. Having the management of public affairs. The stern is the steer-ern—i.e., steer-place; and to sit at the stern is the same as “to sit at the helm;” at the stern of public affairs is the same as “at the helm.”

Sit at chiefest stern of public weal.
Shakespeare, “1 Henry VI.,” i. 1.

Sternhold (Thomas) versified fifty-one of the Psalms. The remainder were the productions of Hopkins and some others. Sternhold and Hopkins' Psalms used to be attached to the Common Prayer Book.

Mistaken choirs refuse the solemn strain
Of ancient Sternhold. Crabbe, “Borough.”

Sterry (in “Hudibras”). A fanatical preacher, admired by Hugh Peters.

Stick. A Composing Stick is a hand instrument into which a compositor places the letters to be set up. Each row or line of letters is pushed home and held in place by a movable “setting rule,” against which the thumb presses. When a stick is full the matter set up is transferred to a “galley” (q. v.), and from the galley it is transferred to the “chase” (q. v.). Called a stick because the compositor sticks the letters into it.

Stickler. One who obstinately maintains some custom or opinion; as a stickler for church government. (See below.)

A stickler about trifles. One particular about things of no moment. Sticklers were the seconds in ancient single combats, very punctilious about the minutest points of etiquette. They were so called from the white stick which they carried in emblem of their office.

I am willing... to give thee precedence, and content myself with the humbler office of stickler.—Sir Walter Scott, “Fair Maid of Perth,” ch. xvi.

Stigmata. Impressions on certain persons of marks corresponding to some or all of the wounds received by our Saviour in his trial and crucifixion. The following claim to have been so stigmatised:—

(1) MEN.—Angelo del Paz (all the marks); Benedict of Reggio (the crown of thorns). 1602; Carlo di Saeta (the lance-wound); Dodo, a Premonstratensian monk (all the marks); Francis of Assisi (all the marks, impressed on him by a seraph with six wings), September 15th, 1224; Nicholas of Ravenna, &c.

(2) WOMEN.—Blanca de Gazeran; St. Catharine of Sienna; Catharine di Riconisco (the crown of thorns), 1583; Cecilia di Nobili of Nocera, 1655; Clara di Pugny (mark of the spear), 1514; “Estatica” of Caldaro (all the marks), 1842; Gabriella da Piezolo of Aquila (the spear-mark), 1472; Hieronyma Carvaglio (the spear-mark, which bled every Friday); Joanna Maria of the Cross; Maria Razzi of Chio (marks of the thorny crown); Maria Villani (ditto); Mary Magdalen di Pazzi; Mechtildis von Stanz; Ursula of Valencia; Veronica Guliani (all the marks), 1694; Vincenza Ferreri of Valencia, &c.

Stigmatise. To puncture, to brand (Greek, stigma, a puncture). Slaves used to be branded, sometimes for the sake of recognising them, and sometimes by way of punishment. The branding was effected by applying a red-hot iron marked with certain letters to their forehead, and then rubbing some colouring matter into the wound. A slave that had been branded was by the Romans called a stigmatic, and the brand was called the stigma.

Stigmities, or St. Stephen's Stones, are chalcedonies with brown and red spots.

Still. Cornelius Tacitus is called Cornelius the Still in the “Fardle of Facions,” the still being a translation of the Latin word “tacitus.”

Cornelius the Styile in his firste booke of his yerely exploits called in Latine Annales.—Ch. iii., s. 3. (1355.)

Still Sow. A man cunning and selfish; one wise in his own interest; one who avoids talking at meals that he may enjoy his food the better. So called from the old proverb "The still sow eats the wash" or "draff."

We do not act, that often jest and laugh;
'Tis old but true, "Still swine eat all the draugh."
Shakespeare, "Merry Wives of Windsor," iv. 2.

Stilling (John Henry), surnamed Jung, the mystic or pietist; called by Carlyle the German Dominie Sampson; "awkward, honest, irascible, in old-fashioned clothes and bag-wig." A real character. (1740-1817.)

Stilo No'vo. New-fangled notions. When the calendar was reformed by Pope Gregory XIII. (1582), letters used to be dated stilo novo, which grew in time to be a cant phrase for any innovation.

And so I leave you to your stilo novo.
Beaumont and Fletcher.

Stimulants.

Bonaparte took snuff when he wished to stimulate his intellect.

The Rev. William Bull, the Nonconformist minister and scholar, was an inveterate smoker.

Lord Byron took gin-and-water.

Lord Erskine took large doses of opium.

Hobbes drank cold water.

Newton smoked.

Pope drank strong coffee.

Wedderburne (the first lord Ashburton) placed a blister on his chest when he had to make a great speech.—Dr. Paris, "Pharmacologia."

Stink'omalee'. So Theodore Hook called London University. The fun of the sobriquet is this: The buildings stand on the site of a large rubbish store or sort of refuse field, into which was cast pot-sherds, sweepings, and all sorts of off-scourings. About the same time the question respecting Trincomalee in Ceylon was in agitation, so the wit spun the two ideas together, and produced the word in question, which was the more readily accepted as the non-religious education of the new college, and its rivalry with Oxford and Cambridge, gave for a time very great offence to the High Church and State party.

Stip'ulate (3 syl.). The word is generally given from the Latin stipula (a straw), and it is said that a straw was given to the purchaser in sign of a real delivery. Isidor (v. 24) asserts that the two contracting parties broke a straw between them, each taking a moiety, that, by rejoining the parts, they might prove their right to the bargain. With all deference to the bishop of Seville, his "fact" seems to belong to limbo-lore. All bargains among the Romans were made by asking a question and replying to it. One said, An stipem vis? the other replied, Stipem volo ("Do you require money?" "I do"); the next question and answer were, An dabis? Dabo ("Will you give it?" "I will"); the third question was to the surety, An spondeo? to which he replied Spondeo ("Will you be security?" "I will"); and the bargain was made. So that stipulate is compounded of stips-volo (stip'-ulo), and the tale about breaking the straws seems to be concocted to bolster up a wrong etymology.

Strir-up Sunday. The last Sunday in Trinity. A school-boy's term taken from the two first words of the collect. Being only four weeks before Christmas, it announces the near approach of the winter holidays.

Stirrup Cup. In the Highlands, a cup given to travellers when their feet are in the stirrups, before they finally leave. Called in some places a "parting cup." (See COFFEE.)

Lord Marmion's bugles blew to horse;
Then came the stirrup cup in course;
Between the baron and his host
No point of courtesy was lost.

Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion," l. 31.

Stirrup Oil. A beating; a mere variety of "strap oil" (q.v.). The French De l'huile de cotret (faggot or stick oil).

Stiver. Not a stiver. Not a penny. The stiver was a Dutch coin, equal to about a halfpenny.

Stock. From the verb to stick (to fasten, make firm, fix).

Live stock. The fixed capital of a farm.

Stock in trade. The fixed capital.

The village stocks, in which the feet are stuck or fastened.

A gun stock, in which the gun is stuck or made fast.

Stocks. Money set fast in the funds. (See Trench on the "Study of Words.")

It is on the stocks. It is in hand but not yet finished. The stocks is the frame in which a ship is placed while building, and so long as it is in hand it is said to be or to lie in the stocks.

Stock-dove. The wild pigeon; so called because it was once considered the stock or parent of the domestic pigeon.

Stocking. (See BLUE STOCKING.)

Stockwell Ghost. A supposed ghost that haunted the village of Stockwell, near London, in 1772. The real source of the strange noises was Anne Robinson, a servant girl. (See COCK LANE GHOST.)

Stoics. Founder of the Stoic school. Zeno of Athens. These philosophers were so called because Zeno used to give his lectures in the Stoa Poecilē of Athens. (Greek, stoa, a porch.)

Epictetus was the founder of the New Stoic school.

The ancient Stoics in their porch
With fierce dispute maintained their church,
Beat out their brains in fight and study
To prove that virtue is a body,
That bonum is an animal,
Made good with stout polemic bawl.

Butler, "Hudibras," ii. 2.

Stolen Things are Sweet. A sop filched from the dripping-pan, fruit procured by stealth, and game illicitly taken, have the charm of dexterity to make them the more palatable. Solomon says, "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret [i.e., by stealth] is pleasant."

From busie cooks we love to steal a bit
Behind their backs, and that in corners eat;
Nor need we here the reason why entreat;
All know the proverb, "Stolen bread is sweet."

"History of Joseph," n. d.

Stomach. Appetite: "He who hath no stomach for this fight."—"Henry V.," iv. 3.

Appetite for honours, &c., or ambition: "Wolsey was a man of an unbounded stomach."—"Henry VIII.," iv. 2.

Appetite or inclination: "Let me praise you while I have the stomach."—"Merchant of Venice," iii. 5.

Stomach. To swallow, to accept with appetite, to digest.

To stomach an insult. To swallow it and not resent it.

If you must believe, stomach not all.—"Anthony and Cleopatra," ii. 4.

Stomach, meaning "wrath," and the verb "to be angry," is the Latin stomachus, stomacha'ri.

Peli'dæ stomachum cedēre nescii.—Horace.

The stomach [wrath] of relentless Achilles.

Stomachabatur si quid asperius dixerim.—Cicero.

His stomach rose if I spoke sharper than usual.

The fourth stomach of ruminating animals is called the aboma'sus or aboma'sum (from ab-oma'sum).

Stone (1 syl.). The sacred stone of the Caa'ba (q.v.) is, according to Arab tradition, the guardian angel of Paradise turned into stone. When first built by Abraham into the wall of the shrine it was clear as crystal, but it has become black from being kissed by the sinful lips of man.

Stones. After the Moslem pilgrim has made his seven processions round the Caaba, he repairs to Mount Arafat, and before sunrise enters the valley of Mena, where he throws seven stones at each of three pillars, in imitation of Abraham and Adam, who thus drove away the devil when he disturbed their devotions.

Standing Stones. The most celebrated groups are those of Stonehenge, Avebury in Wiltshire, Stennis in the Orkneys, and Carnac in Brittany.

The Standing Stones of Stenn'is, in the Orkneys, resemble Stonehenge, and, says Sir W. Scott, furnish an irresistible refutation of the opinion that these circles are Druidical. There is every reason to believe that the custom was prevalent in Scandinavia, as well as in Gaul and Britain, and as common to the mythology of Odin as to Druidism. They were places of public assembly, and in the Eyrbyggja Saga is described the manner of setting apart the Helga Feli (Holy Rocks) by the pontiff Thorolf for solemn meetings.

The Stones of Stennis. One of the group called the "Stone of Odin" has an oval hole large enough to admit a man's hand. This stone, till the middle of last century, was the site of marriage vows and other solemn contracts, and he who violated a vow "made to Odin" was accounted infamous. Children passed through the hole were charmed against palsy.

¶ Stones fallen down from Jupiter. Anaxagoras mentions a stone that fell from Jupiter in Thrace, a description of which is given by Pliny. The Ephesians asserted that their image of Diana came from Jupiter. The stone at Emessa, in Syria, worshipped as a symbol of the sun, was a similar meteorite. At Abydos and Potidæa similar stones were preserved. At Corinth was one venerated as Zeus. At Cyprus was one dedicated to Venus, a description of which is given by Tacitus and Maximus Tyr'ius. Herodian describes a similar stone in Syria. The famous Caa'ba stone at Mecca is a similar meteor. Livy recounts three falls of stones. On November 27, 1492, just as Maximilian was on the point of engaging the French army near Ensisheim, a mass weighing 270 lbs. fell between the combatants; part of this mass is now in the British Museum. In June, 1866, at Knyahinya, a village of Hungary, a shower of stones fell, the largest of which weighs above 5 cwt.; it was broken in the fall into two pieces, both of which are now in the Imperial Collection at Vienna. On December 13, 1795, in the village of Thwing, Yorkshire, an aërolite fell weighing 56 lbs., now in the British Museum. On September 10, 1813, at Adare, in Limerick, fell a similar stone, weighing 17 lbs., now in the Oxford Museum. On May 1, 1860, in Guernsey County, Ohio, more than thirty stones were picked up within a space of ten miles by three; the largest weighed 103 lbs.—Kesselmeier and Dr. Otto Buchner, "The Times," Nov. 14, 1866.

¶ You have stones in your mouth. Said to a person who stutters or speaks very indistinctly. The allusion is to Demosthenēs, who cured himself of stuttering by putting pebbles in his mouth and declaiming on the sea-shore.

The orator who once
Did fill his mouth with pebble stones
When he harangued.

Buller, "Hudibras," i. 1.

Stone Blind. Wholly blind; as much so as a stone.

Stone Cold. Extremely cold; as cold as a stone.

Stone Dead. Quite dead; as dead as a stone.

Stone Still. Perfectly still; with no more motion than a stone.

I will not struggle; I will stand stone still.

Shakespeare, "King John," iv. 1.

Stone of the Broken Treaty. Limerick. About a century and a half ago England made a solemn compact with Ireland. Ireland promised fealty, and England promised to guarantee to the Irish people civil and religious equality. When the crisis was over England handed Ireland over to a faction that has ever since bred strife and disunion.—Address of the Corporation of Limerick to Mr. Bright (1868).

The "stone of the broken treaty" is there, and from early in the morning till late at night groups gather round it, and foster the tradition of their national wrongs.—The Times.

Stone of Stumbling. This was much more significant among the Jews than it is with ourselves. One of the Pharisaic sects, called Nikfi or "Dashers," used to walk abroad without lifting their feet from the ground. They were for ever "dashing their feet against the stones" and "stumbling" on their way.

Stone of Tongues. This was a stone given to Otnit king of Lombardy, by his father dwarf Elberich, and had the virtue, when put into a person's mouth, of enabling him to speak perfectly any foreign language.—"The Heldenbuch."

Stonebrash. A name given in Wiltshire to the subsoil of the north-western border, consisting of a reddish calcareous loam, mingled with flat stones.

Stonehenge, says Geoffrey of Monmouth, was erected by Merlin (the magician) to perpetuate the treachery of Hengist, who desired a friendly meeting with Vortigern, but fell upon him and his 400 attendants, putting them all to the sword. Aurelius Ambrosius asked Merlin to recommend a sensible memento of this event, and Merlin told the king to transplant the "Giant's Dance" from the mountain of Killaraus, in Ireland. These stones had been brought by the giants from Africa as baths, and all possessed medicinal qualities. Merlin transplanted them by magic. This tale owes its birth to the word "stan-hengist," which means uplifted stones, but "hengist" suggested the name of the traditional hero.

N.B. This is no place to enter into the history and mystery of Stonehenge, but it is pretty certain that it was no Druid temple, but a Saxon ring for parliamentary and coronation purposes. It was certainly erected after the Romans left the island, for Roman pottery and coins have been found under several of the stones, and the stones are fitted with mortice and tenon, an art unknown in Britain till it was taught by the Romans. A "Guide Book" is sold to visitors, which affects to prove that Stonehenge was built by the antediluvians, and that the fallen stones were thrown down by the subsiding waters of the flood. In a "Dictionary of Fable" such a suggestion may find standing-room. (See STONE, The Standing Stones of Stennis.)

Stonehenge, once thought a temple, you have found
A throne where kings, our earthly gods, were crowned.
When by their wondering subjects they were seen.
Dryden, "Epistles," ii.

Stonewall Jackson. Thomas J. Jackson, one of the Confederate generals in the American war. The name arose thus: General Bee, of South Carolina, observing his men waver, exclaimed, "Look at Jackson's men; they stand like a stone wall!" (1826-1863.)

Stony Arabia. A mistranslation of Arabia Petraea, where Petræa is supposed to be an adjective formed from the Greek petros (a stone), and not, as it really is, from the city of Petra, the capital of the Nabathæans. This city was called Thamud (rock-built), translated by the Greeks into Petra, and mis-translated into Stony.

Stool of Repentance. A low stool placed in front of the pulpit in Scotland, on which persons who had incurred an ecclesiastical censure were placed during divine service. When the service was over the "penitent" had to stand on the stool and receive the minister's rebuke. Even in the present century this method of rebuke has been repeated.

Colonel Knox...tried to take advantage of a merely formal proceeding to set Mr. Gladstone on the stool of repentance.—The Times.

Stops. Organs have no fixed number of stops; some have sixty or more, and others much fewer. A stop is a collection of pipes similar in tone and quality, running through the whole or part of an organ. They may be divided into Mouth-pipes and Reed-pipes, according to structure, or into (1) Metallic, (2) Reed, (3) Wood, (4) Mixed or Compound stops, according to material. The following are the chief:—

(a) Metallic. Principa' (so called because it is the first stop tuned, and is the standard by which the whole organ is regulated), the open diapason, dulciana, the 12th, 15th, tierce or 17th, larget or 19th, 22nd, 26th, 29th, 33rd, &c. (being respectively 12, 15, 17, &c., notes above the open diapason).

(b) Reed (metal reed pipes). Bassoon, cremona, hautboy or oboe, trumpet, voxhumana (all in unison with the open diapason), clarion (an octave above unison with principal).

(c) Wood. Stopt diapason, double diapason.

(d) Compound or Mixed. Flute (in unison with the principal), cornet, mixture or furniture, sesquialta (above the 15th).

Grand organs have, in addition to the above, from one and a half to two octaves of pedals.

Stordila'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). King of Grana'da, one of the leaders of the Moorish army.

Store (1 syl.). Store is no sore. Things stored up for future use are no evil. Sore means grief as well as wound, our sorrow.

Stork, a sacred bird, according to the Swedish legend received its name from flying round the cross of the crucified Redeemer, crying Styrka! styrka! (Strengthen! strengthen!) This certainly is a marvellous tradition, seeing the stork has no voice at all.

Storks are the sworn foes of snakes. Hence the veneration in which they are held. They are also excellent scavengers.

'Twill profit when the stork, sworn foe of snakes,
Returns, to show compassion to thy plants,
Philips, "Cyder," bk. i.

Storms. The inhabitants of Com-machio, a town in the Ferrarese between the two branches of the Po, rejoice in storms because then the fish are driven into their marshes.

Whose townsmen loaths the lazy calm's repose,
And pray that stormy waves may lash the beach.
Rose's "Orlando Furioso," iii. 41.

Cape of Storms. So Bartholomew Diaz named the south cape of Africa in 1486, but king John II. changed it into the Cape of Good Hope.

Storm in a Teapot. A mighty to-do about a trifle. "A storm in a puddle."

Stornello Verses are those in which certain words are harped on and turned about and about. They are common among the Tuscan peasants. The word is from torna'rè (to return).

I'll tell him the white, and the green, and the red,
Mean our country has hung the vile yoke from her head;

I'll tell him the green, and the red, and the white,
Would took well by his side, as a sword-knot so bright;

I'll tell him the red, and the white, and the green,
Is the prize that we play for, a prize we will win.
Notes and Queries.

Stor'thing (pron. stor-ting). The Norwegian Parliament, elected every three years (Norse, stor, great; thing, court).

Stowe (1 syl.). The fair majestic paradise of Stowe (Thomson, "Autumn"). The principal seat of the duke of Buckingham.

Stowe Nine Churches (a hamlet of Stowe, Northamptonshire). The tradition is that the people of this hamlet wished to build a church, and made nine ineffectual efforts to do so, for every time the church was finished the devil came by night and knocked it down again.

Strabo (Walafridus). A German monk. (807-849.)

Stradivarius (Aortinius). A famous violin-maker, born at Cremona. Some of his instruments have fetched £400. (1760-1728.) See CREMONAS.

Strain (1 syl.). To strain courtesy. To stand upon ceremony. Here strain is to stretch, as parchment is strained on a drum-head. When strain means to filter, the idea is pressing or squeezing through a canvas or woollen bag.

Strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. To make much fuss about little peccadillos, but commit offences of real magnitude. "Strain at" is strain out or off (Greek, diu-lizo). The allusion is to the practice of filtering wine for fear of swallowing an insect, which was "unclean." Tyndale has "strain out" in his version. Our expression "strain at" is a corruption of strain-ut, "ut" being the Saxon form of out, retained in the words ut-most, utter, utmost, &c.

The quality of mercy is not strained ("Merchant of Venice," iv. 1)—constrained or forced, but cometh down freely as the rain, which is God's gift.

Stral'enheim (Count). A feudal baron who hunted Werner like a partridge, in order to obtain his inheritance. Uric saved him from the Oder, but subsequently murdered him.—Byron, "Werner."

Strand (London). The bank of the Thames (Saxon for a beach or shore); whence stranded, run ashore or grounded.

Strange (1 syl.). Latin, extra (without); whence extra-neus (one without); old French, estranger; Italian, strano, &c. Stranger, therefore, is extru-neus, one without.

Strangers Sacrificed. It is said that Busiris, king of Egypt, sacrificed to his gods all strangers that set foot on his territories. Diomed, king of Thrace, gave strangers to his horses for food. (See DIOMEDES.)

Oh fly, or here with strangers' blood imbrued
Busiris' altars thou shalt find renewed;
Amidst his slaughtered guests his altars stood
Obscene with gore, and baked with human blood.
Camoens, "Lusiad," bk. II.

Strap (Hugh). The noble, generous, and disinterested adherent of Roderick Random, whose faithful services and unselfish attachment met a contemptible reward from the heartless libertine.—Smollett, "Roderick Random."

Strap Oil. A beating. This is a corruption of strap 'oil, where 'oil is the German theil (a dole). The play is palpable. The "April fool" asks for a pennyworth of strap 'oil, that is a dole or portion of the strap.

Strappa'do. A military punishment formerly practised; it consisted of pulling an offender to a beam and then letting him down suddenly; by this means a limb was not unfrequently dislocated. (Italian, strappa'rè, to pull.)

Were I at the strappado or the rack, I'd give no man a reason on compulsion.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV," ii. 4.

Strat'agem means generalship (Latin, strat'egus, a general; Greek, stratos-ago, to lead an army).

Straw. Servants wishing to be hired used to go into the market-place of Carlisle (Carel) with a straw in their mouth. (See MOP.)

At Carel I stuid wi' a strae i' my mouth,
The weyves com roun' me in custers;
"What weage dus te ax, canny lad?" says yen..
Anderson, "Cumberland Ballads."

In the straw. Être en couche. The phrase arises from the custom, in paved streets, of strewing straw before the house, to muffle the noise of vehicles. The Dutch of Haarlem and Enckhuysen expose on these occasions a pin-cushion at the street-door. If the babe is a boy the pin-cushion has a red fringe, if a girl a white one.

She wears a straw in her ear. She is looking out for another husband. This is a French expression, and refers to the ancient custom of placing a straw between the ears of horses for sale.

To carry off the straw (Enlever la paille). To bear off the bolle. The pun is between "pal," a slang word for a favourite, and "paille," straw. The French palot means a "pal." Thus Gervais says—

Mais, encore un coup, man palot,
"Le Coup d'Œil Furin," p. 64.

To throw straws against the wind. To contend uselessly and feebly against what is irresistible; to sweep back the Atlantic with a besom.

I have a straw to break with you. I am displeased with you; I have a reproof to give you. In feudal times possession of a fief was conveyed by giving a straw to the new tenant. If the tenant misconducted himself, the lord dispossessed him by going to the threshold of his door and breaking a straw, saying as he did so, "As I break this straw, so break I the contract made between us." In allusion to this custom, it is said in "Reynard the Fox"—"The kinge toke up a straw fro' the ground, and pardoned and forguf the Foxe," on condition that the Fox showed king Lion where the treasures where hid (ch. v.).

Strawberry means the straying plant that bears berries (Anglo-Saxon, strae); so called from its runners, which stray from the parent plant in all directions.

Strawberry Preachers. So Latimer called the non-resident country clergy, because they strayed from their parishes, to which they returned only once a year. (See above.)

Streph'on. The shepherd in Sir Philip Sidney's "Arcadia," who pays his court to the beautiful Ura'nia. Strephon, like Romeo, is a stock name for a lover.

Stretch'er. An exaggeration; a statement stretched out beyond the strict truth.

Strike (1 syl.). Strike, but hear me! So said Themistoclēs with wonderful self-possession to Eurybiadēs the Spartan general. The tale told by Plutarch is this:—Themistoclēs strongly opposed the proposal of Eurybiadēs to quit the bay of Salamis. The hot-headed Spartan insultingly remarked that "those who in the public games rise up before the propersignal are scourged." "True," said Themistoclēs, "but those who lag behind win no laurels." On this, Eurybiadēs lifted up his staff to strike him, when Themistoclēs earnestly but proudly exclaimed, "Strike, but hear me!"

To strike hands upon a bargain or strike a bargain. To confirm it by shaking or striking hands.

Strike Sail. To acknowledge oneself beaten; to eat umble pie. A maritime expression. When a ship in fight, or on meeting another ship, let's down her top-sails at least half-mast high, she is said to strike, meaning that she submits or pays respect to the other.

Now Margaret
Must strike her sail, and learn awhile to serve
When kings command.
Shakespeare, "3 Henry VI.," iii. 3.

String. Always harping on one string. Always talking on one subject; always repeating the same thing. The allusion is to the ancient harpers: some like Paganini played on one string to show their skill, but more would have endorsed the Apothecary's apology—"My poverty, and not my will, consents."

Stroke. The oarsman who sits on the bench next the coxswain, and sets the stroke of the oars. In an eight-oar the rowers are named thus:—

Strong-back. One of Fortunio's servants. He was so strong he could carry any weight upon his back without difficulty.—"Grimm's Goblins" (Fortunio).

Strong-bow. Richard de Clare, earl of Strigul. Justice of Ireland. (*-1176.)

Stron'tian. This mineral receives its name from Stontian, in Argyleshire, where it was discovered by Dr. Hope in 1792.

Struld'brugs. Persons who never die; the miserable inhabitants of Luggnagg.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels."

Stuart. So called from Walter, lord high steward of Scotland, who married Marjory, daughter of Robert Bruce. Walter was the sixth of his family who had enjoyed the office of lord high steward, and the family was usually called the Steward family. This Walter Steward and Marjory were the ancestors of the long line of Scotch Stuarts.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," xv.

Stubble Geese, called in Devonshire Arish Geese. The geese turned into the stubble-fields or arrishers, to pick up the corn left after harvest. (See EARING.)

Stuck Pig. To stare like a stuck pig. A simile founded on actual observation. Of course the stuck pig is the pig in the act of being killed.

Stuck Up. An Australian phrase for robbed on the highway. (See GONE UP.)

Stuck-up People. Pretentious people; parvenus; nobodies who assume to be somebodies. The allusion is to birds, as the peacock which sticks up its tail, the turkey-cock which sticks up its feathers generally, &c., to add to its "importance," and "awe down" antagonists.

Stuff Gown. An outer barrister, or one without the bar. (See BARRISTER.)

Stump Orator (in America). A person who harangues the people from the stump of a tree or other chance elevation; a mob orator.

Stump Up. Pay your reckoning; pay what is due. Ready money is called stumpy or stumps. An Americanism, meaning money paid down on the spot—i.e., on the stump of a tree. (See NAIL.)

Stumped Out. Outwitted; put down. A term borrowed from the game of cricket.

Stumps. To stir one's stumps. To get on faster; to set upon something expeditiously. The stumps properly are wooden legs fastened to stumps or mutilated limbs. (Swedish, stumpa, to mutilate; German, stumpfen.)

This makes him stirre his stumps.
"The Two Lancashire Lovers" (1640).

Stupid Boy. St. Thomas Aquinas, nicknamed the Dumb Ox by his school-fellows. (1224-1274.)

Stygian (3 syl.). Infernal; pertaining to Styx, the fabled river of hell.

At that so sudden blaze the Stygian throng
Bent their aspect,
Milton, "Paradise Lost."

Style (1 syl.) is from the Latin stylus, an iron pencil for writing on waxen tablets, &c. The characteristic of a person's writing is called his style. Metaphorically it is applied to composition and speech. Good writing is stylish, and metaphorically smartness of dress and deportment is so called.

Styles. Tom Styles or John a Styles, connected with John o'Noakes in actions of ejectment. These mythical gentlemen, like John Doe and Richard Roe, are no longer employed.

And, like blind Fortune, with a sleight
Convey men's interest and right
From Styles's pocket into Nokes's.

Butler, "Hudibras," iii. 3.

Stylites or Pillar Saints. By far the most celebrated are Simeon the Stylite of Syria, and Daniel the Stylite of Constantinople. Simeon spent thirty-seven years on different pillars, each loftier and narrower than the preceding. The last was sixty-six feet high. He died in 460, aged seventy-two. Daniel lived thirty-three years on a pillar, and was not unfrequently nearly blown from it by the storms from Thrace. He died in 494. Tennyson has a poem on Simeon Stylites.

I, Simeon of the Pillar by surname,
Stylites among men—I, Simeon,
The watcher on the column till the end.

Tennyson.

Stylus and Wax Tablets. Emblems of the Muse Calliopé.

Styx. The river of Hate, called by Milton "abhorred Styx, the flood of burning hate" ("Paradise Lost," ii.). It was said to flow nine times round the infernal regions. (Greek, stug'eo, to hate.)

The Thames reminded him of Styx.—M. Taine.

Styx, the dread oath of gods.

For by the black infernal Styx I swear
(That dreadful oath which binds the Thunderer)
'Tis fixed! Pope, "Thebais of Statius," l.

Suaviter in Modo (Latin). An inoffensive manner of doing what is to be done. Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re, doing what is to be done with unflinching firmness, but in the most inoffensive manner possible.

Sub Hasta. By auction. When an auction took place among the Romans, it was customary to stick a spear in the ground to give notice of it to the public. In London we hang from the first-floor window a strip of bed-room carpet.

Sub Jo've (Latin). Under Jove; in the open air. Jupiter is the deified personification of the upper regions of the air, Juno of the lower regions, Neptune of the waters of the sea, Vesta of the earth, Cerēs of the surface soil, Hadēs of the invisible or under-world.

Sub-Lapsa'rian, Supra-Lapsarian. The sub-lapsarian maintains that God devised his scheme of redemption after the "lapse" or fall of Adam, when He elected some to salvation and left others to run their course. The supra-lapsarian maintains that all this was ordained by God from the foundation of the world, and therefore before the "lapse" or fall of Adam.

Sub Rosa. (See ROSE.)

Submit means simply "to lower," and the idea usually associated with the word is derived from a custom in gladiatorial sports: When a gladiator acknowledged himself vanquished he lowered (submitted) his arms as a sign that he gave in; it then rested with the spectators to let him go or put him to death. If they wished him to live they held their thumbs down, if to be put to death they held their thumbs upwards.

Subpœ'na is a writ given to a man commanding him to appear in court, to bear witness or give evidence on a certain trial named in the writ. It is so called because the party summoned is bound to appear sub pœna centum librorum (under a penalty of £100).

Sub'sidy means literally a sediment; that which is on the ground. It is a military term. In battle the Romans drew up their army in three divisions: first, the light-armed troops made the attack, and if repulsed, the pike-men came up to their aid; if these two were beaten back, the swordsmen (principes) advanced; and if they too were defeated, the reserve went forward. These last were called subsidies because they remained resting on their left knee till their time of action. Metaphorically money aid is called a subsidy. (Latin, subsideo, to subside.)

Subtle Doctor. John Duns Scotus, one of the schoolmen. (1265-1308.)

Subvol'vans or Subvolva'ni. The antagonists of the Privolvans in Samuel Butler's satirical poem called "The Elephant in the Moon."

The gallant Subvolvani rally,
And from their trenches make a sally.
Verse 83, &c.

Succes'sion Powder. The poison used by the marquise de Brinvilliers in her poisonings, for the benefit of successors. (See POISONERS.)

Succint means undergirded; hence compact, concise. (Latin, sub-cinctus.)

Suck the Monkey. Capt. Marryat says that rum is sometimes inserted in cocoa-nuts for the private use of sailors, and as cocoa-nut shells are generally fashioned into the resemblance of a monkey's face, sucking the rum from them is called sucking the monkey. The phrase is extended to other ways of taking spirits surreptitiously, as sucking it from a cask by means of a straw.

Suckle. To suckle fools and chronicle small beer. Iago says women are of no use but to nurse children and keep the accounts of the household.—Shakespeare, "Othello," ii. 1.

Sucre. Manger du sucre. Applause given by claqueurs to actors is called sucre (sugar). French actors and actresses make a regular agreement with the manager for these hired applauders. While inferior artists are obliged to accept a mere murmur of approval, others receive a "salvo of bravos," while those of the highest rôle demand a "furor" or "éclat de rire," according to their line of acting, whether tragedy or comedy. Sometimes the manager is bound to give actors "sugar to eat" in the public journals, and the agreement is that the announcement of their name shall be preceded with the words "celebrated," "admirable," and so on. The following is part of the agreement of a French actor on renewing his engagement (1869):—"que cinquante claqueurs au moins feroient manger du sucre dès l'entrée en scène, et que l'actrice rivale serait privée de cet agrément." (See CLAUQUE.)

Suds (Mrs.). A facetious name for a washwoman or laundress. Of course the allusion is to soap-suds.

To be in the suds—in ill-temper. According to the song, "Ne'er a bit of comfort is upon a washing day," all are put out of gear, and therefore out of temper.

Suffolk. The folk south of Norfolk.

Suffrage means primarily the hough or pastern of a horse, so called because it bends under and not over, like the knee-joint. When a horse is lying down and wants to rise on his legs, it is this joint which is brought into action; and when the horse stands on his legs it is these "anle-joints" which support him. Metaphorically, voters are the pastern joints of a candidate, whereby he is supported.

A suffragan is a titular bishop who is appointed to assist a prelate; and in relation to an archbishop all bishops are suffragans. The archbishop is the horse, and the bishops are his pasterns.

Sugar-lip. Hâfiz, the great Persian lyrist. (*-1389.)

Sugared Words. Sweet, flattering words. When sugar was first imported into Europe it was a very great dainty. The coarse, vulgar idea now associated with it is from its being cheap and common.

Sui Gen'eris (Latin). Having a distinct character of its own; unlike anything else.

Suit (1 syl.). To follow suit. To follow the leader; to do as those do who are taken as your exemplars. The term is from games of cards.

Sullen (Squire). A brutal husband in Farquhar's "Country Blockhead."

Sult (starvation). The knife which the goddess Hel (g.v.) is accustomed to use when she sits down to eat from her dish Hunger.

Sulpizio. Serjeant in the 11th Regiment of the Grand Army of Napoleon. He found a young girl named Maria, after a battle, and the regiment adopted her as their daughter.—Donizetti, "La Figlia del Reggimento" (an opera).

Sultan of Persia. Mahmoud Gazni, founder of the Gaznvide dynasty, was the first to assume in Persia the title of Sultan (A.D. 999).

Sultan's Horse.

Byzantians boast that on the clod
Where once the sultan's horse hath trod
Grows neither grass nor shrub, nor tree.
Swift, "Pethox the Great."

Sulta'na. A beautiful bird with bright blue feathers, and purple beak and legs.

Some purple-winged Sultana.
Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

Summer. The second or autumnal summer, said to last thirty days, begins about the time that the sun enters Scorpio (Oct. 23rd). It is variously called—

(1) St. Martin's summer (L'été de St. Martin). St. Martin's day is the 11th Nov.

Expect St. Martin's summer, halcyon days.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI." i. 2.

(2) All Saints' summer (All Saints' is the 1st Nov.).

Then followed that beautiful season
Called by the pious Arcadian peasants the summer of All Saints. Longfellow, "Evangeline."

(3) All Hallowen summer (same as All Saints').

Farewell, All Hallowen summer.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI." i. 2.

(4) St. Luke's little summer (St. Luke's day is 18th Oct.).

Summons. Peter and John de Carvajal, being condemned to death on circumstantial evidence, appealed without success to Ferdinand IV. of Spain. On their way to execution they declared their innocence, and summoned the king to appear before God within thirty days. Ferdinand was quite well on the thirtieth day, but was found dead in his bed next morning.

Summum Bonum. The chief excellence; the highest attainable good.

Sumpter Horse or Mule. One that carries baggage (Italian, soma, a burden). (See SOMAGIA.)

Sun. Hebrew, Elohim (God); Greek, helios (the sun); Breton, heol; Latin, sol; German, solnne; Saxon, sunna; our sun. (See APOLLO, SURYA, &c.)

Sun. Harris, in his "Hermès," asserts that all nations ascribe to the sun a masculine and the moon a feminine gender. For confutation see MOON.

Horses of the Sun.

Arvakur, Aslo, and Alsvidur.—Scandinavian mythology.

Brontë (thunder), Eo'os (day-break), Ethiops (flashing), Ethon (fiery), Erythro'os (red-producers), Philog'ea (earth-loving), Pyr'ois (fiery). All of them "breathe fire from their nostrils."—Greek and Latin mythology.

The horses of Aurora are Abrax and Phaëton.

More worship the rising than the setting sun, said Pompey; meaning that more persons pay honour to ascendant than to fallen greatness. The allusion is, of course, to the Persian fire-worshippers.

Heaven cannot support two suns, nor earth two masters. So said Alexander the Great when Darius (before the battle of Arbēla) sent to offer terms of peace. Beautifully imitated by Shakespeare:—

Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere;
Nor can one England brook a double reign—
Of Harry Percy and the prince of Wales,
"1 Henry IV.," v. 4.

Here lies a she-sun, and a he-moon there (Donne). Epithalamium on the marriage of lady Elizabeth, daughter of James I., with Frederick, elector palatine. It was through this unfortunate princess, called "Queen of Bohemia" and "Queen of Hearts," that the family of Brunswick succeeded to the British throne. Some say that lord Craven married (secretly) the "fair widow."

City of the Sun. Rhodes was poetically so called because the sun was its tutelary deity. The Colossos of Rhodes was consecrated to the sun.

Sun and Moon Falling. In heraldry the arms of sovereigns and royal houses are not emblazoned by colours, but by sun, moon, and stars. Thus instead of or (gold) a royal coat has the sun; instead of argent (silver), the moon; instead of the other five heraldic colours, one of the other five ancient planets. In connection with this idea read Matt. xxiv. 29: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." (See PLANETS.)

Sun-burst. The fanciful name given by the ancient Irish to their national banner.

At once, like a sun-burst, her banner unfurled.
Thomas Moore, "Irish Melodies," No. 6.

Sun-flower. So called, not because it follows the sun, but because it resembles the sun in appearance. It does not turn to the sun, for frequently three or four flowers on one plant will turn as many different ways.

Sun Inn. In compliment to the ill-omened house of York.

Sunday Saint. One who observes the ordinances of religion, and goes to church on a Sunday, but is worldly, grasping, indifferent honest, and not "too moral" the following six days.

Sunna or Sonna. The Oral Law, or the precepts of Mahomet not contained in the Koran, collected into a volume. Similar to the Jewish Mishna, which is the supplement of the Pentateuch. (Arabic, sunna, custom, usage.)

Sunnites (2 syl.). Orthodox Mahometans, who consider the Sunna or Oral Law as binding as the Koran. They wear white turbans. The heterodox Moslem are called Schiites or Shyites (q.v.).

Suo Jurē (Latin). In one's own right.

Suo Martē (Latin). By one's own strength or personal exertions.

Supercilious (5 syl.). Having an elevated eyebrow; hence contemptuous, haughty. Shakespeare ("As You Like It") speaks of the "lover sighing like furnace with woeful ballad made to his mistress' eyebrow." It does not mean that the poet writes about the "eyebrow" of his amie du cœur, but that his ballad is woebegone because his sweetening is supercilious. Observe the poet does not say on but to the eyebrow. (Latin, super-cilium.)

Supernaculum. The very best wine. The word is Latin for "upon the nail," meaning that the wine is so good the drinker leaves only enough in his glass to make a bead on his nail. The French say of first-class wine, "It is fit to make a ruby on the nail" (faire rubis sur l'ongle), referring to the residue left which is only sufficient to make a single drop on the nail. Tom Nash says, "After a man has drunk his glass it is usual, in the North, to turn the bottom of the cup upside down, and let a drop fall upon the thumb-nail. If the drop rolls off the drinker is obliged to fill and drink again." Bishop Hall alludes to the same custom: "The duke Tenter-belly . . . exclaims . . . 'Let never this goodly-formed goblet of wine go jovially through me;' and then he set it to his mouth, stole it off every drop, save a little remainder, which he was by custom to set upon his thumb-nail and lick off."

'Tis here! the supernaculum! twenty years
Of age, if 'tis a day. Byron, "Werner," i. 1.

Supernaculum. Entirely. To drink supernaculum is to leave no heel-taps; to drink so as to leave just enough not to roll off one's thumb-nail if poured upon it, but only to remain there as a wine-bead.

This is after the fashion of Switzerland. Clear off, neat, supernaculum.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 5.

Their jests were supernaculum.

I snatched the rubies from each thumb,

And in this crystal have them here.

Perhaps you'll like it more than beer.

King, "Orpheus and Eurydice."

Superstition. That which survives when its companions are dead (Latin, supersto). Those who escaped in battle were called *superstiti*s. Superstition is that religion which remains when real religion is dead; that fear and awe and worship paid to the religious impression which survives in the mind, when correct notions of Deity no longer exist.

Supplication. This word has greatly changed its original meaning. The Romans used it for a thanksgiving after a signal victory—Livy, iii. 63. (His rebus gestis, supplicatio a senatu decretum est—Cæsar, "Bell. Gall." ii.) The word means the act of folding the knees (sub-plico). We now use the word for begging or entreating something.

Surface (Sir Oliver). The rich uncle of Joseph and Charles Surface.—Sheridan, "School for Scandal."

Charles Surface. A reformed scapegrace, after having "sowed his wild oats." He was the accepted lover of Maria, the rich ward of Sir Peter Teazle. His evil was all on the surface.—Sheridan, "School for Scandal."

Joseph Surface. The elder brother of the above, a sentimental knave, artful and malicious, but so plausible in speech and manner as to pass among his acquaintances for a "youthful miracle of prudence, good sense, and benevolence." His good was all on the surface.—Sheridan, "School for Scandal."

Surgeon is the Greek form of the Latin word manufacturer. The former is cheir-ergon (to work with the hand), and the latter manu-facere (to do or make with the hand).

Surlyboy. Yellow hair (Irish, sorley buie).

Sur'name (2 syl.). The over-name: either the name written over the Christian name, or given over and above it; an additional name. For a long time persons had no family name, but only one and that a personal name. Surnames are not traced further back than the latter part of the tenth century.

Sur'plice (2 syl.). Over the fur-robe (Latin, super-pellicium). The clerical robe worn over the bachelor's ordinary dress, which was anciently made of sheep-skin. The ancient Celts and Germans also wore a garment occasionally over their fur-skins.

Surrey. Saxon, Suth-rea (south of the river—i.e., the Thames), or Suth-ric (south kingdom).

Saddle White Surrey for the field to-morrow (Shakespeare, "Richard III.") Surrey is the Syrian horse, as Roan Barbary in "Richard II." is the Barbary horse or barb.

Surt. The guardian of Muspelheim, who keeps watch day and night with a flaming sword. At the end of the world he will hurl fire from his hand and burn up both heaven and earth.—Scandinavian mythology.

Surtur. The giant who is to set the world on fire at the great consummation.—Scandinavian mythology.

Su'rya. The sun-god of Hindu mythology. His chariot is drawn by seven horses, and his charioteer is Arun'a (god of the dawn).

Susan (St.). The patron saint who saves from infamy and reproach. This is from her fiery trial recorded in the tale of Susannah and the Elders.

Susan'nah, the wife of Joiachim, being accused of adultery, was condemned to death by the Jewish elders; but Daniel proved her innocence, and turned the tables on her accusers, who were put to death instead.—The Apocrypha.

Sussex. The territory of the South-Saxons (Suth-Seaxe).

Sutor. Ne sutor, &c. (See COBBLER.) Make wigs. (See WIGS.)

St. Peter is all very well at Rome.

Stick to the cow. Boswell, one night sitting in the pit of Covent-garden Theatre with his friend Dr. Blair, gave an extempore imitation of a cow, which the house applauded. He then ventured another imitation, but failed, whereupon the doctor advised him in future to "stick to the cow."

Suttee (Indian). A pure and model wife (Sanskrit, sati, chaste, pure); a widow who immolates herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband.

Sval'in. The dashboard placed by the gods before the sun-car, to prevent the earth from being burnt up. The word means "cooling."—Scandinavian mythology.

Swaddler. A contemptuous synonym for Protestant used by the Roman Catholics. Cardinal Cullen, in 1869, gave notice that he would deprive of the sacraments all parents who sent their children to be taught in mixed Model Schools, where they were associated with "Presbyterians, Socinians, Arians, and Swaddlers." (See Times, Sept. 4, 1869.)

The origin of the term is as follows:—"It happened that Cennick, preaching on Christmas-day, took for his text these words from St. Luke's Gospel: 'And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger.' A Catholic who was present, and to whom the language of Scripture was a novelty, thought this so ridiculous that he called the preacher a swaddler in derision, and this unmeaning word became the nickname of the Methodists, and had all the effect of the most opprobrious appellation."—Southey, "Life of Wesley," ii. 153.

Swainmote. (See SWANIMOTE.)

Swallow. According to Scandinavian tradition, this bird hovered over the cross of our Lord, crying "Svala! svala!" (Console! console!) whence it was called svalow (the bird of consolation). (See STORK.)

The Swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone that gives sight to her fledglings.

Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow
Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings.

Longfellow, "Evangeline," pt. i.

It is lucky for a swallow to build about one's house. This is a Roman superstition. Ælian says that the swallow was sacred to the Penates or household gods, and therefore to injure one would be to bring wrath upon your own house.

Swallow-wort. A corruption of sallow-wort. So the celandine is called, from the dark yellow juice which exudes freely from its stems and roots on being broken.

Swan. Fionnuala, daughter of Lir, was transformed into a swan, and condemned to wander for many hundred years over the lakes and rivers of Ireland till the introduction of Christianity into that island. T. Moore has a poem entitled "The Song of Fionnuala."—Irish Melodies, No. 11.

The male swan is called a Cob; the female, a Pen.

Swan. Erman says of the Cygnus olor, "This bird, when wounded, pours forth its last breath in notes most beautifully clear and loud."—"Travels in Siberia," translated by Cooley, vol. ii.

Emily says, "I will play the swan, and die in music."—"Othello," v. 2.

"What is that, mother?" "The swan, my love. He is floating down to his native grove... Death darkens his eyes and unplumes his wings, Yet the sweetest song is the last he sings. Live so, my son, that when death shall come, Swan-like and sweet, it may wait thee home."
Dr. G. Doane.

Swan. Mr. Nicol says of the Cygnus musicus that its note resembles the tones of a violin, though somewhat higher. Each note occurs after a long interval. The music presages a thaw in Iceland, and hence one of its great charms.

The Swan of Avon or Sweet Swan of Avon. Shakespeare is so called by Ben Jonson because his home was on the Avon. (1564-1616.)

The Swan of Cambray. Fénelon, archbishop of Cambray, and author of "Tele-machus." (1651-1715.)

The Swan of Mantua or The Mantuan Swan. Virgil, who was born at Mantua. (B.C. 70-29.)

The Swan of Padua. Count Francesco Algarotti. (1712-1764.)

The Swan of Meander. Homer, who lived on the banks of the Meander, in Asia Minor. (Fl. B.C. 950.)

Swan, a public-house sign, like the peacock and pheasant, was an emblem of the parade of chivalry. Every knight chose one of these birds, which was associated with God, the Virgin, and his lady-love in his oath. Hence their use as public-house signs.

A black swan. A curiosity, a rara avis. The expression is borrowed from the well-known verse—"Rara avis in terris, nigroque simillima cygno."

What! is it my rara avis, my black swan?—Sir Walter Scott, "The Antiquary."

The White Swan, a public-house sign, is in compliment to Edward of Lancaster, whose cognisance it was.

Swan. A nickname for a blackamoor. (See LUCUS A NON LUCENDO.)

Ethiopem vocamus cygnum.

Juvenal, viii. 32.

Swan with Two Necks. A corruption of "Swan with Two Nicks." The Vintners' Company mark their swans with two nicks cut in the beak, and nothing can be a more appropriate sign for a tavern than the Vintners' emblem.

N.B. Royal swans are marked with five nicks—two lengthwise, and three across the bill.

Swan-Hopping. A corruption of Swan Upping—that is, taking the swans up the river Thames for the purpose of marking them. (See above.)

Swan'imote. A court held thrice a year before forest vorderers by the steward of the court; so called because the swans or swains were the jurymen. (Swans, swains, or swains, freeholders; Saxon, swan or swein, a herdsman, shepherd, youth; our swain.)

* * This court was incident to a forest, as the court of pie-powder or piepoudre to a fair.

Swarga. The paradise of Indra, and also of certain deified mortals, who rest there under the shade of the five wonderful trees, drink the nectar of immortality called Am'rita, and dance with the heavenly nymphs.

Swash-buckler. A ruffian; a swaggerer. "From swashing," says Fuller, "and making a noise on the buckler." The sword-players used to "swash" or tap their shield, as fencers tap their foot upon the ground when they attack.—"Worthies of England" (A.D. 1662). (See SWINGE-BUCKLER.)

A bravo, a swash-buckler, one that for money and good cheer will follow any man to defend him; but if any danger come, he runs away the first, and leaves him in the lurch.—Priorio.

Swear now means to take an oath, but the primitive sense is merely to aver or affirm; when to affirm on oath was meant the word oath was appended, as "I swear by oath." Shakespeare uses the word scores of times in its primitive sense; thus Othello says of Desdomona—

She swore, in faith, 'twas strange, 'twas pitiful.
Othello, i. 3.

Swear by my sword ("Hamlet," i. 5)—that is, "by the cross on the hilt of my sword." Again in "Winter's Tale," "Swear by this sword thou wilt perform my bidding" (ii. 3). Holinshed says, "Warwick kisses the cross of king Edward's sword, as it were a vow to his promise;" and Decker says, "He has sworn to me on the cross of his pure Tole'do ("Old Fortunatus")."

Sweat. To sweat a client. To make him bleed; to fleece him.

To sweat coin. To subtract part of the silver or gold by friction, but not to such an amount as to render the coin useless as a legal tender. The French use suer in the same sense, as Suer son argent, to sweat his money by usury. "Vous faites suer le bonhomme—tel est votre dire quand vous le pilez."—"Harangue du Capitaine la Carbonnade" (1615).

Sweating Sickness appeared in England about a century and a half after the Black Death (1485). It broke out amongst the soldiers of Richmond's army, after the battle of Bosworth Field, and lasted five weeks. It was a violent inflammatory fever, without boils or ulcers. Between 1485 and 1529 there were five outbreaks of this pest in England, the first four being confined to English people in England or France; the fifth spread over Germany, Turkey, and Austria.

Swedenborgians. Followers of Emanuel Swedenborg, a Swedish nobleman born at Stockholm in 1689. He professed himself to be the founder of the New Jerusalem church, alluding to Rio. The Swedenborgians believe they are in direct communication with angels, and maintain that the sacred Scriptures contain a celestial, a spiritual, and a natural sense.

Swedish Nightingale. Jenny Lind, now Madame Goldschmidt, a native of Stockholm, and previous to her marriage a public singer. (1821-*)

Sweep. To sweep the threshold. To announce to all the world that the woman of the house is paramount. When the procession called "Skimmington" passed any house where the woman was dominant, each one gave the threshold a sweep with a broom or bunch of twigs. (See SKIMMINGTON.)

Sweet Singer of Israel. King David.

Sweet Singers. A puritanical sect in the reign of Charles II., &c., common in Edinburgh. They burnt all story-books, ballads, romances, &c., denounced all unchaste words and actions, and even the printed Bible.

Swell Mob. The better-dressed thieves and pickpockets. A "swell" is a person showily dressed; one who puffs himself out beyond his proper dimensions, like the frog in the fable.

Sweno (in "Jerusalem Delivered"), son of the king of Denmark, was attacked in the night, while bringing succours to Godfrey, by Solyman and a large army of Arabs. After losing all his army, Sweno himself was slain by Solyman, and was buried in a marble sepulchre which appeared miraculously on the field of battle for the purpose (bk. viii.).

The historic fact is thus described by Paolo Emilio: "Sweno, Dani regis filius, cum mille quingentis equitibus cruce insignitis, transmisso ad Constantino-polem Bosphoro inter Antiochiam ad reliquos Latinos iter faciebat; insidiis Turcorum ad unum omnes cum regio juvene cæsi."

Swerga. An earthly paradise on Mount Meru, often resorted to by the gods.—Hindu mythology.

Swi Dynasty. The twelfth Imperial dynasty of China, founded by Yang-kien, prince of Swi, A.D. 587. He assumed the name of Wen-toe (king Wen).

Swidger (William). Custodian or keeper of an ancient college. His wife was Milly, and his father Philip. Mr. William is a great talker, and generally begins with the remark, "That's what I say," apropos of nothing. Philip's favourite expression is, "Lord, keep my memory green, I am eighty-seven." Mrs. William or Milly is the good angel of the tale.—Dickens, "The Haunted Man."

Swindle. To cheat; from the German schwindeln, to totter. It originally meant those artifices employed by a tradesman to prop up his credit when it began to totter, in order to prevent or defer bankruptcy.

Swine. Boar or brawn, the sire; sow, the dam; sucklings, the new-born pigs. A castrated boar-pig is called a hog or shot. Young pigs for the butcher are called porkers.

A sow-pig after her first litter becomes a broad-sow, and her whole stock of pigs cast at a birth is called a litter or farrow of pigs.

Swing (Captain). The name assumed by certain persons who sent threatening letters to those who used threshing machines (1830-1833). The tenor of these letters was as follows:—"Sir, if you do not lay by your threshing machine, you will hear from Swing."

Excesses of the Luddites and Swing.—The Times.

Swinge-buckler. A roisterer, a rake. The continuation of "Stow's Annals" tells us that the "blades" of London used to assemble in West Smithfield with sword and buckler, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, on high days and holidays, for mock fights called "bragging" fights. They swashed and swunged their bucklers with much show of fury, "but seldome was anyman hurt." (See SWASH-BUCKLER.)

There was I, and little John Doit of Staffordshire, and black George Bare, and Francis Pickbone, and Will Squeale a Cotswold man,—you had not four such swinge-bucklers in all the Inns-of-court; and, I may say to you, we knew where the bona-robas were.—Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.," iii. 2.

Swiss. The nick-name of a Swiss is "Colin Tampon" (q.v.).

No money, no Swiss—i.e., no servant. The Swiss have ever been the mercenaries of Europe, willing to serve any one for pay. The same was said of the ancient Carians. In the hotels of Paris this notice is common: Demandez or Parlez au Suisse (Speak to the porter).

Swiss Boy (The). Music by Moscheles.

Swiss Family Robinson. An abridged translation of a German tale by Joachim Heinrich Kampe, tutor to baron Humboldt.

Swithin (St.). If it rains on St. Swithin's day (15th July), there will be rain for forty days.

St Swithin's day, gif ye do rain, for forty days it will remain;
St. Swithin's day, an ye be fair, for forty days 'twill rain nae mair.

The French have two similar proverbs—Si il pleut le jour de St. Médard [8th June], il pleut quarante jours plus tard; and S'il pleut le jour de St. Gervais [19th June], il pleut quarante jours après.

The legend is that St. Swithin, bishop of Winchester, who died 862, desired to be buried in the church-yard of the minster, that the "sweet rain of heaven might fall upon his grave." At canonisation the monks thought to honour the saint by removing his body into the choir, and fixed the 15th July for the ceremony; but it rained day after day for forty days, so that the monks saw the saints were averse to their project, and wisely abandoned it.

The St. Swithin of Scotland is St. Martin of Bouillons. The rainy saint in Flanders is St. Godeliève; in Germany, the Seven Sleepers.

Switzers. Guards attendant on kings, &c., without any regard to the country whence they came. The reason is this, the Swiss used to be hired for mercenaries. In French suisse means "house porter," and till quite recently at the British embassy were these words over the porter's lodge—Demandez au Suisse. The church beadle is called suisse. The King in "Hamlet" says, "Where are my Switzers? Let them guard the door" (iv. 5).

Swiveller (Dick). A kind-hearted care-for-nothing, flowery in speech and fond of absurd quotations. — Dickens, "Old Curiosity Shop."

Sword.

(1) Agricane's was called "Trauch'era." This sword fell into Brandemart's possession.

(2) Artegal's (Spenser) was called "Chrysa'or."

(3) Arthur's was called "Escalibar," "Excalibar," or "Caliburn;" given to him by the Lady of the Lake.

(4) Sir Bevis's of Hamptoun was called "Morglay."

(5) Biterolf's was called "Schrit."

(6) Braggadochio's was called "Sanglamo're" ("Fa'ry Queen").

(7) Cæsar's was called "Crocca Mors" (yellow death). (See "Commentaries," bk. iv. 4.)

(8) Charlemagne's was called "Joyeuse" or "Fusberta Joyo'sa." It was made by Galas.

(9) The Cid's was called "Cola'da;" the sword "Tizo'na" was taken by him from King Bucar.

(10) Closamont's was called "Haute-claire," made by Galas.

(11) Dietrich's was "Nagelring."

(12) Doolin's of Mayence was called "Merveilleuse" (wonderful).

(13) Eck's was called "Sacho."

(14) Edward the Confessor's was called "Curtana" (the cutter), a blunt sword of state carried before the sovereigns of England at their coronation, emblematical of mercy.

(15) English Kings' (the ancient) was called "Curtana."

(16) Frithiof's was called "Angurva'del" (stream of anguish).

(17) Haco I.'s of Norway was called "Quern-Biter" (foot-breadth).

(18) Hieme's was called "Blutgang."

(19) Hildebrand's was "Brinnig."

(20) Iring's was called "Waskë."

(21) Launcelot of the Lake's was called "Ar'oundight."

(22) Mahomet's was called "Dhu' l Fakâr" (the trenchant), a scimitar; "Al Battar" (the beater); "Medham" (the keen); "Halef" (the deadly).

(23) Maugis's, or Malagigi's, was called "Flamberge" or "Floberge." He gave it to his cousin Rinaldo. It was made by Wieland.

(24) Ogier the Dane's was called "Sauvagine." It was made by Munifican.

(25) Oliver's was "Haute-Claire."

(26) Orlando's was called "Durinda'na" or "Durindan," which once belonged to Hector, and is said to be still preserved at Rocamadour, in France.

(27) Otuel's was "Corrouge" (2 syl.).

(28) Rinaldo's was called "Fusberta" or "Flamberge" (2 syl.). (See above, Maugis.)

(29) Rogéro's was called "Balisarda." It was made by a sorceress.

(30) Roland's was called "Durandal," made by Munifican. This is the French version of Orlando and "Durandana."

(31) Siegfried's was called "Balmung," in the "Nibelungen-Lied." It was made by Wieland. Also "Gram." "Mimung" was lent to him by Wittich.

(32) Sintram's was called "Welsung."

(33) Strong-o'-the-Arm's was called "Graban," made by Ansias.

(34) Thoralf Skotinson's, i.e. Thoralf the Strong, of Norway, was called "Quern-biter" (foot-breadth).

(35) Wieland. The swords made by this divine blacksmith were "Flamberge" and "Balmung."

¶ Sword. Galas, Munifican, and Ansias made nine swords, each of which took three years to make :—

Galas made "Flamberge" and "Joyeuse" for Charlemagne, and "Haute-claire" for Closamont.

Munifican made "Durandal" for Roland, and "Sauvagine" and "Courtain" for Ogier the Dane.

Ansias made "Baptism," "Florence," and "Grabau" for Strong-i'-th'-Arm.

Oliver's sword called "Glorious" hacked the nine swords a foot from the pommel.—"Croquemitaine."

Sword. At the death of Uter Pendragon there were many claimants to the crown; they were all ordered to assemble in "the great church of London" on Christmas-eve, and found a sword stuck in a stone and anvil with this inscription: "He who can draw forth this sword, the same is to be king." The knights tried to pull it out, but were unable. One day when a tournament was held, young Arthur wanted a sword and took this one, not knowing it was a charmed instrument, whereupon he was universally acknowledged to be the God-elected king. This was the sword of Excalibar.—"History of Prince Arthur," i. 3.

The enchanted sword in "Am'adis of Gaul." Whoever drew this sword from a rock was to gain access to a subterranean treasure. (Cap. cxxx. See also caps. lxxii. and xcix.)

The sword of God. Khaled Ibn al Waled was so called for his prowess at the battle of Muta. Khaled was the nephew of Maimu'na, one of the prophet's nine living wives.

Your tongue is a double-edged sword. You first say one thing and then the contrary; your argument cuts both ways. The allusion is to the double-edged sword out of the mouth of the Son of man—one edge to condemn, and the other to save (Rev. i. 16).

Yours is a Delphic sword—it cuts both ways. Erasmus says a Delphic sword is that which accommodates itself to the pro or con. of a subject. The reference is to the double meanings of the Delphic oracles, called in Greek Delphikē machaira.

Poke not fire with a sword. This was a precept of Pythagoras, meaning add not fuel to fire, or do not irritate an angry man by sharp words which will only increase his rage. (See Iamblichus, "Protreptics," symbol ix.)

Swords Prohibited. Gaming ran high at Bath, and frequently led to disputes and resort to the sword, then generally carried by well-dressed men. Swords were therefore prohibited by Nash in the public rooms; still they were worn in the streets, when Nash, in consequence of a duel fought by torchlight by two notorious gamblers, made the rule absolute—"That no swords should on any account be worn in Bath."

Sworn at Highgate. T. Mooresays, "The party was sworn on a pair of horns never to kiss the maid when he could kiss the mistress; never to eat brown bread when he could get white; never to drink small beer when he could get strong..... unless you like it best."

Many to the steep of Highgate hie.

Ask ye, Boetian shades, the reason why?

'Tis to the worship of the solemn Ho:n.

Byron, "Child Harold."

Swyneburne is an English translation of senglier, as may be seen by their armorial device, trois testes de senglier (three wild-boars' heads).

Sybarite (3 syl.). A self-indulgent person; a wanton. The inhabitants of Sybaris, in Greece, were proverbial for their luxurious living and self-indulgence. A tale is told by Seneca of a Sybarite who complained that he could not rest comfortably at night, and being asked why, replied, "He found a rose-leaf doubled under him, and it hurt him." (See RIPAÏLLE.)

All is calm as would delight the heart
Of Sybarite of old.

Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto i.

Sybarite. The Sybarites taught their horses to dance to the sound of a pipe. When the Crotonians marched against Sybari'ta they began to play on their pipes, whereupon all the Sybarite horses drawn out in array before the town began to dance; disorder soon prevailed in the ranks, and the victory was quick and easy.

Sycophant, from the Greek sukophantēs, "fig-blabbers." The men of Athens passed a law forbidding the exportation of figs; the law was little more than a dead letter, but there were always found mean fellows who, for their own private ends, impeached those who violated it; hence sycophant came to signify first a government toady, and then a toady generally.

Syc'orax. A witch, whose son was Cal'iban.—Shakespeare, "The Tempest."

Sydney, or rather SIDNEY (Algernon), called by Thomson, in his "Summer," The British Cassius, because of his republican feelings. Both disliked kings, not from their misrule, but from a dislike of monarchy. Cassius was one of the conspirators against the life of Caesar, and Sidney was one of the judges that condemned Charles I. to the block. (1617-1633.)

The Scottish Sidney. Robert Baillie, of Jerviswood, in Lanarkshire, is so called. He was executed in 1684.

Sy'enite. A granite so called from Syene, in Egypt, its great quarry.

Syllogism. The five hexameter verses which contain the symbolic names of all the different syllogistic figures are as follow :—

Barbāra, Celārent, Dārii, Feriōque, priōris.
Cesāre, Camestres, Festinō, Barōkō, secundæ.
Tertiæ, Darapti, Disamis, Datisi, Felapton,
Bokardō Ferisōn habet. Quarta insuper addit
Eramantip, Camēnes, Dimāris, Fesapō, Friesōn.

N.B. The vowel A universal affirmative.
E universal negative.
I particular affirmative.
O particular negative.

Taking the first line as the standard, the initial letters of all the words below it show to which standard the syllogism is to be reduced: thus, Barōko is to be reduced to "Barbara," Cesāre to "Celārent," and so on.

Sylphs, according to middle-age belief, are the elemental spirits of air; so named by the Rosicrucians and Cabalists, from the Greek silphē (a butterfly or moth. (See GNOMES.)

Sylphs. Any mortal who has preserved inviolate chastity may enjoy intimate familiarity with these gentle spirits. All coquettes at death become sylphs, "and sport and flutter in the fields of air."

Whoever, fair and chaste,
Rejects mankind, is by some sylph embraced.
Pope, "Rape of the Lock," i.

Sylvester (St.). The pope who converted Constantine the Great and his mother by "the miracle of restoring to life a dead ox." The ox was killed by a magician for a trial of skill, and he who restored it to life was to be accounted the servant of the true God. This tale is manifestly an imitation of the Bible story of Elijah and the prophets of Baal (1 Kings xviii.).

Syl'vius Bo'nus. Supposed to be Coil the Good, a contemporary of Ausonius, who often mentions him; but not even the titles of his works are known. He was a British writer.

Symbolism of Colours, whether displayed in dresses, the back-ground of pictures, or otherwise:

Black typifies grief, death.

Blue, hope, love of divine works; (in dresses) divine contemplation, piety, sincerity.

Pale Blue, peace, Christian prudence, love of good works, a serene conscience.

Green, faith, immortality, the resurrection of the just; (in dresses) the gladness of the faithful.

Pale Green, baptism.

Grey, tribulation.

Purple, justice, royalty.

Red, martyrdom for faith, charity; (in dresses) divine love.

Rose-colour, martyrdom. Innocent III. says of martyrs and apostles, "Hi et illi sunt flores rosarum et lillia convallium."

—"De Sacr. alto Myst.," i. 64.

Saffron, confessors.

Scarlet, the fervour and glory of witness to the church.

Violet, penitence.

White, purity, temperance, innocence, chastity, faith; (in dresses) innocence and purity.

Symbolism of Metals and Gems.

Amethyst typifies humility.

Diamond, invulnerable faith.

Gold, glory, power.

Onyx, sincerity.

Sapphire, hope.

Silver, chastity, purity.

Symmes's Hole. A vast cavern, supposed by Capt. John C. Symmes, of America, to exist in the earth, leading to its very centre. The centre, he affirms, is peopled, has its flora and fauna, and is lighted by two underground planets, which he calls Pluto and Proserpine.

Symple'gadës (4 syl.). Two rocks in the Euxine Sea said to open and shut. When a ship sailed between them they not unfrequently shut suddenly upon it and crushed it. The Argo escaped this fate, but lost a part of its stern.

Synop'tics. The first three gospels. (See LOGIA.)

Syntax (Doctor). A simple-minded clergyman, wholly unacquainted with the world, but a scholar and a gentleman. He goes in search of the picturesque.—William Combe, "Tour of Dr. Syntax."

Syn'tipas. A Greek version of Sandabar's parables. Syntipas is the tutor, and Cyrus the king. (See SEVEN SAGES.)

Sy'phax (in "Jerusalem'Delivered"). Chief of the Arabs who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. Tasso says of the Arabs, "Their accents were female, and their stature diminutive" (bk. xvii.).

Syphax, in Addison's "Cato."

Syrens of the Ditch. Frogs; so called by Tassoni.

Syr'ia, says Richardson, derives its name from Suri (a delicate rose); hence Suristan (the land of roses). The Jews called Syria Aram.

T

T, in music, stands for Tutti (all), meaning all the instruments or voices are to join. It is the opposite of S for Solo.

Marked with a T. Criminals convicted of felony, and admitted to the benefit of clergy, were branded on the brawn of the thumb with the letter T (thief). The law was abolished by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 27.

It fits to a T. Exactly. The allusion is to work that mechanics square with a T-rule, especially useful in making angles true, and obtaining perpendiculars on paper or wood.

The saintly T's. Sin Tander, Sin Tantony, Sin Tawdry, Sin Tausin, Sin Tedmund, and Sin Telders; otherwise St. Andrew, St. Anthony, St. Audry, St. Austin [Augustine], St. Edmund, and St. Ethelred.

Tab. An old Tab. An old maid; an old tabby or cat. So called because old maids usually make a cat their companion.

Tab'ard. The Tabard, in Southwark, is where Chaucer supposes his pilgrims to have assembled. The tabard was a jacket without sleeves, whole before, open on both sides, with a square collar, winged at the shoulder like a cape, and worn by military nobles over their armour. It was generally emblazoned with heraldic devices. Heralds still wear a tabard.

Item....à chascun ung grand tabart
De cordelier, jusques aux pieds.

"Le Petit Testament de Maître François Villon."

Tab'ardar. A sizer of Queen's College, Oxford; so called because his gown has tabard sleeves—that is, loose sleeves, terminating a little below the elbow in a point.

Tab'arin. He's a Tabarin—a merry Andrew. Tabarin was the fellow of Mondor, a famous vendor of quack medicines in the reign of Charles IX. By his antics and coarse wit he collected great crowds, and both he and his master grew rich. Tabarin bought a handsome château in Dauphine, but the aristocracy out of jealousy murdered him.

Tabby, a cat, means strictly the silken creature. (French, tabis; Italian, &c., tabi; Persian, retabi, a rich figured silk.)

Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclined. Gray.

Table. Apellès' Table. A pictured table, representing the excellency of sobriety on one side, and the deformity of intemperance on the other.

Tables of Cebes. Cebes was a Theban philosopher, a disciple of Socrates, and one of the interlocutors of Plato's "Phædo." His "Tables" or Tableau supposes him to be placed before a tableau or panorama representing the life of man, which the philosopher describes with great accuracy of judgment and splendour of sentiment. This tableau is sometimes appended to "Epic tetus."

Table of Pythagoras. The common multiplication table, carried up to ten. The table is parcelled off into 100 little squares or cells. (See TABULÆ.)

Knights of the Round Table. A military order instituted by Arthur, the "first king of the Britons," A.D. 516. Some say they were twenty-four in number, some make the number as high as 150, and others reduce the number to 12. They were all seated at a round table, that no one might claim a post of honour.

The Twelve Tables. The tables of the Roman laws engraved on brass, brought from Athens to Rome by the decemvirs.

Turning the Tables. Rebutting a charge by bringing forth a counter-charge. Thus, if a husband accuses his wife of extravagance in dress, she "turns the tables upon him" by accusing him of extravagance in his club. The Romans prided themselves on their tables made of citron-wood from Mauritania, inlaid with ivory, and sold at a most extravagant price—some equal to a senator's income. When the gentlemen accused the ladies of extravagance, the ladies retorted by reminding the gentlemen of what they spent in tables. Pliny calls this taste of the Romans mensurum in-sania.

It is also used for "audi alteram partem," and the allusion is then slightly modified—"We have considered the wife's extravagance, let us now look to the husband's."

We will now turn the tables, and show the hexameters in all their vigour.—The Times.

Table d'Hôte (the host's table). An ordinary. In the middle ages, and even down to the reign of Louis XIV., the landlord's table was the only public dining-place known in Germany and France. The first restaurant was opened in Paris during the reign of the Grand Monarque, and was a great success.

Table Money. Money appropriated to the purposes of hospitality. General officers in the army and flag-officers in the navy have table-money—the maximum allowance being three guineas a-day.

Table-Turning. The art or power of turning tables without the application of mechanical force. The force applied is alleged to be that of "the spirits," or of some unknown aura akin to electricity and animal magnetism. (See SPIRITUALISM.)

Tableaux Vivants (French, living pictures). Representations of statuary groups by living persons, invented by Madame Genlis while she had charge of the children of the duc d'Orléans.

Tabooed. Forbidden. This is a Polynesian term, and means consecrated or set apart. Thus a burial-ground is tabooed for general purposes. To fight in such a place would be impious, and any person who did so would be tabooed or "excommunicated" for violating the taboo. Like the Greek anathema, the Latin sacer, the French sacre, &c., the word has a double meaning—one to consecrate, and one to incur the penalty of violating the consecration.

Tab'orites (3 syl.). A sect of Hussites in Bohemia; so called from the fortress Tabor, about fifty miles from Prague, from which 'Nicolas von Hussineez, one of the founders, expelled the Imperial army. They are now incorporated with the Bohemian Brethren.

Tabouret. The right of sitting in the presence of the queen. In the ancient French court certain ladies had the droit de tabouret (right of sitting on a tabouret in the presence of the queen). At first it was limited to princesses; but subsequently it was extended to all the chief ladies of the queen's household; and later still the wives of ambassadors, dukes, lord chancellor, and keeper of the seals, enjoyed the privilege. Gentlemen similarly privileged had the droit de fouteuil.

Qui me résisterait
La marquise a le tabouret.
Beranger, "Le Marquis de Carabas,"

Tab'ulæ Tol'etanæ. The astronomical tables composed by order of Alphonso X. of Castile, in the middle of the thirteenth century, were so called because they were adapted to the city of Toledo.

His Tables Tolletanæs forth he brought,
Ful wel corrected, ne ther lakked nought
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 11,585

Tache'brune (2 syl.). The horse of Ogier le Dane. The word means "brown-spot."

Tac'wins. Winged female forms, who (according to the Koran) defend mortals from the evil demons.

Taë-pings. Chinese rebels. The word means Universal Peace, and arose thus: Hung-sew-tseuen, a man of humble birth, and an unsuccessful candidate for a government office, was induced by some missionary tracts to renounce idolatry and found the society of Taë-ping, which came into collision with the imperial authorities in 1850. Hung now gave out that he was the chosen instrument in God's hand to uproot idolatry and establish the dynasty of Universal Peace; he assumed the title of Taë-ping-wang (Prince of Universal Peace), and called his five chief officers princes. Nankin was made their capital in 1860, but in 1864 the rebellion was nearly stamped out.

Taf'fata or Taffety. A fabric made of silk. At one time it was watered; hence Taylor says "No taffaty more changeable than they." "Notre mot taffeta est formé, par onomatopée, du bruit que fait cette étoffe" (Francisque-Michel).

Taffata phrases. Smooth sleek phrases; euphemisms. We also use the words fustian, stuff, silken, shoddy, buckram, velvet, satin, lutestring, &c. &c., to qualify phrases and literary compositions spoken or written.

Taffata phrases, silken terms precise,
Three-piled hyperboles.
Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," v. 2.

Taffy. A Welshman; so called from David, a very common Welsh name. David, familiarly Davy, becomes in Welsh Taffid, Taffy.

Tag, Rag, and Bobtail. The vulgar ignobiliè. The words are properly applied to three sorts of inferior dogs. Tag is sometimes written shag.

It will swallow us all up, ships and men, shag, rag, and bobtail.—Kabelais, "Pantagruel," iv. 53.

Tag'hairm (2 syl.). A means employed by the Scotch in inquiring into futurity. A person wrapped up in the hide of a fresh-slain bullock was placed beside a waterfall, or at the foot of a precipice, and there left to meditate on the question propounded. Whatever his fancy suggested to him in this wild situation passed for the inspiration of his disembodied spirit.

Last evening tide
Brian an augury hath tried,
Of that kind which must not be
Unless in dread extremity,
The Taghairm called.

Sir Walter Scott, "Lady of the Lake," iv. 4.

Taherites (3 syl.). A dynasty of five kings, who reigned in Khorassan for fifty-two years (820-872). So called from the founder Tabēr, general of the Calif's army.

Tahmuras. King of Persia, whose adventures in Fairy-land among the Pe'ris and Dives (1 syl.) may be found in "Richardson's "Dissertation."

Tail. Lion's tail. Lions, according to legend, wipe out their footsteps with their long tail that they may not be tracked.

He has no more tail than a Manx cat. The cats in the Isle of Man are without a tail.

Tails. We are seriously told that the men of Kent are born with tails, as a punishment for the murder of Thomas à Becket.—Lambert, "Peramb."

Tails. It is said that the Ghilane race, which number between 30,000 and 40,000, and dwell "far beyond the Sennaar," have tails three or four inches long. Colonel du Corret tells us he carefully examined one of this race named Bellal, the slave of an emir in Mecca, whose house he frequented.—"World of Wonders," p. 206.

A three-tailed bashaw. (See BASHAW.)

Tailors. The three tailors of Tooley Street. Canning says that three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, addressed a petition of grievances to the House of Commons, beginning—"We, the people of England."

Nine tailors make a man. The present scope of this expression is that a tailor is so much more feeble than another man, that it would take nine of them to make a man of average stature and strength. There is a tradition that an orphan lad, in 1742, applied to a fashionable London tailor for alms. There were nine journeymen in the establishment, each of whom contributed something to set the little orphan up with a fruit barrow. The little merchant in time became rich, and adopted for his motto "Nine tailors made me a man," or "Nine tailors make a man." This certainly is not the origin of the expression, inasmuch as we find a similar one used by Taylor a century before that date, and referred to as of old standing even then.

Some foolish knave, I thinke, at first began
The slander that three taylors are one man.
Taylor, "Workes," iii. 73. (1630.)

Take a Hair of the Dog that Bit You. After a debauch take a little wine the next day. Take a cool draught of ale in the morning, after a night's excess. The advice was given literally in ancient times, "If a dog bites you, put a hair of the dog into the wound," on the homœopathic principle of similia similibus curantur (like cures like).

Talbot (Lord Arthur). A Cavalier who won the affections of Elvira, daughter of lord Walton; but lord Walton had promised his daughter in marriage to Sir Richard Ford, a Puritan officer. The betrothal being set aside, the Cavalier became the accepted lover, and the marriage ceremony was fixed to take place at Plymouth. When lord Arthur reached Plymouth, he discovered the dowager queen Henrietta in disguise, and aided her escape. Elvira, hearing thereof, concluded that her affianced husband had eloped with another lady. Lord Arthur, on his return, was arrested by Cromwell's soldiers and condemned to death; but Cromwell, secure in his strength, commanded all political prisoners to be released. Lord Arthur was accordingly pardoned, and married Elvira.—Bellini, "I Puritani" (an opera).

Tal'botype (3 syl.). A photographic process invented in 1839 by Fox Talbot, who called it "The Calotype process."

Tale (1 syl.). A tally; a reckoning. In Exod. v. we have tale of bricks. The ignorant measure by tale, not by weight.

Every shepherd tells his tale,
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
Milton, "L'Allegro."

Talent, meaning cleverness or "gift" of intelligence, is a word borrowed from Matt. xxv. 14-30.

Tales (2 syl.). Persons in the court from whom the sheriff or his clerk makes selections to supply the place of jurors who have been empannelled, but are not in attendance. It is the first word of the Latin sentence which provides for this contingency—Tales de circumstantibus.

To serve for jurymen or tales.
Butler, "Hudibras," pt. iii. 3.

To pray a talès. To pray that the number of jurymen may be completed. It sometimes happens that jurymen are challenged, or that less than twelve are in court. When this is the case the jury can request that their complement be made up from persons in the court. Those who supplement the jury are called talesmen, and their names are set down in a book called a talesbook.

Tales of the Genii, by Sir Charles Morell.

Tales of the Hall, in ten-syllable verse with rhymes, in twenty-two books, is by George Crabbe, author of "The Borough."

Tal'gol (in "Hudibras") was Jackson, a butcher in Newgate Street, who got a captain's commission for his rebellious bravery at the battle of Naseby.

Talisman. In order to free any place of vermin, the figure of the obnoxious animal is made in wax or consecrated metal, in a planetary hour, and this is called the talisman.—Warburton.

He swore that you had robbed his house,
And stole his talismanic louse.

S. Butler, "Hudibras," pt. iii. l.

Talisman. The Abraxas Stone is a most noted talisman. (See ABRAXAS.) In Arabia a talisman is still used, consisting of a piece of paper, on which are written the names of the Seven Sleepers and their dog, to protect a house from ghosts and demons. The talisman is supposed to be sympathetic, and to receive an influence from the planets, which it communicates to the wearer.

Talking Bird. A bird that spoke with a human voice, and could call all other birds to sing in concert with itself.—The Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister ("Arabian Nights"). (See GREEN BIRD.)

Tally. To correspond. The tally used in the Exchequer was a rod of wood, marked on one face with notches corresponding to the sum for which it was an acknowledgment. Two other sides contained the date, the name of the payer, and so on. The rod was then cleft in such a manner that each half contained one written side and half of every notch. One part was kept in the Exchequer, and the other was circulated. When payment was required the two parts were compared, and if they "tallied," or made a tally, all was right; if not, there was some fraud, and payment was refused. Tallies were not finally abandoned in the Exchequer till 1834. (French, tailleur, to cut.)

Tally-ho is the Norman hunting cry, Taillis au! (To the coppice). The tally-ho was used when the stag was viewed in full career making for the coppice. We now cry "Tally-ho!" when the fox breaks cover. The French cry is Thia hillaut!

Talpot or Talipot Tree. A gigantic palm. When the sheath of the flower bursts it makes a report like that of a cannon.

The burst, like Zeilan's giant palm,
Whose buds fly open with a sound
That shakes the pigmy forest round.
Moore, "Fire Worshippers."

Zeila or Zeilan is a seaport of Africa.

Talus. Sir Artegal's iron man. Spenser, in his "Faëry Queen," makes Talus run continually round the island of Crete to chastise offenders with an iron hail. He represents executive power—"swift as a swallow, and as lion strong." In Greek mythology Talus was a man of brass, the work of Hephestos (Vulcan), who went round the island of Crete thrice a day. Whenever he saw a stranger draw near the island he made himself red-hot, and embraced the stranger to death.

Tam of the Cowgate. Sir Thomas Hamilton, the Scotch lawyer, who lived at the Cowgate of Edinburgh. (Died 1563.)

Tam'erlane (3 syl.). A corruption of Timour Lengh (Timour the lame), one of the greatest warrior-kings that ever lived. Under him Persia became a province of Tartary. He modestly called himself Ameer (chief), instead of sultan or shah. (1380-1405.)

Taming of the Shrew. The plot was borrowed from a drama of the same title, published by S. Leacroft, of Charing Cross, under the title of "Six Old Plays on which Shakespeare Founded his Comedies." The induction was borrowed from Heuterus' "Rerum Burgund," lib. iv., a translation of which was published in 1607 by E. Grimstone, and called "Admirable and Memorable Histories." Dr. Percy thinks that the ballad of "The Frolicsome Duke, or the Tinker's Good Fortune," published in the Pepys Collection, may have suggested the induction. (See SLY.)

Taming of the Shrew. The shrew was Katherine, eldest daughter of Baptista, a rich gentleman of Padua. Her temper was so fiery, her tongue so insolent, her pride so unbounded, that gentlemen avoided her; but her father would not consent to the marriage of his younger daughter Bianca till Katherine was off his hands. Petruchio, wishing to marry, made his bow to this termagant, and actually married her. Being both high-spirited and witty, he assumed for the nonce such a violent seeming to all his dependents, appeared so arbitrary and dogmatical, that the lady was cowed, and tamed into a pattern wife.—Shakespeare.

Tammany (St.). Tammany was of the Delaware nation in the seventeenth century, and became a chief, whose rule was wise and pacific. He was chosen by the American democrats as their tutelary saint. His day is the 1st May. Cooper calls him Tamenund.

Tammuz. The Phœnician god Adonis. The feast of Adonis began with mourning: the women shaved off their hair and abandoned themselves to unmitigated grief. This period of grief was followed by days of joy, in honour of the resurrection of Adonis.

And, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz (Ezek. viii. 14).

Tan'cred (in "Jerusalem Delivered") shows a generous contempt of danger. Son of Eudes and Emma (sister of Robert Guiscard). Bœmond or Bohemond was his cousin. Tancred was the greatest of all the Christian warriors except Rinaldo. His one fault was "woman's love," and that woman Clorinda, a Pagan (bk. i.). He brought 800 horse from Tuscany and Campania to the allied Christian army. He slew Clorinda (not knowing her) in a night combat, and lamented her death with great lamentation (bk. xii.). Being wounded, he was nursed by Ermin'ia, who was in love with him (bk. xix.).

Tan'dem. At length. A pun applied to two horses driven one before the other. This Latin is of a similar character to plenum sed (full butt).

Tandem D.O.M. Tandem Deo optimo maximo (Now at the end ascribe we praise to God, the best and greatest).

Tangie. Tho water-sprite of the Orkneys; so called from tang (sea-weed), with which it is covered. The tangie sometimes appears in a human form, and sometimes as a little apple-green horse.

Tanist Stone. A monolith erected by the Celts at a coronation. We read in the Book of Judges (ix. 6) of Abimelech, that a "pillar was erected in Shechem" when he was made king; and (2 Kings xi. 14) it is said that a pillar was raised when Joash was made king, "as the manner was." The Lia Fail of Ireland was erected in Icolmkil for the coronation of Fergus Ere. This stone was removed to Scone, and became the coronation chair of Scotland. It was taken to Westminster by Edward I., and is the coronation chair of our sovereigns. (Celtic, Tunist, the heir-apparent.)

Tanner. Sixpence. (The Italian danaro, small change; Gipsy, tawno, little one. Similarly a thaler is called a dollar.)

Tanner. A proper name. (See BREWER.)

Tanner of Tamworth. Edward IV. was hunting in Drayton Basset when a tanner met him. The king asked him several questions, and the tanner, taking him for a highway robber, was very chary. At last they swopped horses; the tanner gave the king his gentle mare Brocke, which cost 4s., and the king gave the tanner his hunter, which soon threw him. Upon this the tanner payed dearly for changing back again. Edward now blew his horn, and when his courtiers came up in obedience to the summons, the tanner, in great alarm, cried out, "I hope I shall be hanged to-morrow" (i.e., I fear); but the king gave him the manor of Plumpton Park, with 300 marks a year.—Percy, "Reliques," &c.

Tann'häuser (4 syl.). A legendary hero of Germany, who wins the affections of Lisaura; but Lisaura, hearing that Sir Tannhäuser has set out for Venusberg to kiss the queen of love and beauty, destroys herself. After living some time in the cave-palace, Sir Tannhäuser obtains leave to visit the upper world, and goes to pope Urban for absolution. "No," said his holiness, "you can no more hope for mercy than this dry staff can be expected to bud again." On this the knight returned to Venusberg. In a few days the papal staff actually did bud, and Urban sent for Sir Tannhäuser, but the knight was nowhere to be found.

Tan'talize. To excite a hope and disappoint it.

Tan'talos (Latin, Tantalus), according to fable, is punished in the infernal regions by intolerable thirst. To make his punishment the more severe, he is plunged up to his chin in a river, but whenever he bends forward to slake his thirst the water flows from him.

So bends tormented Tantalus to drink,
While from his lips the reflux waters shrink;
Again the rising stream his bosom laves,
And thirst consumes him 'mid circumfluent waves.
Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," ii. 419.

Tantalus. Emblematical of a covetous man, who can never reach the good things he so earnestly craves. (See COVETOUS.)

Tantalus. A parallel story exists among the Chipouyans, who inhabit the deserts which divide Canada from the United States. At death, they say, the soul is placed in a stone ferry-boat, till judgment has been passed on it. If the judgment is averse, the boat sinks in the stream, leaving the victim chin-deep in water, where he suffers endless thirst, and makes fruitless attempts to escape to the Islands of the Blessed.—Alexander Mackenzie, "Voyages in the Interior of America" (1789, 1792, 1793).

Tanthony, St. Anthony. In Norwich are the churches called Sin Telder's (St. Ethelred's), Sin Tedmund's (St. Edmund's), Sin Tander's (St. Andrew's), and Sin Tausin's (St. Austin's). (See TAWDRY.)

Tantum Ergo. The most popular of the Eucharistic hymns sung in the Roman Catholic churches at Benediction with the Holy Sacrament; so called from the first two words of the last strophe but one of the hymn Pangē Lingua.

Taou. The sect of Reason, founded in China by Laou-Tsze, a contemporary of Confucius. He was taken to heaven on a black buffalo (B.C. 523).

Tap the Admiral. To suck liquor from a cask by a straw. Hotten says it was first done with the rum-cask in which the body of admiral lord Nelson was brought to England, and when the cask arrived the admiral was found "high and dry."

Tap-up Sunday. The Sunday preceding the fair held on the 2nd October, on St. Catherine's Hill, near Guildford, and so called because any person, with or without a licence, may open a "tap" or sell beer on the hill for that one day.

Tap'is. On the tapis. On the carpet; under consideration; now being ventilated. An English-French phrase referring to the tapis or cloth with which the table of the council-chamber is covered, and on which are laid the motions before the House.

Tap'ley (Mark). Martin Chuzzlewit's valet, who is always "jolly" under every "circumstance." — Dickens, "Martin Chuzzlewit."

Taproba'na. The island of Ceylon. — "Orlando Furioso."

Tapster properly means a bar maid; "ster" is the Anglo-Saxon feminine suffix -estre, which remains in spin-ster (a female spinner). Similarly, webster, baxter, dryster, saltster, huckster, &c., are all feminine nouns, showing that these at one time were female occupations. In all such words as youngster, punster, gamester, trickster, &c., the feminine suffix is in depreciation, as much as to say punning, tricking, gambling, and so on, are unworthy the name of man.

Taran'is. The Jupiter of the Druids.

Taran'tula. This word is derived from Taranto the city, or from Thara the river in Apulia, in the vicinity of which the venomous spiders abound. — Kircher, "De Arte Mag."

Tarentella. A class of tunes and songs, composed to cure the dancing mania called "Ta'rentism." (See above.)

Taren'yawag'on. A tribe-name of Hiawatha (q.v.).

Tariff. A table in alphabetical order of the duties, drawbacks, bounties, &c., charged or allowed on exports and imports. The word is derived from Tarifa, a seaport of Spain about twenty miles from Gibraltar, where the Moors, during the supremacy in Spain, levied contributions according to a certain scale on vessels entering the Mediterranean Sea.

Tarlatan. A thin gauze-like fabric; so called from Tarare, in France, the chief centre of the manufacture.

Tarpe'ian Rock; so called from Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel on the Capitoline Hill. Tarpeia agreed to open the gates to the Sabines if they would give her "what they wore on their arms" (meaning their bracelets). The Sabines, "keeping their promise to the ear," crushed her to death with their shields, and she was buried in that part of the hill called the Tarpeian Rock. Subsequently traitors were cast down this rock and so killed.

Bear him to the rock Tarpeian, and from thence Into destruction cast him.

Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," iii. 1.

Tarred. All tarred with the same brush. All alike to blame; all sheep of the same flock. The allusion is to the custom of distinguishing the sheep of any given flock by a common mark with a brush dipped in tar.

Tarring and Feathering. The first record of this punishment is in 1189 (1 Rich. I.). A statute was made that any robber voyaging with the crusaders "shall be first shaved, then boiling pitch shall be poured upon his head, and a cushion of feathers shook over it;" the wretch was then to be put on shore at the very first place the ship came to.—Rymer, "Fœdera," i. 65.

Tarrinzeau Field. The bowling-green of Southwark; so called because it belonged to the barons Hastings, who were barons Tarrinzeau and Mauchline.

Tartar, the deposit of wine, means "Infernal Stuff," being derived from the word Tar'taros (q.v.). Paracelsus says, "It is so called because it produces oil, water, tincture, and salt, which burn the patient as the fires of Tartarus burn."

Tar'taros (Greek), Tartarus (Latin). That part of the infernal regions where the wicked are punished.—Classic mythology.

Tartufe (2 syl.). The principal character of Molière's comedy so called. The original was the abbé de Roquette, a parasite of the prince de Condé. It is said that the name is from the Italian tartuffoli (truffles), and was suggested to Molière on seeing the sudden animation which lighted up the faces of certain monks when they heard that a seller of truffles awaited their orders. Bickerstaff's character of Mawworm in "The Hypocrite" was borrowed from Tartufe.

Tassel-Gentle. The tiercel is the male of the gooshawk, so called because it is a tierce or third less than the female. This is true of all birds of prey. The tiercel-gentle was the class of hawk appropriate to princes. (See Hawk.)

O for a falconer's voice
To lure this tassel-gentle back again!
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 2.

Tasselled Gentleman. A fop; a man dressed in fine clothes. A corruption of Tercel-gentle by a double blunder: (1) Tercel, erroneously supposed to be tassel, and to refer to the tags and tassels worn by men on their dress; and (2) gentle corrupted into gentlemen, according to the Irish exposition of the verse, "The gentle shall inherit the earth."

Tat'tianists. The disciples of Tatian, who, after the death of Justin Martyr, "formed a new scheme of religion; for he advanced the notion of certain invisible æons, branded marriage with the name of fornication, and denied the salvation of Adam."—Irenæus, "Adv. Hereses" (ed. Grabe), pp. 105, 106, 262.

Tat'inus (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Sent by Alexas, emperor of the Greeks, to join the crusaders with a squadron of 200 Greeks, who were armed with crooked sabres, and had bows and quivers at their backs. They were famous in retreat-fighting, but when the drought came they sneaked off home (bk. xiii.).

Tatting, from the East Indian word tattie (a thick mat used as a curtain for doorways, and usually kept moist in hot weather to preserve the chamber cool by evaporation).

Tattle. A half-witted beau, vain of his amours. He plumed himself on his secrecy, but was more transparent than glass.—Congreve, "Love for Love."

Tattoo. A beat on the drum at night to recall the soldiers to their barracks. It sounded at nine in summer, and eight in winter. (French, tapoter or tapotez tous).

The devil's tattoo. Drumming with one's finger on the furniture, or with one's toe on the ground—a monotonous sound, which gives the listener the "blue devils."

Taurus (the Bull) indicates to the Egyptians the time for ploughing the earth, which is done with oxen.

Tawdry. Showy, worthless finery; a corruption of St. Audrey. At the annual fair of St. Androy, in the isle of Ely, showy lace called St. Audrey's lace was sold, and gave foundation to our word tawdry, which means anything gaudy, in bad taste, and of little value. (See TANTHONY.)

Tawdry: as strigments, timbrim, seu fasciolæ, emptæ nudinis S. Ethelredæ.—Henshaw.
Come, you promised me a tawdry lace and a pair of sweet gloves.—“Winter's Tale,” iv. 2.

Tawny (The). Alexandre Bonvicino the historian, called Il Moretto. (1514-1564.)

Taylor, called The Water-Poet, who confesses he never learned so much as the accident. He wrote fourscore books, and afterwards opened an ale-house in Long Acre. (1580-1654.)

Taylor, their better Charon, lends an oar,
Once swan of Thames, though now he sings no more.
“Dunciad,” iii.

Taylor's Institute. The Fitzwilliam Museum of Oxford; so called from Sir Robert Taylor, who made large bequests towards its erection.

Tchow Dynasty. The third imperial dynasty of China, which gave thirty-four kings, and lasted 866 years (B.C. 1122-256). It was so called from the seat of government.

Te Deum, &c., is usually ascribed to St. Ambrose, but is probably of a much later date. It is said that St. Ambrose improvised this hymn while baptising St. Augustine. In allusion to this tradition, it is sometimes called “The Ambrosian Hymn.”

Te Deum (of ecclesiastical architecture) is a “theological series” of carved figures in niches: (1) of angels, (2) of patriarchs and prophets, (3) of apostles and evangelists, (4) of saints and martyrs, (5) of founders. In the restored west front of Salisbury cathedral there is a “Te Deum,” but the whole 123 original figures have been reduced in number.

Te Ig'itur. One of the service-books of the Roman Catholic Church, used by bishops and other dignitaries; so called from the first words of the canon, Te igitur, clementissimè Pater.

Oaths upon the Te Igitur. Oaths sworn on the “Te Igitur” service-book, regarded as especially solemn. The Te Igitur was used as the ordeal “of compurgation.”

Tea-spoon (A). £5,000. (See SPOON.)

Teachwell (Mrs.). Lady Ellinor Fenn, wife of Sir John Fenn, of East Dereham, Norfolk.

Teän or Teian Poet. Anacreon, who was born at Teüs, in Ionia. (B.C. 563-478.)

Teanlay Night. The vigil of All Souls, or last evening of October, when bonfires were lighted and revels held for succouring souls in purgatory.

Tear and Larne. (Anglo-Saxon, taher; Gothic, tagr; Greek, dakru; Latin, lacrima; French, larme.)

Tears of Eos. The dew-drops of the morning were so called by the Greeks. Eos was the mother of Memnon (q.v.), and wept for him every morning.

St. Laurence's tears. Falling stars. St. Laurence was roasted to death on a gridiron on the 10th of August, and wept that others had not the same spirit to suffer for truth's sake as he had. As falling stars are abundant about this period, it was said that they are the tears of the saint falling on the burning embers.

Tear (to rhyme with “snare”). To tear Christ's body. To use imprecations. The common oaths of mediæval times were by different parts of the Lord's body; hence the preachers used to talk of “tearing God's body by imprecations.”

Her othes been so greet and so dampnable,
That it is grisly for to here hem swere.
Our blisful Lordes body thay to-tere.
Chaucer, “Canterbury Tales,” 13,889.

Tear'sheet (Doll). A courtesan in Shakespeare's “2 Henry IV.”

Teazle (Lady). A lively, innocent country maiden, married to Sir Peter, who is old enough to be her father. Planted in the hot-bed of London gaiety, she formed a liaison with Joseph Surface, but being saved from disgrace, repented and reformed.—Sheridan, “School for Scandal.” (See TOWNLY.)

Teazle (Sir Peter). A man who had remained a bachelor till he had become old, when he married a girl from the country, who proved extravagant, fond of pleasure, selfish, and vain. Sir Peter was always gibing his wife for her inferior rank, teasing her about her manner of life, and yet secretly liking what she did, and feeling proud of her.—Sheridan, “School for Scandal.”

Teeth. In spite of his teeth. In opposition to his settled purpose or resolution. King John (1211) wanted to make a descent upon Wales, and in order to raise money tortured and imprisoned the Jews that they might pay largely for immunity. There was at the time a very wealthy Jew residing at Bristol, who was so imprisoned, and John asked £5,000 as the price of liberation. The Jew went to prison, and John gave orders that he should forfeit one tooth every day till he paid the sum demanded. The Jew stood out for seven days and then gave in.—Holinshead. (See SKIN.)

He has cut his eye-teeth. He is "up to snuff;" he has "his weather-eye open." The eye-teeth are cut late—

Months.

First set—5 to 8, the four central incisors.
7 " 10 " lateral
12 " 14 " anterior molars.
14 " 21 " the eye-teeth.

Years.

Second set—5 to 6, the anterior molars.
7 " 8 " incisors.
9 " 10 " bicuspidis.
11 " 12 " eye-teeth.

Teian poet. (See TEAN.)

Telamón's. Supporters (Greek, telamōn). Generally applied to figures of men used for supporters in architecture. (See ATLANTES.)

Telegram. Milking a telegram. A telegram is said to be "milked" when the message sent to a specific party is surreptitiously made use of by others.

They receive their telegrams in cipher to avoid the risk of their being "milked" by rival journals.—The Times, August 14, 1869.

Telemachos. The only son of Ulysses and Penelopë. After the fall of Troy he went, under the guidance of Mentor, in quest of his father. He is the hero of Fénelon's prose epic called "Télémaque."

Tell (William). The boldest of the Swiss mountaineers. The daughter of Leuthold having been insulted by an emissary of Albright Gessler, the enraged father killed the ruffian and fled. William Tell carried the assassin across the lake, and greatly incensed the tyrannical governor. The people rising in rebellion, Gessler put to death Melch'tal, the patriarch of the district, and placing the ducal cap of Austria on a pole, commanded the people to bow down before it in reverence. Tell refused to do so, whereupon Gessler imposed on him the task of shooting an apple from his little boy's head. Tell succeeded in this perilous trial of skill, but letting fall a concealed arrow, was asked with what object he had secreted it. "To kill thee, O tyrant," he replied, "if I had failed in the task imposed on me." Gessler now ordered the bold mountaineer to be put in chains and carried across the lake to Kißnacht castle, "to be devoured alive by reptiles;" but being rescued by the peasantry, he shot Gessler and liberated his country.—Rossini, "Guglielmo Tell" (an opera).

William Tell. The story of William Tell is told of several other persons:

(1) Egil, the brother of Wayland Smith. One day king Nidung commanded him to shoot an apple off the head of his son. Egil took two arrows from his quiver, the straightest and sharpest he could find. When asked by the king why he took two arrows, the god-archer replied, as the Swiss peasant to Gessler, "To shoot thee, tyrant, with the second, if the first one fails."

(2) Saxo Grammaticus tells nearly the same story respecting Toke, who killed Harold.

(3) Reginald Scot says, "Pumher shot a pennie on his son's head, and made ready another arrow to have slain the duke Remgrave, who commanded it." (1584.)

(4) Similar tales are told of Adam Bell, Clyn of the Clough, William of Cloudeslie, &c.

Tellers of the Exchequer. A corruption of talliers—i.e., tally-men, whose duty it was to compare the tallies, receive money payable into the Exchequer, give receipts, and pay what was due according to the tallies. Abolished in the reign of William IV. The functionary of a bank who receives and pays bills, orders, and so on, is still called a "teller."

Tem'ora. One of the principal poems of Ossian, in eight books, so called from the royal residence of the kings of Connaught. Cairbar had usurped the throne, having killed Cormac, a distant relative of Fingal; and Fingal raised an army to dethrone the usurper. The poem begins from this point with an invitation from Cairbar to Oscar, son of Ossian, to a banquet. Oscar accepted the invitation, but during the feast a quarrel was ramped up, in which Cairbar and Oscar fell by each other's spears. When Fingal arrived a battle ensued, in which Fillan, son of Fingal the Achilles of the Caledonian army, and Cathmor, son of Cairbar, the bravest of the Irish army, were both slain. Victory crowned the army of Fingal, and Ferad-Artho, the rightful heir, was restored to the throne of Connaught.

Temper. To make trim. The Italians say, temperare la lira, to tune the lyre; temperare una penna, to mend a pen; temperare l'orologio, to wind up the clock. In Latin temperare calammum is "to mend a pen." Metal well tempered is metal made trim or mete for its use, and if not so it is called ill-tempered. When Otway says, "Woman, nature made thee to temper man," he means to make him trim, to soften his nature, to mend him.

Templars or Knights Templars. Nine French knights bound themselves, at the beginning of the twelfth century, to protect pilgrims on their way to the Holy Land, and received the name of Templars, because their arms were kept in a building given to them for the purpose by the abbot of the convent called the Temple of Jerusalem. They used to call themselves the "Poor Soldiers of the Holy City." Their habit was a long white mantle, to which subsequently was added a red cross on the left shoulder. Their famous war-cry was "Bauseant," from their banner, which was striped black and white, and charged with a red cross; the word Bauseant is old French for a black and white horse.

Seal of the Knights Templars (two knights riding on one horse). The first Master of the order and his friend were so poor that they had but one horse between them, a circumstance commemorated by the seal of the order.

Temple (London) was once the seat of the Knights Templars. (See above.)

Ten is the Gothic tai-hun (two hands); old German, ze-hen, contracted first into zehn and then into zen. Dozen is du't-zen (two and ten).

Tench is from the Latin tinc-a, so called, says Aulus Gellius, because it is tincta (tinted).

Tendon. (See ACHILLES.)

Ten'glio. A river in Lapland on whose banks roses grow.

I was surprised to see upon the banks of this river roses of as lovely a red as any that are in our own gardens.—M. de Maupeituis.

Ten'iers. Malplaquet, in France, famous for the victory of the duke of Marlborough over the French in 1709.

Her courage tried
On Teniers' dreadful field.
Thomson, "Autumn."

The Scottish Teniers. Sir David Wilkie. (1785-1841.)

Tennis-Ball of Fortune. Pertinax, the Roman emperor, was so called. He was first a seller of charcoal, then a schoolmaster, then a soldier, and lastly an emperor, but in three months he was dethroned and murdered.

Tennyson (Alfred). Bard of Arthurian Romance. His poems on the legends of king Arthur are—(1) The Coming of Arthur; (2) Geraint and Enid; (3) Merlin and Vivien; (4) Lancelot and Elaine; (5) The Holy Grail; (6) Pelleas and Ettarre; (7) Guinevere; (8) The Passing of Arthur. Also the Morte d'Arthur, Sir Galahad, The Lady of Shalott. (1810-*)

Tenson. A subdivision of the chanzos or poems of love and gallantry by the Troubadours. When the public jousts were over, the lady of the castle opened her "court of love," in which the combatants contended with harp and song.

Tent. Pari Banou (the Fairy Banou) gave Prince Ahmed a tent which would cover a whole army, but yet fold up into a parcel not too big for the pocket ("Arabian Nights"). The ship "Skidbladni" would hold all the gods of the Scandinavian Valhalla, but yet might be folded small like a sheet of paper. (See CARPET.)

Father of such as dwell in tents. Jabal (Gen. iv. 20).

Tent Wine. A corruption of the Spanish vino tinto; so called because it is white wine tinted.

Ten'terden. Tenterden steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands. The reason alleged is not obvious; an apparent non-sequitur. Mr. More, being sent with a commission into Kent to ascertain the cause of the Goodwin Sands, called together the oldest inhabitants to ask their opinion. A very old man said, "I believe that Tenterden steeple is the cause."

This reason seemed ridiculous enough, but the fact is the bishop of Rochester applied the revenues for keeping clear the Sandwich haven to the building of Tenterden steeple. Another tradition is that a quantity of stones, got together for the purpose of strengthening the sea-wall, were employed in building the church-tower, and when the next storm came that part of the mainland called Goodwin Sands was submerged.

Tenth Wave. It is said that every tenth wave is the biggest.

At length, tumbling from the Gallic coast, the victorious tenth wave shall ride like the bear over all the rest.—Burke.

Teon Bard. (See TEAN.)

Tercel. The male hawk; so called because it is one-third smaller than the female. (French, tiers.)

Terebinthus. Epkes-dammin, or the coast of Dammin; also called Pas-dammin (1 Sam. xvii. 1).

O thou, that 'gainst Goliath's impious head
The youthful arms in Terebinthus sped,
When the proud foe, who scoffed at Israel's band,
Fell by the weapon of a stripling's hand,
"Jerusalem Delivered," bk. vii.

Terence. The Terence of England, the mender of hearts, is the exquisite compliment which Goldsmith, in his "Retaliation," pays to Richard Cumberland, author of "The Jew," "The West Indian," "The Wheel of Fortune," &c. (1732-1811.)

Tere'sa (St.). The reformer of the Carmelites, canonised by Gregory XV. in 1621. (1515-1582.)

Tere'sa Panza. Wifo of Sancho Panza, Don Quixote's squire. In Bk. i. 7, she is called dame Juanu Gutierrez; in Pt. II., Bk. iv. 7, she is called Maria Gutierrez; in Bk. viii. 21, she is called Joan Panza.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote."

Te'reus (2 syl.). A king of Thrace, changed into a hoopoe. His wifo Progne was changed into a swallow, and his wife's sister, Philomel, into a nightingale.

Term Time.

Hilary or Lent begins	11th Jan.	ends 31st Jan.
Easter term	15th April,	8th May.
Trinity term	22nd May,	12th June.
Michaelmas term	2nd Nov.,	25th Nov.

N.B.—When a term begins or ends on a Sunday, the Monday after is term-day.

Termagant. The author of "Junius" says this was a Saxon idol, and derives the word from tyr magan (very mighty); but probably it is the Persian tir-magian (Magian lord or deity). The early Crusaders, not very nice in their distinctions, called all Pagans Saracens, and muddled together Magianism and Mahometanism in wonderful confusion, so that Termagant was called the god of the Saracens, or the co-partner of Mahound. Hence Ariosto makes Ferrau "blaspheme his Mahound and Termagant" ("Orlando Furioso," xii. 59); and in the legend of "Syr Guy" the Soudan or Sultan is made to say—

So help me, Mahoune of might,
And Termagaunt, my God so bright.

Termagant was at one time applied to men. Thus Massenger, in "The Picture," says: "A hundred thousand Turks assailed him, every one a Termagant" (Pagan). At present the word is applied to a boisterous, brawling woman. Thus Arbuthnot says: "The eldest daughter was a termagant, an imperious profligate wretch." This change of sex arose from the custom of representing Termagant on the stage in Eastern robes, like those worn in Europe by females.

"'Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termagant Scot [Douglas] had paid me scot and lot too.—Shakespeare, "1 Henry IV.," v. 4.

Outdoing Termagant ("Hamlet," iii. 2). In the old plays the degree of rant was the measure of villany. Termagant and Herod, being considered the beau-ideal of all that is bad, were represented as settling everything with club-law, and bawling so as to split the ears of the groundlings. Bully Bottom, having ranted to his heart's content, says, "That is Eracles' vein, a tyrant's vein." (See HEROD.)

Terpsichore, properly Terp-sic'-o-re, but generally pronounced Terp'-si-core. The goddess of dancing. Terpsichore'an, relating to dancing. Dancers are called "the votaries of Terpsichore."

Terra Firma. Dry land, in opposition to water; the continents as distinguished from islands. The Venetians so called the mainland of Italy under their sway, as the duchy of Venice, Venetian Lombardy, the March of Trevi'so, the duchy of Friuli, and Istria. The continental parts of America belonging to Spain were also called by the same term.

Terrible (The). Ivan IV. [or II.] of Russia. (1529, 1533-1584.)

Terrier is a dog that "takes the earth," or unearths his prey. Dog Tray is merely an abbreviation of the same word. Terrier is also applied to the hole which foxes, badgers, rabbits, and so on, dig under ground to save themselves from the hunters. The dog called a terrier creeps into these holes like a ferret to rout out the victim. (Latin, terra, the earth.)

Terry Alts. Insurgents of Clare, who appeared after the Union, and committed numerous outrages. These rebels were similar to "the Thrashers" of Connaught, "the Carders," the followers of "Captain Reek" in 1822, and the Fenians of the present day (1869).

Ter'tium Quid. A third party which shall be nameless. The expression originated with Pythagoras, who defining bipeds said—

Sunt bipes homo, et avis, et tertium quid.

A man is a biped, so is a bird, and a third thing (which shall be nameless).

Jamblicus says this third thing was Pythagoras himself.—Vita Pyth., cxxvii.

In chemistry, when two substances chemically unite the new substance is called a tertium quid, as a neutral salt produced by the mixture of an acid and alkali.

Tessera'rian Art. The art of gambling. (Latin, tessera, a die.)

Tessira (in "Orlando Furioso"). One of the leaders of the Moorish army.

Tester. A sixpence; so called because it was stamped on one side with the head of the reigning sovereign. Similarly the head canopy of a bed is called its tester (Italian, testa; French, teste, a head). Copstick in Dutch means the same thing.

Hold, there's a tester for thee.
Shakespeare, "2 Henry IV.", iii. 2.

Testers are gone to Oxford, to study at Brazenose. When Henry VIII. debased the silver testers, the alloy broke out in red pimples through the silver, giving the royal likeness in the coin a blotchy appearance; hence the punning proverb.

Tête. Tête bottée (Booted-Head). The nickname of Philippe des Comines.

Yon, Sir Philippe des Comines, were at a hunting-match with the duke your master; and when he alighted after the chase, he required your services in drawing off his boots. Reading in your looks some natural resentment, he ordered you to sit down in turn, and rendered you the same office...but...no so ner had he plucked one of your boots off, than he brutally beat it about your head...and his privileged fool Le Glorieux...gave you the name of Tête Bottée.—Sir W. Scott, "Quentin Durward," ch. xxx.

Tête du Pont. The barbican or watch-tower placed on the head of a draw-bridge.

Teth'ys. The sea, properly the wife of Oceanos.

The golden sun above the watery bed
Of hoary Tethys raised his beamy head.
Hooles's "Ariosto," bk. viii.

Tetragram'maton. The four letters, meaning the four which compose the name of Deity. The ancient Jews never pronounced the word Jehovah composed of the four sacred letters JHVH. The word means "I am" or I exist (Exod. iii. 14); but Rabbi Bechai says that the letters include the three times, past, present, and future. Pythagoras called Deity a Tetrad or Tetractys, meaning the "four sacred letters." The Greek ZEUS, Latin JOVE and DEUS, Persian SORU, Assyrian ADAD, Arabian ALLA, Egyptian AMON, German GOTT, and a host of other words significant of Deity, are tetragrams. Zeus, Deus, and Jove all mean the same as Jehovah, viz., "The living Being."

Such was the sacred Tetragrammaton.
Things worthy silence must not be revealed.
Dryden, "Britannia Rediviva."

[We have the Egyptian Osor, like the Greek Zeos; Spanish dios, French dieu, Italian Idio, Dutch Godt, Danish Godh, Swedish Goth, &c. &c.]

Tetrapla. The Bible, disposed by Origen under four columns, each of which contained a different Greek version. The versions were those of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotian, and the Septuagint.

Teucer. Brother of Ajax the Greater, who went with the allied Greeks to the siege of Troy. On his return home his father banished him the kingdom, for not avenging on Ulysses the death of his brother.—Homer, "Iliad."

Teufelsdröckh, Herr (pron. Toy-fels-druk). The German philosopher in Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus," who looks through the coat to the skin which it covers.

Teutons. Thuath-duiné (north men). Our word Dutch and the German Deutsch are variations of the same word, originally written Theodisk.

Teutonic Knights. An order which the Crusades gave birth to. Originally only Germans of noble birth were admissible to the order. (Abolished by Napoleon in 1800.)

Thabeck (executioner). The fierce angel that presides over the dark region of Jehennam.—The Koran.

Tha'is (2 syl.). An Athenian courtesan who induced Alexander, when excited with wine, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings at Persepolis.

The king seized a flambeau with zeal to destroy;
Thaïs led the way to light him to his prey,
And, like another Helen, fired another Troy.
Dryden, "Alexander's Feast."

Thal'aba. The Destroyer, son of Hodeirah and Ze'nab (Zeno'bia); hero of a poem by Southey, in twelve books.

Thales. (See SEVEN SAGES.)

Thales'tris. Queen of the Am'azons; any lady-at-arms or female warrior.—Classic mythology.

Thali'a. The muse of comedy.

Thames (1 syl.). The Latin Tamesis, the river Tame combined with the river Isis. Tame is a variety of the Aryan element am, amp, tam, &c., seen in the Latin amn-is, in the Greek po-tam-os, and in such words as North-amp-ton, South-amp-ton, Tam-worth, Tam-ar, &c. Isis is a variety of the Celtic uisg, water, of which esk, ex, ouse, &c., are other varieties.

Around his throne the sea-born brothers stood,
Who swell with tributary urns his flood:—
First the famed authors of his ancient name,
The winding Isis and the fruitful Thames;
The Kennet swift, for silver eels renowned;
The Loddon slow with verdant alders crowned;
Cole, whose dark streams his flowery islands lave;
And chalky Wey that rolls a milky wave;
The blue transparent Vandalis appears;
The gulphy Lee his sedge tresses rears;
And sullen Mole that hides his diving flood;
And silent Darent stained with Danish blood.
Pope, "Windsor Forest."

He'll never set the Thames on fire. He'll never make any figure in the world. The temse was a corn sieve which was worked in former times over the receiver of the sifted flour. A hard-working active man would not unfrequently ply the temse so quickly as to set fire to the wooden hoop at the bottom; but a lazy fellow would never set the temse on fire. The play on the word temse has engendered many stupid imitations, as "He will never set the Mersey on fire," which has no meaning. (Dutch, teme; French, tamis; Italian, tamiso, a sieve; with the verbs temsen, tamiser, tamisare, to sift). Hence bread made of finely-sifted flour used to be called temse-bread.

* * The thin worsted stuff called tammy, lasting, and durant, used for ladies' shoes and strainers, is the same word. The sieve called the tammy, tamis, or temse, was made of this glazed cloth.

Tham'muz. The Syrian and Phœnician name of Ado'nis. His death happened on the banks of the river Adonis, and in summer time the waters always become reddened with the hunter's blood.

Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound on Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Tham'yris. A Thracian bard mentioned by Homer ("Iliad," ii. 595). He challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and being overcome in the contest, was deprived by them of his sight and power of song. He is represented with a broken lyre in his hand.

Blind Thamyris and blind Mæon'idēs [Homer],
And Tiresias and Phineus, prophets old.
Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii.

* * "Tiresias" pron. Ti'-re-sas; "Phineus" pron. Fi'-nuce.

Thatch. A straw hat. A hat being called a tile, and the word being mistaken for a roof-tile, gave rise to several synonyms, such as roof, roofing, thatch, &c.

Thau'maste (2 syl.). A mighty scholar, who journeyed from England to argue by signs only. He was beaten in argument by Panurge (2 syl.).—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Thaumatur'gus. A miracle-worker; applied to saints and others who are reputed to have performed miracles. (Greek, thauma ergon.)

Prince Alexander of Hohenlohe, whose power was looked upon as miraculous.

Apollonius of Tyana. (A.D. 3-98.) (See his life by Philostratus.)

St. Bernard of Clairvaux, called "The Thaumaturgus of the West." (1091-1153.)

St. Francis D'Assisi, founder of the Franciscan order. (1182-1226.)

J. Joseph Gassner, of Bratz in the Tyrol, who, looking on disease as a possession, exorcised the sick, and his cures were considered miraculous. (1727-1779.)

Gregory, bishop of Neo-Cæsare'a, in Capado'cia, called emphatically "The Thaumaturgus," from the numerous miracles he is reported to have performed. (212-270.)

St. Isidorus. (See his life by Damascius.)

Jannes and Jambres, the magicians of Pharaoh, who withstood Moses.

Blaise Pascal. (1623-1662.)

Plotinus, and several other Alexandrine philosophers. (205-270.) (See the Life of Plotinus by Porphyry.)

Proclus. (412-485.) (See his life by Mari'nus.)

Simon Magus, of Samaria, called "The Great Power of God" (Acts viii. 10).

Several of the Sophists. (See "Life of the Philosophers," by Eunapius.)

Vincent de Paul, founder of the "Sisters of Charity." (1576-1660.)

* * Peter Schott has published a treatise on natural magic called "Thaumaturgus Physicus." (See below.)

Thaumaturgus. Filume'na is called Thaumaturga, a saint unknown till 1802, when a grave was discovered with this inscription on tiles: LUMENA PAXTE CVMFI, which, being re-arranged, makes Pax tecum Filumena. Filumena was at once accepted as a saint, and so many wonders were worked by "her" that she has been called La Thaumaturge du Dix-neuvième Siècle.

Theagenēs and Charicle'a. The hero and heroine of an exquisite erotic romance in Greek by Heliodorus, bishop of Tricca. At early dawn some Egyptian banditti assemble on the summit of a promontory at the mouth of the Nile, and behold a vessel laden with spoils lying at anchor in the sea before them. The banks of the Nile are covered with dead bodies and the fragments of a feast. These are the relics of certain pirates that had contended for the possession of Chariclea, who is discovered by the robbers sitting on a rock tending Theagenes, who lies wounded beside her. Subsequently Cnemon and Calasiris meet in the house of Nausiclēs, when Calasiris relates the early history of Chariclea, the development of her love for Theagenes, and her capture by the pirates.—"Loves of Theagenes and Charicleia" (4th cent.).

Theban Bard or Eagle. Pindar, born at Thebes. (B.C. 518-439.)

Thebes (1 syl.), called The Hundred Gated, was not Thebes of Bœotia, but the Thebais of Egypt, which extended over twenty-three miles of land. Homer says out of each gate the Thebans could send forth 200 war-chariots. (Egyptian, Taape or Taouab, city of the sun.)

The world's great empress on the Egyptian plain. That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states. And pours her heroes through a hundred gates. Two hundred horsemen and two hundred cars From each wide portal issuing to the wars.

Pope, "Riad," ix.

Thecla (St.), styled in Greek martyr-ologies the proto-martyress, as St. Stephen is the proto-martyr. All that is known of her is from a book called the "Periods," or "Acts of Paul and Thecla," pronounced apocryphal by pope Gelasius, and unhappily lost. According to the legend, Thecla was born of a noble family in Ico'nium, and was converted by the preaching of St. Paul.

Thélème (Te-laim). The abbey founded and endowed by Gargantua at the suggestion of Friar John, and bestowed upon him for his services in the subjugation of Picrochole. It was hexagonal, six storeys high, and contained 9,332 chambers, every one of which had its boudoir, oratory, and ward-room. The staircase was twenty feet wide, and had a landing after every twelve stairs. All the furniture was most sumptuous. The surrounding parks were planted with the choicest trees, and decorated with fountains and statues. The men wore crimson stockings, and both the men and women had every luxury which art could devise. There was only one law, and that was expressed in four words—"Do WHAT YOU WILL;" but what one did all did. If one played, all played; if one went hawking, all went; in a word, every one liked and disliked alike. To maintain this establishment a fee-farm-rent of 2,369,514 rose-nobles, exempt from all burden, was settled on it, and paid annually at the gate of the abbey.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 53.

Thelussan Act. The 39th and 40th Geo. III., cap. 98. An Act to prevent testators from leaving their property to accumulate for more than twenty-one years; so called because it was passed in reference to the last will and testament of the late Mr. Thelusson, in which he desired his property to be invested till it had accumulated to some nineteen millions sterling.

The'not. An old shepherd who relates to Cuddy the fable of "The Oak and the Briar," with the view of curing him of his vanity.—Spenser, "Shepherd's Calendar."

Theoc'ritos. The Scottish Theocritus. Allen Ramsay, author of "The Gentle Shepherd." (1685-1758.)

Theodolite (Greek). Theaomai odos litos (I survey the straight road—i.e., the direct distance between two given points). The general etymology is theaomai dolos.

Theod'omas. A famous trumpeter at the siege of Thebes.

At every court ther cam loud menstraleye
That never tromp'de Joab for to heere,
Ne he Theodomas yit half so cleere
At Thebes, when the cite was in doute.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 9,502.

Theodo'ra (in "Orlando Furioso"), sister of Constantine, the Greek emperor. Greatly enraged against Roge'ro, who slew her son, she vowed vengeance. Rogero was captured during sleep, and committed to her hands. She cast him into a foul dungeon, and fed him on the bread of affliction, but prince Leon released him.

Theod'orick. One of the heroes of the Niebelung, a legend of the Sagas. This king of the Goths was also selected as the centre of a set of champions by the German minnesängers (minstrels), but he is called by these romancers Diderick of Bern (Vero'na).

Theodo'rus. The royal physician who undertook to cure Gargantua of his bad propensities, so he purged him canonically with "Anticyrian hellebore," "to drive off all the perverse habits of his brains," and make him forget all he had ever learnt under previous masters.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," bk. i. 23.

Therapeu'tæ. The Therapeutæ of Philo were a branch of the Essenes. The word Essenes is Greek, and means "doctors" (essaioi), and Therapeute is merely a synonym of the same word.

There'sa. Daughter of the count Palatine of Pado'lia, beloved by Mazeppa. The count her father was very indignant that a mere page should presume to fall in love with his daughter, and had Mazeppa bound to a wild horse and set adrift. As for Theresa, Mazeppa never knew her future history. Theresa was historically not the daughter but the young wife of the fiery count.—Byron, "Mazeppa."

Theresa. The miller's wife who adopted and brought up the orphan Ami'na, called the somnambulist.—Belini, "La Sonnambula" (Scribe's libretto).

Thermido'rians. Those who took part in the coup d'état which effected the fall of Robespierre, with the desire of restoring the legitimate monarchy. So called because the Reign of Terror was brought to an end on the 9th Thermidor of the second Republican year (July 27, 1794). Ther'midor or "Hot Month" was from July 19 to August 18.—Duval, "Souvenirs Thermidoriens."

Thersit'es. A deformed scurrilous officer in the Greek army which went to the siege of Troy. He was always railing at the chiefs, and one day Achilles felled him to the earth with his fist, and killed him.—Homer, "Iliad."

He squinted, halted, gibbous was behind,
And pinched before, and on his tapering head
Grew patches only of the filmiest down.

His Greece had sent to Troy.
The miscreant, who shamed his country most.
Cowper's translation, bk. ii.

A Thersit'es. A dastardly, malevolent, impudent railer against the powers that be. (See above.)

Theseus (2 syl.). Lord and governor of Athens, called by Chaucer Duke Theseus. He married Hypol'ita, and as he returned home with his bride and Emily her sister, was accosted by a crowd of female suppliants, who complained of Creon, king of Thebes. The duke forthwith set out for Thebes, slew Creon, and took the city by assault. Many captives fell into his hands, amongst whom were the two knights named Pal'amon and Arcite (q.v.).—Chaucer, "The Knight's Tale."

Thes'pis, Thes'pian. Dramatic. Thes'pis was the father of Greek tragedy.

The race of learned men
Oft snatch the pen,

As if inspired, and in a Thespian rage
Then write.

Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," c. i. 52.

Thes'pis, the first professor of our art,
At country wakes sang ballads from a cart.
Dryden, Prologue to "Sophonisba."

Thes'tylis. Any rustic maiden. In the "Idylls" of Theocritus, Thestylis is a young female slave.

And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves.
Milton, "L'Allegro."

Thick. Through thick and thin (Dryden). Through evil and through good report; through stoggy mud and stones only thinly covered with dust. Devonshire roads illustrate the notion completely.

Through perils both of wind and limb
She followed him through thick and thin.
Butler, "Hudibras."

Thief. (See AUTOLYCOS, CACUS, &c.)

Thieves on the Cross, called Gesmas (the impenitent) and Dismas (afterwards "St. Dismas," the penitent thief) in the ancient mysteries. Hence the following charm to scare away thieves:—

Imperibus merit's pendent tria corpora ramis:
Dismas et Gesmas, media est divina potestas;
Alta petit Dismas, infelix, infima, Gesmas:
Nos et res nostras conservet summa potestas,
Hos versus dicas, ne tu furto tua perdas.

Thimble. Scotch, Thummle, originally "Thumb-bell," because it was worn on the thumb, as sailors still wear their thimbles. It is a Dutch invention, introduced into England in 1695 by John Lofting, who opened a thimble manufactory at Islington. (Ble, German blech, metal-plate, as blech-mütze, a cap of iron-plate, &c.)

Thimble-rig. A cheat. The cheating game so called is played thus: A pea is put on a table, and the conjuror places three or four thimbles over it in succession, and then sets the thimbles on the table. You are asked to say under which thimble the pea is, but are sure to guess wrong, as the pea has been abstracted and concealed under the man's nail.

Thin-skinned. Sensitive, captious, soon offended. The allusion is to horsemanship: a thin-skinned rider is apt to get raw.

Thirteenpence-halfpenny. A hangman; so called because thirteenpence-halfpenny was his wages for hanging a man. (See HANGMAN.)

Thirty. A man at thirty must be either a fool or a physician.—Tiberius.

Thirty Tyrants. The thirty magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens, at the termination of the Peloponnesian war. This "reign of terror," after one year's continuance, was overthrown by Thrasylbulos (B.C. 403).

The Thirty Tyrants of the Roman empire. So those military usurpers are called who endeavoured, in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus (253-268), to make themselves independent princes. The number thirty must be taken with great latitude, as only nineteen are given, and their resemblance to the thirty tyrants of Athens is extremely fanciful. They were—

In the East.	Illyricum.
(1) Cyriades.	(11) Ingenus.
(2) Macrianus.	(12) Regillianus.
(3) Balista.	(13) Aureolus.
(4) Odenathus.	Promiscuous.
(5) Zeno'bia.	(14) Saturninus in Pontus.
In the West.	(15) Trebellianus in Isauria.
(6) Posthumus.	(16) Piso in Thessaly.
(7) Lollianus.	(17) Valens in Achaia.
(8) Victorinus and his mother Victoria.	(18) Emilia'us in Egypt.
(9) Marius.	(19) Celsus in Africa.
(10) Tetricus.

Thirty Years' War. A series of wars between the Catholics and Protestants of Germany in the seventeenth century. It began in Bohemia in 1618, and ended in 1648 with the "peace of Westphalia."

Thisbë. A Babylonish maiden beloved by Piramus. They lived in contiguous houses, and as their parents would not let them marry, they contrived to converse together through a hole in the garden wall. On one occasion they agreed to meet at Ninus' tomb, and Thisbë, who was first at the spot, hearing a lion roar, ran away in a fright, dropping her garment on the way. The lion seized the garment and tore it. When Piramus arrived and saw the garment, he concluded that a lion had eaten Thisbë, and he stabbed himself. Thisbë returning to the tomb saw Piramus dead, and killed herself also. This story is travestied in "The Midsummer Night's Dream," by Shakespeare.

Thistle of Scotland. The Danes thought it cowardly to attack an enemy by night, but on one occasion deviated from their rule. On they crept, barefooted, noiselessly, and unobserved, when one of the men set his foot on a thistle, which made him cry out. The alarm was given, the Scotch fell upon the night-party, and defeated them with terrible slaughter. Ever since the thistle has been adopted as the insignia of Scotland, with the motto Nemo me impunè læssit.

This tradition reminds us of Brennus and the geese.

Thistle. The device of the Scotch monarchs was adopted by queen Anne, hence the riddle in Pope's pastoral proposed by Daphnis to Strephon :

Tell me....in what more happy fields
The thistle springs, to which the lily yields?
Pope, "Spring."

In the reign of Anne the duke of Marlborough made the "lily" of France yield to the thistle of queen Anne. The lines are a parody of Virgil's Eclogue iii., 104-108.

Thistle Beds. Withoos, a Dutch artist, is famous for his homely pictures where thistle-beds abound.

Thom'alín. One of the shepherds in Spenser's "Shepherd's Calendar."

Thomas (St.). Patron saint of architects. The tradition is that Gondoforus, king of the Indies, gave him a large sum of money to build a palace. St. Thomas spent it on the poor, "thus erecting a superb palace in heaven."

The symbol of St. Thomas is a builder's square, because he was the patron of masons and architects.

Christians of St. Thomas. In the southern parts of Malabar there were some 200,000 persons who called themselves "Christians of St. Thomas," when Gama discovered India. They had been 1,300 years under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their materene (archbishop). When Gama arrived the head of the Malabar Christians was Jacob, who styled himself "Metropolitan of India and China." In 1625 a stone was found near Siganfu with a cross on it, and containing a list of the materenes of India and China.

Sir Thomas. The dogmatical, prating squire in Crabbe's "Borough" (letter x.).

Thomas-à-Kempis, generally ascribed to Jean de Gerson, who died 1429, aged sixty-six. His real name was Jean Charlier. Gerson was the place of his birth.

Thomas the Rhymer. Thomas Learmont, of Ercildoune, a Scotchman in the reign of Alexander III., and contemporary with Wallace. He is also called Thomas of Ercildoune. Sir Walter Scott calls him the "Merlin of Scotland." He was magician, prophet, and poet, and is to return again to earth at some future time when Shrove Tuesday and Good Friday change places.

* * Care must be taken not to confound "Thomas the Rhymer" with Thomas Rymer, the historiographer and compiler of the "Fœdera."

Thom'ists. Followers of Thomas Aquinas, who denied the doctrine of the immaculate conception maintained by Duns Scotus.

Scotists and Thom'ists now in pence remain.
Pope, "Essay on Criticism," 444.

Thomson (James), author of "The Seasons" and "Castle of Indolence," in 1729 brought out the tragedy of "Sophonisba," in which occurs the silly line: "O Sophonisba, Sophonisba, O!" which a wag in the pit parodied into "O Jemmy Thomson, Jemmy Thomson, O!" (1700-1748.)

Tho'pas (Sir). Native of Popering, in Flanders; a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner. He resolved to marry no one but an "elf queen," and set out for fairy-land. On his way he met the three-headed giant Olifaunt, who challenged him to single combat. Sir Thopas got permission to go back for his armour, and promised to meet him next day. Here mine host interrupts the narrative as "intolerable nonsense," and the "rime" is left unfinished.

An elf queen wol I have, I wis,
For in this world no woman is Worthy to be my mate.
Chaucer, "Rime of Sir Thopas."

Thor. Son of Odin, and god of war. His wife was Sif (love), and his palace Thrudwanger, where he received the warriors who had fallen in battle.—Scandinavian mythology.

The word enters into many names of places, &c., as Thorsby in Cumberland, Thunderhill in Surrey, Thurso in Caithness, Torthorwald (i.e., "hill of Thor-in-the-wood") in Dumfriesshire, Thursday, &c.

Thor's Belt. The Scandinavian war-god has a belt which doubles his strength whenever he puts it on.

Thor's Hammer or Mace is called Mjölhnir.

Thorgrim (Icelandic mythology). The Northern Apollo.

Thorn. A thorn in the flesh. Something to mortify; a skeleton in the cupboard. The allusion is to a custom common amongst the ancient Pharisees, one class of which used to insert thorns in the borders of their gaberdines, to prick their legs in walking and make them bleed. (See PHARISEES.)

The thorns of Dauphiné will never prick unless they prick the first day. This proverb is applied to natural talent. If talent does not show itself early it will never do so—the truth of which application is very doubtful indeed.

Si l'épine non pique quand nai,
A pene que pique jamais.

Proverb in Dauphiné.

Conference of Thorn met October, 1645, at Thorn, in Prussia, to remove the difficulties which separate Christians into sects. It was convoked by Lad'islas IV. of Poland, but no good result followed the conference.

Thornberry (Job). The hero of Colman's comedy entitled "John Bull." Mary Thornberry is his daughter.

Thornhill (Sir William), who assumes the name of Burchell, and passes himself off as a poor man. He expresses his dissent by the word "Fudge."—Goldsmith, "Vicar of Wakefield."

Thorps-men. Villagers. This very pretty Anglo-Saxon word is worth restoring. (Thorp, Anglo-Saxon, a village.)

Thoth. The Hermès of Egyptian mythology. He is represented with the head of an ibis on a human body. He is the inventor of the arts and sciences, music and astronomy, speech and letters. The name means "Logos" or "the Word."

Thousand. Every one knows that a dozen may be either twelve or thirteen, a score either twenty or twenty-one, a hundred either one hundred or one hundred and twenty-five, and a thousand either one thousand or one thousand two hundred. The higher numbers are the old Teutonic computations. Hickes tells us that the Norwegians and Icelandic people have two sorts of decads, the lesser and the greater called "Tolfræd." The lesser thousand = 10×100 , but the greater or Tolfræd thousand = 12×100 . The word tolfr, equal to Danish tolv, is our twelve.—"Gram. Isl.," p. 43.

Five score of men, money, or pins,
Six score of all other things. Old saw.

Thrall. Bondage. From drill, in allusion to the custom of drilling the ear of a slave in token of servitude, a custom common to the Jews (Deut. xv. 17). Our Saxon forefathers were accustomed to pierce at the church-door the ears of their bond-slaves.

Thra'so. Duke of Mar, one of the allies of Charlemagne.—Ariosto, "Orlando Furioso."

Thra'so. A swaggering captain in the "Ennuch" of Terence.

Thrason'ical. Boastful, given to swagger, like Thraso. (See above.)

Cæsar's Thrasonical brag of "I came, saw, and overcame."—Shakespeare, "As You Like It," v. 2.

Thread. The thread of destiny—i.e., that on which destiny depends. The Greeks and Romans imagined that a grave maiden called Clotho spun from her distaff the destiny of man, and as she spun one of her sisters worked out the events which were in store, and Atropos cut the thread at the point when death was to occur.

A St. Thomas's thread. The tale is that St. Thomas planted Christianity in China, and then returned to Malabar. Here he saw a huge beam of timber floating on the sea near the coast, and the king endeavouring by the force of men and elephants to haul it ashore, but it would not stir. St. Thomas desired leave to build a church with it, and his request being granted, he dragged it easily ashore with a piece of packthread. — Faria y Sousa.

Chief of the Triple Thread. Chief Brahmin. Oso'rius tells us that the Brahmins wore a symbolical Tesseræ of three threads, reaching from the right shoulder to the left. Faria says that the religion of the Brahmins proceeded from fishermen, who left the charge of the temples to their successors on the condition of their wearing some threads of their nets in remembrance of their vocation; but Oso'rius maintains that the triple thread symbolises the Trinity.

Terna fila ab hu'mero dex'tero in latus sinistrum gerunt, ut designent trinam in natu'ra divi'na ratio'nem.

Threadneedle Street. A corruption of Thridendal Street, meaning the third street from "Chepeysde" to the great thoroughfare from London Bridge to "Bushop Gate" (consisting of New Fysho Streate, Gracious Streate, and Bushop Gate Strete). (Saxon, thrid or thrida, third.)

Another etymology is Thrig-needle (three-needle street), from the three needles which the Needle-makers' Company bore in their arms. It begins from the Mansion House, and therefore the Bank stands in it.

The Old Lady in Threadneedle Street. The directors of the Bank of England were so called by William Cobbett, because, like Mrs. Partington, they tried with their broom to keep back the Atlantic waves of national progress.

A silver curl-paper that I myself took off the shining locks of the ever-beautiful old lady of Threadneedle Street [a bank note].—Dickens, "Doctor Marigold."

Three. Pythagoras calls three the perfect number, expressive of "beginning, middle, and end," wherefore he makes it a symbol of deity. Jove is represented with three-forked lightning, Neptune with a trident, and Pluto with a three-headed dog. The Fates are three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Muses three times three, &c. The trinity of the trinity is three times three. (See NINE.)

Three Bishoprics (The). So the French call the three cities of Lorraine, Metz, and Verdun, each of which was at one time under the lordship of a bishop. They were united to the kingdom of France by Henri II., in 1552.

Three Chapters (The). Three books, or parts of three books—one by Theodore of Mopsuestia, one by Theodoret of Cyprus, and the third by Ibas, bishop of Edessa. These books were of a Nestorian bias on the subject of the Incarnation and two natures of Christ. The church took up the controversy warmly, and the dispute continued during the reign of Justinian and the popedom of Vigilius. In 553 the "Three Chapters" were condemned at the general council of Constantinople.

Three Estates of the Realm are the nobility, the clergy, and the commonalty. In the collect for Gunpowder Treason we thank God for "preserving (1st) the king, and (2nd) the three estates of the realm;" from which it is quite evident that the sovereign is not one of the three estates, as nine persons out of ten suppose. These three estates are represented in the two Houses of Parliament.

Three-fingered Jack. The famous negro robber, who was the terror of Jamaica in 1780, and was hunted down in 1781.

Three Kings' Day. Epiphany or Twelfth-day, designed to commemorate the visit of the "three kings" or Wise Men of the East to the infant Jesus.

Three Sheets in the Wind. Unsteady from over drinking, as a ship when its sheets are in the wind. The sail of a ship is fastened at one of the bottom corners by a rope called a "tack;" the other corner is left more or less free as the rope called a "sheet" is disposed; if quite free the sheet is said to be "in the wind," and the sail flaps and flutters without restraint. If all the three sails were so loosened the ship would "reel and stagger like a drunken man."

Three-tailed Bashaw. The beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks has a standard borne before him with three horse-tails. He has also a gilt spear with three horse-tails carried before him, and stuck before his tent. The next in rank is the pacha with two tails, and then the bey, who has only one.

Three Tuns. A fish ordinary in Billingsgate, famous as far back as the reign of queen Anne.

Threshers. Members of the Catholic organisation instituted in 1806. One object was to resist the payment of tithes. Their threats and warnings were signed "Captain Thresher."

Threshold. Properly the door-sill, but figuratively applied to the beginning of anything, as the threshold of life (infancy), the threshold of an argument (the commencement), the threshold of the inquiry (the first part of the investigation). (Saxon, thwarscwald, door-wood; German, thürschwelle; Icelandic, throsulldur. From thür comes our door.)

Thrift-box. A money-box, in which thrifts or savings are put. (See SPEND-THRIFT.)

Throgmorton Street (London). So named from Sir Nicholas Throckmorton, head of the ancient Warwickshire family, and chief banker of England in the reign of queen Elizabeth.

Throw. To throw the helve after the hatchet. To lose the hatchet, and then in temper to throw away the handle; to be reckless; "neck or nothing." Losers often stake all they have left in a desperate last stake.

Thrums. Weaver's ends and fag-ends of carpet, used for common rugs. (The word is common to many languages, as Icelandic, thraum; German, trumm; Danish, drom; Greek, thrumma; all meaning "fag-ends" or "fragments.")

Come, sisters, come, out thread and thrum;
Quail, crush, conclude, and quell!
Shakespeare, "Midsummer Night's Dream," v. 1.

Thread and thrum. Everything, good and bad together.

Thrummy Cap. A sprite described in Northumberland fairy tales as a "queer-looking little auld man," whose exploits are generally laid in the cellars of old castles.

Thrym. The giant who fell in love with Freyja, and stole Thor's hammer.—Scandinavian mythology.

Thug (a cheat). So a religious fraternity in India is called. Their patron goddess is Devi or Kâli, wife of Si'va. The Thugs live by plunder, to obtain which they never halt at violence or even murder. In some provinces they are called "stranglers" (phansigars), in the Tamil tongue "noosers" (ari tulukar), in the Canarese "cat-gut thieves" (tanti kalleru). They band together in gangs mounted on horseback, assuming the appearance of merchants; some two or more of these gangs concert to meet as if by accident at a given town. They then ascertain what rich merchants are about to journey, and either join this party or lay in wait for it. This being arranged the victim is duly caught with a lasso, plundered, and strangled. (Hindu, thaga, deceive.)

Thuggee (2 syl.). The vocation of a Thug—i.e., waylaying and robbing travellers and merchants; these expeditions were generally accompanied with murder by strangulation with a running noose. This was a religious vocation, which had priests and an order of knighthood.

Thule (2 syl.). Called by Drayton Thuly. Pliny, Solinus, and Mela take it for Iceland. Pliny says, "It is an island in the Northern Ocean discovered by Pythæas, after sailing six days from the Orcades." Others, like Camdeu, consider it to be Shetland, still called Thylens-el (isle of Thylë) by seamen, in which opinion they agree with Mari'us, and the descriptions of Ptolemy and Tacitus. Bochart says it is a Syrian word, and that the Phœnician merchants who traded to the group called it Gezirat Thulë (isles of darkness); but probably it is the Gothic Tiule, meaning the "most remote land," and is connected with the Greek telos, the end.

Where the Northern Ocean, in vast whirls,
Boils round the naked melanoholy isles
Of furthest Thulë. Thomson, "Autumn,"

Ultima Thulë. The end of the world; the last extremity. Thule was the most northern point known to the ancient Romans.

Tibi serviat ultima Thule.
Virgil, "Georgics," i. 30.

Thumb. When a gladiator was vanquished it rested with the spectators to decide whether he should be slain or not. If they wished him to live they held their thumbs down; if to be slain they turned their thumbs upwards.

Where, influenced by the rabble's bloody will,
With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill.
Dryden, "Third Satire."

Do you bite your thumb at me? Do you mean to insult me? The way of expressing defiance and contempt was by snapping the finger, or putting the thumb in the mouth. Both these acts are termed a fico, whence our expressions "not worth a fig," "I don't care a fig for you." Decker, describing St. Paul's Walk, speaks of the biting of thumbs to beget quarrels. (See GLOVE.)

I see Contempt marching forth, giving mee the fico with his thombe in his mouth.—"Mits Miserie" (1596).

I will bite my thumbs at them, which is a disgrace to them if they bear it.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," i. 1.

By the pricking of my thumbs, something wicked this way comes. Another proverb says, "My little finger told me that." When your ears turn hot and red, it is to indicate that some one is speaking about you. When a sudden fit of "shivering" occurs, it is because some one is treading on the place which is to form your grave. When the eye itches, it indicates the visit of a friend. When the palm itches, it shows that a present will be shortly received. When the bones ache, it prognosticates a coming storm. Plautus says, "Timeo quod rerum gesserim hic, ita dorsus totus prurit" (Miles Gloriosus). All these and many similar superstitions rest on the notion that "coming events cast their shadows before," because our "angel," ever watchful, forewarns us that we may be prepared. Sudden pains and prickings are the warnings of evil on the road; sudden glows and pleasurable sensations are the couriers to tell us of joy close at hand. These superstitions are relics of demonology and witchcraft.

Every honest miller has a thumb of gold. Even an honest miller grows rich with what he prigs. Thus Chaucer says of his miller—

Wel cowde he stele and tollen thries,
And yet he had a thomb of gold, parde [was what is called an "honest miller"].
"Canterbury Tales" (Prologue, 563).

Rule of Thumb. Rough measure. Ladies often measure yard lengths by their thumb. Indeed the expression "Sixteen nails make a yard" seems to point to the thumb-nail as a standard. Countrymen always measure by their thumb.

Tom Thumb. (See TOM.)

Thumb Brewed. A corruption of Th'ome (the home) brewed.

Thum'bikins or Thumbscrew. An instrument of torture largely used by the Inquisition. The torture was compressing the thumb between two bars of iron, made to approach each other by means of a screw. Principal Carstairs was the last person put to this torture in Britain; he suffered for half an hour at Holyrood, by order of the Scotch Privy Council, to wring from him a confession of the secrets of the Argyll and Monmouth parties.

Thunder. The giant who fell into the river and was killed, because Jack cut the ropes that suspended the draw-bridge, and when the giant ventured to cross it the bridge fell in.—"Jack the Giant Killer."

Thunder and Lightning or Tonnant. Stephen II. of Hungary. (1100, 1114-1131.)

Sons of Thunder (Boaner'gēs). James and John, the sons of Zebedee (Mark iii. 17); so called because they asked to be allowed to consume with lightning those who rejected the mission of Christ (Luke ix. 54).

Thunders of the Vatican. The anathemas and denunciations of the Pope, whose palace is the Vatican of Rome.

Properly speaking, the Vatican consists of the papal palace, the court and garden of Belvedere, the library, and the museum, all on the right bank of the Tiber.

Thunderbolt of Italy. Gaston de Foix, nephew of Louis XII. (1489-1512.)

Thunderer (The). A name applied to The Times newspaper, in allusion to a series of leaders written by Edward Sterling, on the subject of political and social influence. This was when Thomas Barnes was editor. (See The Times.)

Thundering Legion. During the war of Marcus Aurelius with the Marcomanni, in 174, the Roman army was shut up in a defile, and was reduced to great straits for want of water. The Christians in the army prayed for relief, when a thunderstorm broke over them, under cover of which they attacked the Marcomanni, and won a signal victory.

Thun'stone. The successor of king Arthur.—Nursery Tale, "Tom Thumb."

Thursday. (See BLACK.)

Thwack'um, in Fielding's "Tom Jones."

Tiara. A composite emblem. Its primary meaning is purity and chastity—the foundation being of fine linen. The gold band denotes supremacy. The first cap of dignity was adopted by pope Damasus II. in 1048. The cap was surmounted with a high coronet in 1295 by Boniface VIII. The second coronet was added in 1335 by Benedict XII., to indicate the prerogatives of spiritual and temporal power combined in the Papacy. The third coronet is indicative of the Trinity, but it is not known who first adopted it; some say Urban V., others John XXII., John XXIII., or Benedict XII.

Tib. St. Tib's Eve. Never. A corruption of St. Ubes, a corruption again of Setuval. There is no such saint in the calendar as St. Ubes, and therefore her eve falls on the "Greek Kalends" (q.v.), neither before Christmas Day nor after it.

Tibbs (Beau). A vain, flashy man about town, exquisite in dress and dreadfully poor, in Goldsmith's "Citizen of the World."

Tiber, called The Yellow Tiber, because it is much discoloured with yellow mud.

Vorticibus rap'idis et multa flavus are'na.—Virgil.

Tibert (Sir). The cat in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." (See TYBALT.)

Tibul'us. The French Tibullus. Evariste Désiré Desforges, chevalier de Parly. (1753-1814.)

Tibur'ee (3 syl.) or Tiburce (2 syl.). Brother of Vale'rian, converted by the teaching of St. Cecilia, his sister-in-law, and baptised by pope Urban. Being brought before Almachius the prefect, and commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, both the brothers refused, and were decapitated.—Chaucer, "Secounde Nonnes Tale."

Al this thing sche unto Tiburce tolde (3 syl.).
And after this Tiburce, in good entente (2 syl.),
With Valuri'an to pope Urban wente.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 12, 278.

Tick. To go on tick—on ticket. In the seventeenth century, ticket was the ordinary term for the written acknowledgment of a debt, and one living on credit was said to be living on tick. Betting was then, and still is to a great extent, a matter of tick—i.e., entry of particulars in a betting-book. We have an Act of Parliament prohibiting the use of betting-tickets: "Be it enacted, that if any person shall play at any of the said games . . . (otherwise than with and for ready money), or shall bet on the sides of such as shall play . . . a sum of money exceeding £100 at any one time . . . upon ticket or credit . . . he shall," &c. (16 Car. II., cap. 16).

Ticket. That's the ticket—the proper thing. French, étiquette (a ticket), given to those who attended court to tell them what costume to wear, route to take, and ceremonies to observe.

Tidy means in tide, in season, in time. We retain the word in even-tide, spring-tide, and so on. Tusser has the phrase "If weather be fair and tidy," meaning seasonable. Things done punctually and in their proper season are sure to be done orderly, and what is orderly done is neat and well-arranged. Hence we get the notion of methodical, neat, well-arranged, associated with tidy. (Saxon, tidiġ, seasonable, favourable.)

How are you getting on? Oh! pretty idily—favourably. (See above.)

Tied-up. Married; tied-up in the marriage-knot.

When first the marriage-knot was tied Between my wife and me.

Walkingame's "Arithmetic."

Tight. Nearly intoxicated. Sobriety is so taut, that with a little more strain it will burst away. A sea-phrase.

Tiglath Pile'ser. Son of Pul, second of the sixth dynasty of the New Assyrian Empire. The word is a corruption of Tiglath Pul Assur (the great tiger of Assyria).

Tigris (the Arrow). So called from the rapidity of its current. Hiddekel is "The Dekel" or Diglath, a Semitic corruption of Tigra, Medo-Persic for arrow. (Gen. ii. 14.)

Flu'meni, a celerita'téqua defluit Tigri nomen est; quia, Persica lingua, tigrim sagittam appellanti—
Quintus Curtius.

Tike. A Yorkshire tike. A clownish rustic. (Celtic, tiac, a ploughman.) A small bullock or heifer is called a tike, so also is a dog, probably because they are the common companions of the "tiac."

Tilbury. The Governor of Tilbury Fort. Father of Tilburi'na; a plain, blunt, matter-of-fact John Bull.—Sheridan, "Critic."

Tile, a hat. (Saxon tigel, Latin tego, to cover.)

Tile a Lodge, in Freemasonry, means to close the door, to prevent any one uninitiated from entering. (See above.)

Time. Time and tide wait for no man.

For the next inn he spurs amain,
In haste alights, and skuds away,—
But time and tide for no man stay.
Somerville, "The Sweet-scented Miter."

Take or Seize Time by the forelock (Tha'les of Milo'tus). Time is represented as an old man, quite bald, with the exception of a single lock of hair on the forehead. Shakespeare calls him "that bald sexton, Time" ("King John," iii. 1).

The Times. A newspaper, founded by John Walter. In 1785 he established The Daily Universal Register, but in 1788 changed the name into The Times, or Daily Universal Register. (See THUNDERER.)

Time of Grace. The lawful season for venery, which began at Midsummer and lasted to Holyrood-day. The fox and wolf might be hunted from the Nativity to the Annunciation; the roebuck from Easter to Michaelmas; the roe from Michaelmas to Candlemas; the hare from Michaelmas to Midsummer; and the boar from the Nativity to the Purification. (See SPORTING SEASONS.)

Time-honoured Lancaster. Old John of Ghaunt. His father was Edward III., his son Henry IV., his nephew Richard II. of England; his second wife was Constance, daughter of Peter the Cruel of Castile and Leon; his only daughter married John of Castile and Leon; his sister Joanna married Alphonso, king of Castile. Shakespeare calls him "time-honoured" and "old;" honoured he certainly was, but was only fifty-nine at his death. Hesiod is called "Old," meaning "long ago."

Tim'ias. King Arthur's squire, the impersonation of chivalrous honour and generosity. His love for Belphebe is in allusion to Sir Walter Raleigh's admiration of queen Elizabeth. — Spenser, "Faery Queen."

Timoleon. The Corinthian who so hated tyranny, that he murdered his own brother Timoph'anēs when he attempted to make himself absolute in Corinth.

The fair Corinthian boast
Timoleon, happy temper, mild and firm,
Who wept the brother while the tyrant bled.
Thomson, "Winter."

Timon of Athens. The misanthrope. Shakespeare's play so called. Lord Macaulay uses the expression to "out-Timon Timon"—i.e., to be more misanthropical than even Timon.

Tin. Money. A depreciating synonym for silver, which it resembles, and for which in Germany it is largely substituted.

Tinac'rio (The Sage). King of Micom'icon. (See ZARAMILLA.)

Tinder and Kindle are different forms of the same word. Thus the Latin nuntius was also written nuncius, "c" having the force of "k." Webster, in his Dictionary, says cl (answering to kl) are pronounced as tl, and illustrates his observation by the words clear, clean. We have heard of colour-blindness, but here is another phase of blindness.

Tine-man (Lose-man). So was the great earl of Douglas called, who died in France, August 17, 1421. Godscroft says,

"No man was lesse fortunate, and it is no lesse true that no man was more valorous." He was defeated at the battles of Homilden, Shrewsbury, and Verneuill. It was in this last battle that he lost his life.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," xviii.

Ting. The general assembly of the Northmen, which all capable of bearing arms were bound to attend on occasions requiring deliberation and action. The words Volksting and Storting are still in use.

A shout filled all the Ting, a thousand swords
Clashed loud approval.
Frithiof-Saga (The Parting).

Tinker. The person who tinks or beats on a kettle to announce his trade. (Welsh, tinciau, to ring or "tink;" tincierz, a tinker.)

The Inspired Tinker. John Bunyan. (1628-1688.)

Tintag'el or Tintag'il. A strong castle on the coast of Cornwall, the birth-place of king Arthur.

When Uther in Tintagil past away.—Tennyson, "The Holy Grail."

Tin'tern Abbey. Wordsworth has a poem called "Lines composed a few miles above Tintern Abbey," but these lines have nothing whatever to do with the famous ruin, and do not even once allude to it.

Tinto (Dick). The painter in Sir Walter Scott's novel of "St. Ronan's Well" and in the introduction of "The Bride of Lammermoor."

Tintoretto, the historical painter. So called because his father was a dyer (tintore). His real name was Jacopo Robusti. He was nicknamed Il Furioso, from the rapidity of his productions. (1512-1594.)

Tip. He gave me a tip—a present of money, a bribe. (See DIBS.)

To tip one the wink. To make a signal to another by a wink. Here tip means "to give," as tip in the previous example means "a gift."

Tiph'any, according to the calendar of saints, was the mother of the three kings of Cologne. (See COLOGNE.)

Ti'phys. A pilot. He was the pilot of the Argonauts.

Many a Tiphys ocean's depths explore,
To open wondrous ways untrod before.
Hooke's "Ariosto," bk. viii.

Tipstaff. A constable so called because he carried a staff tipped with a bull's horn. In the documents of Edward III. allusion is often made to this staff.

Tirante the White. One of the most redoubtable knights of mediæval romance. Don Quixote ranks him with Amadis of Gaul, Felixmarte of Hyrcania, and the more modern hero named don Belianis of Greece (bk. ii., ch. 5).

Tirer une Dent. To draw a man's tooth, or extort money from him. The allusion is to the tale told by Holinshed of king John, who extorted 10,000 marks from a Jew living at Bristol, by extracting a tooth daily till he consented to provide the money. For seven successive days a tooth was taken, and then the Jew gave in.

Tiresias. Blind as Tiresias. Tiresias, the Theban, by accident saw Athëna bathing, and the goddess struck him with blindness by splashing water in his face. She afterwards repented doing so, and as she could not restore his sight, conferred on him the power of soothsaying, and gave him a staff with which he could walk as safely as if he had his sight. He found death at last by drinking from the well of Tilphosæa. Milton makes Tiresias three syllables, as Ti-re-sas.

Blind Tham'yris and blind Mæon'ides,
And Tiresias (3 syl.) and Phineus (2 syl.), prophets old. "Paradise Lost," iii.

Tiring Irons. Iron rings to be put on or taken off a ring as a puzzle. Light-foot calls them "tiring irons never to be untied."

Tirled. He tirled at the pin. He twiddled or rattled with the latch before he opened the door. Guillaume di Lorris, in his "Romance of the Rose" (13th century), says, "When persons visit a friend they ought not to bounce all at once into the room, but should announce their approach by a slight cough, or few words spoken in the hall, or a slight shuffling of their feet, so as not to take their friends unawares." The pin is the door-latch, and before a visitor entered a room it was, in Scotland, thought good manners to fumble at the latch to give notice of your intention to enter (Tirl is the German querlen, Dutch dwarlen, our twirl, &c.; or Danish trille, German triller, Welsh treilliar, our trill, to rattle or roll.)

Right quick he mounted up the stair,
And tirled at the pin.
"Charlie is my Darling."

Tiryns. An ancient city of Argolis in Greece, famous for its Cyclopean architecture. The "Gallery of Tiryns" is the oldest and noblest structure of the heroic ages. It is mentioned by Homer, and still exists.

Tirynthian Swain. Hercules is so called by Spenser, but he is more frequently styled the Tirynthian Hero, because he generally resided at Tirynthos, a town of Argolis.

Tisapher'nës (4 syl.). "The thunderbolt of war, whose force in battle every force excelled." He was in the army of the king of Egypt, and was slain by Rinaldo. — Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. xx.

Tisellin the raven, in the tale of "Reynard the Fox." The word is old German, tis (wise); French, tisellin (the little wise one).

Tit for Tat. J. Bellenden Ker says this is the Dutch dit vor dat (this for that). Quid pro quo is a synonymous phrase.

Titan. The sun, so called by Ovid and Virgil.

And fleck'd Darkness like a drunkard reels
From forth Day's path and Titan's fiery wheels.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 3.

The Titans. The children of Heaven and Earth, who, instigated by their mother, deposed their father, and liberated from Tartaros their brothers the Hundred-handed, and the Cyclopes. — Classic mythology.

Titan'ia. Wife of O'beron, king of the fairies. According to the belief in Shakespeare's age, fairies were the same as the classic nymphs, the attendants of Diana. The queen of the fairies was therefore Diana herself, called Titania by Ovid ("Metamorphoses," iii. 173). — Keightley, "Fairy Mythology."

Titho'nus. A beautiful Trojan beloved by Aurora. He begged the goddess to grant him immortality, which request the goddess granted; but as he had forgotten to ask for youth and vigour, he soon grew old, infirm, and ugly. When life became insupportable he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world; this, however, she could not do, but she changed him into a grasshopper.

An idle scene Thythonus acted
When to a grasshopper contracted.
Prior, "The Turtle and Sparrow."

The Morn arose from rich Thythonus' bed.
Hooles' "Orlando Furioso," iv.

Titian (Tiziano Vecellio). An Italian landscape painter, celebrated for the fine effects of his clouds. (1477-1576.)

Not Titian's pencil e'er could so array.
So fleece with clouds the pure ethereal space.
Thomson, "Castle of Indolence," canto i.

The French Titian. Jacques Blanchard, the painter. (1600-1638.)

The Titian of Portugal. Alonzo Sanchez Coello. (1515-1590.)

Titmouse (Tittlebat). A vulgar, ignorant linen-draper's apprentice, who comes into £10,000 a year. His conceit, his vulgarity, his gaucherie, and his emptiness of mind are well illustrated in Warren's "Ten Thousand a Year."

Tittle Tattle. Tattle is prate, Dutch tateren, Italian tatta-mèlla. Tittle is little, same as tit in tomtit, titmouse, little tit, tit-bit.

Tit'uos. A giant whose body covered nine acres of ground. He was punished by having two vultures feeding for ever on his liver, which grew again as fast as it was eaten. Prometheus was chained to Mount Caucasus, and had his liver devoured in a similar way by a vulture or eagle.

Tit'us. The penitent thief, called Desmas in the ancient mysteries. (See DUMACHUS.)

Titus the Roman emperor was called "The delight of men." (40, 79-81.)

Titus indeed gave one short evening gleam,
More cordial felt, as in the midst it spread
Of storm and horror; the delight of men.
Thomson, "Liberty," iii.

The Arch of Titus commemorates the capture of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

Tityrè Tus. A dissolute young scapegrace, whose delight was to worry the watchmen, upset sedans, wrench knockers off doors, and be rude to pretty women, at the close of the seventeenth century. The name comes from the first line of Virgil's first Eclogue, Titire tu patule recubans sub tegmine fagi (Tityre Tus loves to lurk in the dark night looking for mischief).

Tit'yrus. Any shepherd; so called in allusion to the name familiar from its use in Greek idyls and Virgil's first Eclogue. In the "Shepherd's Calendar," Spenser calls Chaucer by this name.

Heroes and their feasts
Fatigue me, never weary of the pipe
Of Tityrus, assembling as he sang
The rustic throng beneath his favourite beech.
Cowper.

Tiz'ona. One of the favourite swords of the Cid, taken by him from king Bucar. The other favourite sword was called Cola'da.

To. Altogether; wholly.

If the podesch be burned to....we saye the byshope hath put his fote in the potte.—Tyndale.

To-do. Here's a pretty to-do. Disturbance. The French affaire—i.e., à faire (to do).

Toads. The device of Clovis was three toads (or botes, as they were called in Old French), but after his baptism the Arians greatly hated him, and assembled a large army under king Candat to put down the Christian king. While on his way to meet the heretics, he saw in the heavens his device miraculously changed into three lilies or on a banner azure. He had such a banner instantly made, and called it his lilambe. Even before his army came in sight of king Candat, the host of the heretic lay dead, slain like the army of Sennacherib by a blast from the God of battles.—Raoul de Prèsles, "Grans Croniques de France."

It is wytnessyd of Maister Robert Gagwyne that before thyse dayes all Frech kynges used to bere in their armes iii Todys, but after this Clodoveus had recognised Cristes relygyon iii Floure de lys were sent to hym by diuyn power, sette in a shyld of azure, the whiche syns that been borue of all French kynges.—Fabian's Chronicle.

The toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head. Fenton says: "There is to be found in the heads of old and great toads a stone they call borax or stelon, which being used as rings give forewarning against venom" (1569). These stones always bear a figure resembling a toad on their surface. Lupton says: "A toad-stone, called crepandia, touching any part envenomed by the bite of a rat, wasp, spider, or other venomous beast, ceases the pain and swelling thereof." In the Londesborough Collection is a silver ring of the fifteenth century, in which one of these toad-stones is set. The stone was supposed to sweat and change colour when poison was in its proximity.

Toad-eater. At the final overthrow of the Moors, the Castilians made them their servants, and their active habits and officious manners greatly pleased the proud and lazy Spaniards, who called them mi todita (my factotum). Hence a cringing officious dependent, who will do all sorts of dirty work for you, is called a todita or toad-eater. Dr. Ogilvie, in the "Imperial Dictionary," says the word arose from a sycophant who praised everything. "In order to 'fool him to the top of his bent,' a dish of toads was set before him, which he ate with relish and praised." This seems a very unlikely explanation of the origin of the phrase.

Toad-flax. A corruption of toad-flax. "Tod" means a bunch or cluster, a word still applied to wool, where 28lbs. is called a tod. The mass of a sum of figures is called the lump or total. The Cymbalaria Italica is called toad-flax on account of its multitudinous mass of threads matted together in a cluster.

Toad-pipe (Equisetum arvense) is toad-pipe; so called from the cluster of jointed hair-like tubes or pipes of which it consists.

Toad-stone. (See TOAD, "ugly and venomous.")

Toady. (See TOAD-EATER.)

Toast. A name given, to which guests are invited to drink in compliment. The name at one time was that of a lady. The word is taken from the toast which used at one time to be put into the tankard, and which still floats in the loving-cup, and also the cups called copus, bishop, and cardinal, at the Universities. Hence the lady named was the toast or savour of the wine—that which gave the draught piquancy and merit. The story goes that a certain beau, in the reign of Charles II., being at Bath, pledged a noted beauty in a glass of water taken from her bath, whereupon another roysterer cried out he would have nothing to do with the liquor, but would have the toast (i.e., the lady herself).—Rambler, No. 24.

He noisy mirth and roaring songs commands,
Gives idle toasts, &c. Crabbe, "Borough."

Tobit, sleeping one night outside the wall of his courtyard, was blinded by sparrows "muting warm dung into his eyes." His son Tobias was attacked on the Tigris by a fish, which leapt out of the water to assail him. Tobias married Sara, seven of whose betrothed lovers had been successively carried off by the evil spirit Asmodeus. Asmodeus was driven off by the angel Azari'as, and fleeing to the extremity of Egypt, was bound. Old Tobit was cured of his blindness, by applying to his eyes the gall of the fish which had tried to devour his son.—Apocrypha (Book of Tobit).

Tobo'so. Dulcinea del Toboso. Don Quixote's lady. Sancho Panza says she was "a stout-built sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish." The knight had been in love with her when he was simply a gentleman of the name of Quixa'da. She was then called Aldonza Lorenzo (daughter of Lorenzo Corchuelo and Aldonza Nogales); but when the gentleman became a don, he changed the style of address of the village damsel into one more befitting his new rank.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. i., ch. 1.

"Sir," said Don Quixote, "she is not a descendant of the ancient Caii, Curtii, and Scipios of Rome; nor of the modern Colonas and Orsini; nor of the Rebellas and Villauoras of Valencia; neither is she a descendant of the Palafoxes, Newcas, Roabertis, Corellas, Lunas, Alagonés, Ureas, Fozes, and Gurreas of Aragon; neither does the lady Dulcinea descend from the Cerdas, Manriquez, Mendozas, and Guzmans of Castile; nor from the Alencastros, Pallas, and Menezés of Portugal; but she derives her origin from a family of Toboso, near Mancha (bk. ii., ch. 5).

* * In English the accent of Dulcinea is often on the second syllable, but in Spanish it is on the third.

Ask you for whom my tears do flow so?
Why, for Dulcinea del Toboso.

Don Quixote's Love-song.

Tobo'sian. The rampant Man'che-gan lion shall be united to the white Tobosian dove. Literally, Don Quixote de la Mancha shall marry Dulcinea del Toboso. Metaphorically, "None but the brave deserve the fair;" "She who is fair all maids above shall bravery's guerdon be."

Toby (Uncle). The real hero of Sterne's "Tristram Shandy." He is a captain wounded at the siege of Namur, noted for his kindness of heart, his ingenuous simplicity, his gallantry, and maiden modesty.

Toby Veck. Ticket-porter and job-man, nicknamed "Trotty," from his pace. "A weak, small, spare man," who loved to earn his money, and heard the chimes ring words which his fancy, hopes, and fears created. After a dinner of tripe he lived for a time in dream-land, and woke up on New Year's Day to dance at his daughter's wedding.—Dickens, "The Chimes."

Toddy. A favourite Scotch beverage compounded of spirits, hot water, and sugar. The word is a corruption of taudi, the Indian name for the saccharine juice of palm spathes. The Sanskrit is toldi or taldi, from tal (palm-juice).—Rhind, "Vegetable Kingdom."

Todgers (Mrs.). Proprietress of a commercial boarding-house in "Martin Chuzzlewit," by Charles Dickens.

Toes. The most dexterous man in the use of his toes in lieu of fingers was William Kingston, born without hands or arms. (See "World of Wonders," pt. x.; Correspondence, p. 65.)

Toffania. An old woman of Naples immortalised by her invention of a tasteless and colourless poison, called by her the Manna of St. Nicola of Bari, but better known as Acqua Tofana. Above 600 persons fell victims to this insidious drug.

Hieronyma Spara, generally called La Spara, a reputed witch, about a century previously, sold a similar elixir. The secret was revealed by the father confessor, after many years of concealment and a fruitful number of deaths.

Tog. Togs, dress. (Latin, toga.) "Togged out in his best" is dressed in his best clothes. Toggery is finery.

Toga. The Romans were called toga'ti or gens toga'ta, because their chief outer dress was a toga.

Tole'do. Famous for its swords. "The temper of Tole'dan blades is such that they are sometimes packed in boxes, curled up like the mainsprings of watches." Both Livy and Polybius refer to them.

Tolmen, in French Dolmen. An immense mass of stone placed on two or more vertical ones, so as to admit a passage between them. (Celtic, tol or dol, table; men, stone.)

The Constantine Tolmen, Cornwall, consists of a vast stone 33 feet long, 14½ deep, and 18½ across. This stone is calculated to weigh 750 tons, and is poised on the points of two natural rocks.

Tolo'sa. He has got the gold of Tolosa (Latin proverb meaning "His ill-gotten wealth will do him no good"). Cæpio, in his march to Gallia Narbonensis, stole from Toulouse (Tolosa) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods. In the battle which ensued both Cæpio and his brother consul were defeated by the Cimbrians and Teutons, and 112,000 Romans were left dead on the field (B.C. 106).

Tom. Between "Tom" and "Jack" there is a vast difference. "Jack" is the sharp, shrewd, active fellow, but Tom the honest dullard. Counterfeits are "Jacks," but Toms are simply bulky examples of the ordinary sort, as Tomatoes. No one would think of calling the thick-headed, ponderous male cat a Jack, nor the pert, dexterous, thieving daw a "Tom." The former is instinctively called a Tom-cat, and the latter a Jackdaw. The subject of "Jack" has been already set forth. (See JACK.) Let us now see how Tom is used:—

Tom o' Bedlam (q.v.). A mendicant who levies charity on the plea of insanity.

Tom-cat. The male cat.

Tom-Drum's entertainment. A very clumsy sort of horse-play.

Tom-Farthing. A born fool.

Tom Fool. A clumsy, witless fool, fond of stupid practical jokes, but very different from a "Jack Pudding," who is a wit and bit of a conjuror.

Tom Long. A lazy, dilatory sluggard.

Tomlony. A simpleton.

Tom Noddy. A puffing, fuming, stupid creature, no more like a "Jack-a-dandy" than Bill Sikes to Sam Weller.

Tom Noodle. A mere nincompoop.

Tom the Piper's Son. A poor stupid thief who got well basted, and blubbered like a booby.

Tom Thumb. A man cut short or stunted of his fair proportions. (For the Tom Thumb of nursery delight, see next page.)

Tom Tidler. An occupant who finds it no easy matter to keep his own against sharper rivals. (See TOM TIDLER'S GROUND.)

Tom Tiller. A hen-pocked husband.

Tom Tinker. The brawny, heavy blacksmith, with none of the wit and fun of a "Jack Tar," who can pull a yard to astonish all his native village.

Tom Tit. The "Tom Thumb" of birds.

Tom-Toe. The clumsy, bulky toe, "bulk without spirit vast." Why the great toe? "For that being one o' the lowest, basest, poorest of this most wise rebellion, thou goest foremost."—Shakespeare, "Coriolanus," i. 1.

Tom Tug. A waterman, who bears the same relation to a Jack Tar as a cart-horse to an Arab. (See TOM TUG.)

Great Tom of Lincoln. A bell weighing 5 tons 8 cwt.

Mighty Tom of Oxford. A bell weighing 17 tons 12 cwt.

Old Tom. A heavy, strong, intoxicating sort of gin.

Tom and Jerry. Two characters in Pierce Egan's "Life in London."

Tom and Jerry Shop. (See TOMMY SHOP.)

Tom o' Bedlams. A race of mendicants. The Bethlehem Hospital was made to accommodate six lunatics, but in 1644 the number admitted was forty-four, and applications were so numerous that many inmates were dismissed half cured. These "ticket-of-leave men" used to wander about as vagrants, chaunting mad songs, and dressed in fantastic dresses, to excite pity. Under cover of these harmless "innocents," a set of sturdy rogues appeared, called Abram Men, who shammed lunacy, and committed great depredations.

With a sigh like Tom o' Bedlam,
Shakespeare, "King Lear," i. 2.

Tom-boy. A romping girl, a harlot. (Saxon, tumbian, "to dance or romp;" Danish, tumler, "to tumble about;" French, tomber; Spanish, tumbar; our tumble). The word may either be tumbe-boy (one who romps like a boy), or a tumbier (one who romps), the word boy being a corruption.

A lady
So fair....to be partner'd
With Tomboys.
Shakespeare, "Cymbeline," i. 7.

Tom Folio. Thomas Rawlinson, the bibliomaniac. (1681-1725.)

Tom Fool's Colours. Red and yellow, or scarlet and yellow, the colours of the ancient motley.

Tom Foolery. The coarse witless jokes of a Tom Fool. (See above.)

Tom Long. Waiting for Tom Long—i.e., a wearisome long time. The pun, of course, is on the word long.

Tom Thumb, the nursery tale, is from the French Le Petit Poucet, by Charles Perrault (1630), but it is probably of Anglo-Saxon origin. There is in the Bodleian Library a ballad about Tom Thumb, "printed for John Wright in 1630." Tom in this compound is the Swedish Tomt, a nix or dwarf, as in Tompt-gubbe (a brownie or kobold). The t is mute, like the d in Trold, pronounced troll.

* * The Tom Thumb of King Arthur's court is a clever little fellow; but the stunted creature ordinarily termed a Tom Thumb is simply a man cut short. One should be called Tomt-thumb, and the other Tom-thumb.

Tom Thumb. The son of a common ploughman and his wife, who was knighted by king Arthur, and was killed by the poisonous breath of a spider, in the reign of king Thunstone, the successor of Arthur.—Nursery tale.

Tom Tidler's Ground. The ground or tenement of a sluggard. The expression occurs in Dickens's Christmas Story, 1861. Tidler is a contraction of "the idler" or t'idler. The game so called consists in this: Tom Tidler stands on a heap of stones, gravel, &c.; other boys rush on the heap, crying "Here I am on Tom Tidler's ground," and Tom bestirs himself to keep the invaders off.

Tom Tug. A waterman. In allusion to the tug or boat so called, or to tugging at the oars.

Tomb of our Lord. This spot is now covered with "The Church of the Holy Sepulchre." A long marble slab is shown on the pavement as the tombstone. Where the Lord was anointed for his burial three large candlesticks stand, covered with red velvet.

Tommy Shop. Where wages are paid to workmen, who are expected to lay out a part of the money for the good of the shop. Tommy means bread or a penny roll, or the food taken by a workman in his handkerchief; it also means goods in lieu of money. A Tom and Jerry shop is a low drinking-room.

Tonans (Delirium Tonans). Loud talk, exaggeration, gasconade. Blackwood's Magazine (1869) introduced the expression in the following clause:—

Irishmen are the victims of that terrible malady that is characterised by a sort of sub-acute raving, and may, for want of a better name, be called "Delirium Tonsus."

Tongues.

The Italian is pleasant but without sinews, as a still fleeting water.

The French—delicate, but even nice as a woman, scarce daring to open her lips for fear of marring her countenance.

Spanish—majestical, but fulsome, running too much on the letter o; and terrible like the devil in a play.

Dutch—manlike, but withal very harsh, as one ready at every word to pick a quarrel.

We (the English), in borrowing from them, give the strength of consonants to the Italian; the full sound of words to the French; the variety of terminations to the Spanish; and the mollifying of more vowels to the Dutch; and so, like bees, we gather the honey of their good properties and leave the dregs to themselves.—Camden.

Tonio. A young Tyrolese who saved Maria, the suttler-girl, when on the point of falling down a precipice. The young couple fall in love with each other, and the regiment which calls Maria its adopted daughter consents to their marriage, provided Tonio will enlist under its flag. No sooner is this done than Maria is claimed by the marchioness of Berkenfield as her own daughter, and is at once removed to the castle of her noble mother. In time the castle is taken possession of by the same French regiment, and Tonio has risen to the rank of field officer. When he claims the hand of Maria, the marchioness tells him she has promised her to the son of a duchess; but Maria induces her to relent, and she is given in marriage to the Tyrolese.—Donizetti, "La Figlia del Reggimento" (an opera).

Tonna (Mrs.), Charlotte Elizabeth, the author of "Personal Recollections." (1792-1846.)

Ton'sure (2 syl.). The tonsure of St. Peter consists in shaving the crown and back of the head, so as to leave a ring or "crown" of hair.

The tonsure of James consists in shaving the entire front of the head. This is sometimes called "The tonsure of Simon the Magician," and sometimes "The Scottish tonsure," from its use in North Britain.

Tontine (2 syl.). A legacy left among several persons in such a way that as any one dies his share goes to the survivors, till the last survivor inherits all. So named from Lorenzo Tonti, a Neapolitan, who introduced the system into France in 1653.

Tony Lumpkin. A young clownish bumpkin in "She Stoops to Conquer," by Oliver Goldsmith.

Tooba or Toubia (eternal happiness). The tree Toubia, in Paradise, stands in the palace of Mahomet.—Sale (Prelim. Disc.).

Toodle (Mr.). A character who had only three stages of existence. He was either taking refreshment in the bosom of his family, or was tearing through the country at from twenty-five to fifty miles an hour, or was sleeping after his fatigues.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Tool. To tool a coach. To drive one; generally applied to a gentleman Jebu, who undertakes for his own amusement to drive a stage-coach. To tool is to use the tool as a workman; a coachman's tools are the reins and whip with which he tools his coach or makes his coach go.

Toom Tabard (empty jacket). A nickname given to John Balliol, because of his poor spirit, and sleeveless appointment to the throne of Scotland. The honour was an "empty jacket," which he enjoyed a short time and then lost. He died disrowned in Normandy.

Tooth. Greek, odon; Latin, dent; Sanskrit, dant; Gothic, tunth.

Armed to the teeth. To the Tth. A similar pun is "raising pie to the teeth," that is to the Tth power. These are Cambridge University phrases, taken from mathematics.

In spite of his teeth. Though he snarls and shows his teeth like a snarling dog. (See TEETH.)

Tooth and Egg. A corruption of Tutanag, a Chinese word for spelter, the metal of which canisters are made, and tea-chests lined. It is a mixture of English lead and tin from Quintang.

Tooth and Nail. In right good earnest, like a rat or mouse biting and scratching to get at something.

Toots (Mr.). A sort of Verdant

Green, who had recently burst the bonds of Dr. Blimber's school, and fallen in love with Florence Dombey. He is famous for blushing, refusing what he is dying to obtain, and saying "Oh, it is of no consequence," out of nervous bashfulness.—Dickens, "Dombey and Son," ch. xxviii.

"I assure you," said Mr. Toots, "really I am dreadfully sorry; but it's of no consequence."—Dickens, "Dombey and Son."

Top. (See SLEEP.)

Top-Sawyer. A first-rate fellow. The sawyer that takes the upper stand is always the superior man, and gets double wages.

Tope. A tumulus or Buddhistic monument, called in Ceylon a dagop. (Pali thāpa, Sanskrit stūpa, a mound. Dagop is dhātu-gopa, relic-preserver.)

To'phet (playing on timbrels). A valley near Jerusalem, where children were made to "pass through the fire to Moloch." Josiah threw dead bodies, ordure, and other unclean things there, to prevent all further application of the place to religious use (2 Kings xxiii. 10, 11). Here Sennacherib's army was destroyed (Isa. xxx. 31-33). The valley was also called "Gehinnom" (valley of Hinnom), corrupted into Gehenna, and rabbi Kimchi tells us that a perpetual fire was kept burning in it to consume the dead bodies, bones, filth, and ordure deposited there.

Top'ic. This word has wholly changed its original meaning. It now signifies a subject for talk, a theme for discussion or to be written about; but originally "topics" were what we call common-places; the "sentences" of Peter Lombard were theological topics. (Greek, topike, from topos, a place.)

Topsy. A slave-girl, who impersonates the low moral development but real capacity for education of the negro race. Her reply to Aunt Ophelia, who questioned her as to her father and mother, is worthy Dickens. After maintaining that she had neither father nor mother, her solution of her existence was "I 'spects I growed."—Mrs. Beecher Stowe, "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Topsy-turvy. The Saxon top-sid turn-aweg (the top-side turn-away), or top-sid turn-weg down (top-side turn way-down), as Shakespeare says "turn it tupsy turvy down" ("1 Henry IV.," iv. 1). Skinner gives topen in turfen (tops in the turf—i.e., upside on the ground), and Grose top-side turf-wise, turf being always laid the wrong side upwards. (See HALF-SEAS OVER.)

Toralva. The licentiate who was conveyed on a cane through the air, with his eyes shut. In the space of twelve hours he arrived at Rome, and lighted on the tower of Nona, whence, looking down, he witnessed the death of the constable de Bourbon. The next morning he arrived at Madrid, and related the whole affair. During his flight through the air the devil bade him open his eyes, and he found himself so near the moon that he could have touched it with his finger.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. iii., ch. 5.

Torne'a. A lake, or rather a river of Sweden, which rises from a lake in Lapland, and runs into the Gulf of Bothnia, at the town called Torne'a or Tornö.

Still pressing on beyond Torne'a's lake.
Thomson, "Winter."

Torqua'to—i.e., Torquato Tasso, the poet. (See ALFONSO.)

And see how dearly earned Torquato's fame.
Lord Byron, "Childe Harold," iv. 36.

Torr's MSS., in the library of the dean and chapter of York Minster. These voluminous records contain the clergy list of every parish in the diocese of York, and state not only the date of each vacancy, but the cause of each removal, whether by death, promotion, or otherwise.

Torrallba (Doctor), who resided some time in the court of Charles V. of Spain. He was tried by the Inquisition for sorcery, and confessed that the spirit Cequel took him from Vall'adolid to Rome and back again in an hour and a half.—Pellicer.

Torre, Sir (1 syl.). Brother of Elaine, and son of the lord of As'tolat. A kind, blunt heart, brusque in manners, and but little of a knight.—Tennyson, "Idyls of the King" (Elaine).

Torricelli is noted for his explanation of the rise of water in a common suction-pump. Galileo explained the phenomenon by the ipse dixit of "Nature abhors a vacuum."

Torso. A stature which has lost its head and members, as the famous "torso of Hercules." The word is Italian, and means a trunk [of a tree, &c.].

Torture (2 syl.). The most celebrated instruments of torture were the rack, called by the English "the duke of Exeter's daughter;" the thumbkins or thumbscrows, the boots, the pincers, the manacles, and the scavenger's daughter (q.v.).

To'ry. This word, says Defoe, is the Irish toruigh, used in the reign of queen Elizabeth to signify a band of Irish robbers. It is formed from the verb toruighim (to make sudden raids). Goliut says—"TORY, silvestris, montana, avis, homo, et utrumque ultus haud ibi est (Whatever inhabits mountains and forests is a Tory). Lord Macaulay says—"The name was first given to those who refused to concur in excluding James from the throne." He further says—"The bogs of Ireland afforded a refuge to popish outlaws, called tories." Tory-hunting was a pastime which has even found place in our nursery rhymes—"I went to the wood and I killed a tory."

F. Crossley gives as the derivation, Taoibh-righ (Celtic, "king's party.")

H. T. Hore, in Notes and Queries, gives Tuath-righ, "partisans of the king."

G. Borrow gives Tar-a-ri, "Come, O king."

Another suggestion is the highwayman's demand, Toree! toree!—"Give! give!" (i.e., your money or your life).

Touch. To keep touch—faith, fidelity. The allusion is to "touching" gold and other metals on a touch-stone to prove them. Shakespeare speaks of "friends of noble touch" (proof).

And trust me on my truth,
If thou keep touch with me,
My dearest friend, as my own heart,
Thou shalt right welcome be.
George Barnwell? (1730).

Tou'chet. When Charles IX. introduced Henri of Navarre to Marie Touchet, he requested him to make an anagram on her name, and Henri thereupon wrote the following—Je charme tout.

Touchstone. A dark, flinty schist, called by the ancients Lapis Lydius; called touch-stone because gold is tried by it, thus; the stone is touched by the metal, and the metal leaves a mark behind, the colour of which indicates its purity. Dr. Ure says, "In such small work as cannot be assayed . . . the assayers . . . ascertain its quality by 'touch.' They then compare the colour left behind, and form their judgment accordingly."

Gold is tried by the touchstone, and men by gold.
—Bacon.

Touchstone. A clown whose mouth is filled with quips and cranks and witty repartees.—Shakespeare, "As You Like It."

Touchy (French, touché, affected), or Ne touchez pas, "Noli me tangere," one not to be touched.

Tour. The Grand Tour. Through France, Switzerland, Italy, and home by Germany. Before railways were laid down, this tour was made by most of the young aristocratic families as the finish of their education. Those who merely went to France or Germany were simply tourists.

Tournament or Tournay. A tilt of knights; the chief art of the game being so to manœuvre or turn your horse as to avoid the adversary's blow.

Tournament of the Drum. A comic romance in verse by Sir David Lindsay; a ludicrous mock tournament.

Tournament of Tottenham. A comic romance, printed in Percy's "Reliques." A number of clowns are introduced, practising warlike games, and making vows like knights of high degree. They ride tilts on cart-horses, fight with ploughshares and flails, and wear for armour wooden bowls and saucepan-lids. It may be termed the "High Life Below Stairs" of chivalry.

Tour'nemine (3 syl.). That's Tour'nemine. Your wish was father to that thought. Tournemine was a Jesuit of the eighteenth century, of a very sanguine and dreamy temperament.

Tours. Geoffrey of Monmouth says: "In the party of Brutus was one Turo'nes, his nephew, inferior to none in courage and strength, from whom Tours derived its name, being the place of his sepulchre. Of course, this fable is wholly worthless historically. Tours is the city of the Tu'ronés, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis.

Tout est Perdu Hormis L'Honneur, is what François I. wrote to his mother after the battle of Pavi'a.

Tower of Hunger. Gualandi. (See UGOLF'NO.)

Tower of London. The architect of this remarkable building was Gundulphus, bishop of Rochester, who also built or restored Rochester keep, in the time of William I. In the Tower lie buried Anne Boleyn and her brother; the guilty Catherine Howard, and lady Rochford her associate; the venerable lady Salisbury, and Cromwell the minister of Henry VIII.; the two Seymours, the admiral and protector of Edward VI.; the duke of Norfolk and earl of Essex (queen Elizabeth's reign); the duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II.; the earls of Balmerino and Kilmarnock, and lord Lovat; bishop Fisher and his illustrious friend More.

Townly (Lady). A silly young wife, selfish, and fond of gaiety. She tells her husband's sister—"I dote upon assemblies; my heart bounds at a ball; and at an opera I expire. I love play to distraction; cards enchant me; and dice put me out of my little wits."—Vanbrugh and Cibber, "The Provoked Husband."

Lord Townly. Husband of the above. A sedate domestic gentleman, who redeems his wife by daring to govern her. —Vanbrugh and Cibber, "The Provoked Husband."

Tox (Miss). A milk-and-water young lady, who "ambled on through life without any opinions." She looked upon Dombey and Son as the pivot on which the whole world turned, and once indulged a very distant hope that she might become Mrs. Dombey; but when Mr. Dombey married Edith, Miss Tox "felt she had no reason of complaint, and that no wife could be too handsome or too stately for him." For a day or two the harpsichord and plants were neglected, but Miss Tox "was not of a disposition long to abandon herself to unavailing regret," and converted her "affection" into "Platonic love."—Dickens, "Dombey and Son," ch. xxxviii.

Tracts for the Times. Published at Oxford during the years 1833-1841, and hence called the "Oxford Tracts."

A—i.e., Rev. John Keble, D.D., author of the "Christian Year," fellow of Oriel, and formerly Professor of Poetry at Oxford.

B—Rev. Isaac Williams, fellow of Trinity; author of "The Cathedral, and other Poems."

C—Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christ Church.

D—Rev. John Henry Newman, D.D., fellow of Oriel, writer of the celebrated Tract No. 90, which was the last.

E—Rev. Thomas Keble.

F—Rev. R. H. Froude, fellow of Oriel.

G—Rev. Hugh Rose, of Cambridge.

Tractarians. Those who concur in the religious views advocated by the "Oxford Tracts."

Tracy. All the Tracys have the wind in their faces. Those who do wrong will always meet with punishment. William de Traei was the most active of the four knights who slew Thomas à Becket, and for this misdeed all who bore the name were saddled by the church with this ban: "Wherever by sea or land they go, the wind in their face shall ever blow." Fuller, with his usual naïveté, says, "So much the better in hot weather, as it will save the need of a fan."

Trade. (See BALANCE.)

Trade Mark. A mark adopted by a manufacturer to distinguish his productions from those made by other persons.

Trade Winds. Winds that trade or tread in one uniform track. In the northern hemisphere they blow from the north-east, and in the southern hemisphere from the south-east, about thirty degrees each side of the equator. In some places they blow six months in one direction, and six in the opposite. It is a mistake to derive the word from trade (commerce), under the notion that they are "good for trade." (Anglo-Saxon, tredde-wind, a treading wind—i.e., wind of a specific "beat" or tread; tradan, to tread.)

Tradesmen's Signs, removed by Act of Parliament, 1764. The London Paving Act, 6 Geo. III., 26, 17.

Tragedy. The goat-song (Greek, tragos-odē). The song that wins the goat as a prize. This is the explanation given by Horace ("De Arte Poetica," 220). (See COMEDY.)

Tragedy. The first English tragedy of any merit was "Gorbuduc," written by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville. (See Ralph Roister Doister.)

The Father of Tragedy. Æschylos the Athenian. (B.C. 525-426.) Thespis, the Richardson of Athens, who went about in a waggon with his strolling players, was the first to introduce dialogue in the choral odes, and is therefore not unfrequently called the "Father of Tragedy or the Drama."

Thespis was first who, all besmeared with lee,
Began this pleasure for posterity.

Dryden, "Art of Poetry," (Tragedy) c. iii.

Father of French Tragedy. Garnier. (1534-1590.)

Trail. The trail of the serpent is over them all. Sin has set his mark on all.—Thomas Moore, "Paradise and the Peri."

Traitors' Bridge. A loyal heart may be landed under Traitors' Bridge. Traitor's Bridge, in the Tower, was the way by which persons charged with high treason entered that State prison.

Traitor's Gate opens from the Tower of London to the Thames, and was the gate by which persons accused of treason entered their prison.

Trajan's Column commemorates his victories over the Dacians. It was the work of Apollodorus. The column of the Place Vendôme, Paris, is a model of it.

Trajan's Wall. A line of fortifications stretching across the Dobrudscha from Czernavoda to the Black Sea.

Tramecksan and Slamecksan. The high heels and low heels, the two great political factions of Lilliput. The high heels are the Tories, and the low heels the radicals of the kingdom. "The animosity of these two factions runs so high that they will neither eat, nor drink, nor speak to each other." The king was a low heel in politics, but the heir-apparent a high-heel.—Swift, "Gulliver's Travels" (Voyage to Lilliput, ch. iv.).

Trammel means to allure with spots. (Latin, traho maculis; French, travail.) The allusion is to the practice of attaching pieces of bright cloth upon nets to allure the fish.

Tra'mon'ta'ne (3 syl.). The north wind; so called by the Italians because to them it comes over the mountains. The Italians also apply the term to German, French, and other artists born north of the Alps. French lawyers, on the other hand, apply the word to Italian canonists, whom they consider too Romanistic. We in England generally call overstrained Roman Catholic notions "Ultramontane."

Tramway. A contraction of Outram-way; so called from Benjamin Outram, who, in 1800, used stone sleepers at Little Eton, Derbyshire, instead of timber, to support the ends of rails at their juncture.

Tranch'era. Agricane's sword, which came into Brandemart's possession.—"Orlando Furioso."

Transfordia or Transforthia. The other side of the Forth, Scotland; omnes partes extra Fortham, et Stirling, et exteros. Rose calls this district Strathforth.—"Orlando Furioso," x. 86.

Translator-General. So Fuller, in his "Worthies," calls Philemon Holland, who translated a large number of the Greek and Latin classics. (1551-1636.)

Trap. A carriage, especially such as a phaeton, dog-cart, commercial sulky, and such like. It is not applied to a gentleman's close carriage. Contraction of trappings (whatever is "put on," furniture for horses, decorations, &c.).

Traps. Luggage, as "Leave your traps at the station." "I must look after my traps," &c. (See above.)

Trapa'ni. The count do Trapani was the ninth child of Mary Isabel and Ferdinand II. of the Two Sicilies. He married the archduchess Mary, daughter of Leopold II., grand-duke of Tuscany. N.B. Francis-de-Paul, usually called Louis-Emmanuel count of Trapani, was born in 1827.

Trapa'ni. The Spaniards, in pitiless raillery of the Spanish marriages, called the trapos or dish-cloths used by waiters in the cafés to wipe down the dirty tables trapani.

Trapbois. An old usurer, who knew how to pigeon a greenhorn as well as any man in Alsatia.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

Trapper, in America, is one whose vocation is to set traps for wild animals for the sake of their furs.

The Trapper. (See NATTY BUMPPO.)

Trappists. A religious order, so called from La Trappe, an abbey of the Cistercian order, founded in the middle of the twelfth century.

Tras'go. Same as Duende (q.v.).

Travia'ta. An opera representing the progress of a courtesan. The libretto is borrowed from a French novel called "La Dame aux Camélias," by Alexandre Dumas, jun., the most immoral work in existence. It was dramatised for the French stage. The music of the opera is by Giuseppe Verdi.

Tray Trip. A game at cards.

Treacle (tree-k'l) properly means an antidote against the bite of wild beasts (Greek, thēriakē or thērika, from thēr, a wild beast). The ancients gave the name to several sorts of antidotes, but ultimately it was applied chiefly to Venice Treacle (thēriaca andromachi), a compound of some sixty-four drugs in honey.

Treasures. These are my treasures; meaning the sick and poor. So said St. Lawrence when the Roman prætor commanded him to deliver up his treasures. He was then condemned to be roasted alive on a gridiron (258).

One day a lady from Campa'nia called upon Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and after showing her jewels, requested in return to see those belonging to the famous mother-in-law of Africanus. Cornelia sent for her two sons, and said to the lady, "These are my jewels, in which alone I delight."

Treasury of Sciences. Bokhara (Asia), the centre of learning. It has 103 colleges with 10,000 students, besides a host of schools and 360 mosques.

Tree. The oldest in the world are—

(1) The Baobab or Bo-tree of Senegal, reckoned by Adanson to be 5,150 years old.

(2) With this veteran Humboldt classes the Dragon-tree of Orotava, in Tenerife.

(3) De Candolle considers the deciduous cypress of Chapultepee, in Mexico, of equal age to the preceding.

(4) The chestnut-trees on Mount Etna, and the Oriental plane-tree in the valley of Bujukdere, near Constantinople, are reckoned to be of the same age.

Trees of a patriarchal age.

I. OAKS.

(1) Damory's Oak, Dorsetshire, 2,000 years old.

(2) The great Oak of Saintes, in the department of Charente Inférieure, is from 1,800 to 2,000 years old.

(3) The Winfarthing Oak, Norfolk, and the Bentley Oak, were 700 years old at the time of the Conquest.

(4) Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, Yorkshire, according to Professor Burnet, is 1,600 years old.

(5) William the Conqueror's Oak, Windsor Great Park, is at least 1,200 years old.

(6) The Bull Oak, Wedgenock Park, and the Plestor Oak, Colborne, were in existence at the time of the Conquest.

(7) The Oak of the Partisans, in the forest of Parey, St. Ouen, is above 650 years old. Wallace's Oak, at Ellersley, near Paisley, is probably fifty years older.

(8) Owen Glendower's Oak, Shelton, near Shrewsbury, is so called because that chieftain witnessed from its branches the battle between Henry IV. and Harry Percy, in 1403. Fairlop Oak, Hainault Forest, is about the same age. Other famous oaks are those called The Twelve Apostles and The Four Evangelists.

II. YEW'S.

(1) Of Braburn, in Kent, according to De Candolle, is 3,000 years old.

(2) The Scotch yew at Fortingal, in Perthshire, between 2,500 and 3,000 years.

(3) Of Darley Churchyard, Derbyshire, about 2,050 years.

(4) Of Crookhurst, Surrey, about 1,400.

(5) The three at Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire, at least 1,200 years. Beneath these trees the founders of the abbey held their council in 1132.

(6) The yew grove of Norbury Park, Surrey, was standing in the time of the Druids.

(7) The yew-trees at Kingley Bottom, near Chichester, were standing when the sea-kings landed on the Sussex coast.

(8) The yew-tree of Harlington Churchyard, Middlesex, is above 850 years old.

(9) That at Ankerwyke House, near Staines, was noted when Magna Charta was signed in 1215, and it was the trysting tree for Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn.

III. MISCELLANEOUS.

(1) The eight olive-trees on the Mount of Olives were flourishing 800 years ago, when the Turks took Jerusalem.

(2) The lime-tree in the Grisons is upwards of 590 years old.

* * The spruce will reach to the age of 1,200 years.

¶ The Poet's Tree. A tree grows over the tomb of Tan-Sein, a musician of incomparable skill at the court of Akbar, and it is said that whoever chews a leaf of this tree will have extraordinary melody of voice.—W. Hunter.

His voice was as sweet as if he had chewed the leaves of that enchanted tree which grows over the tomb of the musician Tan-Sein.—Moore, "Lalla Rookh."

¶ Trees of the Sun and Moon. Oracular trees growing "at the extremity of India," mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerino Meschino.

¶ The Singing Tree. Each leaf was a mouth, and every leaf joined in concert.—"Arabian Nights."

Trees burst into leaf—

Ash,	earliest 13th May.	latest 14th June.
Beech,	" 19th April,	" 7th May.
Dumson,	" 28th March,	" 13th May.
Horse-chestnut,	" 17th March,	" 19th April.
Larch,	" 21st March,	" 14th April.
Lime,	" 6th April,	" 2nd May.
Mulberry,	" 12th May,	" 2nd June.
Oak,	" 10th April,	" 26th May.
Poplar,	" 6th March,	" 19th April.
Spanish chestnut,	" 20th April,	" 20th May.
Sycamore,	" 28th March,	" 23rd April.

Tree of Liberty. A tree set up by the people, hung with flags and devices, and crowned with a cap of liberty. The idea was given by the Americans of the United States, who planted poplars and other trees during the war of independence, "as symbols of growing freedom." The Jacobins in Paris planted their first tree of liberty in 1790. The symbols used in France to decorate their trees of liberty were tricoloured ribbons, circles to indicate unity, triangles to signify equality, and a cap of liberty. Trees of liberty were planted by the Italians in the revolution of 1848.

Tree of Life. (See TABA.)

Tregeagle. *To roar like Tregeagle—*very loudly. Tregeagle is the giant of Dosmary Pool, on Bodmin Downs (Cornwall), whose allotted task is to bale out the water with a limpet-shell. When the wintry blast howls over the downs, the people say it is the giant roaring.

Tregetour. A conjuror or juggler.

Tyrwhitt derives the word from trebuchet (a trap-door), but probably the German triegen, like the Italian treccare (to trick), is the first part of the word, and the last syllable is common to all such words as actor, doctor, prestidigitator, &c. The performance of a conjuror was anciently termed his "minstrelsy;" thus we read of Janio the juggler—"Janio le tregettor, facienti ministralsiam suam coram rege . . . 20s."—Lib. Comput. Garderobæ, an. 4 Edw. ii., fol. 86, MS. Cott. Nero, c. viii.

Tremont. Boston in Massachusetts was once so called, from the three hills on which the city stands.

Trench-the-Mer. The galley of Richard Cœur de Lion; so called from its "fleetness." Those who sailed in it were called by the same name.

Trencher. A good trencher-man. A good eater. The trencher is the platter on which food is cut (French, trancher, to cut), by a figure of speech applied to food itself.

He that waits for another's trencher, eats many a late dinner. He who is dependent on others, must wait, and wait, and wait, happy if after waiting he gets anything at all.

Oh, how wretched
Is that poor man that hangs on princes' favours!
There is, betwixt that smile he would aspire to—
That sweet aspect of princes and their ruin—
More pangs and fears than war or women have.
Shakespeare "Henry VIII." iii. 2.

Trencher Cap. The mortar-board cap worn at college; so called from the trenchered or split boards which form the top. Mortar-board is a perversion of the French mortar.

Trencher Friends. Persons who cultivate the friendship of others for the sake of sitting at their board, and the good things they can get.

Trencher Knight. A table knight, a suitor from cupboard love.

Trenchmore. A popular dance in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

Nimble-heeled martners, capering, sometimes a Morrisco, or Trenchmore of forty miles long.—Taylor, the Water-Poet.

Trenmor. The first king of Ireland, father of Conar.—Ossian, "Temora," ii.

Tres'sure (2 syl.). A border round a shield in heraldry. The origin of the tressure in the royal arms of Scotland is traced by heralds to the ninth century. They assert that Charlemagne granted it to king Achaius of Scotland in token of alliance, and as an assurance that "the lilies of France should be a defence to the lion of Scotland." Chalmers insinuates that these two monarchs did not even know of each other's existence.

Trèves (1 syl.). The Holy Coat of Trèves. A relic preserved in the cathedral of Trèves. It is said to be the seamless coat of our Saviour, which the soldiers would not rend, and therefore cast lots for (John xix. 23, 24). The empress Hel ena, it is said, discovered this coat in the fourth century.

Trevethy Stone. St. Clear, Cornwall. A cromlech. Trevedi, in British, means a place of graves.

Trévisan (Sir). A knight to whom Despair gave a hempen rope, that he might go and hang himself. He meets the Red-cross Knight, whom he conducts to the cave of Despair. Despair tries to work upon the Red-cross Knight, but being unable to accomplish his end, hangs himself; but though he hanged himself, he "could not do himself to die."—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. i.

Triads. Three subjects more or less connected formed into one continuous poem or subject: thus the Creation, Redemption, and Resurrection would form a triad. The conquest of England by the Romans, Saxons, and Normans would form a triad. Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and Napoleon Bonaparte would form a triad. So would Law, Physic, and Divinity. The Welsh triads are collections of historic facts, mythological traditions, moral maxims, or rules of poetry disposed in groups of three.

Triads (in chemistry). A group of elementary bodies in which each atom is equivalent in combining power to three of hydrogen (H_3).

Tri'amond. Son of Ag'apë, a fairy; very daring and very strong. He fought on horseback, and employed both sword and shield. He married Can'acë.—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv. (See PRIAMOND.)

Trib'oulet. A fool, a buffoon; so called from Francis Hotman, who went by that name, and was Court fool to Louis XII. Rabelais introduces him in his "Gargantua and Pantagruel."

Tribune. Last of the Tribunes. Cola di Rienzi, who assumed the title of "Tribune of liberty, peace, and justice." Rienzi is the hero of one of Lord Lytton's most vigorous works of fiction. (1313-1354.)

Trice. I'll do it in a trice. The hour is divided into minutes, seconds, and trices or thirds. I'll do it in a minute, I'll do it in a second, I'll do it in a trice.

Trick. An old dog learns no tricks. When persons are old they do not readily conform to new ways. The Latin proverb is "Senex Psittacus negligit ferulam;" the Greeks said "Nekron iat'ruein kai geronta neu'thetein tauton esti;" the Germans say "Einen alten hund ist nicht gut handigen."

Tricolour. Flags or ribbons with three colours, assumed by nations or insurgents as symbols of political liberty. The present European tricolour ensigns are, for—

Belgium, black, yellow, red, divided vertically.

France, blue, white, red, divided vertically. (See next article.)

Holland, red, white, blue, divided horizontally.

Italy, green, white, red, divided vertically.

Tricolour of France. The insurgents in the French revolution chose the three colours of the city of Paris for their symbol. The three colours were first devised by Mary Stuart, wife of François II. The white represented the royal house of France; the blue, Scotland; and the red, Switzerland, in compliment to the Swiss guards, whose livery it was. The heralds afterwards tinctured the shield of Paris with the three colours, thus expressed in heraldic language: "Paris portait de gueules, sur vaisseau d'argent, flottant sur des ondes de même, le chef cousu de France" (a ship with white sails, on a red ground, with a blue chief). The usual tale is that the insurgents in 1789 had adopted for their flag the two colours red and blue, but that Lafayette persuaded them to add the Bourbon white, to show that they bore no hostility to the king. To say nothing of the palpable improbability of this story, it may be summarily rejected, seeing the first flag of the republicans was green, and the tricolour was not adopted till the 11th of July, when the people were disgusted with the king for dismissing Necker.

Triest'e (2 syl.). Since 1816 it has borne the title of "The most loyal of towns."

Trifaldi. The Afflicted Duenna; called Trifaldi because she wore three skirts. She was chief lady of the bed-chamber to the infanta Antonomas'ia.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. iii., ch. 4.

Trifaldin, of the Bushy Beard. Squire to the countess Trifaldi, the Afflicted Duenna.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. iii., ch. 4, 5.

Tri'gon. The junction of three signs. The zodiac is partitioned into four trigons, named respectively after the four elements: The watery trigon includes Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces; the fiery, Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; the earthly, Taurus, Virgo, and Capricornus; and the airy, Gemini, Libra, and Aquarius.

Tril'ogy. A group of three tragedies. Every one in Greece who took part in the poetic contest had to produce a trilogy and a satyric drama. We have only one specimen, and that is by Æschylos, embracing the Agamemnon, the Chæphoræ, and the Eumenidës.

Trim (Corporal). Uncle Toby's faithful servant; affectionate, respectful, and a great talker. The duplicate of his master in delf.—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy."

Trim-tram Gate. The lich-gate, at which the corpse was put on tressels for a few seconds, while all the cortège alighted and got ready to enter the church. Tram means train or cortège.

Trimilki. The Anglo-Saxon name for the month of May, because in that month they began to milk their kine three times a day.

Trimmer. One who runs with the hare and holds with the hounds. Charles Montagu, earl of Halifax, adopted the term in the reign of Charles II., to signify that he was neither an extreme Whig nor an extreme Tory. Dryden was called a trimmer, because he professed attachment to the king, but was the avowed enemy of the duke of York.

Trin'culo. A jester in Shakespeare's "Tempest."

Trine. In astrology, a planet distant from another one-third of the circle is said to be in trino; one-fourth, it is in square; one-sixth or two degrees, it is in sextile; but when one-half distant, it is said to be "opposite."

In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite Of noxious efficacy.

Milton, "Paradise Lost," x. 679.

N.B. Planets distant from each other six degrees or half a circle have opposite influences, and are therefore opposed to each other.

Trin'ity.

Of the American Indians: Otkon, Messou, and Atahnata.

Of the Brahmins: Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Represented as a body with three heads.

Of Plato: Tag'athon or Goodness; "Nous," Eternal Intellect, or architect of the world; and Psuchë or the mundane soul.

Of the Persians, the triplasian deity is Oromas'dës, Mithras, and Arim'anës.

Of Orpheus: Phanës, U'raños, and Chronos.

Of the Egyptians: Eicton; Cneph the demiurgus; and Phtha.—Jamblichus.

Of Pythagoras: The Monad or One; Nous or Mind; Psuche. (See THREE.)

Roman: Jupiter or Divine Power; Minerva or Divine Logos; Juno, Amor ac Delicium Jovis, i.e. the Holy Spirit.—G. J. Vossius, "De Theol. Gentil.," viii. 12.

Scandinavians: Odin, who gave the breath of life; Hænir, who gave sense and motion; Lodur, who gave blood, colour, speech, sight, and hearing.

Trinoban'tës (4 syl.). Inhabitants of Essex, referred to in Cæsar's "Gallic Wars."

Trino'da Necessitas. The three contributions to which all lands were subject in Anglo-Saxon times, viz.—(1) Bryge-bot, for keeping bridges and highroads in repair; (2) Bury-bot, for Fyrd, for maintaining the military and keeping fortresses in repair; and (3) naval force of the kingdom.

Tripita'ka means the "triple basket," a term applied to the three classes into which the canonical writings of the Buddha are divided—viz., the Soutras, the Vinaya, and the Abidharma. (See these words.)

Triple Alliance.

A treaty entered into by Great Britain, Sweden, and Holland against Louis XIV., in 1668. (See next page.)

A treaty between Great Britain, France, and Holland against Spain, 1717.

Tripos. A Cambridge University term, meaning the voluntary honour examination in classics, for those who have already passed their degree examination or in "honours." It is a tri-pe because the candidates are disposed into three classes or groups, according to merit.

Trismegistus (thrice greatest). Hermetes the Egyptian philosopher, or Thoth councillor of Osiris king of Egypt, to whom is attributed a host of inventions—amongst others the art of writing in hieroglyphics, the first code of Egyptian laws, harmony, astrology, the lute and lyre, magic, and all mysterious sciences.

Tris'sotin'. A poet, coxcomb, and fool in Molière's "Femmes Savantes."

Tristram (Sir), Tristrem, Tristan, or Tristam. Son of Rouland Rise lord of Ermonie, and Blanche Fleur sister of Marke king of Cornwall. Having lost both his parents, he was brought up by his uncle. Tristram, being wounded in a duel, was cured by Ysolde, daughter of the queen of Ireland, and on his return to Cornwall told his uncle of the beautiful princess. Marke sent to solicit her hand in marriage, and was accepted. Ysolde married the king, but was in love with the nephew, with whom she had guilty connection. Tristram, being banished from Cornwall, went to Brittany, and married Ysolt of the White Hand, daughter of the duke of Brittany. Tristram now goes on his adventures, and being wounded, is informed that he can be cured only by Ysolde his aunt. A messenger is dispatched to Cornwall, and he is ordered to hoist a white sail if Ysolde accompanies him back. The vessel comes in sight with a white sail displayed; but Ysolt of the White Hand, out of jealousy, tells her husband that the vessel has a black sail flying, and Tristram instantly expires. Sir Tristram was one of the knights of the Round Table. Gotfrit of Strasbourg, a German minnesänger (minstrel) at the close of the twelfth century, composed a romance in verse, entitled "Tristan et Isolde." It was continued by Ulrich of Turheim, by Henry of Freyberg, and others, to the extent of many thousand verses. The best edition is that of Breslau, two vols. 8vo, 1823. (See YSOLT.)

Sir Tristram's horse. Passet'reul.

Tristram and Isuelt. One of Arnold's earlier poems is so entitled.

Triton. Son of Neptune, represented as a fish with a human head. It is this sea-god that makes the roaring of the ocean by blowing through his shell.

Hear old Triton blow his wreathèd horn [hear the sea roar].
Wor isworth.

Tri'via. Goddess of streets and ways. Gay has a poem in three books so entitled.

Thou Trivia, aid my song.
Through spacious streets conduct thy bard along . . .
To pave thy realm, and smooth the broken ways,
Earth from her womb a dainty tribute pays.
Gay, "Trivia," bk. i.

Trivial, strictly speaking, means "belonging to the public road." Latin, trivium, which is not tres viæ (three roads), but from the Greek tribo (to rub), meaning the worn or beaten path. As what comes out of the road is common, so trivial means of little value. Trench connects this word with trivium (tres viæ or cross ways), and says the gossip carried on at these places gave rise to the present meaning of the word.

Trivium. The three elementary subjects of literary education up to the twelfth century—Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic. (See QUADRIVIVUM.)

N.B. Theology was introduced in the twelfth century.

Trochilus, or humming-bird, says Barrow, "enters with impunity into the mouth of the crocodile. This is to pick from the teeth a little insect which greatly torments the creature."

Not half so bold
The puny bird that dares, with teasing hum,
Within the crocodile's stretched jaws to come.
Thomas Moore, "Lalla Rookh," pt. i.

Troglodytes (3 syl.), according to Pliny (v. 8), lived in caves and fed on serpents. (Greek, trog'lê, a cave; duo, to get into.)

King François, of eternal memory . . . abhorred these hypocritical snake-eaters.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel" (Ep. Ded., iv.).

Troglodyte. A person who lives so secluded as not to know the current events of the day, is so self-opinionated as to condemn every one who sees not eye to eye with himself, and scorns everything that comes not within the scope of his own approval; a detractor; a critic. The Saturday Review introduced this use of the word. (See above.)

Troil. (See BRENDA.)

Troilus (3 syl.). The prince of chivalry, one of the sons of Priam, killed by Achilles in the siege of Troy (Homer's "Iliad"). The loves of Troilus and Cressida, celebrated by Shakespeare and Chaucer, form no part of the old classic tale.

As true as Troilus. Troilus is meant by Shakespeare to be the type of constancy, and Cressid the type of female inconstancy. (See CRESSIDA.)

After all comparisons of truth....
As true as Troilus shall crown up the verse
And sanctify the numbers.

"Troilus and Cressida," iii. 2.

Troilus and Cressida (Shakespeare). The story was originally written by Lollius, an old Lombard author, and since by Chaucer (Pope). Chaucer's poem runs to 8,000 lines.

Trois pour Cent. A cheap hat.

Running with bare head about,
While the town is tempest-tost,
'Prentice lads unheeded shout
That their three-per-cents are lost.
Désaugiers, "Le Piliér du Café."

Trojan. He is a regular Trojan. A fine fellow, with good courage and plenty of spirit; what the French call a brave homme. The Trojans in Homer's "Iliad," and Virgil's "Æneid," are described as truthful, brave, patriotic, and confiding.

There they say right, and like true Trojans.
Butler, "Hudibras," i. 1.

Trolls. Dwarfs of Northern mythology, living in hills or mounds; they are represented as stumpy, misshapen, and humpbacked, inclined to thieving, and fond of carrying off children or substituting one of their own offspring for that of a human mother. They are called hill-people, and are especially averse to noise, from a recollection of the time when Thor used to be for ever flinging his hammer after them.

Out then spake the tiny Troll,
No bigger than an emmet he.
Danish ballad, "Elfen af Villenskov."

Trompart. A lazy but very cunning fellow, who accompanies Braggadocio as his squire. — Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. ii.

Trompée. Votre religion a été trompée. You have been greatly imposed upon. Similarly, "surprendre la religion de quelqu'un" is to detect or expose an imposition. Cardinal de Bonnechose used the former phrase in his letter to

The Times respecting the Report of the Ecumenical Council, and it puzzled the English journals, but was explained by M. Notterelle. (See The Times, Jan. 1, 1870.)

 We use the word faith both for "credulity" and "religion," g.e., "Your faith (credulity) has been imposed upon." The "Catholic faith," "Mahometan faith," "Brahminical faith," &c., virtually mean "religion."

Tronc. A witty but deformed dwarf. This dwarf was, in fact, king Oberon, metamorphosed for a term of years into this form—"Isaie le Triste" (a romance).

Troness, Tronis, or Trophy Money. Fourpence paid annually by housekeepers and landlords for the drums and colours of the county militia.

Troops of the Line. All numbered infantry or marching regiments, except the foot-guards.

Trophonios (Greek), Latin Trophonius. He has visited the cave of Trophonios (Greek). Said of a melancholy man. The cave of Trophonios was one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. The entrance was so narrow that he who went to consult the oracle had to lie on his back with his feet towards the cave, whereupon he was caught by some unseen force and violently pulled inside the cave. After remaining there a time he was driven out in similar fashion, and looked most ghastly pale and terrified; hence the proverb.

Trotty. (See TOBY VECK.)

Troubadours (3 syl.). Minstrels of the south of France in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries; so called from the Provençal verb troubar (to invent). Our word poet signifies exactly the same thing, being the Greek for "create." (See TROUVÈRES.)

Trouble means a moral whirlwind (Latin, turbo, a whirlwind; Italian, turbarè; French, troubler). Disturb is from the same root. The idea pervades all such words as agitation, commotion, vexation, a tossing up and down, &c.

Trouillogan's Advice. Do and do not; yes and no. When Pantagruel asked the philosopher Trouillogan whether Panurgo should marry or not, the philosopher replied "Yes." "What say you?" asked the prince. "What you have heard," answered Trouillogan. "What have I heard?" said Pantagruel. "What I have spoken," rejoined the sage. "Good," said the prince; "but tell me plainly, shall Panurge marry or let it alone?" "Neither," answered the oracle. "How?" said the prince. "That cannot be." "Then both," said Trouillogan.—Rabelais, "Gargantua and Pantagruel," iii. 35.

Trout is the Latin troct-a, from the Greek troktēs, the greedy fish (trogo, to eat). The trout is very voracious, and will devour any kind of animal food.

Trouvères (2 syl.) were the troubadours of the north of France, in the twelfth, thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; so called from trouver, the Walloon verb meaning "to invent." (See TROUBADOURS.)

Trovato're, Il (4 syl.). Manri'co, the son of Garzia, brother of the conte di Luna. Verdi's opera so called is taken from the drama of Gargia Gutierrez, which is laid in the fifteenth century.

Trows. Dwarfs of Orkney and Shetland mythology, similar to the Scandinavian Trolls. There are land-trows and sea-trows. "Trow tak' thee" is a phrase still used by the island women, when they are displeased with any of their children.

Troy-Novant (London). This name gave rise to the tradition that Brute, a Trojan refugee, founded London and called it New Troy; but the word is British, and compounded of Tri-nou-hant (inhabitants of the new town). Civitas Trinobantum, the city of the Trinobantes, which we might render "New-townsmen."

For noble Britons sprang from Trojans bold
And Troy-novant was built of old Troyes ashes cold.
Spenser, "Faery Queen," iii. 9.

Troy Weight means "London weight." London used to be called Troy-novant. (See above.) The general notion that the word is from Troyes, a town of France, and that the weight was brought to Europe from Grand Cairo by crusaders, is wholly untenable, as the term Troy Weight was used in England in the reign of Edward the Confessor. Troy weight is old London weight, and Avoirdupois the weight brought over by the Normans. (See AVOIRDUPOIS.)

Troxar'tas (bread-eater). King of the mice and father of Psycarpas, who was drowned.

Fix their council....
Where great Troxartas crowned in glory reigns....
Psycar'pax' father, father now no more!
Farrell, "Battle of the Frogs and Mice," bk. i.

Truce of God. In 1040 the Church forbade the barons to make any attack on each other between sunset on Wednesday and sunrise on the following Monday, or upon any ecclesiastical fast or feast day. It also provided that no man was to molest a labourer working in the fields, or to lay hands on any implement of husbandry, on pain of excommunication. (See PEACE OF GOD.)

Truchuela. A very small trout with which Don Quixote was regaled at the road-side inn where he was dubbed knight.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. i., ch. 2.

Trudge. In "Love and a Bottle" he says of Mr. Lovewell—

You know he's such a handsome man, and has so many ways of insinuating, that the frailty of woman's nature could not resist him.

True-love. (Danish, trolover, to be-troth.) Mr. Laing says: "A man may be a true-love to his bond of £10 as well as to his sweetheart."—"Norway."

True-love Knot is not compounded of true and love, but is the Danish verb trulofa (I plight my troth). Thus in the Icelandic Gospel the phrase "a virgin espoused to a man" is er trulofad var einum mannē. Among the Scandinavians a knot was symbolical of fidelity, the tie of affection, the bond of betrothal, &c.

Three times a true-love's knot I tie secure;
Firm be the knot, firm may his love endure.
Gay's Pastorals, "The Spel,"

True Thomas and the Queen of Elfland. An old romance in verse by Thomas the Rhymer.

True Thomas. Thomas the Rhymer was so called from his prophecies, the most noted of which was the prediction of the death of Alexander III. of Scotland, made to the earl of March in the castle of Dunbar the day before it occurred. It is recorded in the "Scotichronicon" of Fordun (1430). (See RHYMER.)

Truepenny. Hamlet says to the Ghost, "Art thou there, Truepenny?" Then to his comrades, "You hear this fellow in the cellarage?" (i. 5). And again, "Well said, old mole; canst work?" Truepenny means earth-borer or mole (Greek, trupanon, trupao, to bore or perforate), an excellent word to apply to a ghost "boring through the cellarage" to get to the place of purgatory before cock-crow. Miners use the word for a run of metal or metallic earth, which indicates the presence and direction of a lode.

Trull (Dolly), in "The Beggar's Opera," by Gay.

Trulla (in "Hudibras") was the daughter of James Spencer, a Quaker. She was first debauched by her father, and then by Simeon Wait (or Magna'no), the tinker.

He Trulla loved, Trulla more bright
Than burnished armour of her knight;
A bold virago, stout and tall
As Joan of France or English Mall.
Butler, "Hudibras," i. 2.

Trulli. Female spirits noted for their kindness to men.—Randle Holms, "Academy of Armory."

Trulliber (Parson). A fat clergyman, slothful, ignorant, and intensely bigoted.—Fielding, "Joseph Andrews."

Trump Card. The French carte de triomphe (card of triumph).

Trumpet. To trumpet one's good deeds. The allusion is to one of the Pharisaic sect called the Almsgivers, who had a trumpet sounded before them, ostensibly to summon the poor together, but in reality to publish abroad their abnegation and benevolence.

You sound your own trumpet. The allusion is to heralds, who used to announce with a flourish of trumpets the knights who entered a list.

Trumpeter. Your trumpeter is dead—i.e., you are obliged to sound your own praises because no one else will do it for you.

Trumpington. Sir G. de Trompington has for armorial device two trompes or trumpets.

Trundle. A military earthwork above Goodwood. The area is about two furlongs. It has a double vallum. The situations of the portæ are still to be traced in the east, west, and north. The fortifications of the ancient Britons being circular, it is probable that the Trundle is British. The fortified encampments of the Romans were square; examples may be seen at the Broil near Chichester, and on Ditchling Hill.

Trun'ion (Commodore). A naval veteran, who has retired from the service, but still keeps garrison in his own house, which is defended by a ditch and draw-bridge. He sleeps in a hammock, and takes his turn on watch.—Smollett, "Peregrine Pickle."

Truth. Pilate said, "What is truth?" This was the great question of the Platonists. Plato said we could know truth if we could sublimate our minds to their original purity. Arcesila'os said that man's understanding is not capable of knowing what truth is. Carneades maintained that not only our understanding could not comprehend it, but even our senses were wholly inadequate to help us in the investigation. Gorgias the Sophist said, "What is right, but what we prove to be right? and what is truth, but what we believe to be truth?"

Truth in a Well. This expression is attributed both to Cean'thes and to Democritos the derider.

Try'anon. Daughter of the fairy king who lived on the island of Oléron. "She was as white as lily in May, or snow that snoweth on winter's day," her "haire shone as goldē wire," and she had boundless wealth. Tryanon married Sir Launfal, king Arthur's steward, whom she carried off to "Oliroun her jolif isle," and as the romance says—

Since saw him in this land no man,
Ne no more of him tell I neen
For soothie without he.

Thomas Chestre, "Sir Launfal" (15th century).

Try'gon. A poisonous fish. It is said that Tel'egonos, son of Ulysses by Circē, coming to Ith'aca to see his father, was denied admission by the servants; whereupon a quarrel ensued, and his father, coming out to see what was the matter, was accidentally struck with his son's arrow pointed with the bone of a trygon, and died.

The lord of Ithaca.

Struck by the poisonous trygon's bone, expired.
West, "Triumphs of the Goat" (Lucian).

Try'phon. Doctor of the sea-gods.
—Spenser, "Faëry Queen," bk. iv.

Tsin Dynasty. The fourth Imperial Dynasty of China, founded by Tchao-siang-wang, prince of Tsin, who conquered the "fighting kings" (q.v.). He built the Wall of China (B.C. 211).

Tsong Dynasty. The nineteenth Imperial Dynasty of China, founded by Tchao-quang-yn, the guardian and chief minister of Yöng-tee. He was a descendant of Tchuang-tsong, the Tartar general, and on taking the yellow robe assumed the name of Taë-tsou (great ancestor). This dynasty, which lasted 300 years, was one of the most famous in Chinese annals. (960-1276.)

Tu Autem. Come to the last clause. In the long Latin grace at St. John's College, Cambridge, the last clause used to be Tu autem misere're mei, Domine. Amen. It was not unusual, when a scholar read slowly, for the senior Fellow to whisper Tu autem—i.e., Skip all the rest and give us only the last sentence.

Tu l'as voulu, George Dandin ('Tis your own fault, George Dandin). You brought this upon yourself; as you have made your bed so you must lie on it. (See DANDIN.)

Tu Quoque. The tu quoque style or argument. Personal invectives; argument of personal application; argumentum ad hominem.

We miss in this work his usual tu quoque style.—Public Opinion.

Tu-ral-lu, the refrain of comic songs, is a corruption of the Italian turluru, and the French turlureau or turlure. "Loure" is an old French word for a bagpipe, and "toure loure" means a refrain on the bagpipe. The refrain of a French song published in 1697 is—

Toure loure, lourirette,
Lironfa, toure lourira.
"Suite du Théâtre Italien," iii., p. 453.

Tub. A tale of a tub. A cock-and-bull story; a rignarole, nonsensical romance. The "Tale of a Tub" is a religious satire by Dean Swift.

A tub of naked children. Emblematical of St. Nicholas, in allusion to two boys murdered and placed in a pickling tub by a landlord, but raised to life again by this saint. (See NICHOLAS, p. 614.)

Throw a tub to the whale. To create a diversion in order to avoid a real danger; to bamboozle or mislead an enemy. In whaling, when a ship is threatened by a whole school of whales, it is usual to throw a tub into the sea to divert their attention, and to make off as fast as possible.

Tuberose. (See MISNOMERS.)

Tuck (Friar). One of Robin Hood's companions. He is represented as a fat, paunchy, sleek-headed gourmand, whose axiom was "Who leads a good life is sure to live well."

Tuck, a long narrow sword (Gaelic tuca, Welsh twca, Italian stocco, French estoc). In Hamlet the word is erroneously printed "stuck," in Malone's edition.

If he by chance escape your venomous tuck,
Our purpose may hold there. Act. iv. 7.

A good tuck in or tuck out. A good feed. To tuck is to full, a tucker is a fuller. Hence the fold of a dress to allow for growth is called a tuck, and a little frill on the top thereof is called a tucker. To full or tuck cloth is to make it fuller or thicker (Gaelic tuca, Welsh twca, which give the idea of thrusting and pressing).

Tuft. A nobleman or fellow-commoner; so called at the University because he wears a gold tuft or tassel on his college cap.

Tuft-Hunter. A nobleman's toady, one who tries to curry favour with the wealthy and great for the sake of feeding on the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table. A University term. (See above.)

Tuileries, Paris (tile-kilns). The present palace being on the site of some old tile-kilns. (See SABLONNIÈRE.)

Tulip. The turban plant; Persian, thoulyb (thoulyban, a turban), by which name the flower is called in Persia.

Tulip Mania. A reckless mania for the purchase of tulip-bulbs in the seventeenth century. Beckmann says it rose to its greatest height in the years 1634-7. A root of the species called Viceroy sold for £250; Semper Augustus, more than double that sum. The tulips were grown in Holland, but the mania which spread over Europe was a mere stock-jobbing speculation.

Tulkinghorn. A lawyer in possession of family secrets of no value to any one.—Dickens, "Bleak House."

Tully. Cicero, whose name was Marcus Tullius Cicero.

One rich soul,
Plato, the Stagyrite, and Tully joined.
Thomson, "Summer."

Tulsi, according to Hindu mythology, was a woman who asked Vishnu to make her his wife, for which she was metamorphosed into a plant (Ocymum sanctum) by Luximel, the wife of Vishnu.

Tumbledown Dick. Anything that will not stand firmly. Dick is Richard, the Protector's son, who was but a tottering wall at best.

Tune. The tune that the cow died of. Words instead of food. To say to a starving beggar "Be thou fed," but to give nothing; to argue and show how you cannot afford to give alms, though you wish well. The reference is to an old song which represents a man who had bought a cow, but having no food to give her, bade his cow "consider that it was not the season for grass."

He took up his fiddle and played her this tune—
"Consider, good cow, consider,
This isn't the time for grass to grow;
Consider, good cow, consider."

Tuneful Nine. The nine Muses: Calli'opé (epic poetry), Clio (history), Erato (elegy and lyric poetry), Euterpe (music), Melpom'ené (tragedy), Polyhym'nia (sacred song), Terpsich'oré (dancing), Thali'a (comedy), Ura'nia (astronomy).

Tuning Goose. The entertainment given in Yorkshire when the corn at harvest was all safely stacked.

Tunisian. The adjective form of Tunis.

Tunkers. A politico-religious sect of Ohio. They came from a small German village on the Eder. They believe all will be saved; are Quakers in plainness of dress and speech; they will neither fight nor go to law. Both sexes are equally eligible for any office. Celibacy is the highest honour, but not imperative. They are also called Tumblers, and incorrectly Dunkers. Tunker means "to dip a morsel into gravy," "a sop into wine," and as they are Baptists this term has been given them; but they call themselves "The harmless people."—W. Hepworth Dixon, "New America," ii. 18.

Tupman (Tracy). A sleek young gentleman who falls in love with every pretty girl he meets. He travels under the charge of Mr. Pickwick.—Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

Turcaret. One who has become rich by hook or by crook, and having nothing else to display, makes a great display of his wealth. A chevalier in Lesage's comedy of the same name.

Tureen'. A deep pan for holding soup. (French, terrine, a pan made of terre, earth.)

Turf (The). The race-course; the profession of horse-racing, which is done on turf or grass. One who lives by the turf, or one on the turf, is one whose chief occupation or means of living is derived from running horses or betting on races.

All men are equal on the turf and under it.—Lord George Bentinck.

Turk. Slave, villain. A term of reproach used by the Greeks of Constantinople.

Turk Gregory. Gregory VII., called Hildebrand, a furious Churchman, who surmounted every obstacle to deprive the emperor of his right of investiture of bishops. He was exceedingly disliked by the early reformers.

Turk Gregory never did such deeds in arms as I have done this day.—"1 Henry IV.," v. 3.

Turkey. The turkey-red bird, the bird with a deep red wattle. It does not mean the bird that comes from Turkey, as it is a native of America.

Turkish Spy was written by John Paul Mara'na, an Italian, who had been imprisoned for conspiracy. After his release he retired to Monaco, where he wrote the "History of the Plot." Subsequently he removed to Paris, and produced his "Turkish Spy," in which he gives the history of the last age. The first three volumes are by far the best. (1642-1693.)

Turncoat. The dominions of the duke of Saxony being between France and Savoy, one of the early dukes hit upon the device of a coat blue one side, and white the other. When he wished to be thought in the Spanish interest he wore the blue outside; when he wished to be considered in the French interest he wore the white outside. Whence he was named Emanuel Turncoat.—Scots' Magazine, October, 1747.

Without going to history, we have a very palpable etymon in the French tourne-côte (turn-side). (See COAT.)

Turnspit Dog. One who has all the work but none of the profit; he turns the spit but eats not of the roast. The allusion is to the dog used formerly to turn the spit in roasting. Topsel says, "They go into a wheel, which they turn round about with the weight of their bodies, so dilligently that no drudge can do the feate more cunningly." (1697.)

Turpin, Archbishop of Rheims. A mythological contemporary of Charlemagne. His chronicle is supposed to be written at Vienne, in Dauphiny, whence it is addressed to Leoprandus, dean of Aquisgranensis (Aix-la-Chapelle). It was not really written till the end of the eleventh century, and the probable author was a canon of Barcelo'na.

The romance turns on the expedition of Charlemagne to Spain in 777, to defend one of his allies from the aggressions of some neighbouring prince. Having conquered Navarre and Aragon, he returned to France. The chronicle says he invested Pampelu'na for three months without being able to take it; he then tried what prayer could do, and the walls fell down of their own accord like those of Jericho. Those Saracens who consented to become Christians were spared; the rest were put to the sword. Charlemagne then visited the sarcophagus of James, and Turpin baptised most of the neighbourhood. The king crossed the Pyrenees, but the rear commanded by Orlando was attacked by 50,000 Saracens, and none escaped but Orlando.

Dick Turpin. A highwayman, executed at York for horse-stealing. His ride to York on his steed Black Bess is described in Ainsworth's "Rookwood."

Turveydrop. A man who lives on his son's earnings; but his son looks upon him as a perfect "master of deportment." — Charles Dickens, "Bleak House."

Tussle. A struggle, a skirmish. A corruption of tousle (German, zauzen, to pull); hence a dog is named Towser (pull'em down). In the "Winter's Tale," iv. iii., Autolycus says to the Shepherd, "I toze from thee thy business" (pump or draw out of thee). In "Measure for Measure," Escalus says to the Duke, "We'll touze thee joint by joint" (v. i.).

Tut. A word used in Lincolnshire for a phantom, as the Spittal Hill Tut. Tom Tut will get you is a threat to frighten children. Tut-gotten is panic-struck. Our tush is derived from the word tut.

Tutivill'us. The demon who collects all the words skipped over or mutilated by priests in the performance of the services. These literary scraps or shreds he deposits in that pit which is said to be paved with "good resolutions" never brought to effect. — "Piers Ploughman," p. 547; "Townley Mysteries," pp. 310, 319; &c.

Twa Dogs of Robert Burns, perhaps suggested by the Spanish "Colloquio de Dos Perros," by Cervantès.

Twangdillo, the tiddler, lost one leg and one eye by a stroke of lightning, on the banks of the Ister.

Yet still the merry hard without regret
Fears his own ill, and with his sounding shell
And comic phiz relieves his drooping friends...
He tickles every string, to every note
He bends his pliant neck, his single eye
Twinkles with joy, his active stump beats time.
Somerville, "Hobbinol," i.

Tweed. A woollen cloth, so called from being largely made at Galashiels, Hawick, Selkirk, Jedburgh, and other places on the Tweed and its tributaries.

Tweedledum.

Strange that such difference should be 'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee!

This refers to the feud between the Buononciniists and the Handelists. The lines are erroneously ascribed to Dean Swift. (See GLUCKISTS.)

Twelfth Cake. The drawing for king and queen is a relic of the Roman Saturnalia. At the close of this festival the Roman children drew lots with beans to see who would be king. Twelfth day is twelve days after Christmas, or the Epiphany.

Twelfth Night (Shakespeare). The serious plot is taken from Belleforest's "Histoires Tragiques;" and Belleforest borrowed the tale from Bandello of Piedmont, whose "Novelle" ranks next to the "Decamerone" of Boccaccio. The comic parts are of Shakespeare's own invention. Bandello lived 1480-1561. (See BEFFANA.)

Twelve. Each English archer carries twelve Scotchmen under his girdle. This was a common saying at one time, because the English were unerring archers, and each archer carried in his belt twelve arrows.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," vii.

The Twelve. All the prelates of the Roman Catholic church.

The pope identifies himself with the "Master," and addresses those 700 prelates as the "Twelve."—The Times, Dec. 11, 1893.

Twelve Tables. The earliest code of Roman law, compiled by the decemviri, and cut on twelve bronze tables or tablets.—Livy, iii. 57; Diodorus, xii. 56.

Twickenham. The bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope, who lived there for thirty years. (1688-1744.)

Twig. I twig you; do you twig my meaning? I catch your meaning; I understand. Probably a corruption of the Saxon verb wit-an, to know, perceive; Latin vid-eo.

Twinkling. (See BED-POST.)

Twins. One of the signs of the constellation (May 21st to June 21st).

When now no more the alternate twins are fired,
Short is the doubtful empire of the night.
Thomson, "Summer."

Twist (Oliver). A boy born in a workhouse, starved and ill-treated; but always gentle, amiable, and pure-minded. Dickens's novel so called.

Twitcher (Jeremy or Jemmy). A name given to John lord Sandwich (1718-1792), noted for his liaison with Miss Ray, who was shot by the Rev. "Captain" Hackman out of jealousy. His lordship's shambling gait is memorialised in the "Heroic Epistle."

See Jemmy Twitcher shambles—stop, stop thief!

Twitten. A narrow alley.

Two. The evil principle of Pythagoras. Accordingly the second day of the second month of the year was sacred to Pluto, and was esteemed unlucky.

Two an unlucky number in our dynasties. Witness Ethelred II. the Unready, forced to abdicate; Harold II., slain at Hastings; William II., shot in New Forest; Henry II., who had to fight for his crown, &c.; Edward II., murdered at Berkeley Castle; Richard II., deposed; Charles II., driven into exile;

James II., forced to abdicate; George II. was worsted at Fontenoy and Lawfield, his reign was troubled by civil war, and disgraced by general Braddock and admiral Byng.

It does not seem much more lucky abroad: Charles II. of France, after a most unhappy reign, died of poison; Charles II. of Navarre was called The Bad; Charles II. of Spain ended his dynasty, and left his kingdom a wreck; Charles II. of Anjou (le Boiteux) passed almost the whole of his life in captivity; Charles II. of Savoy reigned only nine months, and died at the age of eight.

François II. of France was peculiarly unhappy, and after reigning less than two years sickened and died; Napoleon II. never reigned at all; Franz II. of Germany lost all his Rhine possessions, and in 1806 had to renounce his title of emperor.

Friedrich II., emperor of Germany, was first anathematised, then excommunicated, then dethroned, and lastly poisoned.

Jean II. of France, being conquered at Poitiers, was brought captive to England by the Black Prince; Juan II. of Aragon had to contend for his crown with his own son Carlos.

It was Felipe II. of Spain who sent against England the "Invincible Armada;" it is Francesco II. of the Two Sicilies who has been driven from his throne by Garibaldi; it was Romulus II. in whom terminated the empire of the West; Peter II. of Russia died at the age of fifteen, and he is a disgrace to the name of Menzikoff; Pietro II. de Medicis was forced to abdicate, and died of shipwreck; James II. of Scotland was shot by a cannon at the siege of Roxburgh; James II. of Majorca, after losing his dominions, was murdered. Alexander II. of Scotland had his kingdom laid under an interdict; Alexander II., the pope, had to contend against Honorius II. the anti-pope; Alexis II., emperor of the East, was placed under the ward of his mother and uncle, who so disgusted the nation by their cruelty that the boy was first dethroned, and then strangled; Andronicus II., emperor of Greece, was dethroned; Henri II. of France made the disastrous peace called La Paix Malheureuse, and was killed by Montgomery in a tournament; &c. &c. (See JANE and JOHN.)

Two Eyes of Greece. Athens and Sparta.

Two Gentlemen of Vero'na. The story of Protheus and Julia was borrowed from the pastoral romance of "Diana," by George of Montemayor, a Spaniard, translated into English by Bartholomew Young in 1598. The love adventure of Julia resembles that of Viola, in "Twelfth Night."

Two Sundays. When two Sundays meet. Never. (See GREEK CALEND.)

Tybalt. A Capulet; a "fiery" young noble.—Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet."

It is the name given to the cat in the story of "Reynard the Fox." Hence Mercutio says, "Tybalt, you rat-catcher, will you walk?" (iii. 1); and again, when Tybalt asks, "What wouldst thou have with me?" Mercutio answers, "Good king of cats! nothing but one of your nine lives" (iii. 1).

Tyburn is Twa-burne, the "two rivulets;" so called because two small rivers met in this locality.

Tyburn's triple tree. A gallows, which consists of two uprights and a beam resting on them. Previous to 1783 Tyburn was the chief place of execution in London, and a gallows was permanently erected there. In the reign of Henry VIII. the average number of persons executed annually in England was 2,000. The present number is under twelve.

Kings of Tyburn. Public executioners. (See HANGMEN.)

Tyburn Ticket. Under a statute of William III., prosecutors who had secured a capital conviction against a criminal were exempted from all parish and ward offices within the parish in which the felony had been committed. Such persons obtained a Tyburn Ticket, which was duly enrolled and might be sold. The Stamford Mercury (March 27th, 1818) announces the sale of one of these tickets for £280. The Act was repealed by 58 Geo. III., c. 70.

Tybur'nia (London). Portman and Grosvenor Squares district, described by Thackeray as "the elegant, the prosperous, the polite Tyburnia, the most respectable district of the habitable globe."

T'Year—i.e., to-year; as to-day, tonight, to-morrow; not this year, as it is generally supposed.

Tyke. (See TIKE.)

Tyler Insurrection. That headed by Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, in consequence of a poll-tax of three groats to defray the expenses of a war with France. (1381.)

Tyl'wyth Teg (the Fair Family). A sort of Kobold family, but not of diminutive size. They lived in the lake near Brecknock.—Davies, "Mythology, &c., of the British Druids."

Type. Pica (large type), "litera pica'ta," the great black letter at the beginning of some new order in the liturgy.

Brevier (small type), used in printing the breviary.

Primer, now called "long primer" (small type), used in printing small prayer-books called primers.

A fount of types. A complete assortment, containing—a 8,500	h 6,400	o 8,000	v 1,200

b 1,600	i 8,000	p 1,700	w 2,400
c 3,000	j 400	q 500	x 400
d 4,400	k 800	r 6,200	y 2,000
e 12,000	l 4,000	s 8,000	z 200
f 2,500	m 3,000	t 2,000
g 1,700	n 8,000	u 3,400

Typhoon. The evil genius of Egyptian mythology; also a furious whirling wind in the Chinese seas. [Typhoon or typhon, the whirling wind, is really the Chinese tai-fun, hot wind.]

Beneath the radiant line that girts the globe,
The circling Ty'phon, whirled from point to point,
Exhausting all the rage of all the sky,
And dire Eeneph'ia reigns.

Thomson, "Summer."

Tyr. Son of Odin, and younger brother of Thor. The wolf Fenrir bit off his hand.—Scandinavian mythology.

Tyrant did not originally mean a despot, but an absolute prince, and especially one who made himself absolute in a free state. Napoleon III. would have been so called by the ancient Greeks. Many of the Greek tyrants were pattern rulers, as Pisis'tratos and Pericles, of Athens; Periander, of Corinth; Dionysios the Younger, Gelon, and his brother Hi'ero, of Syracuse; Polyc'ratēs, of Samos; Phi'dion, of Argos; &c. &c.

Tyrant of the Chersonese. Milti'adēs was so called, and yet was he, as Byron says, "Freedom's best and bravest friend." (See THIRTY TYRANTS.)

A tyrant's vein. A ranting, bullying manner. In the old moralities the tyrants were made to rant, and the loudness of their rant was proportionate to the villany of their dispositions. Hence to out-Herod Herod is to rant more loudly than Herod; to o'erdo Termagant is to rant more loudly than Termagant. (See PILATE.)

Tyre, in Dryden's satire of "Absalom and Achitophel," means Holland; Egypt means France.

I mourn, my countrymen, your lost estate....
Now all your liberties a spoil are made,
Egypt and Tyros intercept your trade.

Tyrtæus. The Spanish Tyrtæus. Manuel José Quintana, whose odes stimulated the Spaniards to vindicate their liberty at the outbreak of the War of Independence. (1772-1857.)

U

Ubaldo (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). One of the squadron of adventurers that joined the Crusaders. He was "mature in age," had visited many regions, "from polar cold to Libya's burning soil," and was the bosom friend of Guelpho. He and Charles the Dane go to bring Rinaldo back from the enchanted isle.

Ube'da. Orbaneia, painter of Ubeda, sometimes painted a cock so preposterously designed that he was obliged to write under it, "This is a cock."—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. i. 3.

Uberto (in "Orlando Furioso"). Count d'Este et de Commacchio.

Ugly means hag-like. Mr. Dyer derives it from ouph-lic, like an ouph or goblin. The Welsh hagr, ugly, would rather point to hag-lic, like a hag; but we need only go to the Old English verb ugge, to feel an abhorrence of, to stand in fear of.

For the paynes are so felle and harde....
That ilk man may ugge bothe yhowing and awide.
Hampole, MS. Bowes, p. 189.

Uglyography. A word coined by Southey, and applied to Churchyard's "reformed" spelling of English. Alexander Gil made an attempt in the same direction in his "Logonomia Anglica" (1619). Dr. Franklin, in 1768, proposed a phonetic alphabet; but that of Ellis and Pitman, completed in 1847, is probably the best.

Ugolin'no, count of Pisa, deserted his party the Ghibellines, and with the hope of usurping supreme power in Pisa formed an alliance with Giovanni Visconti, the head of the Guelphic party, who promised to supply him secretly with soldiers from Sardinia. The plot was found out, and both were banished. Giovanni died, but the latter joined the Forentines, and forced the Pisans to restore his territories. In 1284 Genoa made war against Pisa, and count Ugolin'no treacherously deserted the Pisans, causing their total overthrow. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, and in 1288 he was cast with his two sons and two grandsons into the tower of Gualandi, where they were all starved to death. Dante, in his "Inferno," has given the sad tale an undying interest.

N.B. Count Ugolino was one of the noble family of Gheradesca, and should be styled Ugolino Count of Gheradesca.

Uka'se (2 syl.). A Russian term for an edict either proceeding from the senate or direct from the emperor. (Russian, ukasat, to speak.)

Ul-Erin. "The Guide of Ireland." A star supposed to be the guardian of that island.—Ossian, "Temora," iv.

Ula'nia, queen of Perdu'ta or Islanda, sent a golden shield to Charlemagne, which he was to give to his bravest paladin. Whoever could win the shield from this paladin was to claim the hand of Ulania in marriage.—"Orlando Furioso," bk. xv.

Ule'ma. In Turkey, either a member of the college or the college itself. The Ulema consists of the imaums, muftis, and cadis (ministers of religion, doctors of law, and administrators of justice).

Ulien's Son. Rodomont.—"Orlando Furioso."

Uller. The god of archery and the chase. No one could outstrip him in his snow-shoes.—Scandinavian mythology.

Ullin. Fingal's aged bard.—Ossian.
Lord Ullin's Daughter. A ballad by Campbell. She eloped with the chief of Ulva's Isle, and being pursued, induced a boatman to row them over Lochgyle during a storm, and the boat was overwhelmed just as Lord Ullin and his retinue reached the lake. In an agony of distress, he now promised to forgive the fugitives, but it was too late: "the waters well rolled o'er his child, and he was left lamenting."

Ul'ric. Son of count Siegendorf. He rescued Strafenheim from the Oder, but being informed by his father that the man he had saved is the great enemy of their house, he murders him.—Byron, "Werner."

St. Ulric. Much honoured by fishermen. He died 973 on ashes strewed in the form of a cross upon the floor.

Ulri'ca. The sibyl in Sir Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe."

Ulster. The Red Hand of Ulster. In an ancient expedition to Ireland the leader thereof declared that he who first touched the shore should possess the territory on which he lighted. O'Neil, from whom descended the princes of Ulster, seeing another boat likely to land before him, cut off his hand and threw it ashore. The "red hand" was assigned by James as a badge of the baronets, whose duty it was to colonise the province.

Ulster Badge. A sinister hand, erect, open, and couped at the wrist (gules), sometimes born in a canton, and sometimes on the escutcheon. (See above.)

Ulster King of Arms. Chief heraldic officer of Ireland. Created by Edward VI. in 1552.

Ultima Thule. (See THULE.)

Ultima'tum (Latin). A final proposal, which, if not accepted, will be followed by hostile proceedings.

Ul'timum Valë (Latin). A finishing stroke, a final coup.

Atropos cutting off the thread of his life, gave an ultim'um valë to my good fortune.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," iii. 4.

Ul'timus Romano'rum. So Horace Walpole has been sometimes called. (1717-1797.) (See LAST of the ROMANS.)

Ultramontane Party. The ultra-Popish party in the Church of Rome. Ultramontane opinions or tendencies are those which favour the high "Catholic" party. Ultramontane ("beyond the Alps") means Italy or the Papal States. The term was first used by the French, to distinguish those who look upon the pope as the fountain of all power in the church, in contradistinction to the Gallican school, which maintains the right of self-government by national churches.

Ulys'ses (3 syl.). King of Ith'aca, a small rocky island of Greece. He is represented in Homer's "Iliad" as full of artifices, and, according to Virgil, hit upon the device of the wooden horse, by which Troy was ultimately taken. (The word means The Angry or Wrathful.)

After the fall of Troy, Ulysses was driven about by tempests for ten years before he reached home, and his adventures form the subject of Homer's other epic, called the "Odyssey."

Ulysses. When Palamédes summoned Ulysses to the Trojan war, he found him in a field ploughing with a team of strange animals, and sowing salt instead of barley. This he did to seemle insanity, that he might be excused from the expedition. The incident is employed to show what meagre shifts are sometimes resorted to, to shuffle out of plain duties.

Ulysses' Bow. Only Ulysses could draw his own bow, and he could shoot an arrow through twelve rings. By this sign Penel'opë recognised her husband after an absence of twenty years.

The Ulysses. Albert III., margrave of Brandenburg. He was also called "The Achilles" (q.v.). (1414-1455.)

The Ulysses of the Highlands. Sir Evan Cameron, lord of Lochiel, surnamed "The Black." (Died 1719.) His son Donald was called "The Gentle Lochiel."

Uma, consort of Siva, famous for her defeat of the army of Chanda and Munda, two demons. She is represented as holding the head of Chanda in one of her four hands, and trampling on Munda. The heads of the army, strung into a necklace, adorn her body, and a girdle of the same surrounds her waist.

Umbra. The paint so called was first made in Umbria, Italy.

Umbra. Obsequious Umbra, in Garth's "Dispensary," is Dr. Gould.

Umbrage. To take umbrage. To take offence. Umbrage means shade (Latin, umbra), a gloomy view. A bright view of any matter is a cheerful or hopeful one; a gloomy or shady view is the contrary.

Umbrella. The first person who used an umbrella in the streets of London was Jonas Hanway, founder of the Magdalene Hospital.

Umbriel. A gnome or spirit of earth, who goes to the house of Spleen and is supplied by that goddess with a bag-full of "sighs, sobs, passions, and cross words;" and a vial-full of "soft sorrows, melting grief, and flowing tears." When the baron cuts off Belinda's lock of hair, Umbriel breaks the vial over her, and Belinda instantly begins to weep and sigh. — Pope, "Rape of the Lock," iv.

Una (Truth, so called because truth is one). She starts with St. George on his adventure, and being driven by a storm into "Wandering Wood," retires for the night to Hypocrisy's cell. St. George quits the cell, leaving Una behind. In her search for him she is caressed by a lion, who afterwards attends her. She next sleeps in the hut of Superstition, and next morning meets Hypocrisy dressed as St. George. As they journey together Sansloy meets them, exposes Hypocrisy, kills the lion, and carries off Una on his steed to a wild forest. Una fills the air with her shrieks, and is rescued by the fauns and satyrs, who attempt to worship her, but being restrained pay adoration to her ass. She is delivered from the satyrs and fauns by Sir Satyrane, and is told by Archimago that St. George is dead but subsequently hears that he is the captive of Orgoglio. She goes to king Arthur for aid, and the king both slays Orgoglio and rescues the knight. Una now takes St. George to the house of Holiness, where he is carefully nursed, and then leads him to Eden, where their union is consummated. — Spenser, "Faery Queen," bk. i. (See LION.)

Una Serranilla (a little mountain song), by Mendo'za, marquis of Santilana, godfather of Diego Hurtado de Mendoza. This song, of European celebrity, was composed on a little girl found by the marquis tending her father's flocks on the hills, and is called

"The Charming Milk-maiden of Sweet Fin'oj'sa."

Un'anell'ed (3 syl.). Without extreme unction. (Saxon cell means "oil," and an-cell to "anoint with oil.")

Uncas, the son of Chingachcook; called in French Le Cerf Agile (Deer-foot); introduced into three of Fenimore Cooper's novels, viz. — "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Path-finder," and "The Pioneer."

Un'cial Letters. Letters an inch in size. From the fifth to the ninth century. (Latin, uncia, an inch.)

Uncle. Gone to my uncle's. Uncle's is a pun on the Latin word uncus, a hook. Pawnbrokers employed a hook to lift articles pawned before spouts were adopted. "Gone to the uncus" is exactly tantamount to the more modern phrase, "Up the spout." The pronoun was inserted to carry out the pun. The French phrase, A ma tante does not mean "To my aunt's," but to "the scoundrel's," the word tante in French argot being the most reproachful word they can use speaking of a man.

Gone to my uncle's, in French C'est chez ma tante. At the pawnbroker's. In French the concierge de prison is called uncle because the prisoners are "kept there in pawn" by Government. In the seventeenth century a usurer was called my uncle in the Walloon provinces, because of his near connection with spendthrifts, called in Latin nepotēs, nephews.

In public'num seu fenerator'em vulgo a Belgis vocat'um mon uncle, seu avunculum. (See p. 11, "Epigramme," imprimé à Tournay, chez Adrien Quinqué.)

Uncle Toby. (See TOBY.)

Uncle Tom. A negro slave, noted for his fidelity, piety, and the faithful discharge of all his duties. Being sold he has to submit to the most revolting cruelties. — Mrs. Beecher Stowe, "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Uncumber (St.), formerly called St. Wylgeforte. "Women changed her name" (says Sir Thomas More) "because they reken that for a pecke of oty's she will not faile to uncumber them of their husbandys." The tradition says that the saint was very beautiful, but wishing to lead a single life, prayed that she might have a beard, after which she was no more cumbered with lovers. "For a peck of oats," says Sir Thomas More, "she would provide a horse for an evil house-bonde to ride to the Devill upon."

If a wife were weary of a husband, she offered oats at Poul'es....to St. Uncumber.—Michael Woode (1554).

Under the Rose (Sub ro'sa). Secretly, confidentially. Amongst the ancients the rose was an emblem of silence, and it was customary to suspend a rose from the ceiling of a banquet-room, to intimate to the guests that nothing said in that room was to be uttered abroad. (See article ROSE.)

Under-current metaphorically means something at work which has an opposite tendency to what is visible or apparent. Thus in the Puritan supremacy there was a strong under-current of loyalty to the banished prince. Both in air and water there are frequently two currents, the upper one running in one direction, and the under one in another.

Under Weigh. The undertaking is already begun. A ship is said to be under weigh when it has drawn its anchors from their moorings, and started on its voyage. Probably this should be under "way"—i.e., on the way, in the act of moving. We say the matter is under consideration, the bill is under discussion.

Underwriter. An underwriter at Lloyd's. One who insures a ship or its merchandise to a stated amount; so called because he writes his name under the policy.

Undine' (2 syl.). The water-nymph, who was created without a soul like all others of her species. By marrying a mortal she obtained a soul, and with it all the pains and penalties of the human race.—La Motte Fouqué, "Undine" (a romance).

Undines (2 syl.), according to middle-age belief, are the elemental spirits of water (Latin, unda, water). See SYLPHS.

Ungrateful. The Ungrateful Guest. A Macedonian soldier, being wrecked, was hospitably entertained in the house of a villager. When he appeared before Philip, the king asked him what service he could render him, and the soldier demanded the house of his entertainer; but the circumstance being known, Philip ordered him to be branded on the forehead with these words: "The Ungrateful Guest."

Unguem. Ad unguem. To the minutest point. To finish a statue ad unguem is to finish it so smoothly and perfectly that when the nail is run over the surface it can detect no imperfection.

Unhinged. I am quite unhinged. My nerves are shaken, my equilibrium of mind is disturbed; I am like a door which has lost one of its hinges.

Unhouselled (3 syl.). Without having had the Eucharist in the hour of death. To housel is to administer the "sacrament" to the sick in danger of death. Housel is the Saxon husel (the Eucharist). Lye derives it from the Gothic hunsu (a victim).

Unicorn. According to the legends of the middle ages, the unicorn could be caught only by placing a virgin in his haunts; upon seeing the virgin, the creature would lose its fierceness and lie quiet at her feet. This is said to be an allegory of Jesus Christ, who willingly became man and entered the Virgin's womb, when he was taken by the hunters of blood. The one horn symbolises the great gospel doctrine that Christ is one with God.—Guillaume Clerc de Normandie Trouvère.

* * The unicorn has the legs of a buck, the tail of a lion, the head and body of a horse, and a single horn in the middle of its forehead. The horn is white at the base, black in the middle, and red at the tip. The body of the unicorn is white, the head red, and eyes blue. The oldest author that describes it is Ctesias (B.C. 400); Aristotle calls it the Wild Ass; Pliny, the Indian Ass; Lobo also describes it in his "History of Abyssinia."

Unicorn. James I. substituted a unicorn, one of the supporters of the royal arms of Scotland, for the red dragon of Wales, introduced by Henry VII. Aristotle refers to the arms of Scotland thus:

Yon lion placed two unicorns between,
That rampant with a silver sword is seen,
Is for the king of Scotland's banner known.
Hoole, iii.

Unicorn. According to a belief once popular, the unicorn by dipping its horn into a liquid could detect whether or not it contained poison. In the designs for gold and silver plate made for the emperor Rudolph II., by Ottavio Strada, is a cup on which a unicorn stands as if to essay the liquid.

Driving unicorn. Two wheelers and one leader. The leader is the one horn. (Latin, unum cornu, one horn.)

Unigen'itus (Latin, The Only-Begotten). A papal bull, so called from its opening sentence, Unigen'itus Dei Filius. It was issued in condemnation of Quesnel's Réflexions Morales, which favoured Jansenism; the bull was issued in 1713 by Clement XI., and was a damnatio in globo—i.e., a condemnation of the whole book without exception. Cardinal de Noailles, archbishop of Paris, took the side of Quesnel, and those who supported the archbishop against the pope were termed "Appelants." In 1730 the bull was condemned by the civil authorities of Paris, and the controversy died out.

Union Jack. The national banner of Great Britain and Ireland. It consists of three united crosses—that of St. George for England, the saltire of St. Andrew for Scotland, and the cross of St. Patrick for Ireland.

In the Union Jack the white edging of St. George's cross shows the white field. In the saltire the cross is reversed on each side, showing that the other half of the cross is covered over. The broad white band is the St. Andrew's cross; the narrow white edge is the white field of St. Patrick's cross.

In regard to the word "Jack," some say it is Jacque (James), the name of the king who united the flags, but this is not correct. When James I. came to the throne the flag was the cross of St. George, with the surcoat or jack usually emblazoned with the red cross of St. George. James added the saltire of St. Andrew, but that of St. Patrick was not added till 1801. (Jacque, our "jacket.")

Unita'rians, in England, ascribe their foundation to John Biddle. (1615-1662.) Milton, Locke, Newton, Lardner, and many other men of historic note were Unitarians.

United States. The thirty-six states of North America composing the Federal Republic. Each state is represented in the Federal Congress by two senators, and a number of representatives proportionate to the number of inhabitants. The nickname of a United Statesman is "A Brother Jonathan," and of the people in the aggregate "Brother Jonathan" (q.v.).

Unities. (See ARISTOTELIAN.)

Universal Doctor. Alain de Lille. (1114-1203.)

Universe (3 syl.). According to the Peripatetics, the universe consists of eleven spheres enclosed within each other like Chinese balls. The eleventh sphere was called the empyre'an or heaven of the blessed. (See HEAVEN.)

Univer'sity. First applied to collegiate societies of learning in the twelfth century, because the universitas literarum (entire range of literature) was taught in them—i.e., arts, theology, law, and physic, still called the "learned" sciences. Greek, Latin, grammar, rhetoric, and poetry are called humanity studies, or humaniorēs literæ, meaning "lay" studies in contradistinction to divinity, which is the study of divine things. (See CAD.)

Unknown. The Great Unknown. Sir Walter Scott; so called because the Waverley Novels were published anonymously. It was James Ballantyne who first applied the term to the unknown novelist.

Unlicked or Unlicked Cub. A loutish, unmannerly youth. According to tradition, the bear cub is misshapen and imperfect till its dam has licked it into normal form.

Unready (The). Ethelred II. of England. (*, 978-1016.)

Unrighteous (Adok'imos). St. Christopher's name before baptism. It was changed to Christ-bearer because he carried over a stream a little child, who (according to tradition) proved to be Jesus Christ.

Unwashed (2 syl.). It was Burke who first called the mob "the great unwashed," but the term "unwashed" had been applied to them before, for Gay uses it.

The king of late drew forth his sword
(I thank God 'twas not in wrath),
And made, of many a squire and lord,
An unwashed knight of Bath.

A ballad on Quadrille.

U'pas Tree or Poison-tree of Macassar. Applied to anything baneful or of evil influence. The tradition is that a putrid stream rises from the tree which grows in the island of Java, and that whatever the vapour touches dies. This fable is chiefly due to Foersch, a Dutch physician, who published his narrative in 1783. "Not a tree," he says, "nor blade of grass is to be found in the valley or surrounding mountains. Not a beast or bird, reptile or living thing, lives in the vicinity." He adds that on "one occasion 1,600 refugees encamped within fourteen miles of it, and all but 300 died within two months." This fable Darwin has perpetuated in his "Loves of the Plants." Bennett has shown that the Dutchman's account is a mere traveller's tale, for the tree while growing is quite innocuous, though the juice may be used for poison; the whole neighbourhood is most richly covered with vegetation; man may fearlessly walk under the tree, and birds roost on its branches. A upas tree grows in Kew Gardens, and flourishes amidst other hot-house plants.

On the blasted heath
Fell Upas sit-, the hydra-tree of death.
Darwin, "Loves of the Plants," iii. 233.

Upper Crust. The lions or crack men of the day. The phrase was first used in "Sam Slick."

I want you to see Peel, Stanley, Graham, Shiel, Russell, Macanuy, old Joe, and so on. They are all upper crust here.

Upper Storey. The head. "Ill-furnished in the upper storey;" a head without brains.

Upper Ten Thousand. The aristocracy. The term was first used by N. P. Willis, in speaking of the fashionables of New York, who at that time were not more than ten thousand in number.

Uproar is not compounded of up and roar, but is the German auf-ruhr (want of repose, absence of quiet).

Upsees. (See HALF-SEAS OVER.)

Yet whoop, Barnaby! off with thy liquor,
Drink upsees out, and a fig for the vicar.
Sir Walter Scott, "Lady of the Lake," vi. 5.

Upset Price. The price at which goods sold by auction are first offered for competition. If no advance is made they fall to the person who made the upset price. Our "reserved bid" is virtually the same thing.

Ura'nia. Daughter of the king of Sicily, who fell in love with Sir Guy, eldest son of St. George, the patron saint of England. After his marriage, Sir Guy was made king of Sicily.—"The Seven Champions of Christendom," iii. 2.

Urania. The muse of astronomy. The word means "Heavenly Muse."—Classic mythology.

Urbi et Orbi (To Rome and the rest of the world). A form used in the publication of papal bulls.

Urchin is a little orc (Orc-kin; Dutch, urk, urken). The orc is a sea monster that devours men and women; the orc-kin, or little ork, is the hedgehog, supposed to be a sprite or mischievous little imp.

Urda (the Past). Guardian of a well called the Norna, where the gods sit in judgment.—Scandinavian mythology.

Urda, Verdandi, and Skulla (Past, Present, and Future). Three maidens who dwell in a beautiful hall below the ash-tree Yggdrasil. Their employment is to grave on a shield the destiny of man.—Scandinavian mythology.

Urdan Fount. The fount of light and heat.—Scandinavian mythology.

Urgan. A mortal born and christened, but stolen by the king of the fairies and brought up in elf-land. He was sent to lord Richard, the husband of Alice Brand, to lay on him the "curse of the sleepless eye" for killing his wife's brother Ethert. When lord Richard saw the hideous dwarf he crossed himself, but the elf said, "I fear not sign made with a bloody hand." Then forward stepped Alice and made the sign, and the dwarf said if any woman would sign his brow thrice with a cross he should recover his mortal form. Alice signed him thrice, and the elf became "the fairest knight in all Scotland, in whom she recognised her brother Ethert."—Sir Walter Scott, "Alice Brand" ("Lady of the Lake," iv. 12).

Urganda la Desconeci'da. An enchantress or sort of Mede'a in the romances belonging to the Amadis and Palmerin series, in the Spanish school of romance.

Urgel. One of Charlemagne's paladins, famous for his "giant-strength."

Uriel. "Regent of the Sun," and "sharpest-sighted spirit of all in heaven."—Milton, "Paradise Lost," iii. 630.

Longfellow, in "The Golden Legend," makes Raphael the angel of the Sun, and Uriel the minister of Mars. (See RAPHAEL.)

I am the minister of Mars,
The strongest star among the stars.
My songs of power prelude
The march and battle of man's life,
And for the suffering and the strife
I give him fortitude.

"The Miracle Play," iii.

Urim, in Garth's "Dispensary," is Dr. Atterbury.

Urim was civil and not void of sense,
Had humour and courteous confidence....
Constant at leasts, and each decorum knew,
And soon as the dessert appeared, withdrew.
(Canto I)

Urim and Thummim consisted of three stones, which were deposited in the double lining of the high priest's breastplate. One stone represented Yes, one No, and one No answer is to be given. When any question was brought to the high priest to be decided by "Urim," the priest put his hand into the "pouch" and drew out one of the stones, and according to the stone drawn out the question was decided (Lev. viii. 8; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6).

Urisk. A rough hairy spirit in the mythology of the Cymri.

Ursa Major. Calisto, daughter of Lycaon, was violated by Jupiter, and Juno changed her into a bear. Jupiter placed her among the stars that she might be more under his protection. Homer calls it Arktos the bear, and Hamaea the waggon. The Romans called it Ursa the bear, and Septentrionēs the seven ploughing oxen; whence "Septentrionālis" came to signify the north. The common names in Europe for the seven bright stars are "the plough," "the waggon," "Charles's wain," "the Great Bear," &c.

Bowell's father used to call Dr. Johnson Ursa Major. (See BEAR.)

Ursa Minor. Also called Cynosura, or "Dog's tail," from its circular sweep.

The pole star is α in the tail. (See CYNOSURE.)

Ursula (Dame) or Ursley Suddlechop. Wife of Benjamin Suddlechop the barber, modelled from Mrs. Turner, who came to condign punishment for her share in the poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury.

She had acquain'tances... among the quality, and maintained her intercourse with this superior rank of customers partly by driving a trade in perfumes, essences, comedas, head-gears from France, not to mention drugs of various descriptions, chiefly for the use of the ladies, and partly by other services more or less connected with the esoteric branches of her profession.—Sir Walter Scott, "Fortunes of Nigel."

St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgin martyrs. Ursula was a British princess, and, as the legend says, was going to France with her virgin train, but was driven by adverse winds to Cologne, where she and her 11,000 companions were martyred by the Huns. This extravagant legend is said to have originated in the discovery of an inscription to Ursula et Undecimilla Virginēs, "the Virgins Ursula and Undecimilla;" but by translating the latter name, the inscription reads "Ursula and her 11,000 virgins." Visitors to Cologne are shown piles of skulls and human bones heaped in the wall, faced with glass, which the verger asserts are the relics of the 11,000 martyred virgins. (See VIRGINS.)

Ushas. The goddess Dawn, similar to the Greek "Eos" and Roman "Aurora" Vedas. (Sanskrit, ush, to shine.)

Usher means a porter (Old French, huisher, a door; whence huissier, an usher; Latin, ostarius). One who stands at the door to usher visitors into the presence.

Usquebaugh (3 syl.). Whiskey (Irish, uisge-beatha, water of life). Similar to the Latin aqua vite, and the French eau de vie.

U'sury. Cowell derives this word from the Latin usu-aris (for the use of money).

Ut. Saxon out, as Utoxeter, in Staffordshire; Utrecht, in Holland; "outer camp-town;" the "out passage," so called by Clotaire because it was the grand passage over or out of the Rhine, before that river changed its bed. Utmost is out or outer-most. (See UTGARD.)

Strain at [ut, "out"] a goat, and swallow a camel. —Matt. xxiii. 24.

Ut Queat Laxis, &c. This hymn was composed in 770. Dr Busby, in his "Musical Dictionary," says it is ascribed to John the Baptist, but has omitted to inform us by whom. (See DO.)

U'ta. Queen of Burgundy, mother of Kriemhild and Gunther. — "The Nibelungen-Lied."

U'ter. Pendragon (chief) of the Britons; by an adulterous amour with Igerna (wife of Gerlois, duke of Cornwall) he became the father of Arthur, who succeeded him as king of the Silurés.

U'terine (3 syl.). A uterine brother or sister. One born of the same mother but not of the same father (Latin, uterus, the womb).

Utgard (old Norse, outer ward). The circle of rocks that hemmed in the ocean which was supposed to encompass the world. The giants dwelt among the rocks. — Scandinavian mythology.

Utgard-Lok. The demon of the infernal regions. — Scandinavian mythology.

U'ti Posside'tis (Latin, as you at present possess them). The belligerents are to retain possession of all the places taken by them before the treaty commenced.

U'ticen'sis. Cato the younger was so called from U'tica, the place of his death.

Utilita'rians. A word first used by John Stuart Mill; but Jeremy Bentham employed the word "Utility" to signify the doctrine which makes "the happiness of man" the one and only measure of right and wrong.

Oh happiness, our being's end and aim
For which we bear to live, or dare to die.
Pope, Epistle IV.

Uto'pia properly means nowhere (Greek, ou topos). It is the imaginary island of Sir Thomas More, where everything is perfect—the laws, the morals, the politics, &c. In this romance the evils of existing laws, &c., are shown by contrast. (1516.)

Uto'pia, the kingdom of Grangousier. When Pantagruel sailed thither from France and had got into the main ocean, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope and made for the shores of Melinda. "Parting from Me'damoth he sailed with a northerly wind, passed Me'dam, Ge-lasem, and the Fairy Isles; and keeping Uti to the left and Uden to the right, ran into the port of Utopia, distant about three and a half leagues from the city of the Amaurots." (Medamoth, from no place; Me'dam, nowhere; Gelasem, hidden land; Uti, nothing at all; Uden, nothing; Utopia, no place, distant three and a half leagues from Amauros, the vanishing point, — all Greek.) (See QUEEBUS.)

Uto'pian. An impracticable scheme for the improvement of society. Any scheme of profit or pleasure which is not practicable. (See UTOPIA.)

U'traquists (Both-kinders). The followers of Huss were so called, because they insisted that both the elements should be administered to all communicants in the eucharist. (Latin, utraque specie, in both kinds.)

Uz'ziel. The angel next in command to Gabriel. The word means "Strength of God." Uzziel is commanded by Gabriel to "coast the south with strictest watch."—Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv.

V

V represents a hook, and is called in Hebrew, vav (a hook).

V. D. M. on monuments is Vir Dei Minister, or Verbi Dei Minister.

V. D. M. I. Æ (Verbum Dei manet in æternum). The word of God endureth for ever. The inscription on the servants of the duke of Saxony and landgrave of Hesse, the Lutheran princes, at the diet of Spire in 1526.

V. V. V., the letters found on the coin of the 20th Roman legion, stand for "Valeria, Viccesima, Victrix."

Vacuum now means a space from which air has been expelled. Descartes says, "If a vacuum could be effected in a vessel, the sides would be pressed into contact." Galileo said, "Nature abhors a vacuum," to account for the rise of water in pumps. (See POINT.)

Vac'uum Boyleanum. Such a vacuum as can be produced by Boyle's improved air-pump, the nearest approach to a vacuum practicable with human instruments.

Va'dē Mecum (a go-with-me). A pocket-book, memorandum-book, pocket cyclopædia, lady's pocket companion, or anything else which contains many things of daily use in a small compass.

Vafri'no (in "Jerusalem Delivered"). Tancred's squire, practised in all disguises and learned in all Eastern languages. He was sent as a spy to the Egyptian camp.

Val Del Bove, in Sicily. An extinct crater of vast size, enclosed by precipices 3,000 feet in height, and filled with gigantic rocks standing out separately, and resembling beasts; hence its name. — Lady Herbert of Lea.

Valdar'no. The valley of the Arno, in Tuscany.

— the Tuscan artist [Galileo] views
At evening from the top of Fesolè,
Or in Valdarno?

Milton, "Paradise Lost," bk. i.

Vale. To vale the bonnet. To cap to a superior; hence to strike sail, to lower (French, avaler, to take off).

My wealthy Andrew docked in sand,
Vailing her high-top lower than her ribs.
Shakespeare, "Merchant of Venice," i. 1.

Vale of Tears. This world. (See BACA.)

Valens or Vala'nus. Mercury was the son of Valens and Phoronis. This Mercury is called Tropo'nus in the regions under the earth. — Cic., "De Nat. Deorum," iii. 22.

Ciclin'us [Mercury] riding in his chiroachæ
Fro Venus V'lanus might this palais see.
Chaucer, "Compl. of Mars and Venus."

Valentia. The southern part of Scotland is so called from the emperor Valens.

Valenti'na. Daughter of the comte de St. Bris, governor of the Louvre. She was betrothed to the comte de Nevers, but loved Raoul de Nangis, a Protestant, by whom she was loved in return. Marguérite sent her to the count to beg him to break off the promised union, because she loved another; but Raoul, who witnessed the interview without knowing its tenor, became jealous, and disdainfully rejected her hand when offered it by Marguérite. In consequence of this slight she was married to Nevers. In the Bartholomew slaughter, the comte de Nevers was killed, and Valentina confessed her love for Raoul. The lovers were united in marriage by Marcello, and were both shot by a party of musketeers under the command of St. Bris. — Meyerbeer, "Gli Ugonotti" (an opera).

Valentine. A corruption of galantin (a lover, a dangler), a gallant. St. Valentine was selected for the sweet-hearts' saint because of his name. Similar changes are seen in gallant and valiant (Latin, valens; vain, Welsh gran; vale, Welsh gwael; guard, ward, &c.).

Valentine. One of the Two Gentlemen of Vero'na; his serving-man is Speed. The other gentleman is Prothens, whose serving-man is Launce. — Shakespeare, "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Valentine, in Congreve's "Love for Love." Betterton's great character.

Valentine (The Brave). Brother of Orson and son of Bellisant, sister of king Pepin and wife of Alexander, emperor of Constantinople. The twin brothers were born in a wood, near Orleans, and while their mother went in search of Orson, who had been carried off by a bear, Pepin happened to see Valentine and took him under his charge. He married Clerimond, niece of the Green Knight. — "Valentine and Orson."

Valentin'ians. An ancient sect of Gnostics; so called from Valentinian, their leader.

Valer'ian or Valir'ian. Husband of St. Cecilia. Cecilia told him she was beloved by an angel who frequently visited her, and Valerian requested he might be allowed to see this constant visitant. Cecilia told him he should do so provided he went to pope Urban and got baptised. On returning home he saw the angel in his wife's chamber, who gave to Cecilia a crown of roses, and to himself a crown of lilies, both of which he brought from Paradise. The angel then asked Valerian what would please him best, and he answered that his brother might be brought "to saving faith" by God's grace. The angel approved of the petition, and said both should be holy martyrs. Valerian being brought before Alma'chius, the prefect, was commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, and refusing to do so was led forth to execution. — Chaucer, "Secounde Nonnes Tale."

Valer'ian is said to attract cats irresistibly.

Valhalla, in Scandinavian mythology, is the palace of immortality, inhabited by the souls of heroes slain in battle. The Times, speaking of Westminster Abbey, says "The abbey is our Valhalla."

We both must pass from earth away,
Valhalla's joys to see;
And if I wander there to-day,
To-morrow may fetch thee
"Frithiof-Saga," lay xi.

Valiant (The). Jean IV. of Brittany. (1389-1442.)

Valiant-for-Truth. A brave Christian who fought three enemies at once (Wildhead, Inconsiderate, and Pragmatic). His sword was "a right Jerusalem blade," so he prevailed, but was wounded in the encounter. When Mr. Greatheart came to the spot, Valiant joined Christiana's party to the Celestial City.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. ii.

Valis'e (2 syl.). A small leather portmanteau (French, valise).

Valkyriur or Valkyrs. The Fatal Sisters, servants of Odin. They were mounted on swift horses, and held drawn swords in their hands. In the mêlée of battle they selected those destined to death, and conducted them to Valhalla, where they waited upon them, and served them with mead and ale in cups of horn called skulls. Their names were Mista, San'grida, and Hilda. Valkyriur means "chooser of the slain." (See SKULL.)

Mista black, terrific maid,
Saugrida and Hilda see
Gray, "Fatal Sisters."

Valla (Laurentius). One of the first scholars of the Renaissance, noted for his Latin sermons, and his admirable Latin translations of Herodotus and Thucydides.

Nunc postquam manes defunctorum Valla petitiv,
Non audet Pluto verba Latina loqui.

Since Valla hath the manes come among,
Pluto has feared to speak his mother tongue.

Vallambro'sa. Milton says, "Thick as autumnal leaves that strow the brooks in Vallambrosa" ("Paradise Lost," i. 302), but the trees of Vallambrosa are not deciduous. They are pines, and therefore no thick autumnal leaves ever strow the brooks of that forest. (See VALLAMBROZA.)

Vallary Crown. A crown bestowed by the ancient Romans on the soldier who first surmounted the vallum of an enemy's camp.

Valley of Humiliation. The place where Christian encountered Apollyon, just before he came to the "Valley of the Shadow of Death."—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. i.

Valley of the Shadow of Death, through which Christian had to pass in order to get to the Celestial City. The prophet Jeremiah describes it as "a wilderness, a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought and of the shadow of death" (ii. 6); and the Psalmist says, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me" (xxiii. 4).

The light there is darkness, and the way full of traps and gins to catch the unwary.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress," pt. i.

Vallombro'za. A convent in the Apennines, celebrated by Ariosto in the "Orlando Furioso," canto xxii. (See VALLAMBROSA.)

Valun'der. The Vulcan of Scandinavian mythology.

Next in worth to the sword was an arm-ring, fir and wide famous.

Forged by the Vulcan of northern story—the halting Valunder.

"Frithiof-Saga" (Frithiof's Inheritance).

Vamp. To vamp up an old story. To vamp is to put new uppers to old boots. Vampes were short hose covering the feet and ankles. (Welsh, gream, anything that wholly or partially encloses.)

Vampire. An extortioner. According to Dom Calmet, the vampire is a dead man who returns in body and soul from the other world, and wanders about the earth doing mischief to the living. He sucks the blood of persons asleep, and these persons become vampires in turn. This superstition is prevalent in Hungary, &c. Similar to the Barkolacka of the Greek Christians, the Vukodlak of the Servians, the Murony of the Wallachians, the Priccolitsch of the Moldavians, the Werwolf or Loup-Garou of the French, and the Ghoul of the Persians and Arabs.

The vampire lies as a corpse during the day, but by night, especially at full moon, wanders about in the form of a dog, frog, toad, cat, flea, louse, bug, spider, &c., biting sleepers in the back or neck.

Van of an army is the French avant; but van, a winnowing machine, is the Latin vannus, our fan.

The Spirit of the Van. A sort of fairy which haunts the Van Pools in the mountains of Carmarthen on New Year's Eve. She is dressed in white, girded with a golden girdle; her golden hair is very long, and she sits in a golden boat, which she urges along with a golden oar. A young farmer fell in love with her and married her, but she told him if he struck her thrice she would quit him for ever. After a time they were invited to a christening, and in the midst of the ceremony she burst into tears. Her husband struck her, and asked why she made such a fool of herself. "I weep," she said, "to see the poor babe brought into a vale of misery and tears." They were next invited to the funeral of the same child, and she could not resist laughing. Her husband struck her again, and asked the same question. "I laugh," she said, "to think how joyous a thing it is that the child has left a world of sin for a world of joy and innocence." They were next invited to a wedding, where the bride was young and the man advanced in years. Again she wept, and said aloud, "It is the devil's compact. The bride has sold herself for gold." Her husband bade her hold her peace, struck her, and she vanished for ever from his sight.—Welsh mythology.

Vandal. One who destroys beautiful objects to make way for what he terms "improvements," or to indulge his own caprice. So called from the ancient Vandals, who ravaged and laid waste, regardless of any consideration but their own profit or caprice.

Vandal Society. (See BANDE NOIRE, BARBARI, &c.)

Vandal'ia. Andalusia.

Vandalism. The destruction or injury of what is beautiful or precious as a relief, as cutting down or injuring the trees or flowers of a public park, white-washing or painting marble pillars, pulling down or cutting initials on old edifices of historic interest, &c. (See VANDAL.)

Vandy'ck. The Vandyck of sculpture. Antoine Coysevox. (1640-1720.)

The English Vandyck. William Dobson, painter. (1610-1647.)

Vandy'ke (2 syl.). To scollop an edge after the fashion of the collars painted by Vandyck in the reign of Charles I. The scolloped edges are said to be vandyked.

Vanessa is Miss Esther Vanhomrigh, and Cade'nus is Dean Swift. While he was still married to Stella [Miss Esther Johnson, whose tutor he had been] Miss Vanhomrigh fell in love with him, and requested him to marry her, but the dean refused. The proposal became known to his wife (?) and both the Esthers died soon afterwards. Esther Johnson was called Stella by a pun upon the Greek aster, which resembles Esther in sound and means a "star." Miss Vanhomrigh was called Van-essa by compounding Van, the first syllable of her name, with Essa, the pet form of Esther. Cade'nus is simply deca'nus [dean] slightly transposed. The proposal of Miss Vanhomrigh gave rise to a poem of some 890 lines, called "Cade'nus and Vanessa," which is certainly witty, but is no less certainly vain and heartless (1713).

Cadenus many things had writ;
Vanessa much esteemed his wit.
Swift, "Cadenus and Vanessa."

Vanity Fair. A fair established by Beelzebub, Apollyon, and Legion, for the sale of all sorts of vanities. It was held in the town of Vanity, and lasted all the year round. Here were sold houses, lands, trades, places, honours, preferences, titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts. Here Christian and Faithful, being arrested, were beaten, and put into a cage. Next morning they were taken before Judge Hategood, when Faithful was condemned to suffer death at the stake.—Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, pt. i.

Va'noc. Son of Merlin, one of Arthur's Round-Table knights.

Young Vanoc of the beardless face
(Fame spoke the youth of Merlin's race),
O'erpowered at Gyneth's footstool, bled,
His heart's blood dyed her sandals red.
Sir Walter Scott, "Bride of Triermain," ii. 25.

Vari'na. Swift, in his early life, professed to have an attachment to Miss Jane Waryng, and Latinised her name into Varina. (See above, VANESSA.)

Varnish, from the French vernis; Italian, ver'nicè. Sir G. C. Lewis says the word is a corruption of Berenice, famous for her amber hair, which was dedicated in the temple of Arsinoë, and became a constellation.

Varro, called "The most learned of the Romans." (B.C. 116 B.C.)

Varun'a. The Hindu Neptune. He is represented as an old man riding on a sea-monster, with a club in one hand and a rope in the other. In the Vedic hymns he is the night-sky, and Mitra the day-sky. Varuna is said to set free the "waters of the clouds."

Vassal. A youth. In feudal times it meant a feudatory, or one who held lands under a "lord." In law it means a bondservant or political slave, as "England shall never be the vassal of a foreign prince." Christian says, in his "Notes on Blackstone," that the corruption of the meaning of vassal into slave "is an incontrovertible proof of the horror of feudalism in England." (Welsh, gwds, a boy or servant; gwadsu, to serve; like the French garçon, and Latin puer; Italian, vassallo, a servant.)

Vath'ek. The hero of Beckford's fairy romance. He is a baughty effeminate monarch, induced by a malignant genius to commit all sorts of crimes. He abjures his faith, and offers allegiance to Eblis, under the hope of obtaining the throne of the Pre-Adamite sultans.

Vat'ican. The palace of the pope; so called because it stands on the Vatican Hill. Strictly speaking the Vatican consists of the papal palace, the court and garden of Belvidere, the library, and the museum.

The sun of the Vatican sheds glory over the Catholic world.—The Times.

The thunders of the Vat'ican. The anathemas of the pope, which are issued from the Vatican.

The Council of the Vatican. The twenty-first General or Ecumenical Council. It commenced in 1869, Pius IX. being pope. (See COUNCILS.)

Vaude'ville (2 syl.). A corruption of Val de Vire, or in Old French Vau de Vire, the native valley of Oliver Basse-lin, a Norman poet, the founder of a certain class of convivial songs, which he called after the name of his own valley. These songs are the basis of modern vaudeville. The etymology from Vau de Ville, the "go" of the town or popular thing of the day, as Vau l'eau (the "go" or current of water), is of the same class as Goliath's shoes for goloshes, and brethren from tabernacle "because we breathe therein."

Father of the Vaudeville. Oliver Basse-lin, a Norman poet (fifteenth century).

Vau'girard. The deputies of Vau-girard. Only one individual. This applies to all the false companies in which the promoter represents the directors, chairman, committee, and entire staff. The expression is founded on an incident in the reign of Charles VIII. of France: The usher announced to the king "The deputies of Vau-girard." "How many are there?" asked the king. "Only one, an please your majesty," was the answer. (See TAILORS.)

Vaux'hall or Fauxhall (2 syl.). Called after Jane Vaux, who held the copyhold tenement in 1615, and was the widow of John Vaux, the vintner. Chambers says it was the manor of Fulke de Breauté, the mercenary follower of king John, and that the word should be Fulke's Hall. Pepys calls it Fox Hall, and says the entertainments there are "mighty divertising."—"Book of Days."

Thackeray, in "Vanity Fair," sketches the loose character of these "divertising" amusements.

Vav'asour. One who held his lands of the nobles, and not of the crown. Camden says the vavasour was next in rank to the baron. (Celtic, gwds, a page, attendant.)

Va'yu. The wind, in Vedic mythology. Su'rya (the sun) occupies the heavens, Agni (fire) occupies the infernal region, and Vayu (air) the space between earth and heaven. (Sanskrit, va, blow.)

Ve. Brother of Odin and Vili. He was one of the three deities who took part in the creation of the world.—Scandinavian mythology.

Veal (Mrs.). An imaginary person who (according to De Foe) appeared the day after her death to Mrs. Bargrave, of Canterbury, 8th September, 1705.

Veal, Calf. The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. (See BEEF, PORK.)

Myneer Calf becomes Monsieur de Veau in the like manner. He is Saxon when he requires tendance, but takes a Norman name when he becomes matter of enjoyment.—Sir Walter Scott, "Ivanhoe."

Ve'das or Ve'dams. The generic name of the four sacred books of the Hindus. It comprises (1) the Rig or Rish Veda; (2) Yajar or Yajush Veda; (3) the Sama or Saman Veda; and (4) the Atharva or Ezour Veda. (Sanskrit, vid, know; Chaldee, yed-a; Hebrew, el-o; Greek, eid-o; Latin, vid-eo; &c.

Vegetable Substances. The three fundamental laws are these:—

(1) If they contain more hydrogen (in proportion than water, they are acid.

(2) If less, they are resinous, oily, or spirituous.

(3) If an equal quantity, they are saccharine, mucilaginous, or analogous to woody fibre or starch.

These laws were discovered by O. Thénard and Gay-Lussac, French chemists.

Vehm'gerichte or Holy Vehme Tribunal. A secret tribunal of Westphalia, said to have been founded by Charlemagne. (See FEHM-GERICHT.)

Veil. At one time men wore veils, as St. Ambrose testifies. He speaks of the "silken garments and the veils interwoven with gold, with which the body of rich men is encompassed." (St. Ambrose lived 340-397.)

Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. The first poetical tale in Thomas Moore's "Lalla Rookh."

The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan was Hakim ben Allah, surnamed the Veiled (Mokanna), founder of an Arabic sect in the eighth century. Having lost an eye, and being otherwise disfigured in battle, he wore a veil to conceal his face, but his followers said it was done to screen his dazzling brightness. He assumed to be a god, and maintained that he had been Adam, Noah, and other representative men. When encompassed by sultan Mahadi, he first poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself into a burning acid, which wholly destroyed his body.

Veillantif. Roland's horse. In Italian romance Roland is Orlando, and the horse Vegliantino.

Roland is mounted on Veillantif, the only horse in the world worthy of such a rider.—"Crockett's," iii.

Velvet (The Rev. Morphine). A popular preacher of the "Lamb" genus, who feeds his audience with milk well sugared. He assures them that there is a way to heaven in silver slippers, and with Great-Heart for a guide Christiana and her family need entertain no anxiety about the road to the Celestial City.—Samuel Warren, "Ten Thousand a Year."

Vendémiaire (4 syl.), in the French Republican calendar, was from September 23 to October 21. The word means "Wine-month."

Vendetta. The blood-feud, or duty of the nearest kin of a murdered man to kill the murderer. It prevails in Corsica, and exists in Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria. It is preserved among the Druses, Circassians, Arabs, &c.

Venerable. Archdeacons have the title of Venerable, as "The Venerable Archdeacon Waghorn."

The Venerable. Bede, the ecclesiastical historian. (672-735.)

The Venerable Doctor. William de Champeaux, founder of realism (twelfth century).

Peter, abbot of Clugny. (1093-1156.)

Vengeur (Le). The name of a ship. The tale is this: June 1, 1794, lord Howe encountered the French fleet off Ushant. Six ships were taken by the English admiral, and the victory was decisive; but Le Vengeur, although reduced to a mere hulk, refused to surrender, and discharging a last broadside, sank in the waves, while the crew shouted, "Vive la République!" The Convention ordered a medal to be struck with this legend—Le Triomphe du Vengeur. It is almost a pity that this thoroughly French romance should lack one important item—a grain of truth. The day of this victory is often called "The Glorious First of June."

We'll show the haughty British race
The Frenchman can such honour boast,—
That when one Vengeur we have lost,
Another hastes to take her place.

Translated by J. Oxenford.

Veni Creator Spiritus. A hymn of the Roman Breviary used on the Feast of Pentecost. It has been ascribed to Charlemagne, but more thinks that pope Gregory I. was the author.

Veni Sancte Spiritus. A Latin hymn in rhyme, ascribed to Robert king of France.

Veni, Vidi, Vici. It was thus that Julius Caesar announced to his friend Amintius his victory at Zela, in Asia Minor, over Pharnaces son of Mithridates, who had rendered aid to Pompey. This boast may be paraphrased thus: "On my return from the Alexandrine wars, I just stopped aside to punish Pharnaces for joining Pompey; but it was no great matter, for no sooner did I arrive at Zela and survey the foe, than he fell before me."—Plutarch.

Ve'nial Sin. One that may be pardoned; slight, excusable. In the Roman Catholic church sins are of two sorts, mortal and venial; in the Protestant church all sins are pardonable. (Latin, venia, pardon.)

Venice of the West. Glasgow.

Another element in the blazon of the "Venice of the West" is a fish laid across the stem of the tree, "in base," as the heralds say.—J. H. Burton.

Venice Glass. The drinking glasses of the middle ages, made at Venice, were said to possess the peculiar property of breaking into shivers if poison were put into them.

Doge, "It is said that our Venetian crystal has Such pure antipathy to poison, as
To burst, if aught of venom touches it.
Byron, "The Two Foscari," v. 1.

Venice Glass, from its excellency, became a synonym for perfection.

Ven'ison. Anything taken in hunting or by the chase. Hence Jacob bids Esau to go and get venison such as he loved (Gen. xxvii. 3), meaning the wild kid. The word is simply the Latin venatio (hunting), but is now restricted to the flesh of deer.

Ven'om. The venom is in the tail. The real difficulty is the conclusion. The allusion is to the scorpion, which is said to carry its venom in its tail.

The French say "It is always most difficult to flay the tail" (C'est le plus difficile que d'écorcher la queue).

Venomous Preacher (The). Robert Traill. (1642-1716.)

Ventriloquism, "speaking from the belly." From the erroneous notion that the voice of the ventriloquist proceeded from his stomach. Alexandre the Frenchman, and Love, our own countryman, were very celebrated for this art.

Venus. Love; the goddess of love; courtship. (See APHRODITE, CHASCA, &c.)

Venus smiles not in a house of tears.
Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," iv. 1.

Venus. The most celebrated statues of this goddess are the Venus de Medici, the Aphrodite of Praxiteles, the Venus of Milo, the Venus Victorious of Cano'va, and the Venus of Gibson.

Cra'nian Venus of the "Lusiad" is the impersonation of heavenly love. She pleads to Destiny for the Lusians, and appears to them in the form of "the silver star of love." Plato says she was the daughter of Heaven (Uranos), and Xenophon adds that "she presided over the love of wisdom and virtue, the pleasures of the soul." Nigidius says that this "heavenly Venus" was not born from the sea-foam, but from an egg which two fishes conveyed to the sea-shore. This egg was hatched by two pigeons whiter than snow, and gave birth to the Assyrian Venus, who instructed mankind in religion, virtue, and equity. (See APHRODITE, ATHOR.)

Venus in astrology "signifieth the white men or browne . . . joyfull, laughter, liberall; pleasers, dauncers, entertayners of women, players, perfumers, musitions, messengers of love."

Venus loveth ryot and dispense.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 6, 931.

My Venus turns out a whelp (Latin). All my swans are changed to geese; my cake is dough. In dice the best cast (three sixes) was called "Venus," and the worst (three aces) was called "Canis." My win-all turns out to be a lose-all.

The Island of Venus in the "Lusiad" is a paradisaical island raised by "Divine Love," as a reward for the heroes of the poem. Here Venus, the ocean-goddess, gave her hand to Gama, and committed to him the empire of the sea. It was situate "near where the bowers of Paradise are placed," not far from the mountains of Ima'us, whence the Ganges and Indus derive their source. This paradise of Love is described in the ninth book.

* * We have several parallel Edens, as the "gardens of Alciv'ous," in the "Odyssey," bk. vii.; the "island of Circé," "Odyssey," x.; the "Elysium" of Virgil, "Æneid," vi.; the "island and palace of Alc'ina" or Vice, in "Orlando Furioso," vi., vii.; the "country of Logistilla" or Virtue, in the same epic, bk. x.; the description of "Paradise," visited by Astolpho, the English duke, in bk. xxxiv.; the "island of Ar'mida," in Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered;" the "bower of Acras'ia" in Spenser's "Faëry Queen;" the "palace with its forty doors," the keys of which were entrusted to prince Agib, whose adventures form the tale of the "Third Calender," in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments,"

&c. E. A. Poe calls Eden "Aidenn," which he rhymes with "laden."—"The Raven," xvi. (See VENUSBERG.)

Venus and Adonis. A poem in six-line stanzas, by Shakespeare.

Venus de Medicis, supposed to be the production of Cleoménēs of Athens, who lived in the second century before the Christian era. In the seventeenth century it was dug up in the villa of Hadrian, near Tivoli, in eleven pieces; but it is all ancient except the right arm. It was removed in 1680, by Cosmo III., to the Imperial Gallery at Florence, from the Medici Palace at Rome.

So stands the statue that enchants the world,
So bending tries to veil the matchless boast,
The mingled beauties of exulting Greece.

Thomson, "Summer."

Venus of Milo. This statue, with three of Hermēs, was discovered in 1820 by admiral Dumont in Milo, one of the Greek islands, whence its name. It now stands in the Louvre.

Venus of Praxitéles (4 syl.). This statue was purchased by the ancient Cnicians, who refused to part with it, although Nicomédēs, king of Bithynia, offered to pay off their national debt as a price for it. The statue was subsequently removed to Constantinople, and perished in the great fire during the reign of Justinian (A.D. 80).

Ve'nusberg'. The mountain of delight and love, where lady Venus holds her court. Human beings occasionally are permitted to visit her, as Heinrich von Limburg did, and the noble Tannhäuser (q.v.); but as such persons run the risk of eternal perdition, Eckhardt the Faithful, who sat before the gate, failed not to warn them against entering.—German legend, "Children of Limburg," a poem. 1337. (See The Island of Venus.)

Verbum Sap. (A word to the wise). A hint is sufficient to any wise man; a threat implying if the hint is not taken I will expose you. (Latin, Verbum sapienti.)

Verbum Sat (A word is enough). Similar to the above. (Latin, Verbum sat [sapienti], A word to the wise is enough.)

Verdan'di (the present). A maiden that dwells with her two sisters, Urda and Skulda, near the well Norna.—Scandinavian mythology.

Verë Adeptus. One admitted to the fraternity of the Rosicrucians. In "Hudibras," vere is one syl., pronounced veer.

In Rosicrucian lore as learned
As he the Vere-adeptus earned.

Butler, "Hudibras."

Verger. The officer in a church who carries the rod or mace. (Latin, verga, a wand.)

Vergēs. An old-fashioned Charlie.—Shakespeare, "Much Ado about Nothing."

Ver'non, mentioned by Thomson in his "Summer," was admiral Edward Vernon, who attacked Carthage'na in 1741; but the malaria reached his crew, and as the poet says—

To infant weakness sunk the warrior's arms.

Diana Vernon. An enthusiastic Royalist of great beauty and talent.—Sir Walter Scott, "Rob Roy."

Verone'se (3 syl.). A native of Vero'na, pertaining to Verona, &c.; a Paul Veronese, Paul a native of Verona; a Veronese fashion, and so on.

Veronica. It is said that a maiden handed her handkerchief to our Lord on his way to Calvary. He wiped the sweat from his brow, returned the handkerchief to the owner, and went on. The handkerchief was found to bear a perfect likeness of the Saviour, and was called Vera-Icon'ica (true likeness), and the maiden was ever after called St. Veronica. One of these handkerchiefs is preserved at St. Peter's church in Rome, and another at Milan.

Ver'sailles of Poland. The palace of the counts of Braniski, which now belongs to the municipality of Bialystok.

Verse 21, Ezra viii., contains every letter of the English alphabet. Verse 8, Zephaniah iii., contains every letter of the Hebrew, including finals; it also contains every Hebrew vowel-sound, and the different forms of Sheva.

Versi Bernes'chi. Jocose poetry; so called from Francesco Berni, the Italian poet. (1490-1536.)

Vert, green, in heraldry signifies love, joy, and abundance. It is represented on the shields of noblemen by the emerald, and on those of kings by the planet Venus.

Vertum'nus. The god of the seasons, who married Pomona.—Roman mythology.

Verulam Buildings (London). So named in compliment to Lord Bacon, who was baron Verulam and viscount St. Albans.

Ver'vain (2 syl.). It was with this that heralds crowned their heads when they declared war. It is called Holy Herb, from its use in ancient rites and ceremonies.

Ves'ica Piscis (Latin, fish-bladder). The ovoidal frame or glory which, in the twelfth century, was much used, especially in painted windows, to surround pictures of our Lord. It is meant to represent a fish, from the anagram ICHTHUS. (See NOTARICA.)

Vesper Hour is said to be between the dog and the wolf; "betwixt and between;" neither day nor night; a breed between the canis and canis lupus; too much day to be night, and too much night to be day. Probably the phrase was suggested by the terms "dog watch" (which begins at four), and "dark as a wolf's mouth."

Sicilian Vespers. Easter Monday, March 30, 1282; so called because John of Proci'da on that day led a band of conspirators against Charles d'Anjou and his French countrymen in Sicily. These Frenchmen greatly oppressed the Sicilians, and the conspirators, at the sound of the vesper bell, put them all to the sword without regard to age or sex.

The Fatal Vespers. October 26, 1623. A congregation of some 300 persons had assembled in a small gallery over the gateway of the French ambassador, in Blackfriars, to hear Father Drury, a Jesuit, preach. The gallery gave way, and about 100 of the congregation were precipitated into the street and killed. Drury and a priest named Redman were also killed. This accident was, according to the bigotry of the times, attributed to God's judgment against the Jesuits.—Stow, "Chronicles." (See St. Luke xiii. 4.)

Vestal Virgin. A nun, a religeuse; properly a maiden dedicated to the service of the goddess Vesta. The duty of these virgins was to keep the fire of the temple always burning, both day and night. They were required to be of spotless chastity. (See IMMURING.)

Vet'inary Science. The first person who made it a regular profession was Claude Bourgelet. (1712-1799.)

Veto (Monsieur and Madame). Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette; so called by the Republicans, because the Constituent Assembly allowed the king to have the power of putting his veto upon any decree submitted to him. (1791.)

Monsieur Veto swore he'd bide

To the constitution true;

But he cast his oath aside,

Teaching us the like to do.

Madame Veto swore one day

All the Paris rout she'd slay;

But we snapped the tyrann's yoke.

Turning all her threats to smoke.

Vetturino (Vettu-ree'no), in Italy, is one who for hire conveys persons about in a vet'tura or four-wheeled carriage; the owner of a livery stable; a guide for travellers. The two latter are, of course, subsidiary meanings.

We were accosted in the steamer by a well-dressed man, who represented himself to be a Vetturino.—The Times (One of the Alpine Club).

Vi'a Doloro'sa. The way our Lord went to the Hall of Judgment, from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha, about a mile in length.

Vial. Vials of wrath. Vengeance, the execution of wrath on the undeserving. The allusion is to the seven angels who pour out upon the earth their vials full of wrath (Rev. xvi.).

Viat'icum (Latin). The Eucharist administered to the dying. The word means "money allowed for a journey," and the notion is that this sacrament will be the spirit's passport to Paradise.

Vic'ar. Rector, one who receives both great and small tithes. Vicar receives only the small tithes. At the Reformation many livings which belonged to monasteries passed into the hands of noblemen, who, not being in holy orders, had to perform the sacred offices vicariously. The clergyman who officiated for them was called their vicar or representative, and the law enjoined that the lord should allow him to receive the use of the glebe and all tithes except those accruing from grain (such as corn, barley, oat, rye, &c.), hay, and wood.

The title of "Incumbent" being abolished, the term Vicar is now applied to the minister of a district church, though he receives neither great nor small tithes; his stipend arising partly from endowment, partly from pew-rents, and in part from fees, voluntary contributions, offerings, and so on. The vicar of a pope is a Vicar-apostolic.

The vicar of Bray will be vicar of Bray still. Fuller says of Simon Alleyn that he "lived in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. In the first two reigns he was Protestant, in Mary's reign he turned Papist, and in the next reign recanted—being resolved, whoever was king, to die vicar of Bray." (1540-1588.)

Ray refers to a vicar who was Independent in the Protectorate, Churchman in the reign of Charles II., Papist under James II., and Moderate Protestant under William and Mary. The name assigned to this sexagenarian is Simon Symonds.

The well-known song, "I will be Vicar of Bray," was written by an officer in colonel Fuller's regiment in the reign of George I., and seems to apply to Ray's vicar, or some clergyman even later.

Vicar of Wakefield. The Rev. Dr. Primrose in Goldsmith's novel so called.

Vice (1 syl.) in Old English plays, means simply the masked man, the vizard. (Frank, vis, our phiz.)

Vi'cè Versa (Latin). The reverse; the terms of the case being reversed.

Victor Emmanuel of Italy, called King Honest-Man, for his honest concessions to the people of constitutional freedom promised by his father and by himself in less prosperous circumstances.

Vi'dar. The god of silence, who reads the most secret thoughts of men. He is noted for the thickness of his shoes.—Scandinavian mythology.

Inghorg's sorrowing few men heard.
Like Vi'dar, Inghorg spoke no word,
But grieved and pined in broken love,
As nightingale or turtle-dove.

"Frithiof-Saga" (Frithiof's Return).

Vierge (2 syl.). A curious conversion in playing-cards occurs in reference to this word. The invention is Indian, and the game is called "The Four Rajahs." The pieces are the king, his general or fierche, the elephant or phil, the horseman, the camel or ruch, and the infantry. The French corrupted fierche (general) into "vierge," and then converted "virgin" into dame. Similarly they corrupted phil into "fol" or "fou" (knave); ruch is our "rook." At one time playing-cards were called "The Books of the Four Kings," and chess "The Game of the Four Kings." It was for chess and not cards that Walter Sturton, in 1278, was paid 8s. 5d., according to the wardrobe rolls of Edward I., "ad opus regis ad ludendum ad quatuor reges." Malkin said it was no great proof of our wisdom that we delighted in cards, seeing they were "invented for a fool." Malkin referred to the vulgar tradition that cards were invented for the amusement of Charles VI., the idiot king of France; but it was no proof that Jacquemin Grignonnet invented cards because "he painted and gilded three packs for the king in 1392."

View-holloa of a fox is "Tally-ho!" of a hare, "Gone away!" but the "Who-hoop" signifies the death of each.

Vignette (2 syl.) means properly a likeness having a border of vine-leaves round it. (French, "little vine, tendril.")

Viking. A pirate; so called from the vik or creek in which he lurked. The word is wholly unconnected with the word "king." There were sea-kings, sometimes but erroneously called "vikings," connected with royal blood, and having small dominions on the coast. These sea-kings were often vikings or vikings, but the reverse is not true that every viking or pirate was a sea-king.

Vila. A lovely mountain nymph of Servian mythology. Her voice resembles that of the woodpecker. The Vila loves to comfort the enamoured deer or roe, but will sometimes brew storms. She rides on a hart, with a bridle made of snake's-skin.

Cherry, dearest cherry,
Spread thy branches round
Under which the Vils
Dance their magic round

Servian ballad

Fair as a mountain Vila. The highest praise that a Servian can bestow on beauty. In the ballad of "The Sisters of Kap'itan Leka" of Rossandra it is said—

And who on hills hath seen the Vila—
E'en the Vila, brother, must to her yield.

Vilaish (3 syl.) or Swift as Vila. Said of a very fleet horse. (See VILA.)

Vili. Brother of Odin and Ve, one of the progenitors of the Asir race, and one of the creators of the world.—Scandinavian mythology.

Vil'lain means simply one attached to a villa or farm. In feudal times the lord was the great land-owner, and under him were a host of tenants called villains. The highest class of villains were called regardant, and were annexed to the manor; then came the Coliberti or Burës, who were privileged vassals; then the Bordarii or cottagers (Saxon, bord, a cottage), who rendered certain menial offices to their lord for rent; then the Coscets, Cottarii, and Cotmanni, who paid partly in produce and partly in menial service; and, lastly, the villains in gross, who were annexed to the person of the lord, and might be sold or transferred as chattels. The notion of wickedness and worthlessness associated with the word is simply the effect of aristocratic pride and exclusiveness, not as Christian says in his Notes on Blackstone, "a proof of the horror in which our fathers held all service to feudal lords." The French vilain seems to connect the word with vile, but it is probable that vile is the Latin vilis vilë (of no value), and that the noun vilain is independent of vilain, except by way of pun. (See CHEATER.)

I am no villain [base-born]; I am the youngest son of Sir Roland de Bois; he was my father, and he is thrice a villain [rascal] that says such a father begot villains [bastards].—Shakespeare, "As You Like It," i. 1.

Villiers. Second duke of Buckingham. (1627-1682.)

Vina'sa. The book of discipline in the Tripitaka (q.v.).

Vincent (St.). Patron saint of drunkards. This is from the proverb—

If on St. Vincent's day [Jan. 22] the sky is clear,
More wine than water will crown the year.

Vincent de la Rosa. The son of a poor labourer who had served as a soldier. According to his own account, "he had slain more Moors than ever Tunis or Morocco produced; and as for duels, he had fought a greater number than ever Gantë had, or Luna either, or Diego Garciale Paredes, always coming off victorious, and without losing a drop of blood." He dressed "superbly," and though he had but three suits, the villagers thought he had ten or a dozen, and more than twenty plumes of feathers. This gay young spark caught the affections of Leandra, the only child of an opulent farmer. The giddy girl eloped with him; but he robbed her of all her money and jewels, and left her in a cave to make the best of her way home again.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. I., viii. 20.

Vin'dicate (3 syl.), to justify, to avenge, has a remarkable etymon. Vindicis was a slave of the Vitelli, who informed the Senate of the conspiracy of the sons of Junius Brutus to restore Tarquin, for which service he was rewarded with liberty (Livy, ii. 5); hence the rod with which a slave was struck in manumission was called vindicta, a Vindicis rod (see MANUMIT); and to set free was in Latin vindicare in libertatem. One way of settling disputes was to give the litigants two rods, which they crossed as if in fight, and the person whom the prætor vindicated broke the rod of his opponent. These rods were called vindicie, and hence vindicate, meaning to "justify." To avenge is simply to justify oneself by punishing the wrong-doer.

Vine (1 syl.). The Rabbins say that the fiend buried at the foot of the first vine planted by Adam, a lion, a lamb, and a hog; and that as wine is used, men receive from it ferocity, mildness, or wallowing.

Vin'egar Bi'ble. Printed at the Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1717; so called because it has the word vinegar instead of vineyard in the running head-line of Luke xxii.

Vineyard Controversy. A paper war provoked by the Hon. Daines Barrington, who entered the lists to overthrow all chroniclers and antiquaries from William of Malmesbury to Samuel Pegge, respecting the vineyards of Domesday-book. He maintained that the vines were currants, and the vineyards currant-gardens.

Vin'golf or Gimli. The future dwelling of the righteous.—Scandinavian mythology.

And I'd adorn with star-light glance
The golden tresses of thy head,
And high in Vingolf's hall should dance
My pallid lily rosy red.
"Frithiof-Saga" (Frithiof's Joy).

Vino. In vino veritas (In wine is truth), meaning when persons are more or less intoxicated they utter many things they would at other times conceal or disguise (Latin).

Vin'try Ward (London). So called from the Vintry, or part occupied by the Vintners or wine-merchants from Bordeaux, who anciently settled on this part of the Thames' bank. They landed their wines here, and, till the 28th Edw. I., were obliged to sell what they landed within forty days.

Vinum Theologicum. The best wine in the nation. Hollinshed says it was so called because religious men would be sure "neither to drinke nor be served of the worst, or such as was anie waies vined by the vintner; naie, the merchant would have thought that his soule would have gone streightwaie to the devil if he should have served them with other than the best" (i. 282).

Viola. A lady who disguises herself as a page, and enters the service of the duke Orsino. — Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night."

Violante (4 syl.). Wife of Pietro and the putative parent of Pompilia. The woman provided this supposititious child for the sake of fulfilling certain conditions on which Pietro was to come into a large fortune. — Robert Browning, "The Ring and the Book." (See RING.)

Violet. The colour indicates the love of truth and the truth of love. Pugin says it is used for black in mourning and fasting.

"I would give you some violets, but they withered all when my father died." So says Ophelia to the Queen. The violet in flower-language is emblematical of innocence, and Ophelia says the King, the Queen, and even Hamlet himself now he has killed Polonius, are unworthy of this symbol. Now my father is dead all the violets are withered, all the court family are stained with blood-guiltiness.

This entire poem may be thus paraphrased: Both you and I are under a spell, and there is "herb of grace" to disenchant us; there's a "daisy" to caution you against expecting that such wanton love as yours will endure long; I would have given you a "violet" if I could, but now my father is killed all of you are blood-guilty.

Violin. The following musicians are very celebrated: Arcangelo Corelli, noted for the melodious tones he produced (1653-1713). Pierre Gaviniés, native of Bordeaux, founder of the French school of violinists, noted for the sweetness of his tones (1722-1800). Nicolo Paganini, whose mastery over the instrument has never been equalled, especially known for his musical feats on one string (1784-1840). Gaetan Pugnani, of Turin, founder of the Italian school of violinists; his playing was "wild, noble, and sublime" (1727-1803). Giuseppe Tartini, of Padua, whose performance was plaintive but full of grace (1698-1779). G. B. Viotti, of Piedmont, whose playing was noted for grandeur and audacity, fire and excitement (1753-1824). (See CREMONAS.)

The best makers of violins. (1) The Amati family and their pupil Stradivarius, makers of what are termed Amatis or Cremonas—the latter from Cremona in Milan, where they lived. (2) Jacob Steiner, and two Tyrolese makers named Klotz.

Violon'. A temporary prison. Galigani says: In the time of Louis XI. the Salle-de-Perdus was so full of turbulent clerks and students that the bailiff of the palace shut many up in the lower room of the conciergerie (prison) while the courts were sitting; but as they were guilty of no punishable offence, he allowed them a violin to wile away the tedium of their temporary captivity.

M. Génin says the seven penitential psalms were called in the middle ages the psalterion, and to put one to penance was in French expressed by mettre au psalterion. As the psaltery was an instrument of music, some witty Frenchman changed psalterion to violon, and in lieu of mettre au psalterion wrote mettre au violon.

A prisonnier et lui furent mis au salterion.
"Antiquités Nationales de Mullin," iv., p. 6.

Viper and File. The biter bit. Æsop says a viper found a file, and tried to bite it, under the supposition that it was good food; but the file said that its province was to bite others, and not to be bitten. (See SERPENT.)

I fawned and smiled to plunder and betray,
Myself betrayed and plundered all the while;
So gnawed the viper the corroding file.
Beattie, "Minstrel."

Thus he realised the moral of the fable: the viper sought to bite the file, but broke his own teeth. — The Times.

Virgil. In the "Gesta Romanorum" Virgil is represented as a mighty but benevolent enchanter. This is the character that Italian tradition always gives him, and it is this traditional character that furnished Dante with his conception of making Virgil his guide through the infernal regions. From the

"Æne'id" grammarians illustrated their rules, rhetoricians selected the subjects of their declamations, and Christians looked on the poet as half inspired; hence the use of his poems in divination. (See SORTES VIRGILIANÆ.)

The Christian Virgil. Marco Girolamo Vida, author of "Christias," in six books, an imitation of the "Æne'id." (1490-1566.)

The Virgil and Horace of the Christians. So Bentley calls Aurelius Clemens Prudentius, a native of Spain, who wrote Latin hymns and religious poems. (348.)*

Le Virgile au Rabot ("au rabot" is difficult to render into English. "Virgil with a Plane" is far from conveying the idea. "The Virgil of Planers" or "The Virgilian Joiner" is somewhat nearer the meaning). Adam Billaut, the poetical carpenter and joiner, was so called by M. Tissot, both because he used the plane and because one of his chief recueils is entitled "Le Rabot." He is generally called Maître Adam. His roaring Bacchanalian songs seem very unlike the Eclogues of Virgil, and the only reason for the title seems to be that Virgil was a husbandman and wrote on husbandry, while Billaut was a carpenter and wrote on carpentry. (*-1662.)

Virgilius. Bishop of Saltzburg, an Irishman, whose native name was Feargil or Feargal. He was denounced as a heretic for asserting the existence of antipodes. (Died 754.) (See SCIENCE.)

Virgin. One of the constellations. (August 23rd to September 23rd.)

Astræa, goddess of justice, was the last of the deities to quit our earth, and when she returned to heaven became the constellation Virgo.

When the bright Virgin gives the beauteous days.
Thomson, "Autumn."

The Virgin Queen. Queen Elizabeth. (1533, 1558-1603.)

Virgins. The eleven thousand virgins of Cologne, according to the legend, were born at Bae'za, in Spain. This city contains some twelve thousand houses, so the contribution was pretty liberal; and it may be said of Baeza as of Egypt of old, there was [scarce] a house where there was not one dead. (See URSULA.)

Virtuo'so. A man fond of virtu or skilled therein; a dilettantè. Virtu is an Italian word, and means curiosities of all sorts connected with the fine arts.

Vis Iner'tiæ properly means that property of matter which makes it resist any change. In consequence of this property it is hard to set in motion what is still, and hard to stop what is in motion. Figuratively it applies to that unwillingness of change which makes men "rather bear the ills they have, than fly to others that they know not of."

Viscon'ti. These lords of Milan had for their armorial bearing a snake.

Vish'nu (Indian). The Preserver, who forms with Brahma and Siva the divine triad of the system of Hinduism.

Vi'tal Spark of heavenly flame (Pope). Heraclitus held the soul to be a spark of the stellar essence.—Macrobius, "In Somnium Scipionis," i. 14.

Vitellius. A glutton; so named from Vitellius the Roman emperor, who took emetics after one meal that he might have power to swallow another.

Vitru'vius. There were two Roman architects of this name. The one best known was Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, who wrote a book on "Architecture."

The English Vitruvius. Inigo Jones. (1572-1652.)

Vi'tulos. The scourgings which the monks inflicted on themselves during the chanting of the psalms.

Vitus (St.). St. Vitus's Dance, once widely prevalent in Germany and the Low Countries, was a "dancing mania," so called from the supposed power of St. Vitus over nervous and hysterical affections.

At Strasbourg hundreds of folk began
To dance and leap, both maid and man;
In open market, lane, or street,
They skipped along, nor cared to eat,
Until their plague had ceased to fright us.
"It was called the dance of holy Vitus.
Jan of Königshaven (an old German chronicler).

St. Vitus's dance. A description of the jumping procession on Whit-Tuesday to a chapel in Ulm dedicated to St. Vitus, is given in Notes and Queries, September, 1856.

Vi'va Vo'cè. Orally; by word of mouth. A viva voce examination is one in which the respondent answers by word of mouth. (Latin, "with the living voice.")

Vivian. Brother of Maugis d'Aygre-mont, and son of duke Bevis of Aygre-mont. He was stolen in infancy by

Tapinel, and sold to the wife of Sorgalant.—"Roman de Maugis d'Agremont et de Vivien son Frère."

Vivian, in "Orlando Furioso," son of Buovo (Bu-vo), of the house of Clarmont, and brother of Aldiger and Malagigi.

Vivien. A wily wanton in Arthur's court "who hated all the knights." She tried to seduce "the blameless king," and succeeded in seducing Merlin, who "overtalked and overworn, told her his secret charm"—

The which if any wrought on any one
With woven paces and with waving arms,
The man so wrought on ever seemed to lie
Closed in the four walls of a hollow tower,
From which was no escape for evermore.

Having obtained this secret, the wanton "put forth the charm," and in the hollow oak lay Merlin as one dead, "lost to life, and use, and name, and fame."—Tennyson, "Idylls of the King" (Vivien).

Vix'e'rë. Vixere fortes ante Agamemnon (Horace). You are not the first great man that ever lived, though you boast so mightily. Our own age does not monopolise the right of merit.

Viz. A contraction of videlicet. The z is a corruption of 3, a common mark of contraction in the middle ages; as hab3—i.e., habet; omnib3—i.e., omnibus; vi3—i.e., videlicet.

Vola'na. One of the mouths of the Po.—"Orlando Furioso."

Volpine (2 syl.). The hero of Ben Jonson's drama called "The Fox." He is a profligate Venetian who obtains money of his friends by pretending (1) that he is disabled by illness, and (2) that he is the Fox's favourite. The play is a satire on avarice, which is made the motive power of working on each in different ways. At the end the Fox is betrayed, his property forfeited, and Volpine is sentenced to lie in the worst hospital of all Venice till he is ill as he pretends to be.

"The Alchemist," "The Fox," and "Silent Woman,"
Done by Ben Jonson, and outdone by no man.

Volta'ic Battery. An apparatus for accumulating electricity; so called from Volta, the Italian, who first contrived it.

Voltaire. His proper name was François Marie Arouet. The word Voltaire is simply an anagram of Arouet

L. I. (le jeune). Thus have we Stella (q.v.), Astrophel (q.v.), Vanessa and Calenus (q.v.), and a host of other names in anagrams.

Voltaire, the infidel, built the church at Ferney, which has this inscription: Deo erexit Voltaire. Cowper alludes to this anomaly in the following lines:—

Nor he who, for the base of thousands born,
Built God a church, and laughed his Word to scorn.

Voltaire. Dr. Young said of him—

Thou art so witty, profligate, and t' in,
Thou seem'st a Milton, with his Death and Sin.

An excellent comparison between Voltaire and Gibbon is given by Byron in "Childe Harold," canto iii., 106, 107.

The German Voltaire. Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. (1749-1838.)

Christoph Martin Wieland. (1733-1813.)

The Polish Voltaire. Ignatius Krasicki. 1774-1801.

Volume (2 syl.). A roll. Anciently books were written on sheets fastened together lengthwise and rolled; some were rolled on a pin or roller. The rolls were placed erect on shelves. Each one was labelled in red letters or rubrics. Rolls of great value were packed in cases or boxes. (Latin, volvo, to roll up.)

Volund. The Scandinavian Vulcan.

Vri'tra. The demon who clouds the sun. He was slain by Indra.—Hindu mythology.

Vugh (pron. Voog), in mining language, means a hollow or cavernous part in a lode. Adj., vughy. (British, voog, a hole; Welsh, ued, a puddle.)

Vul'can. The divine blacksmith, whose workshop was on Mount Etna, where the Cyclops assisted him in forging thunderbolts for Jove. He was also called Mulciber.

Vulcan's Badge. That of cuckoldom. Venus was Vulcan's wife, but her amour with Mars gave Vulcan the badge referred to.

Vulcanised India-rubber. India-rubber combined with sulphur by vulcanic agency or heat, by which means the caoutchouc absorbs the sulphur and becomes carbonised.

Vulcanist. One who supports the Vulcanian or Plutonian theory, which ascribes the changes on the earth's surface to the agency of fire. These theorists say the earth was once in a state of igneous fusion, and that the crust has gradually cooled down to its present temperature.

VXL, a monogram on locket, &c., stands for U XL (you excel).

W

Wa'bun. Son of Mudjeeke'wis (North-American Indian), East-Wind, the Indian Apollo. Young and beautiful, he chases Darkness with his arrows over hill and valley, wakes the villager, calls the Thunder, and brings the Morning. He married Wabun-Annung (q v.), and transplanted her to heaven, where she became the Morning Star.—Longfellow, "Hiawatha."

Wabun-An'nung, in North-American Indian mythology, is the Morning Star. She was a country maiden wooed and won by Wabun, the Indian Apollo, who transplanted her to the skies.—Longfellow, "Hiawatha."

Wach'um (in "Hudibras"). A foolish Welchman named Tom Jones, who could neither write nor read. He was zany to Lilly the astrologer.

Wade (1 syl.), to go through watery places, is the Anglo-Saxon weyd, a meadow; German waden, to go [through a meadow]. (See WEYD-MONAT.)

General Wade, famous for his military highways in the Highlands, which proceed in a straight line up and down hill like a Roman road.

Had you seen but these roads before they were made,
You would hold up your hands, and bless General Wade.

Wade's Boat, named Guin'gelot. Wade was a hero of mediæval romance, whose adventures were a favourite theme in the sixteenth century. Mons. F. Michel has brought together all he could find about this story, but nevertheless the tale is very imperfectly known.

They can so moche craft of Wades boot.
So moche broken harm whan that hem list,
That with hem schuld I never lye in rest.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," 9.298.

Wadham College (Oxford) was founded by Nicholas Wadham in 1613.

Wad'man (Widow). A comely widow who tries to secure Uncle Toby for her second husband. Amongst other wiles she pretends that she has something in her eye, and gets Uncle Toby to look for it; as the kind-hearted hero of Namur does so, the widow gradually places her face nearer and nearer the captain's mouth, under the hope that he will kiss her and propose.—Sterne, "Tristram Shandy."

Wages. Giles Moore, in 1659, paid his mowers sixteenpence an acre. In 1711, Timothy Burrell, Esq., paid twenty-pence an acre; in 1686 he paid Mary his cook fifty shillings a year; in 1715 he had raised the sum to fifty-five shillings.—"Sussex Archaeological Collections," iii., pp. 163, 170.

* * For wages in the reign of Henry VIII., see Preface of Vol. I., "Letters and Papers of the Reign of Henry VIII.," Edited by J. S. Brewer, pp. 103-119.

Wagoner. (See BOOTES.)

Waha'bites (3 syl.). A Mahometan sect, whose object is to bring back the doctrines and observances of Islam to the literal precepts of the Koran; so called from the founder, Ibn-abd-ul-Wahab.

Waifs and Strays of London Streets. The homeless poor. Waifs are goods found but not claimed. Strays are animals that have wandered from their proper enclosures to the grounds of some one not their owner.

Waist (1 syl.) means the part girded or squeezed. This word plainly shows that tight-lacing is not a modern fashion. (Welsh, gwâsg, pressure; gwâs-gu, to squeeze).

Waits. Street musicians, who serenaded the principal inhabitants a little before Christmas-day. From Rymer's "Fœdera" we learn it was the duty of musical watchmen "to pipe the watch" nightly in the king's court four times from Michaelmas to Shrove Thursday, and three times in the summer; and they had also to make "the bon gate" at every door, to secure them against "pyckeres and pillers." They formed a distinct class from both the watch and the minstrels. (German wacht, Dutch wagt, Danish vagt, Swedish wakt, Scotch wate, English watch.)

Waits, according to Dr. Busby, is a corruption of Wayghtes (hautboys), a word which has no singular number. The word, he says, has been transferred from the instruments to the performers, who are in the habit of parading our streets by night at Christmas time.—

“Dictionary of Music.” (See WASTLERS.)

Wake (1 syl.), to keep vigils (Saxon wacian). Spelman wittily derives it from the Saxon wac, drunkenness. A vigil celebrated with junketing and dancing.

It may, therefore, be permitted them [the Irish] on the dedication day, or other solemn days of martyrs, to make them bowers about the churches, and refresh themselves, feasting together after a good religious sort: killing their oxen now to the praise of God and increase of charity, which they were wont before to sacrifice to the devil.—Gregory the Great to Melitus [Melitus was an abbot who came over with St. Augustine].

Walbrook Ward (London) is so called from a brook which once ran along the west wall of Walbrook Street.

Walcheren Expedition. A well-devised scheme, ruined by the stupidity of the agent chosen to carry it out. Lord Castlereagh's instructions were “to advance instantly in full force against Antwerp,” but lord Chatham wasted his time and strength in reducing Flushing. Ultimately, the red-tape “Incapable” got possession of the island of Walcheren, but 7,000 men died of malaria, and as many more were permanently disabled.

Walden'ses. So called from Peter Waldo, a citizen of Lyons, who founded a preaching society in 1176.

Waldo, a copse between Lavant and Goodwood (Sussex). Same as weald, wold, wald, walt, “a wood” Anglo-Saxon. The final o is about equivalent to “the,” as hælo, the whole, i.e. health; meniġeo, the many, i.e. a multitude, &c.

Wales. The older form is Wealthas, plural of Wealth, an Anglo-Saxon word denoting borderers, and applied by them to the ancient Britons; hence, also, Corn-wall, the horn occupied by the same “borderers.” Welschland is a German name for Italy; Valais are the non-German districts of Switzerland; the parts about Liège constitute the Walloon country on the frontier of Germany; Wallachia is another “Welshland.” Portugal is the “port” inhabited by the Spanish borderers, &c. (See WALNUT.)

Walk (in “Hudibras”) is colonel Hewson, who had been a cobbler.

To walk. This is a remarkable word. It comes from the Saxon wealcan (to roll); whence wealcere, a fuller of cloth. In Percy's “Reliques” we read—

She cursed the weaver and the walker,
The cloth that they had wrought

To walk, therefore, is to roll along, as the machine in felting hats or fulling cloth.

Walk not in the public ways. This was one of the maxims of Pythagoras, and reminds us very forcibly of the audition of the Saviour. “Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction,” but “narrow is the path” [of truth and holiness]. (See Iamblicus, “Protreptics, Symbol v.”)

Walker, a proper name, is generally supposed to be wealcere, a fuller, but the derivation of ancient names from trades is to be received with great caution. It is far more probable that Walker is derived from the old High German walah, Anglo-Saxon wealh, a foreigner or borderer; whence Wallack, Walk, Walkey, Walliker, and many others. (See BREWER.)

Helen Walker. The prototype of Jeanie Deans. Sir Walter Scott caused a tombstone to be erected over her grave in the churchyard of Irongray, stewartry of Kirkcudbright. In 1869 Messrs. A. and C. Black caused a headstone of red freestone to be erected in Carlawrock churchyard to the memory of Robert Paterson, the Old Mortality of the same novelist, who was buried there in 1801.

Hookey Walker. John Walker was an out-door clerk at Longman, Clementi & Co.'s, Cheapside, and was noted for his eagle nose, which gained him the nick-name of Old Hookey. Walker's office was to keep the workmen to their work, or report them to the principals. Of course it was the interest of the employés to throw discredit on Walker's reports, and the poor old man was so badgered and ridiculed, that the firm found it politic to abolish the office; but Hookey Walker still means a tale not to be trusted.—John Bee.

Wall (The), from the Tyne to Boulness, on the Solway Frith, a distance of eighty miles. Called—

The Roman Wall, because it was the work of the Romans.

Agricola's Wall, because Agricola made the south bank and ditch.

Hadrian's Wall, because Hadrian added another vallum and mound parallel to Agricola's.

The Wall of Severus, because Severus followed in the same line with a stone wall, having castles and turrets.

The Picts' Wall, because its object was to prevent the incursions of the Picts.

Wall of Antoninus, now called Grymes Dyke, was a more northerly entrenchment, from the Clyde to the Frith. This was made by Lollus Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140. It was a turf wall.

A, Agricola's mound. The straight part is 135 feet. B, Hadrian's vallum and mounds. C, the wall, &c., of Severus

To give the wall. Nathaniel Bailey's explanation of this phrase is worth perpetuating. He says it is "a compliment paid to the female sex, or those to whom one would show respect, by letting them go nearest the wall or houses, upon a supposition of its being the cleanest. This custom [he adds] is chiefly peculiar to England, for in most parts abroad they will give them the right hand, though at the same time they thrust them into the kennel." — Dictionary, word "Wall."

To take the wall. To take the place of honour, the same as to choose "the uppermost rooms at feasts" (Matt. xxiii. 6). At one time pedestrians gave the wall to persons of a higher grade in society than themselves.

I will take the wall of any man or maid of Montague's. — Shakespeare, "Romeo and Juliet," i. 1.

To go to the wall. To be put on one side; to be shelved. This is in allusion to another phrase, "laid by the wall" — i.e., dead but not buried; put out of the way.

Walls have Ears. The Louvre was so constructed in the time of Catharine de Medicis, that what was said in one room could be distinctly heard in another. It was by this contrivance that the suspicious queen became acquainted with state secrets and plots. The tubes of communication were called the auriculaires, and were constructed on the same principle as those of the confessionals. The "ear of Dionysius" communicated to him every word uttered in the state prison. See SPEAKING HEADS (9).

Walls-end Coals. So called from the colliery at the eastern termination of the Great Roman Wall, between New-castle-upon-Tyne and the sea.

Wall-eyed properly means "with-ered-eyed." Persons are wall-eyed when the white is unusually large, and the sight defective; hence Shakespeare has wall-eyed wrath, wall-eyed slave, &c. When King John says, "My rage was blind," he virtually says his "wrath was wall-eyed." (Saxon, hwelan, to wither. The word is often written whall-eyed, or whallied, from the verb whally.)

Wall-flower. So called because it grows on old walls and ruined buildings. It is a native plant. Similarly, wall-cress, wall-creeper, &c., are plants which grow on dry, stony places, or on walls. Wall-fruit is fruit trained against a wall. (See WALNUT.)

Wallace's Larder. The dungeon of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire: so called because Wallace threw into it the dead bodies of the garrison surprised by him and cut to pieces in the reign of Edward I.

Wallachs. The people of Wallachia.

Walloons. Part of the great Roman stock. They occupied the low track along the frontiers of the German-speaking territory, as Artois, Hainault, Namur, Liège, Luxembourg; with parts of Flanders and Brabant. (See WALES.)

Wallop. To thrash. Sir John Wallop, in the reign of Henry VIII., was sent to Normandy to make reprisals, because the French fleet had burnt Brighton. Sir John burnt twenty-one towns and villages, demolished several harbours, and "walloped" the foe to his heart's content.

Walnut (foreign nut). It comes from Persia, and is so called to distinguish it from those native to Europe, as hazel, filbert, chesnut. (Saxon, walh, foreign; Danish, wal-noot; German, wälschen-nusz.)

Some difficulty there is in cracking the name thereof. Why walnuts, having no affinity to a wall, should be so called. The truth is, wal or wall in the old Dutch signifies "strange" or "exotic," (whence Walsh, foreigners); these nuts being no natives of England or Europe, but probably first etched from Persia, and called by the French nux persique. — Fuller, "Worthies of England."

Walnut Tree. It is said that the walnut tree thrives best if the nuts are beaten off with sticks, and not gathered. Hence Fuller says, "Who, like a nut-tree, must be manured by beating, or else would not bear fruit" (bk. ii., ch. 11). The saying is well known that—

A wife, a spaniel, and a walnut tree,
The more you beat t' em the better they be.

Walston (St.). A Briton who gave up all his wealth, and supported himself by manual husbandry. He died mowing, 1016. St. Walston is the patron saint of husbandmen, and is usually depicted with a scythe in his hand, and cattle in the background.

Walter. Marquis of Saluzzo, in Italy, who married Grisilda, a poor peasant's daughter.—Chaucer, "The Clerkes Tale." (See GRISILDA.)

Walter Multon, abbot of Therton-upon-Humber, in Lincolnshire, was immured in 1443. In 1722, an old wall being taken down, his remains were found with a candlestick, table, and book. Stukeley mentions the fact. In 1845 another instance of the same kind was discovered at Temple Bruer, in Lincolnshire.

Wal'tham Blacks. The deer-stealers of Waltham in the eighteenth century were so called, because they wore black crape masks. The act to put them down is called the "Black Act."

Walton. An Isaak Walton. One devoted to "the gentle craft" of angling. Isaak Walton wrote a book called "The Complete Angler, or Contemplative Man's Recreation." (1655.)

Walton (Lord). Father of Elvira, who promised her in marriage to Sir Richard Forth, a Puritan officer; but Elvira had already engaged her heart to lord Arthur Talbot, a Cavalier nobleman. The betrothal being set aside, the Cavalier was accepted by lord Walton as the affianced of his daughter, and after certain difficulties had been surmounted, married her.—Bellini, "I Puritani" (an opera.)

Wamba. Son of Witless, and jester of Cedric "the Saxon," of Rotherwood.—Sir Walter Scott, "Ivanhoe."

Wan means thin (Saxon, wan, deficient; our wane, as the "waning moon"). As wasting of the flesh is generally accompanied with a grey palor, the idea of leanness has yielded to that of the sickly hue which attends it.

Wandering Jew--

(1) Of Greek tradition. Aristeis, a poet who continued to appear and disappear alternately for above 400 years, and who visited all the mythical nations of the earth.

(2) Of Jewish story. Tradition says that Kartaphilos, the door-keeper of the Judgment Hall, in the service of Pontius Pilate, struck our Lord as he led him forth, saying, "Get on faster, Jesus;" whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come again."

Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down with the weight of his cross, stopped to rest at the door of one Ahasuerus, a cobbler. The craftsman pushed him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you, away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come." Schubert has a poem entitled "Ahasuer" (the Wandering Jew).

A third legend says that it was the cobbler who hailed Jesus before the judgment seat of Pilate, saying to him, "Faster, Jesus, faster!"

In Germany, the Wandering Jew is associated with John Bultadeus, seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth century, again in the fifteenth, and a third time in the sixteenth. His last appearance was in 1774 at Brussels. Signor Gualdi about the same time made his appearance at Venice, and had a portrait of himself by Titian, who had been dead at the time 130 years. One day he disappeared as mysteriously as he had come.—"Turkish Spy," vol. ii.

The French call the Wandering Jew Isaac Laquedem, a corruption of La-kedion.

Soon after the crucifixion Kartaphilos, or whatever the name was, being converted, was baptised, and received the name of Joseph. At the end of every 100 years he falls into a trance, and wakes up a young man about thirty years of age.

Wandering Jew. Salathiel ben Sadi, who appeared and disappeared towards the close of the sixteenth century, at Venice, in so sudden a manner as to attract the notice of all Europe. Croly in his novel called "Salathiel," and Southey in his "Curse of Kehama," trace the course of the Wandering Jew, but in utter violation of the general legends. In Eugène Sue's "Le Juif Errant," the Jew makes no figure of the slightest importance to the tale.

Wandering Willie or Willie Steenson. The blind fiddler who tells the tale of Redgauntlet.—Sir Walter Scott, "Redgauntlet."

Wandering Wood, in book i. of Spenser's "Faery Queen," is where St. George and Una encounter Error, who is slain by the knight. Una tries to persuade the Red Cross knight to leave the wood, but he is self-willed. Error, in the form of a serpent, attacks him, but the knight severs her head from her body. The idea is that when Piety will not listen to Una or Truth, it is sure to get into "Wandering Wood," where Error will attack it; but if it listens then to Truth it will slay Error.

Wans Dyke, Sir Richard Colt Hoare tells us, was a barrier erected by the Belgæ against the Celts, and served as a boundary between these tribes. Dr. Stukeley says the original mound was added to by the Anglo-Saxons when they made it the boundary line of the two kingdoms of Mercia and Wessex. It was also used by the Britons as a defence against the Romans, who attacked them from the side of Gloucestershire and Oxfordshire.

In its most perfect state it began at Andover, in Hampshire, ran through the counties of Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Somersetshire, and terminated in the "Severn Sea" or Bristol Channel. It was called Wodenes Dyke by the Saxons, contracted into Wondes-dyke, and corrupted to Wans-dyke, as Wodenes-daeg is into Wed'nes-day.

Want or Went. A road. Thus "the four-want way," the spot where four roads meet. Chaucer uses the expression "a privie went" (private road), &c.

Wants, meaning "gloves." According to the best Dutch authorities the word is a corruption of the French gant, Italian quanto.

Wanten are worn by peasants and working people when the weather is cold. They are in shape somewhat like boxing-gloves, having only a thumb and no fingers. They are made of a coarse woollen stuff.—Teding von Berkhout, "Letter from Breda."

Wantley. (See DRAGON.)

Wa'pentake. A division of Yorkshire, similar to that better known as a hundred. The word means "touch-arms," it being the custom of each vassal, when he attended the assemblies of the district, "to touch the spear of his overlord in token of homage." Victor Hugo, in his novel of "L'Homme qui Rit," calls a tipstaff a "wapentake." (Saxon, wapen, arms; tac, touch.)

Wapping Great means astonishingly great. (Saxon, wafian, to be astonished.)

War of the Meal-sacks. After the battle of Beder, Abu Sofian summoned 200 fleet horsemen, each with a sack of meal at his saddle-bow, the scanty provision of an Arab for a foray, and sallied forth to Medi'na. Mahomet went forth at the head of a superior force to meet him, and Abu Sofian with his horsemen, throwing off their meal-sacks, fled with precipitation.

War of the Roses. The civil wars of York and Lancaster, the former of which houses had a white rose, and the latter a red rose, for its badge.

According to Shakespeare, certain lords were in the Temple Gardens, contending about the succession, when Richard Plantagenet exclaimed—

Since you are tongue-tied and so loth to speak..
Let him that is a true-born gentleman..
If he supposes that I have pleaded truth,
From off this briar pluck a white rose with me.
Somers.

Let him that is no coward not so flatterer..
Pluck a red rose from off this thorn with me.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI.," ii. 4.

Warchant. (See BARDIT.)

Ward (Ar'temus). A nom de plume of Charles F. Browne, of America, who died 1867. Much controversy existed respecting the pronunciation of his name. Most persons called it Artemus; but he put the question at rest by the following jeu:—

Don't bother me with your etas and short es.
Nor ask me for more than you have on my card.
O spare me from etymological sorties,
And simply accept me as Artemus Ward.
Artemus Ward (Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly, 1867).

* Did he wish the public to pronounce his surname as a rhyme to card? If not, the second line might be, "Nor ask me for more than my card will afford."

Wardrobe Place (London); so called from the royal wardrobe formerly kept in that part of the vicinity which goes by the name of Wardrobe Court. The church is still called St. Andrew's Wardrobe.

Ware. (See BRD.)

Warlock. A wandering evil spirit. (Saxon, wer-loga, a deceiver, one who breaks his word. Satan is called in Scripture "the father of lies," the arch-warlock.)

Warming Pan. (See JACOBITES.)

Warning Stone. Anything that gives notice of danger. Bakors in Wiltshire and some other counties used to put a "certain pebble" in their ovens, and when the stone turned white it gave the baker warning that the oven was hot enough for his bakings.

Warwick. (Saxon, woer-wic, contracted from wæringa-wic (the fortified or garrisoned town). A translation of the ancient British name Caer Leon.

Warwick Lane (City). The site of a magnificent house belonging to the famed Beauchamps, earls of Warwick.

Warwolf. A man-wolf, a magician who has power to transform himself into a wolf. (Saxon wer, man, like the Latin vir; werwulf.) (See WERWOLF.)

O was it warwolf in the wood,
Or was it mermaid in the sea,
Or was it man, or vile woman,
My ain true-love, that misshaped thee?

"Kempion" (see "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border").

Washing. Wash your dirty linen at home (French). The French say the English do not follow the advice of washing their dirty linen en famille, meaning that they talk openly and freely of the faults committed by ministers, corporations, and individuals. All may see their dirty linen; and as for its washing, let it be but washed and the English care not who has the doing of it. Horace (Ep. II. i. 220) says, Vine'ta egomet cædam mea, "I do my own washing at home." Though the French assert that we disregard this advice, we have the familiar proverb, "It is an ill bird that fouls its own nest."

Washington of Columbia. Simon Bolivar. (1785-1831.)

Wasky or Waskë. Sir Iring's sword.

Right through the head-piece straight the knight Sir Hagan paid
With his resistless Wasky, that sharp and peerless blade.
"Nibelungen-Lied," so.

Was'sail (2 syl.). A salutation used on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day over the spiced-ale cup, hence called the "wassail bowl." (Saxon, Wæs hæl, Be in health.)

Wastlers. Wandering musicians; from wastle, to wander. The carol-singers in Sussex are called wastlers.

Wat. A proper name for a hare. So called from his long ears, or wattles.

By this, poor Wat, far off upon a hill,
Stands on his hinder legs, with listening ear.
Shakespeare, "Venus and Adonis."

Wat's Dyke (Flintshire). A corruption of Wato's Dyke. Wato was the father of Weland, the Vulcan of Northern mythology, and the son of king Vilkinr by a mermaid. This dyke extends from the vicinity of Basingwerk Abbey, in a south-easterly direction, into Denbighshire. The space between it and Offa's dyke, which in some parts is three miles, and in others not above 500 yards, is neutral ground, "where Britons, Danes, and Saxons met for commercial purposes." (See WAN'S DYKE.)

There is a famous thing,
Called Offa's Dyke, that reacheth far in leng'h.
All kinds of ware the Danes might thither bring;
It was free ground, and called the Briton's strength.
Wat's Dyke, likewise, about the same was set,
Between which two both Danes and Britons met,
And traffic still.

Churchyard, "Worthiness of Wales" (1587).

Watch. On board ship there are two sorts of watch—the long watch of four hours, and the dog watch of two; but strictly speaking a watch means four hours. The dog watches are introduced to prevent one party always keeping watch at the same time. ("Dog" is a corruption of dodge. It is the dodging or shifting watch.)

12 to 4 p.m.	Afternoon watch.
4 to 6 "	First dog watch.
6 to 8 "	Second dog watch.
8 to 12 "	First night watch.
12 to 4 a.m.	Middle watch.
4 to 8 "	Morning watch.
8 to 12 "	Forenoon watch.

The Black Watch. The gallant 42nd regiment, the first corps raised for the royal service in the Highlands, and allowed to retain their national garb; called black from the contrast which their dark tartans furnished to the scarlet and white of the other regiments.

Watch'et. Sky-blue. (Saxon, woad-chet, dye of the woad plant.)

Water. The dancing water beautifies ladies, and restores them to perpetual youth.—"Chery and Fairstar."

The Father of Waters. The Mississippi (Indian, Michë Sepë), the chief river of North America. The Missouri, the longest river in the world, is its child, or one of its branches.

The yellow water danced in a basin without overflowing.—"Arabian Nights."

To live in hot water or be in hot water. Bellenden Ker says hot water is "hotte wat terre," meaning "constant care, very wearing."

O'er muckle water drowned the miller. This alludes to water-mills, to which water is essential, but too much water drowns or overflows the mill. The weaver, in fact, is hanged in his own yarn. The French say un embarras de richesse.

Blood thicker than water. "What is born in the skin," &c.; nature will crop up through all the trammels of education and conventionality.

Blood is thicker than water, and between the Latin and Teutonic members of the Western church not a little jealousy and antipathy of race has been perpetuated.—The Times, Nov. 15, 1869.

More water glideth by the mill than wots the miller of ("Titus Andronicus," ii. 1). More things are done in the best regulated family than master or mistress knows of. The Scotch say, "Mickle water goes by the miller when he sleeps."

Water Discoverer. The Persians believe that the lapwing (kudhud) has the power of discovering water underground. (See HAZEL.)

Water-logged. Rendered immovable by too much water in the hold. When a ship leaks and is water-logged it will not make any progress, but is like a log on the sea, tossed and stationary.

Water-Poet. John Taylor, the Thames waterman. (1580-1654.)

I must confess I do want eloquence,
And never scarce did learn my accident,
For having got from "possum" to "posset,"
I there was gravelled, nor could farther get.

Taylor the Water-Poet.

Watergall. The dark rim round the eyes after much weeping. A peculiar appearance in a rainbow which indicates more rain at hand. "Gall" is the Saxon gealew (yellow).

And round about her tear-distrained eye
Blue circles trembled, like rainbows in the sky,—
The watergalls... that foretell new storms.

Shakespeare, "Rape of Lucrece."

Watling Street. A road extending east and west across South Britain. Beginning at Dover it ran through Canterbury to London, and thence to Chester. The word is a corruption of Vitellina strata, the paved road of Vitellius, called by the Britons Guet'alin. Poetically the "Milky Way" has been called the Watling Street of the sky.

Watteau (2 syl.). A French painter famous for his gay colouring, and high-life pastoral scenes. He was made, by special favour, "Peintre de fêtes galantes du roi." (1684-1721.)

Colours which would have delighted Watteau to paint.—Lady Duffus Hardy, "Casual Acquaintance."

Wave. The ninth wave. A notion prevails that the waves keep increasing in regular series till the maximum arrives, and then the series begins again. No doubt when two waves coalesce they form a large one, but this does not occur at fixed intervals. The most common theory is that the tenth wave is the largest, but Tennyson says the ninth.

And then the two
Dropt to the cove, and watch'd the great sea fall,
Wave after wave, each mightier than the last,
Till last, a ninth one, gathering half the deep
And full of voices, slowly rose and plunged
Roaring, and all the wave was in a flange.
Tennyson, "The Holy Grail."

Waverley. Mr. Richard Waverley. Brother of Sir Everard.

Captain Edward Waverley. His son. Sir Everard Waverley. Captain Edward's uncle.

Miss Rachel Waverley. Sir Everard's sister.

Waverley. Captain Edward Waverley, being gored by a stag, resigned his commission, and proposed marriage to Flora MacIvor, but his suit was rejected. Fergus, the brother of Flora, introduced him to prince Charles Edward, and Edward Waverley entered the chevalier's service. He was present at the famous battle of Preston, and saved there the life of colonel Talbot. The colonel, in gratitude, obtained the young man's pardon, and as his father was now dead, he returned to Waverley Honour, married Rose Bradwardine, and settled down quietly, as the hero of a novel should do after he has won the prize for which he encountered his adventures. (See "Waverley; or, 'Tis Sixty Years Since," a romance by Sir Walter Scott.)

Waverley Annals, from 1066 to 1291, in "Gale" (1687).

Wawa (North-American Indian). The wild goose.

Wax Candles are used for the altar because "bees derive their origin from Paradise," and according to Moslem faith will be one of the ten "dumb animals" which will be gathered into heaven. (See PARADISE.)

Way-bit. A Yorkshire way-bit. A large overplus. Ask a Yorkshireman the distance of any place, and he will reply so many miles and a way-bit (wee-bit); but the way-bit will prove a frightful length to the traveller who imagines it means only a little bit over. The Highlanders say, "A mile and a bittock," which means about two miles.

Ways and Means. A parliamentary term, meaning the method of raising the supply of money for the current requirements of the state.

Wayland, the Scandinavian Vulean, was son of the sea-giant Wate, and the sea-nymph Wac-hilt. He was bound apprentice to Mimi the smith. King Nidung cut the sinews of his feet, and cast him into prison, but he escaped in a feather-boat. (Anglo-Saxon, velun, to fabricate.)

Wayland Smith's Cave. A cromlech near Lambourn, Berkshire. Scott, in his "Kenilworth" (ch. xiii.), says, "Here lived a supernatural smith, who would shoe a traveller's horse for a 'consideration.' His fee was sixpence, and if more was offered him he was offended."

Wayland Wood (Norfolk), said to be the scene of the "Babes in the Wood," and a corruption of "Wailing Wood."

Wayz-goose. An entertainment given to journeymen. The word wayz means a "bundle of straw," and wayz-goose a "stubble goose," the crowning dish of the entertainment. (See BEAN FEAST, HARVEST GOOSE.)

We. Coke, in the "Institutes," says the first king that wrote we in his grants was king John. All the kings before him wrote ego (I). This is not correct, as Richard Lion-heart adopted the royal we. (See Rymer's "Fœdera.")

We Three. Did you never see the picture of "We Three?" asks Sir Andrew Aguecheek—not meaning himself, Sir Toby Belch, and the clown, but referring to a public-house sign of Two Loggerheads, with the inscription "We three loggerheads be," the third being the spectator.

Weap'on Salve. A salve said to cure wounds by sympathy. The salve is not applied to the wound, but to the instrument which gave the wound. The direction—"Bind the wound and grease the nail" is still common when a wound has been given by a rusty nail. Sir Kenelm Digby says the salve is sympathetic, and quotes several instances to prove that "as the sword is treated the wound inflicted by it feels. Thus, if the instrument is kept wet, the wound will feel cool; if held to the fire, it will feel hot;" &c.

But she has ta'en the broken lance
And washed it from the clotted gore,
And saved the splinter o'er and o'er.
Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion."

Wear. Never wear the image of Deity in a ring. So Pythagoras taught his disciples, and Moses directed that the Jews should make no image of God. Both meant to teach their disciples that God is incorporeal, and not to be likened to any created form. (See Iamblichus, "Protreptics, Symbol xxiv.")

Never wear a brown hat in Friesland.
(See HAT.)

To wear the willow. (See WILLOW.)
To wear the wooden sword. (See WOODEN.)

Weasel. Weasels suck eggs. Hence Shakespeare:

The weazel Scot
Comes sneaking, and so sucks the princely egg.
"Henry V.," i. 2.

I can suck mel'n'holy out of a song, as a weazel sucks eggs.—"As You Like It," ii. 5.

To catch a weasel asleep. To catch a person nodding; to find he has not his weather-eye open. The French say, Croire avoir trouvé la pie au nid (to expect to find the pie on its nest). The vigilant habits of these animals explain the allusions.

Weather-Cock. By a papal enactment made in the middle of the ninth century, the figure of a cock was set up on every church-steeple as the emblem of St. Peter. The emblem is in allusion to his denial of our Lord thrice before the cock crew twice. On the second crowing of the cock the warning of his Master flashed across his memory, and the repentant apostle "went out and wept bitterly."

Weather-Eye. I have my weather-eye open. I have my wits about me; I know what I am after; I can see a hawk from a hanser. The weather-eye is that which looks at the sky, &c., to forecast the weather.

Weather-Gage. To get the weather-gage of a person. To get the advantage over him. A ship is said to have the weather-gage of another when it has got the windward thereof.

Were the line
Of Rokeby once combined with mine,
I gain the weather-gage of fate.
Sir Walter Scott, "Rokeby."

Web. The web of life. The destiny of an individual from the cradle to the grave. The allusion is to the three Fates who, according to Roman mythology, spin the thread of life, the pattern being the events which are to occur.

Weave the web, weave the woof,
The winding-sheet of Edward's race;
Give ample room and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace.
Gray, "The Bard."

Wedding Finger. Macrobius says the thumb is too busy to be set apart, the forefinger and little finger are only half protected, the middle finger is called medicus, and is too opprobrious for the purpose of honour, so the only finger left is the pronubus or wedding finger. (See RING, FINGERS.)

Week. The Great Week (La Grande Semaine). The insurrectionary Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of July 27, 28, and 29, 1830, when Charles X. was driven from the throne.

Passion Week. The week which contains Good Friday.

The Feast of Weeks. A Jewish festival, which lasted seven weeks, that is a "week of weeks," after the Passover. Our Pentecost or Whitsuntide.

Weeping Brides. A notion long prevailed in this country that it augured ill for a matrimonial alliance if the bride did not weep profusely at the wedding.

As no witch could shed more than three tears, and those from her left eye only, a copious flood of tears gave assurance to the husband that the lady had not "plighted her troth" to Satan, and was no witch.

Weeping Cross. To go by Weeping Cross. To repent, to grieve. In ancient times weeping crosses were crosses where penitents offered their devotions. In Stafford there is a weeping cross.

Few men have wedded....their paramours....but have come home by Weeping Cross.—Florio, "Montaigne."

Weeping Philosopher. Heraclitus; so called because he grieved at the folly of man. (Flourished B.C. 500.)

Weerdt (John de). A German general of great repute, the terror of the French in the reign of Louis XIII. His name became proverbial in France, but got corrupted into De-Vert.

Weigh Anchor. Be off, get you gone. To weigh anchor is to lift it from its moorings, so that the ship may start on her voyage. As soon as this is done the ship is under-weigh—i.e., in movement. (Saxon, wagan, to lift up, carry.)

"Get off with you; come, come! weigh anchor."—Sir Walter Scott, "The Antiquary."

Weir (Major). A favourite baboon of Sir Robert Redgauntlet. Sir Robert's piper went to the infernal regions to obtain the knight's receipt of rent, which had been paid, but no receipt could be found. The knight told the piper that his favourite baboon had carried it off and secreted it in the castle turret.—Sir Walter Scott, "Redgauntlet."

Weissnichtwo (vis-neekt-vo). I know not where; Utopia; Kennaquhair; an imaginary place in Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus." (See UTOPIA.)

Welch Main. Same as a "Battle Royal." (See BATTLE.)

Welch'er. One who lays a bet, but absconds if he loses. It means a Welshman, and is based upon the nursery rhyme, "Taffy was a Welshman, Taffy was a thief."

Well. Dan Chaucer, well of English undefiled. So Geoffrey Chaucer is spoken of by Spenser in the "Faery Queen," iv. 2. (1328-1400.)

Well of St. Keyne (Cornwall). The reputed virtue of this well is that whichever of a married pair first drinks its waters will be the paramount power of the house. Southey has a ballad on the subject.

Well of Samaria. now called Nabulus, is seventy-five feet deep.

Well of Wisdom. This was the well under the protection of the god Mimir (q.v.). Odin, by drinking thereof, became the wisest of all beings.—Scandinavian mythology.

Well-beloved. Charles VI. of France, le Bien-aimé. (1368-1422.)

Well-founded Doctor. Ægidius Roma'us, general of the Augustinians. (*-1316.)

Weller (Sam). Pickwick's factotum. His wit, fidelity, archness, and wide-awakeness are inimitable. — Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

Tony Weller. Father of Sam. Type of the old stage-coach-man; portly in size, and dressed in a broad-brimmed hat, great-coat of many capes, and top-boots. His stage-coach was his castle, and elsewhere he was as green as a sailor on terra firma. — Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."

Wellington. Arthur Wellesley, duke of Wellington, called "The Iron Duke," from his iron constitution and iron will. (1769-1852.)

Wellington's horse, Copenhagen. (Died at the age of twenty-seven.)

Le Wellington des Joueurs. Lord Rivers was so called in Paris.

Le Wellington des Joueurs lost £23,000 at a sitting beginning at twelve at night, and ending at seven the following morning. — Edinburgh Review (July, 1844).

Wells (Somersetshire). So called from St. Andrew's Well.

Weno'nah. Mother of Hiawath'a. Her lover Mudjokee'wis, the west wind, proved false, and Wenonah died. — Longfellow, "Hiawatha."

Werner alias Kruitznar, alias Count Siegendorf. Being driven from the dominion of his father, he wandered about as a beggar for twelve years. Count Stral'enheim, being the next heir, hunted him from place to place. At length Stral'enheim, travelling through Silesia, was rescued from the Oder by Ulric, and lodged in an old palace where Werner had been lodging for some few days. Werner robbed Stral'enheim of a rouleau of gold, but scarcely had he done so when he recognised in Ulric his lost son, and chid him for saving the count. Ulric murdered Stral'enheim, and provided for his father's escape to Siegendorf castle, near Prague. Werner recovered his dominion, but found that his son was a murderer, and imagination is left to fill up the future fate of both father and son. — Byron, "Werner."

Werther. The sentimental hero of Goethe's romance called "The Sorrows of Werther."

Werwolf or Were-Wolf (French, loup-garou). A bogie who roams about devouring infants, sometimes under the form of a wolf followed by dogs, sometimes as a white dog, sometimes as a black goat, and occasionally in an invisible form. Its skin is bullet-proof, unless the bullet has been blessed in a chapel dedicated to St. Hubert. This superstition was once common to almost all Europe, and still lingers in Brittany, Limousin, and Auvergne. In the fifteenth century a council of theologians, convoked by the emperor Sigismund, gravely decided that the loup-garou was a reality. It is somewhat curious that we say a "bug-bear," and the French a "bug-wolf." ("Wer-wolf" is Anglo-Saxon wer, a man, and wolf—a man in the semblance of a wolf. "Garou" is either wer-ou or war-ou, as in "warlock;" ou is probably a corruption of ore, an ogre.)

* * Ovid tells the story of Lycaon, king of Arcadia, turned into a wolf, because he tested the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a "hash of human flesh."

Herodotos describes the Neuri as sorcerers, who had the power of assuming once a year the shape of wolves.

Pliny relates that one of the family of Anteus was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years.

St. Patrick, we are told, converted Vereticus king of Wales into a wolf.

Wesleyan. A follower of John Wesley; a Methodist of the Wesleyan section.

Wessex, or West Saxon Kingdom, included Hants, Dorset, Wilts, Somerset, Surrey, Gloucestershire, and Bucks.

Western (Miss Sophy'a). The lady-love of Tom Jones. — Fielding, "Tom Jones."

Squire Western. A jovial fox-hunting country gentleman of the olden times. — Fielding, "Tom Jones."

Westmoreland (Land of the West Moors). Geoffrey of Monmouth says (iv. 17) that Mar or Ma'rius, son of Arviragus, one of the descendants of Brutus the Trojan wanderer, killed Rodric, a Pict, and set up a monument of his victory in a place which he called "Westmar-land," and the chronicler adds that the "inscription of this stone remains to this day."

Wetherell (Elizabeth). A pseudonym adopted by Miss Susan Warner, an American writer, author of "The Wide, Wide World," and other works.

Weyd-monat. The Anglo-Saxon name for June, "because the beasts did then weyd in the meadow, that is to say, go and feed there."—Verstegan.

Wf. A printer's mark to indicate that the letter marked is correct but of the wrong type. W means "wrong," and f "font." (See FONT.)

Whale. Very like a whale. Very much like a cock-and-bull story; a fudge. Hamlet chaffs Polonius by comparing a cloud to a camel, and then to a weasel, and when the courtier assents Hamlet adds, "Or like a whale;" to which Polonius answers, "Very like a whale" (iii. 2).

Whalebone (2 syl.). White as whalebone. Our forefathers seemed to confuse the walrus with the whale; ivory was made from the teeth of the walrus, and "white as whalebone" is really a blunder for "white as walrus-bone."

Wharncliffe (2 syl.). A Wharncliffe meeting is a meeting of the shareholders of a railway company, called for the purpose of obtaining their assent to a bill in Parliament bearing on the company's railway; so called from lord Wharncliffe, its originator.

Wharton. Philip Wharton, duke of Northumberland, described by Pope in the "Moral Essays," in the lines beginning—

Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days.

A most brilliant orator, but so licentious that he wasted his patrimony in drunkenness and self-indulgence. He was outlawed for treason, and died in a wretched condition at a Bernardine convent in Catalonia. (1698-1731.)

What we Gave we Have, What we spent we had, What we had we lost. Epitaph of the Good Earl of Courtenay.—Gibbon, "History of the Courtenay Family."

This is a free translation of Martial's distich—

Extra fortunam est quidquid donatur amicis
Quas dederis, solus semper habebis opes.

Whately, archbishop of Dublin, nicknamed at Oxford "The White Bear," for the rude, unceremonious way in which he would trample upon an adversary in argument. (1787-1863.)

Wheal or Huel means a tin-mine (Cornwall).

Wheel. Emblematical of St. Catharine, who was put to death on a wheel somewhat resembling a chaff-cutter.

St. Donatus bears a wheel set round with lights.

St. Euphemia and St. Willigis both carry wheels.

St. Quintin is sometimes represented with a broken wheel at his feet.

Whelps. Fifth-rate men of war. Thus, in Howell's letters we read, "At the return of this fleet two of the whelps were cast away;" and in the Travels of Sir W. Brereton we read, "I went aboard one of the king's ships, called the ninth whelp, which is 215 ton and tonnage in king's books." In queen Elizabeth's navy was a ship called Lion's Whelp, and her navy was distinguished as first, second . . . tenth whelp.

Whetstone. (See ACCIUS NAVIUS.)

Whig is from Whiggam-more, a corruption of Ugham-more (pack-saddle thieves), from the Celtic ugham (a pack-saddle). The Scotch freebooters were called pack-saddle thieves, from the pack-saddles which they used to employ for the stowage of plunder. The marquis of Argyle collected a band of these vagabonds, and instigated them to aid him in opposing certain government measures in the reign of James I., and in the reign of Charles II. all who opposed government were called the Argyle whiggamors, contracted into whigs. (See TORY.)

The south-west counties of Scotland have seldom been enough to serve them all the year round, and the northern parts producing more than they used, those in the west went in summer to buy at Leith the stores that came from the north. From the word whiggam, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whiggamors, contracted into whigs. Now in the year before the news came down of duke Hamilton's defeat, the ministers animated the people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up, marching on the head of their parishes, with an unheard-of fury, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, they being about 6,000. This was called the "Whiggamors' Inroad;" and ever after that all who opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs. From Scotland the word was brought into England, where it is now one of our unhappy terms of disunion.—Bishop Burnet, "Owen Times."

Whig'ism. The political tenets of the whigs, which may be broadly stated to be political and religious liberty. Certainly bishop Burnet's assertion that they are "opposed to the court" may or may not be true. In the reigns of Charles II. and his brother James, no doubt they were opposed to the court, but it was far otherwise in the reign of William III., George I., &c., when the Tories were the anti-court party.

Whip. He whipped round the corner—ran round it quickly. (Dutch, wippen; Welsh, ceipwia, to move briskly; ceip, quick.)

He whipped it up in a minute. The allusion is the hoisting machine called a whip—i.e., a rope passed through a single block or pulley, and attached to the yard-arm.

Whip'pers-in (of the House of Commons). Those who hunt up the members on special votes. In fox-hunting the whippers-in urge on the lagging hounds.

Whipping Boy. A boy kept to be whipped when a prince deserved chastisement. Mungo Murray stood for Charles I. Barnaby Fitzpatrick, Edward VI.'s whipping boy, is mentioned by Fuller ("Church History," ii. 342). D'Ossat and Du Perron, afterwards cardinals, were whipped by Clement VIII. for Henri IV.

Whisk'ers. A security for money. John de Castro of Portugal, having captured the castle of Diu, in India, borrowed of the inhabitants of Goa 1,000 pistoles for the maintenance of his fleet, and gave one of his whiskers as security of payment, saying, "All the gold in the world cannot equal the value of this natural ornament, which I deposit in your hands."

Whiskey. Contracted from the Gaelic uoshk'-a-pai (water of health). Usquebaugh, Irish uisge'-a-bagh (water of life); eau de vie, French (water of life).

L.L. whiskey is Lord Lieutenant whiskey. The duke of Richmond, who was lord lieutenant in 1807, was a great humorist and bon vivant. One day he sent to Kinahan and Co. for samples of their whiskey, and having made his choice requested that the vat should be reserved for his use. Accordingly it was marked with L.L. (lord lieutenant), and the same quality of whiskey has ever since retained the name.

Whist. Cotton says that "the game is so called from the silence that is to be observed in the play." Dr. Johnson has adopted this derivation, but Taylor the Water-poet called the game Whisk, to the great discomfiture of this etymology.

Whistle. You may whistle for that. You must not expect it. The reference is to sailors' whistling for the wind. "They call the winds, but will they come when they are called?"

Only a little hour ago
I was whistling to St. Antonio
For a capful of wind to fill our sail,
And instead of a breeze he has sent a gale.
Longfellow, "Golden Legend," v.

Worth the whistle. Worth calling; worth inviting; worth notice. The dog is worth the pains of whistling for. Thus Heywood, in one of his dialogues consisting entirely of proverbs, says, "It is a poor dog that is not worth the whistling." Goneril says to Albany—

I have been worth the whistle.
Shakespeare, "King Lear," iv. 2.

You must whistle for more. In the old whistle-tankards, the whistle comes into play when the tankard is empty, to announce to the drawer that more liquor is wanted. Hence the expression, if a person wants liquor he must whistle for it.

You paid too dearly for your whistle. You paid dearly for something you fancied, but found that it did not answer your expectation. The allusion is to a story told by Dr. Franklin of his nephew, who set his mind on a common whistle, which he bought of a boy for four times its value. Franklin says the ambitious who dance attendance on court, the miser who gives this world and the next for gold, the libertine who ruins his health for pleasure, the girl who marries a brute for money, all pay "too much for their whistle."

To wet one's whistle. To take a drink. Whistle means a pipe (Latin, fistula; Saxon, hwistle), hence the wind-pipe.

So was his jolly whistal well y-wet.
Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales,"

Whistle for the Wind. (See CAP-FULL.)

What gales are sold on Lapland's shore!
How whistle rash bids tempests roar!
Sir Walter Scott, "Rokeby," H. 11.

White denotes purity, simplicity, and candour; innocence, truth, and hope.

The ancient Druids, the priests of Jupiter, and indeed the priests generally of antiquity, used to wear white vestments, as do the clergy of the Established Church of England when they officiate in any sacred service. The magi also wore white robes.

The head of Osiris, in Egypt, was adorned with a white tiara.

The victims offered to Jupiter were white; white horses were sacrificed to the sun, white oxen were selected for sacrifice by the Druids, and white elephants are held sacred in Siam.

¶ To prove black's white. To prove anything, no matter how absurd. The original meaning of black was white or wan, preserved in the word bleach. Wan is the same as wane, and means deficient in colour; and this synonym gives the key to the word black as a negative term. (Saxon, blac, pale, livid; Swedish, blek, bleached; Danish, bleek, pale; Greek, blax, pale, delicate.)

¶ Knight of the White Moon. Sampson Carrasco assumed this character and device, in order to induce Don Quixote to abandon knight-errantry and return home. He challenged the knight to single combat, and the condition was, that if the Man'ebegan lunatic was overthrown he should return home, and abandon for twelve months the profession of chivalry. Carrasco was the victor, and the occupation of Don Quixote being taken from him, he lingered a little while and then died.—Cervantès, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. iv. 12, &c.

White Brethren or White-clad Brethren. A sect in the beginning of the fifteenth century. Mosheim says (bk. ii., p. 2, ch. 5) a certain priest came from the Alps, clad in white, with an immense concourse of followers all dressed in white linen also. They marched through several provinces, following a cross borne by their leader. Boniface X. ordered their leader to be burnt, and the multitude dispersed.

White Caps. A rebellious party of zealous Mahometans, put down by Kien-lông, the Chinese emperor, in 1753.

White Cockade. The badge worn by the followers of Charles Edward, the Pretender.

White Elephant. King of the White Elephant. The proudest title borne by the kings of Ava and Siam. In Ava the white elephant bears the title of "lord," and has a minister of high rank to superintend his household.

To have a white elephant to keep. To have an expensive and unprofitable dignity to support, or pet article to take care of. For example, a person moving is determined to keep a pet carpet, and therefore hires his house to fit his carpet. The king of Siam makes a present of a white elephant to such of his courtiers as he wishes to ruin.

White Feather. To show the white feather. To show cowardice. No gamecock has a white feather. A white feather indicates a cross-breed in birds.

Showing the white feather. Some years ago a bloody war was raging between the Indians and settlers of the backwoods of North America. A Quaker, who refused to fly, saw one day a horde of savages rushing down towards his house. He set food before them, and when they had eaten the chief fastened a white feather over the door as a badge of friendship and peace. Though many bands passed that house, none ever violated the covenant by injuring its inmates or property.

White Friars. The Carmelites; so called because they dressed in white.

Whitefriars, London; so called from a monastery of White Friars which formerly stood in Water Lane.

Whitefriars. A novel, by Emma Robinson.

White Horse of Wantage (Berkshire), cut in the chalk hills. This horse commemorates a great victory gained by Alfred over the Danes, in the reign of his brother Ethelred I. The battle is called the battle of Æscesdun (Ashtrec-hill). The horse is 374 feet long, and may be seen at the distance of fifteen miles.—Dr. Wise.

An annual ceremony was once held, called "Scouring the White Horse."

White House. The presidential mansion in the United States. It is a building of freestone, painted white, at Washington. (See WHITEHALL.)

White Ladies (Les Dames Blanches). A species of fee in Normandy. They lurk in ravines, fords, bridges, and other narrow passes, and ask the passenger to dance. If they receive a courteous answer, well; but if a refusal, they seize the churl and fling him into a ditch, where thorns and briars may serve to teach him gentleness of manners. The most famous of these ladies is "La dame d'Aprigny," who used to occupy the site of the present Rue St. Quentin, at Bayeux, and "La dame Abonde." "Vocant dom'nam Abund'nam pro eo quod dom'ibus, quas frequentant, abundan'tiam bono'rum tempora'lium praesta're putantur non al'iter tibi sentiendum est nequ'e al'iter quam quemad'modum de illis audivisti." — William of Auvergne (1248). (See BERCHTA.)

One kind of these the Italians Fata name; The French call Fée; we Sylbs; and the same Others White Dames, and those that them have seen Night Ladies some, of which Habundia's queen. "Hierarchie," viii., p. 507.

White Lady of German legend. A being dressed in white, who appeared at the castle of German princes, &c., when any important event was about to take place. She is said to carry a bunch of keys at her side, and to sit watching over children when their nurses lie asleep. The first instance of this apparition occurs in the sixteenth century, and the name given to the lady is Bertha of Rosenberg (in Bohemia).

The White Lady. The legend says that Bertha promised the workmen of Neuhaus a sweet soup and carp on the completion of the castle. In remembrance thereof, these dainties are given to the poor of Bohemia on Maundy Thursday.

The most celebrated in Britain is the White Lady of Avenel, the creation of Sir Walter Scott.

The White Lady of Ireland. The Benshie (q.v.).

White Rose. The House of York, whose emblem it was.

White Rose of England. So Perkin Warbeck or Osbeck was always addressed by Margaret of Burgundy, sister of Edward IV.

The White Rose of Raby. Cecily, wife of Richard duke of York, and mother of Edward IV. and Richard III. She was the youngest of twenty-one children.

White Sheep (Ak-koin-loo). A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. The Sophive'an dynasty of Persia was founded by one of this tribe.

White Squall. One which produces no diminution of light, in contradistinction to a black squall, in which the clouds are black and heavy.

White Stone. Days marked with a white stone. Days of pleasure; days to be remembered with gratification. The Romans used a white stone or piece of chalk to mark their lucky days with on the calendar. Those that were unlucky they marked with black charcoal. (See RED-LETTER DAY.)

White Surrey. The horse of Richard III.

Saddle White Surrey for the field. Shakespeare, "Richard III.," v. 3.

White Tincture. That preparation which the alchemists believed would convert any baser metal into silver. It is also called the Stone of the Second Order, the Little Elixir, and the Little Magisterium. (See RED TINCTURE.)

White Water-lotus (Pe-lien-kaou). A secret society which greatly disturbed the empire of China in the reign of Kea-King. (1796-1820.)

White Widow. The duchess of Tyrconnel, wife of Richard Talbot, lord-deputy of Ireland under James II., created duke of Tyrconnel a little before the king's abdication. After the death of Talbot, a female, supposed to be his duchess, supported herself for a few days by her needle. She wore a white mask and dressed in white.—Pennant, "London," p. 147.

Whitebait Dinner. The ministerial dinner that announces the near close of the parliamentary session. Sir Robert Preston, M.P. for Dover, first invited his friend George Rose (secretary of the Treasury) and an elder brother of the Trinity House to dine with him at his fishing cottage, on the banks of Dagenham lake. This was at the close of the session. Rose on one occasion proposed that Mr. Pitt, their mutual friend, should be asked to join them; this was done, and Pitt promised to repeat his visit the year following, when other members swelled the party. This went on for several years, when Pitt suggested that the muster should be in future nearer town, and Greenwich was selected. Lord Camden next advised that each man should pay his quota. The dinner became an annual feast, and is now a matter of course. The time of meeting is Trinity Monday, or as near Trinity Monday as circumstances will allow, and therefore is near the close of the session.

Whiteboys. A secret agrarian association organised in Ireland about the year 1759; so called because they wore white shirts in their nightly expeditions. In 1787 a new association appeared, the members of which called themselves "Right-boys." The Whiteboys were originally called "Levellers," from their throwing down fences and levelling enclosures. (See LEVELLERS.)

Whitehall (London) obtained its name from the white and fresh appearance of the front, compared with the ancient buildings in York Place.—Brayley, "Londoniana." (See WHITE HOUSE.)

Whitewashed. Said of a person who has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He went to prison covered with debts and soiled with "dirty ways:" he comes out with a clean bill to begin the contest of life afresh.

Whitsunday. White Sunday. In the primitive church, the newly-baptised were white from Easter to Pentecost, and were called alba'ti (white-robed). The last of the Sundays, which was also the chief festival, was called emphatically Domin'ica in Albis (Sunday in White).

A correspondent in Notes and Queries offers a very clever suggestion: As the word was originally written Wit-Sonday or Wite-Sonday, the etymology is probably Wit-Sunday—i.e., Wisdom Sunday, the day when the Apostles were filled with wisdom by the Holy Ghost.

Whittle Down. To cut away with a knife or whittle; to reduce; to enervate. In Cumberland, underpaid schoolmasters are allowed Whittle-gait—i.e., the privilege of knife and fork at the table of those who employ them.

The Americans "whittled down the royal throne;" "whittled out a commonwealth;" "whittle down the forest trees;" "whittle out a railroad;" "whittle down to the thin end of nothing."

We have whittled down our loss extremely, and will not allow a man more than 350 English slain out of 4,000.—Walpole.

Whole Duty of Man. Tonison, bishop of Linceln, says the author was Dr. Chaplin, of University College, Oxford.—Evelyn, "Diary."

Thomas Hearne ascribes the authorship to archbishop Sancroft.

Some think Dr. Hawkins, who wrote the introduction, was the author.

The following names have also been suggested:—Lady Packington (assisted by Dr. Fell), archbishop Sterne, archbishop Woodhead, William Fulman, archbishop Frewen (president of Magdalen College, Oxford), and others.

Whom the Gods Love Die Young (Herodotos). Cited in "Don Juan," canto iv. 12 (death of Haidee).

Wicked (2 syl.), in connection with wick, like the French méchant with mèche. This seems to be an ecclesiastical allusion. The good are "the lights of the earth," the evil are smouldering wicks. We read two or three times in the Bible that the "candle of the wicked shall be put out." (French, mécher, to smoke with brimstone. "Wick" is the Saxon weok, a reed. See Ps. i.; compare Isa. xlii. 3.)

Wicked Bible. (See BIBLE.)

Wicket-gate. The entrance to the road that leadeth to the Celestial City. Over the portal is the inscription—"KNOCK, AND IT SHALL BE OPENED UNTO YOU."—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

Wicliffe (John), called "The morning star of the Reformation." (1324-1384.)

Wide nostrils (3 syl.; French, Briuguénarilles). A huge giant, who subsisted on windmills, and lived in the island of Tohu. When Pantagruel and his fleet reached this island, no food could be cooked because Widenostrils had swallowed "every individual pan, skillet, kettle, frying-pan, dripping-pan, boiler, and saucepan in the land," and died from eating a lump of butter. Tohu and Bohu, two contiguous islands (in Hebrew, toil and confusion), mean lands laid waste by war. The giant had eaten everything, so that there "was nothing to fry with," as the French say—i.e., nothing left to live upon.

Widow (in "Hudibras"). The relict of Aminidab Wilmer or Willmot, an Independent, slain at Edgehill. She had £200 left her. Sir Hudibras fell in love with her.

Widow Bird, a corruption of Whydow Bird; so called from the country of Whydow in Western Africa. The blunder is perpetuated in the scientific name given to the genus, which is the Latin Fid'ua, a widow.

Widow Blackacre. A perverse, bustling, masculine, pettifogging, litigious woman.—Wycherley, “The Plain Dealer.”

Widows' Caps. This was a Roman custom. Widows were obliged to wear “weeds” for ten months.—Seneca, “Epistles,” lxxv.

Widows' Pianos. Inferior instruments sold as bargains; so called from the ordinary advertisement announcing that a widow lady is compelled to sell her piano, for which she will take half-price.

Widow's Port. A wine sold for port, but of quite a different family. As a widow retains her husband's name after the husband is taken away, so this mixture of potato-spirit and some inferior wine retains the name of port, though every drop of port is taken from it.

We have all heard of widow's port, and of the instinctive dread all persons who have any respect for their health have for it.—The Times.

Wieland (2 syl.). The famous smith of Scandinavian fable. He and Amilias had a contest of skill in their handicraft. Wieland's sword cleft his rival down to the waist; but so sharp was the sword, that Amilias was not aware of the cut till he attempted to stir, when he divided into two pieces. This sword was named Balmung.

Wife is from the verb to weave. Saxon, wefan; Danish, weeven; German, weben; whence weib, a woman, one who works at the distaff. Woman is called the distaff. Hence Dryden calls Anne “a distaff on the throne.” While a girl was spinning her wedding clothes she was simply a spinster; but when this task was done, and she was married, she became a wife, or one who had already woven her allotted task.

Alfred, in his will, speaks of his male and female descendants as those of the spear-side and those of the spindle-side, a distinction still observed by the Germans; and hence the effigies on graves of spears and spindles.

Wig. Latin pilucca, a head of hair; Italian perruca, French perruque, whence periwig, contracted into ‘wig.’

A big wig. A magnate. Louis XIV. had long flowing hair, and the courtiers, out of compliment to the young king, wore perukes. When Louis grew older he adopted the wig, which soon incumbered the head and shoulders of all the aristocracy of England and France.

An ye fa' over the clough there will be but ae wig left in the parish, and that's the minister's.—Sir Walter Scott, “The Antiquary.”

Make Wigs. A perukier, who fancied himself “married to immortal verse,” sent his epic to Voltaire, asking him to examine it and give his “candid opinion” of its merits. The witty patriarch of Ferney simply wrote on the MS., “Make Wigs, Make Wigs, Make Wigs,” and returned it to the barber-poet. (See SUTOR—Stick to the Cow.)

Wiga (Saxon, wig, a warrior). This word enters into many names of places, as Wigan in Lancashire, where Arthur is said to have routed the Saxons.

Wight (Isle of) means probably channel island (Celtic, gwy, water; gwyth, the channel). The inhabitants used to be called Unthii or Gwythii, the inhabitants of the channel isle.

Another derivation is Jute (a predacious warrior), whence the island was once called Ytaland or Gytaland, the land of the Ytas, Gytas, or Jutes; but Yta and Gyta are merely other forms of gwytha.

Isle of Wight, according to the famous “Anglo-Saxon Chronicle,” is so called from Wihthgar, great grandson of king Cerdic, who conquered the island. All eponymic names—that is, names of persons, like the names of places, are more fit for fable than history: as Cissa to account for Cissanceaster (Chichester), Horsa to account for Horsted, Hengist to account for Hengistbury, Brutus to account for Britain, and so on.

Wig'wam. An Indian hut (America). The Knisteneaux word is wigwaum, and the Algonquin wigwawum.

Wild (Jonathan), the detective, born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire. He brought to the gallows thirty-five highwaymen, twenty-two housebreakers, and ten returned convicts. He was himself hanged at Tyburn for housebreaking “amidst the execrations of an enraged populace, who pelted him with stones to the last moment of his existence.” (1682-1725.) Fielding has a novel entitled “Jonathan Wild.”

Wild as a March Hare. The hare in spring, after one or two rings, will often run straight on end for several miles. This is especially the case with the buck, which therefore affords the best sport.

Wild Boar of Ardennes. William de la Marck.—Sir Walter Scott, "Quentin Durward."

Wild Boar. An emblem of warlike fury and merciless brutality.

Wild Boy of Hameln or Man of Nature, found in the forest of Hertswood, Hanover. He walked on all fours, climbed trees like a monkey, fed on grass and leaves, and could never be taught to articulate a single word. Dr. Arbuthnot and lord Monboddo sanctioned the notion that this poor boy was really an unsophisticated specimen of the genus homo; but Blumenbach showed most conclusively that he was born dumb, of weak intellect, and was driven from his home by a stepmother. He was discovered in 1725; was called Peter the Wild Boy; and died at Broadway Farm, near Berkhamstead, in 1786 (at the supposed age of seventy-three).

Wild Children.

(1) Peter the Wild Boy. (See above.)

(2) Mlle. Lablane, found by the villagers of Soigny, near Chalons, in 1731; she died at Paris in 1780 (at the supposed age of sixty-two).

(3) A child captured by three sportsmen in the woods of Cannes (France) in 1798. (See "World of Wonders," pt. ix., p. 61, Correspondence.)

Wild-geese Chase. A hunt after a mare's-nest. This chase has two defects: First, it is very hard to catch the goose; and, secondly, it is of very little worth when it is caught.

To lead one a wild-geese chase. To beguile one with false hopes, or put one on the pursuit of something not practicable, or at any rate not worth the chase.

Wild Huntsman.

The German tradition is that a spectral hunter with dogs frequents the Black Forest to chase the wild animals.—Sir Walter Scott, "Wild Huntsman."

The French story of "Le Grand Veneur" is laid in Fontainebleau Forest, and is considered to be "St. Hubert."—Father Mathieu.

The English name is "Herne the Hunter," who was once a keeper in Windsor Forest. In winter time, at midnight, he walks about Herne's Oak, and blasts trees and cattle. He wears horns, and rattles a chain in a "most hideous manner."—"Merry Wives of Windsor," iv. 4.

The Scotch lay a phantom chase in "Albania."

Wild Man of the Forest. Orson, brother of Valentine and nephew of king Pepin.—"Valentine and Orson." (See ORSON.)

Wild Oats. He is sowing his wild oats—indulging the buoyant folly of youth; living in youthful dissipation. The idea is that the mind is a field of good oats, but these pranks are wild oats or weeds sown amongst the good seed, choking it for a time, and about to die out and give place to genuine corn. The corresponding French phrase is Jeter ses premiers feux, which reminds us of Cicero's expression, Nondum illi deferbuit adolescentiâ.

Wild Women (Wildē Frauën) of Germany resemble the Ellë-maids of Scandinavia. Like them, they are very beautiful, have long flowing hair, and live in hills. (See WUNDERBERG.)

Wi'd'air (Sir Harry). A profligate in Farquhar's "Constant Couple."

Wilde. A John or Johnny Wilde is one who wears himself to skin and bone to add house to house and barn to barn. The tale is that John Wilde of Rodenkirchen, in the Isle of Rügen, found one day a glass slipper belonging to one of the hill-folks. Next day the little brownie, in the character of a merchant, came to redeem it, and John asked as the price "that he should find a gold ducat in every furrow he ploughed." The bargain was concluded, and the avaricious hunks never ceased ploughing morning, noon, nor night, but died within twelve months from over-work.—Rügen tradition.

Wildfire (Madge). The crazy daughter of Old Meg Murdochson, the gipsy thief. She had been seduced when a giddy girl, and the murder of her infant had turned her brain.—Sir Walter Scott, "Heart of Mid-Lothian."

Wile away Time (not While). It is the same word as "guile," to "beguile the time" (fuller'ē tempus).

Wilfrid, son of Oswald Wycliffe, a lad after the type of Beattie's Minstrel. He was in love with Matilda, heir of Rokeby's knight. After various villainies, Oswald forced Matilda to promise to marry his son. Wilfrid thanked her, and fell dead at her feet.—Sir Walter Scott, "Rokeby."

St. Wilfrid. Patron saint of bakers, being himself of the same craft. (634-709.)

St. Wilfrid's Needle. A narrow passage in the crypt of Ripon cathedral, built by Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, and used to try whether virgins deserve the name or not. It is said that none but virgins can pass this ordeal.

Wilhelm Meister (2 syl.). The first true German novel. It was by Goethe, who died 1832, aged eighty-three.

William (2 syl.; in "Jerusalem Delivered"), archbishop of Orange. An ecclesiastical warrior, who besought pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent in the crusade. He took 400 armed men in his train from his own diocese.

William, youngest son of William Rufus. He wore a casque of gold, and was the leader of a large army of British bow-men and Irish volunteers in the crusading army.—Tasso, "Jerusalem Delivered," bk. iii.

* * English history teaches that William Rufus was never married. (See ORLANDO FURIOSO.)

Belted Will. William lord Howard, warden of the Western Marches. (1563-1640.)

His Bilboa blade, by Marchmen felt,
Hung in a broad and studded belt;
Hence, in rude phrase, the borderers still Called noble Howard "Belted Will."

Sir Walter Scott, "Lay of the Last Minstrel," v. 16.

St. William of Aquitaine was one of the soldiers of Charlemagne, and helped to chase the Saracens from Languedoc. In 808 he renounced the world, and died 812. He is usually represented as a mailed soldier.

St. William of Malavalle or Maleval. A French nobleman of very abandoned life; but being converted, he went as pilgrim to Jerusalem, and on his return retired to the desert of Malavalle. He is depicted in a Benedictine's habit, with armour lying beside him. (Died 1157.)

St. William of Montpellier is represented with a lily growing from his mouth, with the words Ave Maria in gold letters on it.

St. William of Monte Virgine is drawn with a wolf by his side. (Died 1142.)

St. William of Norwich was the celebrated child said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137. He is represented as a child crowned with thorns, or crucified, or holding a hammer and nails in his hands, or wounded in his side with a knife. (See HUGH OF LINCOLN.)

* * In Percy's "Reliques," bk. i. 3, there is a tale of a lad named Hew, son of lady Helen, of Merryland town (Milan), who was allured by a Jew's daughter with an apple. She stuck him with a penknife, rolled him in lead, and cast him into a well. Lady Helen went in search of her boy, and the child's ghost cried out from the bottom of the well—

The lead is wondrous heavy, mither,
The well is wondrous deep;
A keen penknife sticks in my hert;
A word I dounae speik.

St. William of Roeschild is represented with a torch flaming on his grave. (Died 1203.)

St. William of York is depicted in pontificals, and bearing his archiepiscopal cross. (Died 1154.)

William II. The body of this king was picked up by Purkess, a charcoal-burner of Minestead, and conveyed in a cart to Winchester. The name of Purkess is still to be seen in the same village.

A Minestead churl, whose wonted trade
Was burning charcoal in the glade,
Outstretched amid the gorse
The monarch found; and in his wain
He raised, and to St. Swithin's faue Conveyed the bleeding corse. W. S. Rose.

William III. It was not known till the discovery of the correspondence of Cardonnel, secretary of Marlborough, by the Historical MS. Commission in 1869, that our Dutch king was a great eater. Cardonnel, writing from the Hague, October, 1701, to under-secretary Ellis, says—"It is a pity his majesty will not be more temperate in his diet. Should I eat so much, and of the same kinds, I dare say I should scarce have survived it so long, and yet I reckon myself none of the weakest constitutions."

William of Cloude's lie (2 syl.). A noted outlaw and famous archer of the "north countrie." (See CLYM OF THE CLOUGH.)

William of Newburgh (Gulielmus Nonbrigensis), monk of Newburgh in Yorkshire, surnamed Little, and sometimes called Gulielmus Parvus, wrote a history in five books, from the Conquest to 1197, edited by Thomas Hearne, in three volumes, octavo, Oxford, 1719. The Latin is good, and the work ranks with that of Malmesbury. William of Newburgh is the first writer who rejects Geoffrey of Monmouth's Trojan descent of the old Britons, which he calls a "figment made more absurd by Geoffrey's impudent and impertinent lies." He is, however, quite as fabulous an historian as the "impudent" Geoffrey. (1136-1208.)

Williams. Caleb Williams. (See FALKLAND.)

Willie-Wastle (the child's game). Willie Wastle was governor of Hume castle, Haddington. When Cromwell sent a summons to him to surrender, he replied—

Here I, Willie Wastle,
Stand firm in my castle.
And all the dogs in the town
Shan't pull Willie Wastle down.

Willoughby (Sir Hugh). Sent by queen Elizabeth to discover the north-east passage. He sailed in command of three ships, all of which were lost. Subsequently voyagers tried the north-west course.

Such was the Briton's fate
As with first prow (what have not Britons dared ?)
He for the passage sought, attempted since
So much in vain. Thomson, "Winter."

Willow. To wear the willow. To go into mourning, especially for a sweet-heart or bride. Fuller says, "The willow is a sad tree, whereof such as have lost their love make their mourning garlands." The psalmist tells us that the Jews in captivity "hauged their harps upon the willows" in sign of mourning (cxxxvii.).

Willow Garland. An emblem of being forsaken. "All round my hat I wear a green willow." So Shakespeare: "I offered him my company to a willow-tree"..... to make him a garland, as being forsaken ("Much Ado About Nothing," ii. 1.) The very term weeping willow will suffice to account for its emblematical character.

Willow Pattern. To the right is a lordly mandarin's country seat. It is two storeys high to show the rank and wealth of the possessor; in the foreground is a pavilion, in the back-ground an orange-tree, and to the right of the pavilion a peach-tree in full bearing. The estate is enclosed by an elegant wooden fence. At one end of the bridge is the famous willow-tree, and at the other the gardener's cottage, one storey high, and so humble that the grounds are wholly uncultivated, the only green thing being a small fir-tree at the back. At the top of the pattern (left-hand side) is an island, with a cottage; the grounds are highly cultivated, and much has been reclaimed from the water. The two birds are turtle-doves. The three figures on the bridge are the mandarin's daughter with a distaff nearest the cottage, the lovers with a box in the middle, and nearest the willow-tree the mandarin with a whip.

The tradition. The mandarin had an only daughter named Li-chi, who fell in love with Chang, a young man who lived in the island home represented at the top of the pattern, and who had been her father's secretary. The father overheard them one day making vows of love under the orange-tree, and sternly forbade the unequal match; but the lovers contrived to elope, lay concealed for a while in the gardener's cottage, and thence made their escape in a boat to the island home of the young lover. The enraged mandarin pursued them with a whip, and would have beaten them to death had not the gods rewarded their fidelity by changing them both into turtle-doves. The picture is called the willow pattern not only because it is a tale of disastrous love, but because the elopement occurred "when the willow begins to shed its leaves."

Willy-nilly. Nolens volens; willing or not. Will-he, nill-he, where nill is n' negative and will, the same as nolens is n'-volens.

Wil'mington, invoked by Thomson in his "Winter," is Sir Spencer Compton, earl of Wilmington, the first patron of our poet, and speaker of the House of Commons.

Wilt'ed (American). Withered. This is the Dutch and German welken (to fade). Spenser says, "When ruddy Phœbus 'gins to welk in west"—i.e., fade in the west.

Wilton (Ralph de). The accepted suitor of lady Clare, daughter of the earl of Gloucester. When lord Marmion overcame De Wilton in the ordeal of battle, and left him on the field for dead, lady

Clare took refuge in Whitby convent. Lord Marmion, wishing to secure her large estates, forsook his betrothed, lady Constance of Beverley, and proposed to lady Clare, but was scornfully rejected. Under Marmion's directions, she was removed from the care of the abbess of St. Hilda to Tantallon Hall, where she encountered De Wilton, who had been healed of his wounds, and had returned from the Holy Land, whither he had gone on a pilgrimage. De Wilton was knighted by Douglas, and married lady Clare.—Sir Walter Scott, "Marmion."

Wilt'shire (2 syl.) is Wilton-shire, Wilton being a contraction of Wily-town (the town on the river Wily).

Win'chester. According to the authority given below, Winchester was the Camelot of Arthurian romance. Hanmer, referring to "King Lear," ii. 2, says Camelot is Queen's Camel, Somersetshire, in the vicinity of which "are many large moors where are bred great quantities of geese, so that many other places are from hence supplied with quills and feathers." Kent says to the Duke of Cornwall—

Goose, if I had you upon Sarum plain,
I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot.

With all due respect to Hanmer, it seems far more probable that Kent refers to Camelford, in Cornwall, where the duke of Cornwall resided, in his castle of Tintagel. He says, "If I had you on Salisbury plain (where geese abound), I would drive you home to Tintagel, on the river Camel." Though the Camelot of Shakespeare is Tintagel or Camelford, yet the Camelot of King Arthur may be Queen's Camel; and indeed visitors are still pointed to certain large entrenchments there called by the inhabitants "King Arthur's Palace."

Sir Balin's sword was put into marble stone, standing as upright as a great millstone, and it swam down the stream to the city of Camelot—that is, in English, Winchester.—"History of Prince Arthur," 44.

Winds. Poetical names of the winds. The North wind, Boreas; South, Notus or Auster; East, Eurus; West, Zephyr; North-east, Argestes; North-west, Cæcias; South-east, Sirocco or Syrian wind; South-west, Afer or Africus, and Lib'yicus. The Thra'scias is a north wind, but not due north.

Boreas and Cæcias, and Argestes loud,
And Thra'scias rend the woods, and seas upturn;..

Notus and Afer, black with thunderous clouds,
From Serraho'na. Thwart of these, as fierce,
Porth rush.... Eurus and Zephyr ...
Sirocco and Libecchio [Libycus].
Milton, "Paradise Lost," x. 699-706.

Special winds.

(1) The ETESIAN WINDS are yearly or anniversary winds, answering to the monsoons of the East Indies. The word was applied by Greek and Roman writers to the periodical winds of the Mediterranean. (Greek, et'os, a year.)

(2) The HARMATTAN. A wind which blows periodically from the interior parts of Africa towards the Atlantic. It prevails in December, January, and February, and is generally accompanied with fog, but is so dry as to wither vegetation and cause the human skin to peel off.

(3) The KHAMSI. A fifty days' wind in Egypt, from the end of April to the inundation of the Nile (Arabic for fifty).

(4) The MISTRAL. A violent north-west wind blowing down the Gulf of Lyons; felt particularly at Marseilles and the south-east of France.

(5) The PAMPERO blows in the summer season, from the Andes across the pampas to the sea-coast. It is a dry north-west wind.

(6) The PUNA WINDS prevail for four months in the Puna (table-lands of Peru). The most dry and parching winds of any. When they prevail it is necessary to protect the face with a mask, from the heat by day and the intense cold of the night.

(7) SAM'IEL or SIMOOM'. A hot, suffocating wind that blows occasionally in Africa and Arabia. Its approach is indicated by a redness in the air. (Arabic, samoom, from samma, destructive.)

(8) The SIROCCO. A wind from Northern Africa that blows over Italy, Sicily, &c., producing extreme languor and mental debility.

(9) The SOLA'NO of Spain, a south-east wind, extremely hot, and loaded with fine dust. It produces great uneasiness; hence the proverb, "Ask no favour during the Solano." (See TRADE WINDS.)

To take or have the wind. To get or keep the upper hand. Lord Bacon uses the phrase. "To have the wind of a ship" is to be to the windward of it.

Wind Egg. An egg without a shell. The cause of this want of shell is that the hen was winded or fluttered after impreg-nation. Dr. Johnson's notion that the wind egg does not contain the principle of life is no more correct than the superstition that the hen that lays it was impregnated, like the "Thracian mares," by the wind.

Windfall. Unexpected legacy; money which has come de cælo. Some of the English nobility were forbidden by the tenure of their estates to fell the timber, all the trees being reserved for the use of the Royal Navy. Those trees, however, which were blown down were excepted, and hence a good wind was often a great god-send.

Windmills. Don Quixote de la Mancha, riding through the plains of Montiel, approached thirty or forty windmills, which he declared to Sancho Panza "were giants, two leagues in length or more." Striking his spurs into Rosinante, with his lance in the rest, he drove at one of the "monsters dreadful as Typhæus." The lance lodged in the sail, and the latter, striking both man and beast, lifted them into the air, shivering the lance to pieces. When the valiant knight and his steed fell to the ground they were both much injured, and Don Quixote declared that the enchanter Freston, "who carried off his library with all the books therein," had changed the giants into windmills "out of malice."—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. i., ch. 8.

To fight with windmills. To combat chimeras. The French have the same proverb, "Se battre contre des moulins à vent." The allusion is, of course, to the adventure of Don Quixote referred to above.

To have windmills in your head. Fancies, chimeras. Similar to "bees in your bonnet" (q.v.). Sancho Panza says—

Did I not tell your worship they were windmills? and who could have thought otherwise, except such as had windmills in their head?—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. i., ch. 8.

Windmill Street. When Charnel chapel, St. Paul's, was taken down by the Protector Somerset, in 1549, more than 1,000 cart-loads of bones were removed to Finsbury Fields, where they formed a large mound, on which three windmills were erected. It was from these mills that the street obtained its name.—Leigh Hunt.

Window. A corruption of windor. (Welsh, gwyrat-dor.) A door or lattice to let in the wind or air.

Wine. The French say of wine that makes you stupid, it is vin d'âne; if it makes you maudlin, it is vin de cerf (from the notion that deer weep); if quarrelsome, it is vin de lion; if talkative, it is vin de pie; if sick, it is vin de porc; if crafty, it is vin de renard; if rude, it is vin de singe. (See below.)

Win of Ape (Chaucer). "I trow that ye have drunken win of ape"—i.e., wine to make you drunk; in French, vin de singe. There is a Talmud parable which says that Satan came one day to drink with Noah, and slew a lamb, a lion, a pig, and an ape, to teach Noah that man before wine is in him is a lamb, when he drinks moderately he is a lion, when like a sot he is a swine, but after that any further excess makes him an ape that chatters and jabbars without rhyme or reason. (See above.)

Wine-month or Wyn-monat (Saxon). The month of October, the time of vintage.

Win'frith. The same as St. Boniface, the apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon, killed by a band of heathens in 755.

Wing. Wing of a house, wing of an army, wing of a battalion or squadron, &c., are the side-pieces which start from the main body, as the wings of birds.

Don't try to fly without wings. Attempt nothing you are not fit for. A French proverb.

Win'fred (St.). Patron saint of virgins, because she was beheaded by prince Caradoc for refusing to marry him. She was Welsh by birth, and the legend says that her head falling on the ground originated the famous healing well of St. Winifred in Flintshire. She is usually drawn like St. Denis, carrying her head in her hand. Holywell, in Wales, is St. Winifred's Well, celebrated for its "miraculous" virtues.

Winkin'. He ran like winkin'—i.e., very fast. He did it in the twinkling of an eye, or, as the French say, dans un clin d'œil; Italian, in un batter d'occhio.

Winkle (Nathaniel). A cockney sportsman, and one of the Pickwick club.—Dickens, "Pickwick Papers."
Rip van Winkle. A Dutch colonist of

New York. He met with a strange man in a ravine of the Kaatskill Mountains. Rip helps him to carry a keg, and when they reach the destination Rip sees a number of odd creatures playing ninepins, but no one utters a word. Master Winkle seizes the first opportunity to take a sip at the keg, falls into a stupor, and sleeps for twenty years. On waking, his wife is dead and buried, his daughter is married, his native village has been remodelled, and America has become independent. — Washington Irving.

Wint-monat (Wind-month). The Anglo-Saxon name for November.

Winter, Summer. We say of an old man, "His life has extended to a hundred winters;" but of a blooming girl, "She has seen sixteen summers."

Winter's Tale (Shakespeare). The story is taken from the "Pleasant History of Dorastus and Fawnia," by Robert Greene. Dorastus is called by Shakespeare Florizel and Doricles, and Fawnia is Perdita. Leontes of the "Winter's Tale" is called Egistus in the novel, Polixenes is called Pandosto, and queen Hermionë is called Bellaria.

Wir'ral (Cheshire), where are "few that either God or man with good heart love." — "Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight."

Wise (The).

ALBERT II., duke of Austria, called The Lame and Wise. (1289, 1330-1358.)

ALFONSO X. or IX. of Leon, and IV. of Castile, called The Wise and The Astronomer. (1203, 1252-1285.)

BERNARD ALBINUS, a medical writer, called Weiss. (1653-1721.)

CHARLES V. of France, called Le Sage. (1337, regent 1358-1360, king 1364-1380.)

CHE-TSOU, founder of the fourteenth dynasty of China, called Hou-pe-lue (the model ruler), and his sovereignty The Wise Government. (1278-1295.)

COMTE DE LAS CASES, called Le Sage. (1766-1842.)

FREDERICK, elector of Saxony. (1463, 1544-1554.)

JOHN V. of Brittany, called The Good and Wise. (1389, 1399-1442.)

¶ Wise as the women of Mungret. At Mungret, near Limerick, was a famous monastery, and one day a deputation was sent to it from Cashel to try the skill of the Mungret scholars. The heads of the monastery had no desire to be put to this proof, so they habited several of their scholars as women, and sent them forth to waylay the deputation. The Cashel professors met one and another of these "women," and asked the way, or distance, or hour of the day, to all which questions they received replies in Greek. Thunderstruck with this strange occurrence, they resolved to return, saying, "What must the scholars be if even the townswomen talk in Greek!"

¶ Nathan the Wise. A drama by Lessing, based on a story in the "Decameron." (Day x., Novel 3.)

Wise Men of the East. The three Magi who followed the guiding star to Bethlehem. They are the patron saints of travellers. (See SEVEN SAGES.)

Wiseest Man of Greece. So the Delphic oracle pronounced Soc'ratës to be, and Socrates modestly made answer, "'Tis because I alone of all the Greeks know that I know nothing."

Wiseacre. A corruption of the German weissager (a wise sayer or prophet). This, like the Greek sophism, has quite lost its original meaning, and is applied to dunces, wise only "in their own conceit."

Wishart (George). One of the early reformers of Scotland, condemned to the stake by Cardinal Beaton. While the fire was blazing about him he said: "He who from yon high place beholdeth me with such pride, shall be brought low, even to the ground, before the trees which supplied these faggots have shed their leaves." It was March when Wishart uttered these words, and the cardinal died in June. (See SUMMONS.)

Wishing-cap. Fortunatus had an inexhaustible purse and a wishing-cap, but these gifts proved the ruin of himself and his sons. The object of the tale is to show the vanity of human prosperity.

Wishing-rod of the Nibelungs was of pure gold. Whoever had it could keep the whole world in subjection. It belonged to Siegfried, but when the "Nibelung hoard" was removed to Worms this rod went also.

And there-among was lying the wishing-rod of gold. Which whoso could discover might in subjection hold

All this wide world as master, with all that dwell therein. Lettom's "Nibelungen-Lied," st. 1160.

Wit. To wit, that is to say. A translation of the French savoir. Wit is the Anglo-Saxon witan (to know). I divide my property into four parts, to wit, or savoir, or namely, or that is to say.....

Witch. By drawing the blood of a witch you deprive her of her power of sorcery. Glanvil says that when Jane Brooks, the demon of Tedworth, bewitched a boy, his father scratched her face and drew blood, whereupon the boy instantly exclaimed that he was well again.

Blood will I draw on thee ; thou art a witch.
Shakespeare, "1 Henry VI." i. 5.

Hammer for Witches (Malleus Maleficarum). A treatise drawn up by Heinrich Institor and Jacob Sprenger, systematising the whole doctrine of witchcraft, laying down a regular form of trial, and a course of examination. Innocent VIII. issued the celebrated bull Summis Desiderantes in 1484, directing inquisitors and others to put to death all practisers of witchcraft and other diabolical arts.

* * Dr. Sprenger computes that as many as nine millions of persons have suffered death for witchcraft since the bull of Innocent.—"Life of Mohammed."

Witch of Endor. A divining woman consulted by Saul when Samuel was dead. She called up the ghost of the prophet, and Saul was told that his death was at hand (1 Sam. xxviii. 7-20).

Witch-Hazel. A shrub supposed to be efficacious in discovering witches. A forked twig of the hazel was made into a divining rod for the purpose.

Witchcraft. The epidemic demonopathy which raged in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries.

Witches' Sabbath. The muster at night-time of witches and demons to concoct mischief. The witch first anointed her feet and shoulders with the fat of a murdered babe, then mounting a broomstick, distaff, or rake, made her exit by the chimney, and rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. The assembled witches feasted together and concluded with a dance, in which they all turned their backs to each other.

Witchfinder. Matthew Hopkins, who, in the middle of the seventeenth century, travelled through the eastern counties to find out witches. At last Hopkins himself was tested by his own rule. Being cast into a river, he floated, was declared to be a wizard, and was put to death. (See above, Hammer for Witches.)

Wit'ham. You were born, I suppose, at Little Witham. A reproof to a noodle. The pun, of course, is on little wit. Little Witham or Wittham is in Lincolnshire.

I will be sworn she was not born at Wittham, for Gaffer Gibbs....says she could not turn up a single lesson like a Christian.—Sir Walter Scott, "Heart of Mid-Lothian," ch. xxxii.

Withe (1 syl.). When Delilah asked Samson what would effectually bind him, he told her "green withes," but when she called in the Philistines he snapped his bonds like tow.

It seems impossible that Samson can be held by such green withes [i.e., that a great measure can be carried by such petty shifts].—The Times.

Wititterly (Mr.), of Cadogan Place, Sloane Street. His Christian name was Henry. He went about all day in a tremor of delight at having shaken hands with a lord, and was in the seventh heaven because a real lord had promised to be his guest.

Mrs. Wititterly (Julia), wife of the above. A lady of sweetest insipidity, "whose soul was too large for her body." She reclined on a sofa half the day and studied attitudes of graceful languor. Kate Nickleby was her companion, and was expected always to be well and in good spirits; why else was she paid a salary? Mrs. Wititterly had her husband's weakness for "lords." Coarseness in a lord became in her eyes mere humour; vulgarity got softened down into eccentricity; and insolence to "aristocratic ease." Her page "Bill" she called Alphonse.—Dickens, "Nicholas Nickleby."

Witney (Oxfordshire) is the Saxon Witon-ey, the island of Wise-men—i.e., of the Witenagemot or national parliament.

Wittington. Thrice lord mayor of London—in 1397, 1406, 1419. He amassed a fortune of £350,000. (See CAT.)

Beneath this stone lies Wittington,
Sir Richard rightly named,
Who three times Lord Mayor served in London,
In which he ne'er was blamed.
He rose from indigence to wealth
By industry and that,
For lo! he scorned to gain by stealth
What he got by a cat.
Epitaph (destroyed by the Fire of London).

Wittoba, in Bombay mythology, is Crishna or Vishnu incarnate.

Wives of literary men. The following were unhappy in their "help-metes."—Lord Byron, Albert Durer, Milton, Molière, Scaliger, Shakespeare, Socrates, &c. Three modern names are prominent exceptions: Thomas Moore, Sir Walter Scott, and Wordsworth.

Wo. Stop (addressed to horses). "Ho!" or "Hoa!" was formerly an exclamation commanding the knights at tournaments to cease from all further action.

Scollers, as they read much of love, so when they once fall in love, there is no ho with them till they have their love.—"Cobler of Canterbury" (1608).

Woden. Another form of Odin (q.v.). The word is incorporated in Wodensbury (Kent), Wedensbury (Suffolk), Wansdyke (Wiltshire), Wednesday, &c.

Woful. Knight of the Woful Countenance. The title given by Sancho Panza to Don Quixote (bk. iii., ch. 5). After his challenge of the two royal lions (pt. II., bk. i., ch. 17) the adventurer called himself Knight of the Lions.

Wokey. Wicked as the Witch of Wokey. Wokey-hole is a noted cavern in Somersetshire, which has given birth to as many weird stories as the Sybils' Cave in Italy. The Witch of Wokey was metamorphosed into stone by a "lerved wight" from Gaston, but left her curse behind, so that the fair damsels of Wokey rarely find "a gallant."—Percy, "Reliques," iii. 14.

Wolf.

Fenrir. The wolf that scatters venom through air and water, and will swallow Odin when time shall be more.

Sköll. The wolf that follows the sun and moon, and will swallow them ultimately.—Scandinavian mythology.

Wolves. It is not true that wolves were extirpated from the island in the reign of Edgar. The tradition is based upon the words of William of Malmesbury (bk. ii., ch. 8), who says that the tribute paid by the king of Wales, consisting of 300 wolves, ceased after the third year, because "nullum se ulterius posse invenire professus" (because he could find no more—i.e., in Wales); but in the tenth year of William I., we find that Robert de Umfranville, knight, held his lordship of Riddlesdale in Northumberland by service of defending that part of the kingdom from "wolves." In the forty-third year of Edward III.,

Thomas Engarne held lands in Fitchley, Northamptonshire, by service of finding dogs at his own cost for the destruction of "wolves" and foxes. Even in the eleventh year of Henry VI., Sir Robert Plumpton held one bovate of land in the county of Notts by service of "frighting the wolves" in Shirewood Forest.

She-wolf of France. Isabella le Bel, wife of Edward II. According to a tradition she murdered the king by burning his bowels with a hot iron, or by tearing them from his body with her own hands.

*She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs,
That tear'st the bowels of thy mangled mate.*
Gray, "The Bard."

The Wolf. So Dryden calls the Presbytery in his "Hind and Panther."

*Unkennelled range in thy Polonian plains,
A fiercer foe the insatiate Wolf remains.*
Pt. i.

He has seen a wolf. Said of a person who has lost his voice. Our forefathers used to say that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him he lost his voice, at least for a time.

*Vox duoque Mærim
Jam fugit ipsa; lupi Mærim vid'e p'ior'es.*
Virgil, Ecl. ix.

"Our young companion has seen a wolf," said lady Hameline, "and has lost his tongue in consequence."—Scott, "Quentin Durward," ch. xviii.

To see a wolf is also a good sign, inasmuch as the wolf was dedicated to Odin, the giver of victory.

He put his head into the wolf's mouth. He exposed himself to needless danger. The allusion is to the fable of the crane that put its head into a wolf's mouth in order to extract a bone. The fable is sometimes related of a fox instead of a wolf. (French.)

To cry "Wolf!" To give a false alarm. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the shepherd lad who used to cry "Wolf!" merely to make fun of the neighbours, but when at last the wolf came no one would believe him.

In Chinese history it is said that Yü-wâng, of the third Imperial dynasty, was attached to a courtesan named Pao-tse, whom he tried by various expedients to make laugh. At length he hit upon the following: He caused the tocsins to be rung as if some invaders were at the gates. Pao-tse laughed immoderately to see the people pouring into the city in alarm. The emperor, seeing the success of his trick, repeated it over and over again but at last an enemy really did come and when the alarm was given no one paid attention to it, and the emperor was slain (B.C. 770). (See AMYCLEAN SILENCE.)

To keep the wolf from the door. To keep out hunger. We say of a ravenous person "He has a wolf in his stomach," an expression common to the French and Germans. Thus manger comme un loup is to eat voraciously, and wolfsmagen is the German for a keen appetite.

Dark as a wolf's mouth. Pitch dark. Is mouth in this phrase a corruption of month? Wolf's-month is January, and "dark as January" or "dark as winter" is a common expression. Campbell says, "Dark as winter was the flow of Iser rolling rapidly."—"Hohenlinden."

Wolf in music. Applied to a bad fifth, or to the interval from the false octave, obtained by the fifths, to the true one. The concords in such instruments as the organ and pianoforte cannot be made perfect, because the interval of a tone is not uniformly the same. For instance, the interval between the fourth and fifth of the major scale contains nine commas or parts, but that between the fifth and sixth only eight. Tuners generally distribute the defects, but some musicians prefer to throw the onus on some particular keys. A squeak made in reed instruments by unskilful players is termed a Goose.

Wolf, duke of Gascony. One of Charlemagne's knights, and the most treacherous of all, except Ganelon. He sold his guest and his family. He wore browned steel armour, damasked with silver; but his favourite weapon was the gallows. He was never in a rage, but cruel in cold blood.

It was Wolf, duke of Gascony, who was the originator of the plan of tying wetted ropes round the temples of his prisoners, to make their eye-balls start from their sockets. It was he who had them sewed up in freshly-stripped bulls' hides, and exposed to the sun till the hides in shrinking broke their bones.—"Croquemitaine," iii.

Wolf's-bane. The Germans call all poisonous herbs "banes," and the Greeks, mistaking the word for "beans," translated it by ku'amos, as they did "hen-bane" (huos ku'amos). Wolf's-bane is an aconite with a pale yellow flower, called therefore the white-bane to distinguish it from the blue aconite. White-bean would be in Greek lenkos kuamos, which was corrupted into tukos kuamos (wolf-bean); but botanists, seeing the absurdity of calling aconite a "bean," restored the original German word "bane," but retained the corrupt word tukos (wolf), and hence the ridiculous term "wolf's-bane."—H. Fox Talbot.

Wolf's Head. A general enemy; some one or thing obnoxious to all.

Any one who dares to connect himself with a publication which sins in [personalities], finds himself a caput lupinum, against whom every man of every class and party are (?) willing to raise their cudgel. —The Times, January 12, 1879.

Wolf-month or Wolf-monat. The Saxon name for January, because "people are wont always in that month to be in more danger of being devoured by wolves than in any other."—Verstegan.

Woman. The Rabbins assert that man was originally formed with a tail, but that Deity cut off this appendage and made woman thereof. T. Moore says—

Every husband remembers th' original plan,
And knowing his wife is no more than his tail,
Why, he—leaves her behind him as much as he can.

The Silent Woman. A public-house sign, being a woman without a head. The original of this sign was a woman decapitated, and called the Good Woman.

Wonder. A nine-days' wonder. Something that causes a sensational astonishment for a few days, and is then placed in the limbo of "things forgot." Three days' amazement, three days' discussion of details, and three days of subsidence. (See NINE.)

The Seven Wonders of the World. According to ancient tradition, there were seven of the works of man so extraordinary as to deserve to be called wonders they were—

The Pyramids of Egypt.
The Mausoleum of Artemisia.
The Temple of Diana of Ephesus.
The Hanging Gardens of Babylon.
The Colossus of Rhodes.
The statue of Jupiter Olympus by Phidias.

The Pharos or watch-tower of Rhodes.
¶ The eighth wonder. The palace of the Escorial in Toledo, built by Felipe II. to commemorate his victory over the French at St. Quentin. It was dedicated to San Lorenzo, and Juan Baptista de Toledo, the architect, took a gridiron for his model—the bars being represented by rows or files of buildings, and the handle by a church. It has 1,860 rooms, 6,200 windows and doors,

80 staircases, 73 fountains, 48 wine-cellar, 51 bells, and 8 organs. Its circumference is 4,800 feet (nearly a mile). Escorial is scoria ferri, iron dross, because its site is that of old iron works. (See TUILERIES.)

An eighth wonder. A work of extraordinary mechanical ingenuity, such as the Great Wall of China, the Dome of Chosroes in Madain, St. Peter's of Rome, the Menai Suspension Bridge, the Thames Tunnel, the bridge over the Niagara, Eddystone Lighthouse, the Suez Canal, the Railroad over Mount Cenis, the Atlantic Cable, &c.

¶ The Three Wonders in Egypt.

The Palace, eight miles in circumference.

The Hanging Gardens.

The Tower of Babel, said by some Jewish writers to be twelve miles in height! Jerome quotes contemporary authority for its being four miles high. Strabo states its height to have been 600 feet.

Wonder-worker. St. Gregory, of Neo-Cesarea, in Pontus; so called because he "recalled devils at his will, stayed a river, killed a Jew by the mere effort of his will, changed a lake into solid earth, and did many other wonderful things." (210-273.)

Woo or Woo'e. Stop, addressed to a horse. The Latin word ohē has the same meaning. Thus Horace (Sat. I., v. 12): "Ohē, jam satis est."

Woo'ish, when addressed to horses, means "Bear to the left." In the West of England they say Woag—i.e., wag off (Saxon, wagian and wecgan). Woo'ish is "Move off a little."

Woo-tee Dynasty. The eighth Imperial dynasty of China, established in the south Liou-yu. A cobbler, having assassinated the two preceding monarchs, usurped the crown, and took the name of Woo-tee (king Woo), a name assumed by many of his followers.

Wood. Knight of the Wood or Knight of the Mirrors. So called because his coat was overspread with numerous small mirrors. It was Simpson Carrasco, a bachelor of letters, who adopted the disguise of a knight under the hope of overthrowing Don Quixote, when he would have imposed upon him the penalty of returning to his home for two years; but it so happened that Don Quixote was the victor, and Carrasco's scheme was abortive. As Knight of the White Moon Carrasco again challenged the Manchegan lunatic, and overthrew him; whereupon the vanquished knight was obliged to return home, and quit the profession of knight errantry for twelve months. Before the term expired he died.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," pt. II., bk. i. 11, &c.; bk. iv. 12.

Wood's Halfpence. A penny coined by William Wood, to whom George I. granted letters patent for the purpose. (See DRAPER'S LETTERS.)

Sir Walter's [Scott] real belief in Scotch one-pound notes may be advantageously contrasted with Swift's forced frenzy about Wood's halfpence, more especially as Swift really did understand the defects of Wood's scheme, and Sir Walter was absolutely ignorant of the currency controversy in which he engaged.—The Times.

Wooden Horse—

At Troy. Virgil tells us that Ulysses had a monster wooden horse made after the death of Hector, and gave out that it was an offering to the gods to secure a prosperous voyage back to Greece. The Trojans dragged the horse within their city, but it was full of Grecian soldiers, who at night stole out of their place of concealment, slew the Trojan guards, opened the city gates, and set fire to Troy.

Cambuscan's. The "Arabian Nights" tells us of Cambuscan's wooden horse, which had a pin in the neck, and on turning this pin the horse rose into the air, and transported the rider to the place he wanted to go to. (See CLAVILENO.)

Wooden Spoon. The last of the honour men, i.e. of the Junior Optimists, in the Cambridge University. Sometimes two or more "last" men are bracketed together, in which case the group is termed the spoon bracket. It is said that these men are so called because in days of yore they were presented with a wooden spoon, while the other honour men had a silver or golden one, a spoon being the usual prix de mérite instead of a medal. (See WOODEN WEDGE.)

Wooden Sword. To wear the wooden sword. To overstand the market, or keep back sales by asking too high a price. Fools used to wear wooden swords or "daggers of lath."

Wooden Wall. When the Greeks sent to Delphi to ask how they were to defend themselves against Xerxes, who had invaded their country, the evasive answer given was to this effect—

Pallas hath urged, and Zeus, the sire of all,
Hath safely promised in a wooden wall;
Seed-time and harvest, weeping sires shall tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell.

Wooden Walls of Old England. The ships of war. We must now say, "The Iron Walls of Old England."

Wooden Wedge. Last in the classical tripos. When in 1824 the classical tripos was instituted at Cambridge, it was debated what name to call the last on the list. It so happened that the last on the list was Wedgewood, and the name was accepted and moulded into Wooden-wedge. (See WOODEN SPOON.)

Woodfall, brother of the Woodfall of Junius, and editor of the Morning Chronicle, would attend a debate, and, without notes, report it accurately next morning. He was called Memory Woodfall. (1745-1803.)

Woodwar'dian Professor. The professor of geology in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1727 by Dr. Woodward.

Wool-gathering. Your wits are gone wool-gathering. You are in a brown study; your brains are asleep, and you seem bewildered. The allusion is to village children sent to gather wool from hedges; while so employed they are absent, and for a trivial purpose. To be wool-gathering is to be absent-minded, but to be so to no good purpose.

Woollen.

"Odious! in woollen! 'twould a saint provoke!"
(Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke).
"Not let a charming chintz and Brussels lace
Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face.
One would not sure be frightful when one's dead.
And—Betty—give the cheeks a little red."
Pope, "Moral Essays," Ep. i.

This was the ruling passion strong in death. At the time this was written it was compulsory to bury in woollen. Narcissa did not dread death half so much as being obliged to wear flannel instead of her fine mantles. Narcissa was Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, who died 1731.

Woollen Goods. (See LINEN GOODS.)

Woolsack. To sit on the woolsack. To be Lord Chancellor of England, whose seat in the House of Lords is called the woolsack. It is a large square bag of wool, without back or arms, and covered with red cloth. In the reign of queen Elizabeth an Act of Parliament was passed to prevent the exportation of wool; and that this source of our national wealth might be kept constantly in mind, woolsacks were placed in the House of Peers, whereon the judges sat. Hence the Lord Chancellor, who presides in the House of Lords, is said to "sit on the woolsack," or to be "appointed to the woolsack."

Worcester (Woost'-er). A contraction of Wici-ware-ceaster (the camp-town of the Wicii people). Ware means people, and Wicii was a tribe name.

Worcester. Cartulary of the church, by Heming, published by Hearne in two volumes 8vo, in 1723. This was compiled in the reign of the Conqueror.

Worcester College (Oxford), founded by Sir Thomas Coke, of Bentley, Worcestershire, in 1714.

Words. Many words will not fill a bushel. Mere promises will not help the needy. If we say to a beggar, "Be thou filled," is he filled?

Good words butter no parsnips, is a proverb of the same scope. In Scotland an excellent dish is made of parsnips and potatoes beaten up with butter.

Worldly-Wiseman (Mr.). One who tries to persuade Christian that it is very bad policy to continue his journey.—Bunyan, "Pilgrim's Progress."

Worm. To have a worm in one's tongue. To be cantankerous; to snarl and bite like a mad dog.

There is one easy artifice
That seldom has been known to miss—
To snarl at all things right or wrong,
Like a mad dog that has a worm in his tongue.
Samuel Butler, "Upon Modern Critics."

Worms, in Germany, according to tradition, is so called from the Lindwurm or dragon slain by Siegfried under the linden tree.

Yet more I know of Siegfried that well your ear may hold.
Beneath the linden tree he slew the dragon bold;
Then in his blood he bathed him, which turned to horn his skin.
So now no weapon harms him, as oft hath proven been.
"Nibelungen," st. 104.

Worse than a Crime, it was a Blunder. Said by Talleyrand of the murder of the duc d'Enghien by Napoleon I.

Wor'ship means state or condition of worth, hence the term "his worship," meaning his worthlyship. "Thou shalt have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee" (Luke xiv. 10) means "Thou shalt have worth-ship (value or appreciation)." In the marriage service the man says to the woman, "With my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow"—that is, I confer on you my rank and dignities, and endow you with my wealth; the worth-ship attached to my person I share with you, and the wealth which is mine is thine also.

Never worship the gods unshod. So taught Pythagoras, and he meant in a careless and slovenly manner. (See Iamblichus, "Protreptics, Symbol III.")

Worsted. Yarn or thread made of wool; so called from Worsted in Norfolk, now a village, but once a large market-town with at least as many thousand inhabitants as it now contains hundreds.—Camden.

Wor'thies. The Nine Worthies.

Three Gentiles: Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar.

Three Jews: Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabæus.

Three Christians: Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey of Bouillon.

¶ The Nine Worthies of London.

(1) Sir William Walworth, who stabbed Wat Tyler the rebel. Sir William was twice lord mayor. (1374-1380.)

(2) Sir Henry Pritchard, who welcomed Edward III. on his return from France with 5,000 followers, and then entertained him at a banquet. (1356.)

(3) Sir William Sevenoke, who fought with the Dauphin of France, built twenty almshouses and a free school. (1413.)

(4) Sir Thomas White, a philanthropic mayor in the reign of queen Mary.

(5) Sir John Bonham, entrusted with a valuable cargo for the Danish market, and made commander of the army raised to stop the progress of the great Solyman.

(6) Christopher Coker. Famous at the siege of Bordeaux, and companion of the Black Prince when he aided don Pedro to the throne of Castile.

(7) Sir John Hawkwood. One of the Black Prince's knights, and immortalised in Italian history as "Giovanni Acuti Cavaliero."

(8) Sir Hugh Caverley. Famous for ridding Poland of a monstrous bear.

(9) Sir Henry Maleverer, generally called "Henry of Comhall," who lived in the reign of Henry IV. He was a crusader, and became the guardian of "Jacob's Well."

The chronicle of these worthies is told in a mixture of prose and verse by Richard Johnson, author of "The Seven Champions of Christendom" (1592).

Wound. Bind the wound and grease the weapon. This is a Rosicrucian maxim. These early physicians applied salve to the weapon, instead of to the wound, under the notion of a magical reflex action. Sir Kenelm Digby quotes several anecdotes to prove this sympathetic action.

Wraburn (Eugene). A gentleman who pays attention to Lucy Hexham. Headstone, a village schoolmaster, waylays him, and almost murders him out of jealousy. Lucy nurses him throughout his illness, and ultimately becomes his wife.—Charles Dickens, "Our Mutual Friend."

Wra'ith. The spectral appearance of a person shortly about to die. It appears to persons at a distance, and forewarns them of the event.—Highland superstition.

Wrangler, in Cambridge phrase, is one who has obtained a place in the highest mathematical honour-class. The first man of this class is termed the senior wrangler; the rest are arranged according to respective merit, and are called second, third, fourth, &c., wrangler, as it may be. In the middle ages, when letters were first elevated to respectability in modern Europe, college exercises were called disputations, and those who performed them disputants, because the main part consisted in pitting two men together, one to argue pro and the other con. In the law and theological "schools" this is still done for the bachelor's and doctor's degrees. The exercise of an opponent is called an opponency. Wrangling is a word-battle carried on by twisting words and trying to obfuscate an opponent—a most excellent term for the disputations of schoolmen. The opponency begins with a thesis or essay, which means "throwing down the gauntlet," from the Greek tithēmi (setting together by the ears).

Wrax'en. Overstretched, strained, rank. They go to school all the week, and get wraxen. The weeds are quite wraxen. The child fell and wraxed his ankle. (Danish, wrak and wreken; Saxon, wracan, allied to wreck and break.)

Wright of Norwich. Do you know Dr. Wright of Norwich? A reproof given to a person who stops the decanter at dinner. Dr. Wright, of Norwich, was a great diner-out and excellent talker. When a person stops the bottle and is asked this question, it is as much as to say, Dr. Wright had the privilege of doing so because he entertained the table with his conversation, but you are no Dr. Wright except in stopping the circulation of the wine.

A similar reproof is given in the Universities in this way: The bottle-stopper is asked if he knows A or B (any name), and after several queries as to who A or B is, the questioner says "He was hanged," and being asked what for, replies "For stopping the bottle."

Wrong. The king or queen can do no wrong.

It seems incredible that we should have to remind lord Redesdale that the sovereign "can do no wrong," simply because the sovereign can do nothing except by aid with the advice and consent of the ministers of the crown.—The Times.

Wronghead (Sir Francis), of Bumper Hall. A country squire who became member of Parliament for the borough of Guzzledown, under the hope of mending his fortune, "which was a little out of elbows," by obtaining a post under Government. He came to London with an extravagant wife and silly daughter, who ran him into frightful expenses, and would both have been ruined if a relative named Manly had not befriended them.—Vanbrugh and Cibber, "The Provoked Husband."

Wul-wulleh. The death-song of the Turkish women.

Wulstan (St.). A Saxon bishop of Worcester, who received his see from Edward the Confessor. Being accused of certain offences, and ordered to resign his see, he planted his crozier in the shrine of the Confessor, declaring if any of his accusers could draw it out he would submit to resign; as no one could do so but St. Wulstan himself, his innocence was universally admitted. This sort of "miracle" is one of the most common of legendary wonders.

Wunderberg or Underberg, on the great moor near Salzberg, the chief haunt of the Wild-women. It is said to be quite hollow, and contains churches, gardens, and cities. Here is Charles V. with crown and sceptre, lords and knights. His grey beard has twice encompassed the table at which he sits, and when it has grown long enough to go a third time round it Antichrist will appear.—German superstition.

Wursum. Full of pus or matter. (Anglo-Saxon, wyr, pus, and sum or some; as fulsome, glesome, truthsone, &c.)

Wyn-monat (Wine-month). The Anglo-Saxon name for October, the month for treading the wine-vats. In Domesday Book the vineyards are perpetually mentioned.

Wynd. Every man for his own hand, as Henry Wynd fought. Every man for himself; every man seeks his own advantage. When the feud between Clan Chattan and Clan Kay was decided by deadly combat on the North Inch of Perth, one of the men of Clan Chattan deserted, and Henry Wynd, a bandy-legged smith, volunteered for half-a-crown to supply his place. After killing one man he relaxed in his efforts, and on being asked why, replied, "I have done enough for half-a-crown." He was promised wages according to his deserts, and fought bravely. After the battle he was asked what he fought for, and gave for answer that he fought "for his own hand;" whence the proverb.—Sir Walter Scott, "Tales of a Grandfather," xvii.

Wyo'ming (3 syl.). In 1778 a force of British provincials and Indians, led by Colonel Butler, drove the settlers out of the valley, and queen Esther tomahawked fourteen of the fugitives with her own hand, in revenge of her son's death. Campbell has founded his "Gertrude of Wyoming" on this disaster, but erroneously makes Brandt leader of the expedition.

X

X on beer-casks indicates beer which had to pay ten shillings duty, and hence it came to mean beer of a given quality. Two or three crosses are mere trade-marks, intended to convey the notion of twice or thrice as strong as that which pays ten shillings duty.

Xamabu'gis. Bonzes of Japan, who serve as guides to the pilgrims across the deserts.

Xan'adu. A city mentioned in the "Kubla Khan" of Coleridge. This poem is borrowed from Purchas's "Pilgrimage," where the city is called Xaindu.

Xan'gi. The supreme governor of heaven and earth.—Chinese mythology.

Xan'thos (reddish yellow). Achilles' wonderful horse. Being chid by his master for leaving Patroelos on the field of battle, the horse turned his head reproachfully, and told Achilles that he also would soon be numbered with the dead, not from any fault of his horse, but by the decree of inexorable destiny.—"Iliad," xix. (Compare Numbers xxii. 28-30.)

* * Xanthos and Balios (swift as the wind) were the offspring of Harpya and Zephuros.

Xanthos, the river of Troas. Elian and Pliny say that Homer called the Scamander "Xanthos" or the "Gold-red River," because it coloured with such a tinge the fleeces of sheep washed in its waters. Others maintain that it was so called because a hero named Xanthos defeated a body of Trojans on its banks, and pushed half of them into the stream, as in the battle of Blenheim the duke of Marlborough drove the French into the Danube.

Xanthus. A large shell like those ascribed to the Tritons. The volutes generally run from right to left; and if the Indians find a shell with the volutes running in the contrary direction, they persist that one of their gods has got into the shell for concealment.

Xantip'pe or Xanthip'pe (3 syl.). Wife of the philosopher Socrates. Her bad temper has rendered her name proverbial for a conjugal scold.

Be she as foul as was Florentius' love,
As old as Sybil, and as curst and shrewd
As Socrates' Xanthippe, or a worse,
She moves me not.

Shakespeare, "Taming of the Shrew," i. 2.

Xenoc'ratēs. A disciple of Plato, noted for his continence and contempt of wealth. (B.C. 396-314.)

Warmed by such youthful beauty, the severe
Xenocrates would not have more been chaste.
"Orlando Feros," xi. 3.

Xerxes (2 syl.). A Greek way of writing the Persian Ksathra or Kshatra, a royal title assumed by Isfunder, son of Gushtasp, darawesh. (See DARIUS.)

When Xerxes invaded Greece he constructed a pontoon bridge across the Dardanelles, which being swept away by the force of the waves, so enraged the Persian despot that he "inflicted three hundred lashes on the rebellious sea, and cast chains of iron across it." This story is probably a Greek myth, founded on the peculiar construction of Xerxes' second bridge, which consisted of three hundred boats, lashed by iron chains to two ships serving as supporters. As for the scourging, without doubt it was given to the engineers and not to the waves.

Xime'na. The Cid's bride.

Xin. The good genii of China.—Chinese mythology.

Xit'ragup'ten. The secretary of the infernal gods, whose office it is to register every action of man from birth to death. When any one dies this recording angel opens the register to ascertain the balance of merits and demerits, and the deceased is awarded his place in "after-life" accordingly.—Indian mythology.

Xoar'cam. The first of the five paradises of the Indians. It is the abode of thirty-three millions of the gods and forty-eight millions of penitents. The president of this celestial abode is Devandiren.

Xu'ry. A Moresco boy, servant to Robinson Crusoe.—De Foe, "Robinson Crusoe."

Y

Y. A letter resembling "y" was the Anglo-Saxon character for th (soft); hence the expression ye, yt, ys, &c., for the, that, this.

Y. See SAMIAN (letter).

Ya'coub ebn La'ith, surnamed al Sofur (the brazier), because his father followed that trade in Seistan, was captain of a bandit troop, raised himself to the sovereignty of Persia, and was the first independent monarch of that country of the Mahometan faith. (873-875.)

Yacu-mama (mother of waters). A fabulous sea-snake, fifty paces long and twelve yards in girth, said to lurk in the lagunes of South America, and in the river Amazon. This monster draws into its mouth whatever passes within a hundred yards of it, and for this reason an Indian will never venture to enter an unknown lagune till he has blown his horn, which the yacu-mama never fails to answer if it is within hearing. By this means the danger apprehended is avoided. —Dr. Hartwig.

Ya'hoo. A savage; a very ill-mannered person. In "Gulliver's Travels," the Yahoos are described as brutes with human forms and vicious propensities. They are subject to the Houyhnhnms, or horses with human reason.

Ya'ma. Judge of departed souls, the Minos of the Hindus. He is represented as of a green colour, and sits on a buffalo.

Yamuna. A sacred river of the Hindus, supposed by them to have the efficacy of removing sin.

Yankee. A corruption of "English." The word got into general use thus: In 1713 one Jonathan Hastings, a farmer at Cambridge in New York, used the word as a puffing epithet, meaning genuine, American-made, what cannot be surpassed, &c., as a "Yankee horse," "Yankee cider," and so on. The students of the college, catching up the term, called Hastings "Yankee Jonathan." It soon spread, and became the jocose pet name of the New Englander. Since then the term has been extended to any American of the Northern States. (Indian corruption of Anglais or English, thus: Yenjees, Yenghis, Yanghis, Yankies.)

Yankee Doodle is Nankee Doodle (Oliver Cromwell), who went to Oxford "with a single feather fastened in a macaroni knot," whence the rhyme—

Nankee Doodle came to town upon his little pony,
Stuck a feather in his hat, and called it macaroni.

The brigade under lord Percy marched out of Boston playing this air "by way of contempt," but were told they should dance to it soon in another spirit. It is said that the Persians call the Americans Yanki doon'iah.

Yar'mouth Bloater. A red herring, for which Yarmouth is very famous. —"Lex Balatronicum." (See CAPON.)

Yawn. Greek chaino, German gahnen, Saxon gynian (pron. wyan), our yawn.

Yea, Yes. Yea and nay are in answer to questions framed in the affirmative, as—"Art thou a prophet?" Yea or nay. Yes and no to questions framed in the negative, as—"Art thou not a prophet?" Yes or no. —George P. Marsh, "Lectures on the English Language." (See his note on the celebrated passage of Sir Thomas More, who rebukes Tyndale for using no instead of nay, p. 422.)

Year. Annus Magnus. The Chaldaic astronomers observed that the fixed stars shift their places at about the rate of a degree in seventy-two years, according to which calculation they will perform one revolution in 25,920 years, at the end of which time they will return to their "as you were." This revolution of the fixed stars is the "Annus Magnus." The Egyptians made it 30,000 years, and the Arabians 49,000. (See Abulhasan's "Meadows of Gold.")

¶ For a year and a day. In law many acts are determined by this period of time: g.e., if a person wounded does not die within a year and a day, the offender is not guilty of murder; if an owner does not claim an estray within the same length of time, it belongs to the lord of the manor; a year and a day is given to prosecute appeals, &c.

Yellow and Gold. Saxon gelew (yellow), Italian giallor, Old German gelo, or gel, Danish gual, Icelandic gull, our gold (yellow metal).

Yellow indicates jealousy, inconstancy, and adultery. In France the doors of traitors used to be daubed with yellow. In some countries the law ordains that Jews be clothed in yellow, because they betrayed our Lord. Judas in mediæval pictures is arrayed in yellow. In Spain the vestments of the executioner are either red or yellow—the former to indicate blood-shedding, and the latter treason.

Yellow in blazonry is gold, the symbol of love, constancy, and wisdom.

Yellow in Christian symbolism, also gold, is emblematical of faith. St. Peter is represented in a robe of a golden yellow colour. In China yellow is also the symbol of faith.

Yellow Book of France. A report drawn up by government every year since 1861, designed to furnish historians with reliable information of the state, external and internal, of the French nation. It is called Yellow from the colour of its cover.

Yellow Caps. A notable insurrection in China, in the reign of Hân-ling-tee (168-189), headed by Tchang-keo, and so called from the caps worn by the rebels, which were all of the imperial colour.

Yellow Dwarf. A certain queen had a daughter named ALL-FAIR, of incomparable beauty. One day the queen went to consult the Desert-Fairy, but being weary lay down to rest, and fell asleep. On waking she saw two lions approaching, and was greatly terrified. At this juncture the Yellow Dwarf arrested her attention, and promised to save her from the lions, if she would consent to give him ALL-FAIR for his bride. The queen made the promise, and an orange tree opened, into which the queen entered and escaped the lions. The queen now sickened, and ALL-FAIR went to consult the Desert-Fairy, but like her mother was threatened by the lions, and promised to be the dwarf's bride if he would contrive her escape. Next morning she awoke in her own room, and found on her finger a ring made of a single red hair, which could not be got off. The princess now sickened, and the States resolved to give her in marriage to the powerful king of the Gold Mines. On the day of espousals the Yellow Dwarf came to claim his bride, carried her off on his Spanish cat, and confined her in Steel Castle. In the meantime the Desert Fairy made the king of the Gold Mines her captive. One day a mermaid appeared to the captive king, carried him to Steel Castle, and gave him a sword made of one entire diamond. Thus armed, the king went in and was first encountered by four sphinxes, then by six dragons, then by twenty-four nymphs. All these he slew with the syren sword, and then came to the princess. Here he dropped his sword, which the Yellow Dwarf took possession of. The Yellow Dwarf now made the king his captive, and asked if he would give up the princess. "No," said the king; whereupon the dwarf stabbed him to the heart; and the princess, seeing him fall, threw herself upon the dead body and died also.—Countess D'Anois, "Fairy Tales."

Yellow Jack. The flag displayed from lazarettos, naval hospitals, and vessels in quarantine. (See UNION JACK.)

Yellowley (Mr. Triptolemus). The experimental agriculturist.—Sir Walter Scott, "The Pirate."

Mistress Baby [Barbara] Yellowley. Sister of Mr. Triptolemus, and his housekeeper.

Old Jaspur Yellowley. Father of the above.

Yemen. Arabia Felix. Felix is a mistranslation by Ptolemy of Yemen, which means to the "right"—i.e., of Mecca. (See STONY ARABIA.)

Beautiful are the maids that glide
On summer-eves through Yemen's dales.
Thomas Moore, "Fire-worshippers."

Yeth-Hounds. Dogs without heads, said to be the spirits of unbaptised children, which ramble among the woods at night, making wailing noises.—Devonshire.

Yezd (1 syl.). Chief residence of the Fire-worshippers. Stephen says they have kept the sacred fire alight above 3,000 years, without suffering it to go out for a second. The sacred fire is on the mountain Ater Quedah (Mansion of the Fire), and he who dies away from the mountain is deemed unfortunate.—Persia.

From Yezd's eternal "Mansion of the Fire,"
Where aged saints in dreams of heaven expire.
Thomas Moore, "Lulla Rookh," pt. 1.

Ygg'drasil. The ash-tree which binds together heaven, earth, and hell. Its branches spread over the whole world and reach above the heavens. Its roots run in three directions: one to the Asa-gods in heaven, one to the Frost-giants, and the third to the under-world. Under each root is a fountain of wonderful virtues. In the tree, which drops honey, sit an eagle, a squirrel, and four stags. At the root lies the serpent Nithhögger gnawing it, while the squirrel Ratatöskr runs up and down to sow strife between the eagle at the top and the serpent.—Scandinavian mythology.

Y'mir. The personification of Chaos, or the first created being, produced by the antagonism of heat and cold. He is called a giant, and was nourished by the four milky streams which flowed from the cow Aëdhm'la. While he slept, a man and woman grew out of his left arm, and sons from his feet. Thus was generated the race of the frost-giants (Hrimthursar).

Odin and his two brothers slew Ymir, and threw his carcase into the Ginnungagap (abyss of abysses), when his blood formed the water of the earth, his gore the ocean, his bones the mountains, his teeth the rocks, his skull the heavens, his brains the clouds, his hair plants of every kind, and his eyebrows the wall of defence against the giants.—Scandinavian mythology.

Yn'iol. An earl of decayed fortune, father of Enid, ousted from his earldom by his nephew Ed'yrn, son of Nudd, called the "Sparrow-hawk." When Ed'yrn was overthrown in single combat by prince Geraint, he was compelled to restore the earldom to Yn'iol.—Tennyson, "Idyls of the King" (Enid).

Yo'ke (1 syl.). Greek zugon, Latin jugum, French joug, Danish juk, German joch, Saxon geoc (pron. yoc), our yoke, &c.

To pass under the yoke. To suffer the disgrace of a vanquished army. The Romans made a yoke of three spears—two upright and one forming a lintel. When an army was vanquished, the soldiers had to lay down their arms and pass under this archway of spears.

Yor'ick. The King's jester, "a fellow of infinite jest and most excellent fancy" ("Hamlet," v. 1). In "Tristram Shandy," Sterne introduces a clergyman of that name, meant for himself.

York, when it was Saxon, was called Effroc, and the legend is that a duke of Effroc being drowned at the foot of the wall caused this name to be given to the city. Southwark Wall was also called the Effroc Wall or Stone.—Victor Hugo, "L'Homme qui Rit," pt. II., bk. iii. 1.

York is Eure-wic (pron. Yorric), and means the town on the Eure, now called the Ouse. The Romans Latinised the word Eure or Eere into "Evora" or "Ebora," and wic into "vicum," whence Ebora-vicum, contracted into Ebor'acum. The Saxons restored the older word.

York Stairs (London), by Inigo Jones. The only remains left of the splendid mansion of the Buckingham. The site is part of the precincts of a palace belonging to the bishops of Norwich. It then passed to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, then to the archbishops of York, then to the crown, then to the duke of Buckingham, who rebuilt it. The second duke of Buckingham pulled it down, and converted it into the five streets, &c., called respectively, "George," "Villiers," "Duke," "Of," "Buckingham." The gate leading to the Thames is the only part of this mansion which remains.

Yorkshire. I see Yorkshire too. I am as deep as you are, and am not to be bamboozled. The north-countrymen are proverbially "long-headed and cannie." A tale is told of a Yorkshire rustic under cross-examination. The counsel tried to make fun of him, and said to him, "Well, farmer, how go calves at York?" "Well, sir," said the farmer, "on four legs, and not on two." "Silence in the court!" cried the baffled bigwig, and tried again. "Now, farmer—remember you are on your oath—are there as many fools as ever in the West Riding?" "Well, no, sir, no; we've got our share, no doubt; but there are not so many as when you were there."

Young Chevalier. Charles Edward Stuart, the second Pretender. (1720-1780.)

Young England. A set of young noblemen and aristocratic gentlemen who tried to revive the formality and court manners of the Chesterfield school. They wore white waistcoats, patronised the pet poor, looked down upon shopkeepers, and were altogether Red-Tape Knights. Disraeli has immortalised their ways and manners, but scarcely a caput mortuum of their folly now remains.

Young Germany. A literary school headed by Heinrich Heine, whose aim was to liberate politics, religion, and manners from the old conventional trammels.

Young Italy. A league of Italian refugees, who associated themselves with the French republican party, called the Charbonnerie Democratique (q.v.). It was organised at Marseilles by Mazzini, and its chief object was to diffuse republican principles.

Ysolde or Ysonde. Daughter of the queen of Ireland. Sir Tristram, being wounded, was cured by Ysolde, and on his return to Cornwall gave his uncle such a glowing description of the young princess, that he sent to ask her hand in marriage. Ysolde married king Mark of Cornwall, but entertained a criminal passion for the nephew. This attachment being discovered by the king, he banished Tristram from Cornwall. Sir Tristram went to Wales, where he performed prodigies of valour, and his uncle invited him back again. The guilty intercourse being repeated, Sir Tristram was banished a second time, and went to Spain, Ermonie, and Brittany. In this last place he met with Ysolt of the White Hand, daughter of the duke of Brittany, whom he married. After many marvellous exploits he was severely wounded, and, being told that no one could cure him but Ysolde, he sent a messenger to Cornwall, and told him if the queen consented to accompany him he was to hoist a white flag. The queen hastened to succour her lover, but Ysolt told her husband that the vessel was coming with a black sail displayed. Sir Tristram, in an agony of despair, fell on his bed and instantly expired. Soon as Ysolde heard thereof, she flung herself on the corpse and died also. King Mark buried the two in one grave, and planted over it a rose-bush and vine, which so intermingled their branches as they grew up that no man could separate them.

Ysolt of the White Hand. Daughter of the duke of Brittany and wife of Sir Tristram. (See above.)

Yue-Laou, in Chinese mythology, is the old man of the moon, who unites with a silken cord all predestined couples, after which nothing can prevent their union.

Yuga. A mundane period of years, four of which have already passed, making up an aggregate of four million solar years. In the first period men were innocent and free from disease, in the second their life was shortened by one-quarter. In the first period devotion was man's object, in the second spiritual knowledge, in the third sacrifice. Compare the Hindu legend with the account given in Genesis.

Yule (1 syl.). Christmas time. The word means "The festival of the Sun," kept at the winter solstice, when the new year or sun was ushered in. Odin, "the sun," was called "Jul-vatter"—i.e., Yule father. (Saxon, gehu, "the Sun-feast;" Danish, jul; Swedish, oel, with the article "j"; Breton, heol, the sun; Welsh, *hau*l.)

Yule-log. A great log of wood laid in ancient times across the hearth-fire on Christmas Eve. This was done with certain ceremonies and much merry-making.

Yumboes (2 syl.). Fairies of African mythology, about two feet high, of a white colour, and dressed like the people of Jaloff. Their favourite haunt is the range of hills called The Paps.

When evening's shades o'er Goree's isle extend,
The nimble Yumboes from "The Paps" descend,
Nily approach the natives' huts, and s'eat
With secret hand the pounc'd coos o'os meal.
Keightley, "Fairy Mythology."

Y'ves, St. (1 syl.). Patron saint of lawyers, being himself a lawyer. As he used his knowledge of the law in defending the oppressed, he is called in Brittany "The poor man's advocate."

Y'veto't (pron. Eve-tô). The King of Yvetot. Yvetot is a town in Normandy, and the king referred to is the lord of the town, called roi d'Yvetot in old chronicles. The tradition is that Clotaire, son of Clovis, having slain Gauthier, lord of Yvetot, before the high altar of Soissons, made atonement by conferring the title of king on the heirs of the murdered man. The "Roi d'Yvetot" is one of Beranger's most popular songs. He says the king of Yvetot is little known in history; he rose late, went to bed early, slept without glory, made four meals a day in his thatched palace, rode on an ass through his domains, and his only code was pleasure.

Il était un roi d'Yvetot
Peu connu dans l'histoire;
Se levant tard, se couchant tôt,
Do maint fort bien sans gloire,
Et cour, nué par Jeanne-m
D'un simple bonnet de coton,
Dit-on.
Oh! oh! oh! oh! ah! ah! ah! ah!
Quel bon petit roi c'était là! là! là!

Z

Za'bian. The Zabian world of fashion. The world of fashion that worships the stars, or men and women of notoriety. A Zabian is a worshipper of the sun, moon, and stars. The Chaldees and ancient Persians were Zabians.

This is the new meteor, admired with so much devotion by the Zabian world of fashion.—Belgravia, No. 1.

Zachari'a. One of the three Anabaptists who induced John of Leyden to join the revolt in Westphalia and Holland. John was proclaimed "the Prophet-King." On the arrival of the emperor with his army, the Anabaptists betray their dupe; but when they enter the banquet-hall to arrest him, perish in the burning palace.—Meyerbeer, "Le Prophète (an opera).

Zacoc'ia. King of Mozam'bec. Camoens, in his "Lusiad," says that he received Vasco de Gama and his men with great hospitality, believing them to be Mahometans, but the moment he discovered that they were Christians all his kindness turned to the most rancorous hate. He tried to allure them into ambush, but failing in this, sent to Gama a pilot to conduct the fleet to Momba'ze (2 syl.), where the whole party would have been killed or reduced to slavery. This treachery failed also because Venus drove the fleet in a contrary direction by a storm. The faithless pilot lastly attempted to run the ships upon hidden rocks, but the Nereids came to the rescue, and the pilot threw himself into the sea to escape the anger of the Portuguese adventurer.—Camoens, "Lusiad," bks. i., ii.

Zad'kiel (3 syl.). Angel of the planet Jupiter.—Jewish mythology.

Zulkiel. The nom de plume of lieutenant Morrison.

Zodkiel. The pseudonym of a Mr. Smith of Derby, author of the "Prophetic Almanac."

Za'doc, in Dryden's satire of "Ab-salom and Achitophel," is designed for Sancroft, archbishop of Canterbury.

Zakari'ja ibn Muhammed, surnamed Kazvini, from Kaswin, the place of his birth. De Sacy calls him "The Pliny of the East." (1200-1283.)

Zal. Son of Sâm Nerimân, exposed on Mount Elburz, because he was born with white hair, and therefore supposed to be the offspring of a deer. He was brought up by the wonderful bird Seemurgh (q.v.), and when claimed by his father, received from the foster-bird a feather to give him insight into futurity.—Persian mythology.

Zan'ès. The statues dispersed about the grounds on which the public games of Greece were celebrated. They were the produce of fines imposed on those who infringed the regulations.

Zano'ni. Hero of a novel so called, by lord Lytton. Zanonì is supposed to possess the power of communicating with spirits, prolonging life, and producing gold, silver, and precious stones.

Zan'y, more correctly Zanny. It is the Latin sanna (a grimace), whence the buffoon in the Roman mimes was called Sannio, changed by the Italians into Zanni.

I take these modern wise men, that crow so at these set kind of fools, no better than the fools' zaucies.—Shakespeare, "Twelfth Night," i. 5.

Zaramilla. Wife of Tinae'rio, king of Micomicon, a hundred days' journey from Lake Meo'tis. The king was told that his daughter would succeed him, but would be dethroned by the giant Pandaflando, and would flee to Spain, where she would meet a knight to redress her wrongs.—Cervantes, "Don Quixote," bk. iv. 3.

Zayde. A novel by Madame La Fayette.

Zel. A Moorish instrument of music.

Where, some hours since, was heard the swell
Of trumpet, and the clash of zel.

Thomas Moore, "Fire-Worshippers."

Zel'ica was in love with Azim. Azim left his native Bokhara to join the Persian army, and was taken captive by the Greeks. Report said "he was dead;" Zel'ica lost her reason, joined the haram of the Veiled Prophet as "one of the elect of Paradise," and became "priestess of the Faith." When Azim joined the prophet's band, Zelica was appointed to lure him to his destruction both of body and soul. They meet—Azim tells her to fly with him, but she tells him she is the prophet's bride, and flees from his embrace. After the death of the prophet Zelica puts on his veil, and Azim, thinking he sees the prophet, rushes on her and kills her.—Thomas Moore, "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan."

Zelo'tes (3 syl.) or Sicarii were pious assassins among the Jews, who imposed on themselves the task of killing all who broke the Mosaic law.—Mishnah, "Sandhedrim," ix. 6.

Simon Zelotes was probably a disciple of Judas the Gaulonite, leader of a party of the Kenaim 'Sicarii.'—Renan, "Life of Jesus," ix.

Zem, the sacred well of Mecca. According to Arab tradition, this is the very well that was shown to Hagar when Ishmael was perishing of thirst. Mecca is built round it.

Zen'chis Khan (great chief). A title assumed in 1206 by Temoudin, a Persian rebel, in the presence of 100 tribes. His progress was like that of a destroying angel, and by his sword Persia became part of the vast Mogul empire.

Zend-Avesta. The great work of Zoroaster or rather Zarathustra, the Mede, who reformed the Magian religion. It is the Avesta or "Living Word," written in the Zend language (B.C. 490). Some say Zend means "paraphrase," and that Zend-Avesta is equivalent to the Parsee Scripture and paraphrase or commentary.

Zenel'ophon, a corruption of Penel'ophon. The beggar-maid loved by king Cophe'tua.

The magnanimous and most illustrious king Cophe'tua set eye upon the pernicious and indubitable beggar Zenelophon.—Shakespeare, "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 1.

Zephon (searcher of secrets). The cherub dispatched by Gabriel to find Satan, after his flight from hell. Ithuriel goes with him.—Milton, "Paradise Lost."

Zeph'yr. The west wind, the son of Æolus and Aurora, and the lover of Flora.—Roman mythology.

Zerbi'no (in "Orlando Furioso"). Son of the king of Scotland, and intimate friend of Orlando.

Zerli'na. A rustic beauty about to be married to Masetto, when Don Giovanni practises on her credulity, and induces her to believe that he intended to make her a fine lady.—Mozart, "Don Giovanni" (an opera).

Zero. The 0 in arithmetic, &c. Probably ezoro, an Italian form of the Hebrew ezor (a girdle), being the heraldic girdle and buckle.

Zeus (1 syl.). The Grecian Jupiter. The word means the "living one." (Sanskrit Djaus, heaven; Latin Jupiter, our Tues-day.)

Zeuxis (2 syl.), a Grecian painter, is said to have painted some grapes so well that the birds came and pecked at them.

È'en as poor birds, deceived with painted grapes,
Do surfeit by the eye, and rine the maw.
Shakespeare, "Venus and Adonis."

Zif. Hypothetical stock, entered in "salted accounts" to give a colourable balance "to the good." (Hebrew, zifh, a book.)—Vidocq, "Les Voleurs," vol. ii., pp. 81, 87.

Zig. A prodigious cock, which stands with its feet on the earth and touches heaven with its head. When its wings are spread it darkens the sun, and causes a total eclipse. This cock crows before the Lord, and delighteth him.—Babylonish Talmud.

Zim and Jim. His house was made a habitation for Zim and Jim, and every unclean thing ("Godly Man's Portion," 1663). The marginal reading of Isa. xiii. 21, 22, explains Zim to be wild beasts, and Jim jackals.

Zimri, in Dryden's "Absalom and Achitophel," is the second duke of Buckingham. Like the captain who conspired against Asa, king of Judah, he "formed parties and joined factions," but pending the issue "he was drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza, steward of his house" (1 Kings xvi. 9).

Some of the chiefs were princes in the land;
In the first rank of these did Zimri stand;
A man so various that he seemed to be
Not one, but all mankind's epitomé.
Stiff in opinions, always in the wrong.

Was everything by starts, and no thing long.
Dryden.

Zinca'li. Gipsies; so called in Spain from Sinte or Sind (India) and calo (black), the supposition being that they came from Hindustan, which no doubt is true. The Persian Zungi means an Ethiopian or Egyptian.

Zin'dikites (3 syl.). An heretical Mahometan sect, who disbelieve in God, the resurrection, and a future life. They think that the world is the production of four eternal elements, and that man is a microcosm of the world.

Zineu'ra, in the "Decameron" of Boccaccio (Day ii., Novel 9), is the Imogen of Shakespeare's "Cymbeline." In male attire Zineura assumed the name of Sieura'no da Finalé, and Imogen of Fide'lé. Zineura's husband was Bernard Lomellin, and the villain Ambrose. Imogen's husband was Posthumus Leonatus, and the villain Iachimo. In Shakespeare, the British king Cymbeline takes the place assigned by Boccaccio to the sultan.

Zion. Daughter of Zion. Jerusalem or its inhabitants. The city of David stood on Mount Zion. Zion and Jerusalem were pretty much in the same relation to each other as Old and New Edinburgh.

Zist. Se trouver entre le zist et le zest. To be in a quandary, in a state of perfect bewilderment. Also, to shilly shally. "Zest" is anything of no value, as Cela ne vaut pas un zest, It is not worth a fig. "Zist" is the same word slightly varied.

Zobeide (2 syl.). A lady of Bagdad, whose history is related in the "Three Calenders." The kalif Haroun-al-Raschid married her.—"Arabian Nights."

Zo'diac. An imaginary belt or zone in the heavens, extending about 8 degrees each side of the ecliptic.

Signs of the Zodiac. The zodiac is divided into twelve equal parts, proceeding from west to east; each part is 30 degrees, and is distinguished by a sign. Beginning with "Ariës," we have first six northern and then six southern signs—i.e., six on the north side and six on the south side of the equator; beginning with "Capricornus," we have six ascending and then six descending signs—i.e., six which ascend higher and higher towards the north, and six which descend lower and lower towards the south. The six northern signs are Aries (the ram), Taurus (the bull), Gemini (the twins), spring signs; Cancer (the crab), Leo (the lion), Virgo (the virgin), summer signs. The six southern are Libra (the balance), Scorpio (the scorpion), Sagittarius (the archer), autumn signs; Capricornus (the goat), Aquarius (the water-bearer), and Pisces (the fishes), winter signs. (Greek, zōon, living creatures.)

Our vernal signs the RAM begins,
Then comes the BULL, and then the TWINS;—
The CRAB in June, then LEO shines,
And VIRGO ends the northern signs.
The BALANCE brings autumnal fruits,
The SCORPIO stings, the ARCHER shoots;—
Then comes the GOAT with WINTER blast,
AQUARIUS next, the FISHES last.

Zohar. The name of a Jewish book containing cabalistic expositions of the "books of Moses."

Zoïlism. Harsh, ill-tempered criticism; so called from Zoïlos (q.v.).

Zoïlos (Latin, Zoïlus). The sword of Zoïlos. The pen of a critic. Zoïlos was a literary Thersitès, shrewd, witty, and spiteful. He was nicknamed Hómēromastix (Homer's-scourge), because he mercilessly assailed the epics of Homer, and called the companions of Ulysses in the island of Circé "weeping porkers" (choirid'ou klaionta). He also flew at Plato, Isocrates, and other high game.

Zollverein is Zoll-Verein (customs-union), a commercial union of German states, for the purpose of establishing a uniform tariff of duties. (Begun 1819.)

Zo'phiel (3 syl.). An angelic scout of "swiftest wing." The word means "God's spy."—Milton, "Paradise Lost."

Zoraida (3 syl.). Daughter of Agimora'te of Algiers, who becomes a Christian and elopes with Ruy Perez de Viedma, an officer of Leon. The story is told in an episode of "Don Quixote," called "The Captive's Life and Adventures" (bk. iv., ch. 9-11).

Zoraide (3 syl.) or Zoraida. The name of a yacht belonging to the squadron at Cowes. This name is taken from Rossini's "Zoraidi et Coradin."

Zorphee (2 syl.). A fairy in the romance of "Am'adis de Gaul."

Zulal. That stream of Paradise, clear as crystal and delicious as nectar, which the "spirits of the just made perfect" drink of.

Zuleï'ka. Daughter of Giaffir, pacha of Aby'dos. She is all purity and loveliness. Her intelligence, joyousness, undeviating love, and strict regard to duty are beautifully portrayed. She promises to flee with Selim and become his bride; but her father, Giaffir, shoots her lover, and Zuleika dies of a broken heart.—Byron, "Bride of Abydos." Zulfa'gar. Ali's sword.

Zumbi. A ghost is so called in Congo.—African mythology.

Faire le Zumbi. To come as a ghost and disturb a banquet.

Zuttibur. The demon of forests.—Scandinavian mythology.
